The prudent king of England seeing the resemble of his adversaries sent his heralds unto them, commaunding them, either forthwith to come to battell, or else immediately to depart the field, and if they delayde to depart, or to come to battell, both those of their company already taken prisoners, and also all they that should thereafter be taken, without mercie or redemption should be put to death: which message when the Frenchmen heard, fearing the strength of the Englishmen, and also the death, both of themselves, and also of their friends before taken prisoners, with great heavinesse, and with shame, they forthwith departed. When the king of England being assured of the victorie, gave the greatest land and praise to God that might be.

Frenchmen
slaine.

In this battell were slaine on the French party, the Noble Dukes of Alanson, of Berrey, and Bauere, and the Lord Hely, the Lord Labret chiefe Constable of France, the Archbishop of Saunce, Eight Carles, an hundred and one Barons, fiftene hundred knights, and above tenne thousand of all estates, whereof scarcely fiftene hundred were souldiers or labourers, the rest were of coate armour (saith Enguerant:) but Thomas Elmham saith, Archbishops, one, Dukes, three, Carles, five, Barons, and such like, fourescore and twelue, knights, fiftene hundred, of Esquires and Gentlemen, seven thousand, whereof he nameth the Archbishoppe of Saunce, the Dukes of Brabant, Alanson, and of Bauere, the Carles of Flanders, Daupmartin, Harlenes, Grantper, Saunfis, and of Dansemonteuse, the Lord of Biet, Constable of Fraunce.

Frenchmen taken prisoners.

In this battell were taken prisoners of the Frenchmen, the Dukes of Oyleance, and of Bourbon, Arthur brother to the Duke of Britaine, the Carles of Glandosme, of Cleve, and Richimount, and sir Bomcicault Marshall of Fraunce, and many other to the number of 1500. Knightes and Esquires: And of the English partie were slayne Edward Duke of Yorke, buried at Fordinghey, Michaell de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, buried at new Elme, and to the number of an hundred persons in the bantgard, and of all estates in the English partie were not found dead above fife hundred in the fiede. When night approached, the king of England returned with his host into the villiage, wherein they had harboured the night before, where he found his horses, and other baggages and carriages that he left behinde him there before the field, to be stolen and caried away by the Frenchmen: where amongst many other Jewels of great price, was stolen away a sword of great value, adorned with gold and precious stones, which was after given to Philip Earle of Charloys, sonne and heire to Iohn Duke of Britaine.

King Henry having gathered his army together, gave thanks to Almightye

the God for his so happy a victory, causing his Priests and Chaplaines to sing the Psalm, In Exitu Israel de Agypto, and commanding every man to kneele downe on the ground at this verse, Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam: which being done, he caused Te Deum with certaine Anthems to be song, giuing laud and praise to God, not boasting of his owne force or any humane power. This night when the King sate at his refection in the foresaid village, he was serued at his boorde, of those great Lords and Princes that were taken in the field. That night the King appointed god and sure watches throughout his host, for feare of sodaine inuasions, but the Frenchmen were vtterly diuided and gone without making or intending any new businesse, whereby the Englishmen were suffered in peace to take their rest.

On the next day the King with his people entred his iourney toward Calice: and as they passed through the fields where they had fought the day before, they found all the dead bodies dispoyled, as well of their harnesse, as of their array, by the inhabitantes of the countrey, notwithstanding the bodies that might be knowne for Englishmen of any reputation, the king caused to be entered according to their estates, and so continuing his iourney the King came to the Castell of Swines, and from thence he went to his Towne of Calice, with all his host and his prisoners, where he was receined of his siegemen, with great ioy and due honour. After the kings host was somewhat refreshed with meat, drinke and sleepe, the king conferred with his wise counsellors, if it were good now to returne into France, and to pursue his enterprise begun, or else to return with his host into England, there to refresh his people, among whom it was considered that the number of his people was right small, and many of them bered with the sir, many soze grieved of their wounds which they had receined at the field. Moreover, that their long staying at Calice should cause scarcity of victualles there, whereas otherwise in their owne countrey, the people should at moze ease refresh themselves, and also be better cured of their wounds: finally, considering the time had not been hitherto vnfortunate, but that with honour they might returne with great gaine, which they had conquered, they doubted not, but by the ayde of God the King should right well obtaine his desire in time to come, for which causes they all condescended vpon their returne into England.

Then with all diligence the shipp was prepared, and by the kings commaundement, the Lords and great estates of the prisoners of France vnto a great number, were brought into that ship, wherein the King was determined to passe the Sea. At this their passage the Sea was maruellously boysterous and rough, insomuch as two of the English shippes were perished in the floods, by reason whereof the French prisoners were so incombred and bered, that the day of their passage seemed to the no lesse bitter & terrible, than that day wherein they were taken at Agencourt, nor they could not maruell enough, how the king should haue so great strengthes, so easily to resist and endure the rage and boysterousnesse of the Sea, without accombrance and discase of his stomache. When the King had passed the Sea, and was come to arrive and to take land at Doner, innumerable people of Religion, Priests, and Noblemen, and of the commons came running to meete the King in every way: and when he was arrived on the xiii. day of November, he abode at Doner by certaine daies, to refresh and rest his Lords, and his prisoners, after his troublesome passage, and from thence he took his journey towards the Citie of London, where the Mayor of London, with the Aldermen and craftes to the number of foure hundred riding in red, with hodes red and white, met with the King on the Black heath comming from Eltham, and so brought him through London to Westminster, with all his prisoners of Fraunce.

The gates and streets of the Citie were garnished and apparelled with precious clothes of Arras, containyng the victories, triumphes and princely Actes of the Kings of England his progenitors, which was done to the ende that the King might understand, what remembrance his people would to their posterity of these his great victories and triumphes. The Conduits through the Citie ranne none other but good swete wines, and that abundantly. There were also made in the streets many Towers and stages, adorned richly, and vpon the height of them sate small children, apparelled in semblance of Angels, with swete tuned voyces singing prayes and laudes vnto God: for the victorious King would not suffer any ditties to be made and song of his victory, for that he would wholly haue the praises giuen to God: neyther would hee suffer to be carried befoze him, nor shewed vnto the people his helmet, wherupon his Crowne of golde was broke, and deposed in the fieldes by the violence of the enemye, and great strokes that he had receined, nor his other armour that in that cruell battaile was so sore broken, but as the faithfull constant champion of God, he eschewed all occasions of vaine glory, and refused the vaine praises of the people. On the next morrow, the Mayor, Aldermen and 200. of the commons presented the king with a 1000. l. in two basons of gold, worth 500. pounds.

The first day of December, by the kings commaundement, a great number of the bishops and Abbots of the realme, were assembled at London, there to celebrate and keepe the requies for Edward late Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke, and of other both English and French, which died in partes beyond the sea: vnto these solemnities came from Harlew, he Captaine of the same Towne, the Kings vncke Earle of Dorset, who a little befoze had made a roade into the borders of the countrey next adioyning, and had put them to flight, and taken prisoners 800.

In the feast of the Purification, seuen dolphins of the sea came by the riuer of Thamis, and plaid there whiles foure of them were kille.

The first of May, Sigismonde the Emperour landed at Dover, and the tenth of May, the Mayor, Aldermen, and craftes of London receiued him at Blacke-heath, and the King with his Lords met him at S. Thomas Waterings, and so brought him through London to Westminster. The Emperour returned out of England the xvi. of August, after he had laboured, but could make no peace betwene England and France.

John Benet woolman, who had in London scattered seducles full of sedition, was drawne, hanged, and beheaded on Michaelmas day. The viii. day of October, was a parchment maker of Trillmell Streete, drawne, hanged, and beheaded, for that he had harboured sir John Old-castell.

King Henry of England, immediately after his returne from Caleis, sent his legats to Constance, where was kept y general counsell, as ye haue heard, which with all other legats, the Emperour being there present, laboured for the vnitie and peace of their mother the Church, and to reform the schisme that had long continued of the Popes, which counsell took effect in this manner. They first deposed all the Popes, by whom the schisme was continued, & they with the Cardinals elected into the papacy, the Cardinal of Colompre, borne in Rome, and was named Martin the fift. whose armes were a pillar of siluer crowned with golde, in a field gules. At this counsell, by the assent of all nations there present, it was authorized, and ordained that England should obtaine the name of a nation, and should be said one of the five nations, that owe their deuotion to the Church of Rome, which thing vntill that time, men of other nations, for enuy had delayed and letted.

In the Parliament at London, Thomas Bewfort Earle of Dorset was made Duke of Excester, and had 1000. l. the yere giuen him.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Kenelworth, at which time there was treason wrought gainst him, by a certaine Esquire of the complices of sir John Old-castell.

The morrow after Christmas day, certaine seditious persons spread abroad poisoned bills, rayling against all estates of the Church, almost in euery great house, and hospital of the Townes of Saint Albons, Portsmouth, Reading, &c. but no man would be knowne to be the author of them: also one by his counterfeited name, called frer Tucke with many other malefactors, committed many robberies in the countries of Surrey, and Sussex, whereupon the King sent out his writs for their apprehension.

On Easter day in the after-noon, at a Sermon in Saint Dunstons in the East of London, a great fray happened in the Church, where-through many people were sore wounded, and one Thomas Petwarden fishmonger, layne out of hande, wherefore the Church was suspended, and the beginners of the fray ( which was the Lord Strange, and sir John Tussell knight, through the quarrell of their two wiues ) were brought to the Counter in the Pultrie: the Archbishoppe of Canterbury caused them to be excommunicate, as well at Pauls Crosse, as in all other parish Churches of the Citie. the Lord Strange and his wife, who upon the first of May following, in Paule Church befoze the Archbishop, the Mayor of London, and other, submitted themselves to penance, which was intoned them, that immediatly all their servants should in their shirts go befoze the Parson of Saint Dunstons, from Paules, to Saint Dunstons Church, and the Lord bare headed, with his Ladie bare footed, Reignold Kenwood Archdeacon of London following them, and at the halloving of the Church, the Ladie should fill all the vessels with water, and also offer an oznamment of tenne pound, and the Lord Strange should offer a Pire of five pound.

Carle Dowglas of Scotland came into England, and promised amittie to the king, the which he assured by oath and writing sealed, yet not withstanding he after turned to the French, at the battaile of Cernol in Berch fought by the Duke of Bedford as shall be shewed.

Titus Livius.

King Henry prepared his Paule, ordinance, and victuall for his people, and generally all other things behouefull for the warres, he assembled through England such men as wel Dukes, Carles, Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, and commons as he knew were good both for warre and peace: which being done, upon Saint Markes day the Euangelist he toke his journey towarde Hampton, in purpose, when the winde and sea were favourable, to goe into France: he rode through London, till he came at Paules, where he alighted and made his offering, and in like maner he offered at Saint Georges in Southwarke, and in all his way he gaue the farewell to every man, praying them all to pray to God for him.

In this meane time the Frenchmen, made covenant with the Citizens of Genae (a Citie in Italy) whereby the Italians were bound, at a certaine price for every Caricke limited for the French mens money, to prepare and furnish with armed men, as many of their greatest Carickes as the French should desire, and so prepared they should send them to the ayde of the French men, against the Englishmen, many of these Carickes so prepared, were of marvellous greatnes, pea greater then ever were seene in those parts befoze that time, they sayled into the mouth of the Saene, where they strongly assailed Werssieste by water, whereof when the king of England was aduertised, he delibered to go vnto them in his own person to remove them from this siege, but from that purpose hee was letted, by the aduise of his counsaile, wherefoze he gaue that journey to the right puissant Iohn, Carle of Hunting-ton, who entred the Paule, departed from the land, and had such sauable winde, that in short time he was brought vnto the enemies, who assailed ech other by great vigoze and strength. Their ships were grappled together, the more part of a sommers day, but at the length the Italians oppressed by the strength of the Englishmen, were bitterly discomfited and overcome, their greatest Caricks, and also the greater part of their men were taken, the residue of the Genowales seeing their fellows slaine or taken, were stricken with feare, & their chaines or cables broken, or heved alunder, they departed their Caricks from the English ships, and escaped by helpe of the winde and streame. This victozy obtayned, the Noble Carle returned to Hampton

Hampton, whereof when the king was aduertised, he gaue laud and praising for this victorie vnto God: and for the same he inhaunted the Earle his nephew, with honour, and also with rewardes, he had fought with nine earles and taken foure of them, with their patrons, and the Admiral of them all, that was called the Bastard of Bourbon, with all the treasure that they all should haue bene waged with for a quarter of a yere.

The xxviii. day of Iuly the puissant king Henry (his shipp of 1500. ships being prepared) assembled his armie to passe the seas, of his owne company and purueiance 16400. armed men, and besides that number came to him to Dover, Lords and Gentlemen with their retinues, and the day and place for the same prefixed: first the Duke of Clarence with 240. speares, and 720. archers in his retinue: and the Duke of Gloucester with 100. speares, and 300. archers, and five Earles with 470. speares, and 1410. archers, to wit, the Earle of March 100. speares and 300. archers, the Earle of Warwick 100. speares 300. archers, the Earle of Huntington 40. speares, and 120. archers, the Earle of Suffolke 30. speares, and 90. archers, and the Earle of Salisbury 100. speares, and 300. archers, and after these Earles followed 13. estates of the Realme, with 506 speares, and 1500. archers, that is to say, the Lord Burgaunay, the Lord Mastrauers, the Lord Fitz Hughe, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Grey, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Talbot, the Lord E. Courtney, the L. Bourcher, the Lord Rosse, the Lord Louel, the L. Ferrers of Chartley, the L. Harrington.

After came 87. knights, and their retinue, 940. speares, and 2852. archers. Of carpenters and other artificers the king had with him in wages to the number of 1000. and so the kings whole hoste besides labourers & artificers, amounted to the number of 25527. fighting men, of whom euery fourth man was a horseman. Whose things thus ordered, and the shipp for their conueyance ready apparelled, the king entred his shippe, which was royally and sumptuously adorned: the sayle thereof was of purple silke, right beautifully embroidered, both with the armes of England & of Fraunce, and this ship they called the Kings chamber. He had also another the second a caricke of like apparell, which by the Kings commaundement they called the Kings hall, and these two he ordered to be the principall of all the shipp. Before he departed the Realme, he constituted Iohn Duke of Bedford his brother, to be protector of his Realme of England in his absence.

On the first day of August the whole fleet arrived in Normandie, not farre from the Castell of Tonque, where the king dubbed 48. knights, such as were worthe of that order. Now, when all the ships were discharged of their carriages, the king sent them againe into England, except such ships as were deputed for the carriage of guns and other engins and habiliments of warre.

This being done, the king sent men of armes on horsebacke to espie the situation and strength of the Castell of Pymflew, and other nigh vnto those parts, which Gentlemen, with many prisoners returned, and great prayes of beastes. Their enemies stricken with feare, euery man conueyed their goods and beastes into the Cities, Townes and Castels, not knowing which the king would first besiege : they strengthened their Townes and walles with stones, guns and other things necessary for their defence. The king took his enterprise to assaige the Towne of Tongue, whose Castell was marvellously defensible, the assaige wherof was given to the Duke of Gloucester, chiefe taine of the kings avantguard, who constrained the Frenchmen so soze, what with assaults, with guns and other engines, that within short time, to wit, the fourth day of the siege, and the ninth day of August, they promised to yeld the Castell to the Duke, if the same were not shortly rescued by the French : but when they heard no word of succour, they yelded the Castell to the king, and he made sir John Kikeley Captaine there.

Also the Earle of Salisbury conductor of the kings second battell whiles the Duke of Gloucester assaiged the Castell of Tongue, wanne the Castell of Aumbeliers, and put out the Frenchmen thereof, which Castell so taken, with all that belonged therunto, the king gaue to the same Earle. And thus this Noble Earle was the first that had any land given unto him of the kings liberalitie in this conquest.

The Earle Marshall was sent to the Castell of Louers, which in short time he subdued, and after it was given to him by the king.

King Henry
besieged Cam-

The eighteenth day of August, the king placed himselfe with his army before the Citie of Cane, on the south side nere vnto the Monastery of Saint Stephen, and the Duke of Clarence the kings brother was sent before with one thousand horsemen to keepe the suburbs of the Towne, that the townsmen should not burne them, the Duke thus lodged on the north side, by the Monastery of Suns of the holy Trinitie : the Earle Marshall lay on the left hand of the king, and the Lord Maltravers hard by him, and by him were placed the Lords Talbot and Vmfreuile : and next to them the Lords Neuill and Willoughby. On the right hand of the king lay the Earle of Warwick & the Lord John Grey, and by them the Earles of Huntington & of Salisbury, and the Lord Gren-Cornewall.

The kings army thus placed and set in order : the Abbey of Saint Stephen being manned with Frenchmen, when they sawe themselves too weake to resist the kings force, they took and carried away both victualles and Iewelles of the house, and brought them into the Towne next adioyning, and deuised how they mought set the Abbey on fire : but a certaine Monk of the place boldly put himselfe in jeopardy in the dead season of the night, to creepe on handes and feete, till he came to the Duke of Clarence, whom he found lying in compleate harnesse, in a garden vpon the grasse, with his head vpon a stone, whom he besought to prevent the ruine of his place, which else should be destroyed. For, said he, it doth specially pertaine to you to preserve our Monastery, which are descended of the king which founded our place, builded it, and indued it with possessions, wherefore take mine aduise and I will bring you into the place, and the Duke following the Monks counsell, took scaling ladders, and came to the side of the Abbey, which the Monk knewe was not manned. The Duke hauing by this meanes gotten the place, brought the king into it.

Not

Not farte diftant from this place was an other Monaftery of women, right ftrong and defendible, which alfo that worthy Duke had receiued vnder his tuition.

The fourth day of September, at the breake of the day, the king caufed all his trumpets to be founded, and forthwith the ladders were rayfed to the walles of the Towne, they fell to scaling them with great diligence, but many of them were caft backward into the ditch, and their ladders with them: the French caft great ftones vpon the Englifhmen, they powred on their heades ſerching water, molten lead, boiling pitch, and oyle, all which would not make the Englifhmen forfake the affault, amongft whom Edmond Springes lately made knight, in his armour went vpon the walles of Cane, and fought very foze, both giuing and receiuing many woundes, and yet at length was overcome and died. Notwithftanding the kings men ceafed not to affault and fet vpon the enemies fo fircely, on that one fide, that they that were on the other fide the Towne to keepe and to defend the fame, were forced to leaue their ftanding, and to come to that fide that the king affaulted. And thus when that fide of the Towne was boyde of defence, the Duke of Clarence, in the place which was thought moft fafe, scaled the wals and came vpon the backs of the Frenchmen, which fo fodaynly aftonked them, that they knew not whether it were better to go on for ward againft the king, or to turne backe to withftand the Duke.

Thus great deftruction and laughter was made of the Frenchmen, for the king meeting them in their foreward, and the Duke of Clarence coming on the rereward, toke all hope of fagegard from them, and thus the king got the Towne, and entred the fame by the gates, that the Duke had opened for him. After which entry of the king, he went to with great deuotion the principall Church of the Towne being of Saint Peter, there to giue laudings and praifes to the Almighty God, for the obtayning of this fo great a victozy. All they that intended to prayes were maruelloufly enriched, for the inhabitants of that Towne were men of great fubftance: but there was no man fo hardy that durft preſume to robbe any Church, for feare of the kings iuflice, which was extreme in that caſe, no women in the Towne were rauifhed by the Englifhmen, but ſhortly after the king commaunded all women and children to be auoyded out of the towne, and fo the towne was inhabited of new poſſeſſors. The king made fir Gilbert Vinſeuille Earle of Ryme, captain there, and fir Gilbert Talbot, and fir Iohn Popham bayliffes. Neuertheleſſe the Caſtel of Cane was not yet gotten, they held it thre weekes after the taking of the towne. After the taking of this town of Cane, the ſiege yet enduring before the Caſtel, the puiſſant Prince the Duke of Gloceſter, with his battell before Bayeur, they of the Towne and Caſtell yielded vnto him.

The xx. day of September the Caſtell of Cane was deliuered vnto King Henry: and in ſhort time the Englifhmen had taken the Citie of Liccur, and the Caſtel of Newby: and not long after, all the fortifications, were it town, Caſtell or Citie within a great circuite about them, were taken and reduced to the kings obedience.

The Scots
besieging Berwick and Roxborough.

Tinus Livius.

Whilste these things were in doing in Normandie, the saourers of sir John Old-castell beganne to rage in England, who with great proffers and promise of money, stirred by the Scots to invade the Realme in the kings absence, affirming that the same would be easily wonne, and it was said that sir John Old-castell talked with William Douglas the Scot at Pontefract, promising him a great summe of money, to perswade the people to come with him, and to bring with them, him, who was falsely called king Richard, and to set him out as king. Also indentures, and other writings were found, made betwixt sir John Old-castell & the Duke of Albany, in the which the Scots were invited to besiege Roxborough and Berwike: whereupon the Duke of Albany besieged Berwike by water and land on each side: and the Earle Dowglas did also besiege Roxborough, carrying there xv. daies, undermining to overthrow the walles, but it hapned at the same time Thomas Beauford Duke of Excester, came to Wyndlesington upon deuotion to that place, who straightwaies, so soone as he heard tidings thereof, went into those parts, gathering by the way as he went men of armes and archers. On the other side John Duke of Bedford protectoz of the Realme, and other Nobles, to wit Ralph Earle of Westmerland, and Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, with 60000. warriors, the Archbishop of Yorke Henry Bewet, which for great age might not indure to ride upon an horse, caused himselfe to be brought to the English hoste in his chaire, there to comfort & in courage the hearts of the people, that they should more ardently defend their countrey, his Cleargy being there with him, & other, remoued those sieges: for the Scots in the night leaving their tents, ladders & other engins, with shame returned into Scotland.

When these things were in good suretie toward the North, the Duke of Excester with a chosen company of men of warre, toke his ships, and sailed into Normandy, where he landed, & toke his journey towards Roane to the king, in the which journey, he wained the Citie of Chzotren.

King Henry hauing deputed in all his towne and fortes, Captaines and gouerners, into whose hands all the Frenchmen that should returne into the kings obessance, should giue their othes of true allegiance. The first of October he departed from Cane with his people, leaving behinde him a sufficient garrison, and toke his journey to the Castell of Coursey, which on the third day after was yelded vnto him. The first of October he went to assiege Argentine, which Towne was very defensible and strong, with a Castell of great strength, but the inhabitants of this Towne answered the kings heralds, that if they were not succoured by the Frenchmen by a certaine day limited, they would deliuer both the Towne and Castell vnto the king vnder condition, to depart with their goods and when the time limited was come, the Towne and Castell were deliuered. After this, daily resorted to the king much people of Normandy, to do fealty vnto him, and to liue vnder his Emprye. The Citie of Sees which was right well peopled, and wherein were two Abbies marvellous strong and defensible, yelded vnto the king: likewise many other Townes in that prouince yelded them vnto the king, without assault or battell. These things thus done, the king toke his voyage toward ward Alanson, to receiue into his dominion the Towne of Semile, in which iourney he sent a great part of his host to two strong Abbets, whereof the one was called Bomolins, and the other Cley, which, if they had made resistance, he commaunded to be taken by force, but they submitted themselves to the kings authoritie. The king came to Alanson on the 15. of October, where he first caused his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester to pitch his tents before the Castell, and the rest of the Towne himselve assieged. This Towne and Castell was likewise yelded to the king in manner as the rest. The English men after this toke the Towne of Bolosine, and the Towne and Castell of Freswey: and shortly to recount, all the countrey by a great circuit, Cities, Townes and Castels were brought vnder the kings subiection. In this time, the Duke of Britaine accompanied with many great estates of his countrey came to king Henry, with whom he accorded a peace from the 17. day of October, vntill the last day of September, in the yere following. The Dolphine of France also desired to treat with the king of England for peace, to whose Embassadors the king appointed the Towne of Tongue, whereunto they might safely resort for the same treaty, but there was no good done.

The king besieged Walbeys, which the French, to their power resisted right manfully, and made with them many battailes, and skirmishes: but in the ende the inhabitants, seeing the Englishmen more couetous of honour, then weary of paine, they couenanted with the king, that if by the second day of Januarie they were not deliuered from the siege, they should freely deliuer vnto the king their Towne. In this meane time was taken in England sir Iohn Olde-castle, in the territoyp of the Lord Powesse, not without danger and hurt of some that toke him: neither could he himselfe be taken before he was wounded. At the which time all the states of the Realme were called to a Parliament at London, therein to prouide the king of a subsidie and aide of money, who toke great paines beyond the seas. These Lords & other when they heard tell that the publike enemy was taken, they agreed all, not to dissolue the Parliament vntill he were examined, and heard to answer in the same: wherefore the Lord of Powes was sent to fetch him vp with power, who brought him to London in a litter, wounded, and also a Cleark with him that was of counsell in all his secrets. As soone as the said sir Iohn Olde-castle was brought into the Parliament before the Duke of Bedford, regent and gouernour of the Realme, and the other estates, his inditement was read before him, of his forcible insurrection against the king in Saint Giles hielde, and other treasons by him committed, the question was asked how he would excuse himselfe, and shew why he should not be deemed to die: but he seeking other talke beganne to preach of the mercies of God, and that all mortal men that would be followers of God, ought to preferre mercy aboue iudgement, and that vengeance pertayned onely to the Lord, and ought not to be practised by them that worship God, but to be left to God alone: with many other wordes to detract the time, vntill the chiefe Justice admonished the Regent not to suffer him to spend the time so vainely; in molesting of the Nobles of the Realme: whereupon the Earle of Bedford regent commanded him to answer formally vnto the matter laid to his charge. The said sir Iohn being thus vrged, at the last after deliberation taken, he said, it is the least thing that I account of, to be iudged by you, as of mans iudgement: and againe, he began to talke, but nothing to the purpose, vntill the chiefe iustice commanded him againe to answer finally, and to informe them if he could, why he should not suffer death. To the which he stoutly answered, that he had no iudge amongst them, so long as his liege Lord King Richard was a liue, and in the Realme of Scotland, which answered when he had made, because there needed no further witness, he was commanded to be drawne and hanged vpon a gallows, and to be burned hanging vpon the same, which iudgement was executed vpon him on the xiiii. day of December in Saint Giles field. where when many honourable persons were present, the last words that he spake, was to sir Thomas of Epingham, aduising him, that if he saw him rise from death to life againe, the third day, he would procure that his sect might be in peace and quiet: he was hanged by the necke in a chaine of iron, and after consumed with fire.

King Henry kept his feast of the Patenitie of Christ at Batour in Normandie, where when the day limited was come, they of Phalois, with gates open deliuered the Towne to the king, and shortly after the Castell was yielded to him also.

The Duke of Clarence with his armed power conquered in this time the Townes and Castels of Harcourt, Fagnon, Liuil, Cambysle, Courton, and diuers other, and also the strong Abbey of Biskilrom, all which places, the mightie Duke, with assaiges, assaults, oppressions, and faire promises, especially obserued, in short time he subdued, to the kings Empery.

An. reg. 6.

The Duke of Gloucester was sent to the Ile of Constantine, in the first entrie of which iourney, he obtayned the strong Castell of Caudey, from whence he went to the Towne and Castell of Alire, the inhabitants whereof yielded them with all their goods, to liue vnder the kings obedience: the Castell of Lozney yielded to the Duke: the Town of Lew, the Castell of Saint Saniour le Vicount, Maleiges, Beckcourt, and Vaho: all these submitted them to the Duke for the king.

King Henry during this time, sent of his owne company the Earle of Huntington to suruey certaine defensible places, which in short time he manfully reduced vnder the kings obeisance. The king sent also the Earle of Warwike with another company of men of warre, to assiege the Castell of Donfront, which Castell vnto him was deliuered on the 22. day of Iune.

When the Duke of Gloucester (after he had bene with the king) had reprised his iourney towards Sharbrough, the Captaine of the same hauing knowledge of his purpose, and other Noble men that were deputed by the Frenchmen, for the defence of that place, assembled out of all partes the strongest men of warre, in marvellous great number, for the resistance of the Englishmen, and for the defence of the Towne: the Duke approached nigh vnto the Towne, whereunto he laid his siege, but not in all places, for the inhabitantes had broken the bidge without the Towne, whereby the Englishmen

Engliſhmen were depriued of their paſſage ouer.

Now to returne to the king, who had perſeuered the whole Lent, and alſo the ſolemnitie of Eaſter in prayers, faſtings, vigils, almesdeeds, and other woꝝks of mercy, within the Towne of Baiaur: from whence after Eaſter he went to Cane, where he ſolemnized the feaſt of Saint George, at the which feaſt he made 15. knights of the Bathe, ſiue of them were, ſir Lewes Robſart, ſir Roger Saluſine, ſir Iohn Siewart, ſir Iohn Shotebroke, and ſir Iohn Mountgomery, whom he ſent to beſiege diuers places thereabouts. This being done, he delibered to go to Roane, the chiefe and principall City of Normandy, notwithstanding that his company was greatly miniſhed by the abſence of the Duke of Gloſter, that then lay at Sharbrough, as is afore ſhewed, and of the Earle of Marwicke that then beſieged the Caſtell of Donfront. Peruertheleſſe the king departed from Cane the ninth of June, & toke his voyage with all his people towards the Citie of Roane: in which iourney, becauſe it was not farre out of his way, he firſt laid ſiege to the Towne of Louars, and compelled them within to yeld to him vpon conditions, on the ſeuen of Saint Iohn Baptiſt.

uars.

Then the king on the 22. of June, remoued his army towards Pont-larche, where he laid his ſiege on the one ſide of the Towne, by the middle whereof, the riuer of Sene hath his courſe, but could haue no paſſage ouer the riuer to lay ſiege on the other ſide, ſo the bridge which was without the Towne was defended with a ſtrong Tower, and a gariſon: but king Henry commaunded to make boates of wickers, and thoſe to be cloſed in beaſtes ſkinnes, by which boates, on the fiſt of July, the Duke of Clarence with his company paſſed ouer ſecretly in great number, and then beſieged the other ſide of the Towne: but becauſe the riuer of Sene diuided his hoſt, where by if eyther part ſhould haue neede of other, they could not come togiſther ſo the riuer, the king cauſed to be made ſo many ſmall ſquare boates of the wicker aforeſaid, that being tyed together, and caſt into the riuer, he made of them a bridge. When the inhabitants and gariſons perceiued them thus enuironed in all parts, they agreed with the king, that if within 15. daies they were not deliuered from this ſiege, they ſhould deliuer to the king the Towne and Caſtell, and when the day was come, they performed promiſe: and this was the firſt bridge ouer the riuer of Sene that the king ſubdued to his power.

After the king had thus obtayned that bridge ouer the riuer of Sene, and that there was none other riuer or ſtound might let his iourney, with all the haſte he might, he entred his iourney towards Roane. The Citizens hearing the approach of their enemies, and fearing leaſt they ſhould be lodged in the ſuburbes, which were much larger than the Citie was within the walles, and was alſo much replenished with Monasteries, Churches, and Towers, burned the ſame, and made all euen with the ground. So this City on the thirtieth day of July this victorious king approached, againſt whom came the Citizens with their gariſons and men of warre, where the moze part of all that day they continued in battell, and fought foze on both partes, but the Frenchmen were forced to seeke their succour within the walles of the Citie, whom in their recoile the King pursued still befoze the Citie, where he ordered his siege in this manner. First, the King with a Noble company of young and hardie men lodged himselfe befoze the gate of Saint Hilarie. The Duke of Clarence with his powder was lodged befoze the gate of Caulx. The Duke of Excester, after he was come to the King, was lodged with his people befoze the gate of the Castell, called Beanuice. Earle Marshall was lodged befoze the gate called Parkenile. The Earle of Warwicke, after he was come from the Castell of Donfrount, was lodged vpon the hill, where the strong Monastery of Saint Katherin was. The Earles of Salisbury and Huntingdon, were lodged there vpon the other side of the riuer of Sène: vpon whom their enemies made many assaultes: and because the riuer of Sène diuided the English host in two parts, the King caused to be made a strong brydge of timber ouer the same riuer, that when néede should require, they might haue frée passage on foote and hoise: and because their enemies should not approach vnto it, with their ships or gallies, the king caused to be made a great chaine to be drawne ouer the riuer, betwixt the Citie and the brydge. At that time the king of Portugale cosin to the king of England, sent a Flaue of ships well manned vnto the kings ayde, whom the king commaunded to lie betwixt the Citie and the Sea, to enclose the Citie from all succours by water. The Towne of Caudebecke fearing the danger of the time, covenanted with the king of England, that when the Citie of Roane were taken and deliuered into the kings obaysance, they in like manner would yelde them to him, without any assault, and vnder the same appointment accorded with the king, foure teine other sensible Townes and Castles that were nigh borders vnto Roane. After many cruell battels and assaults, the Cittizens fearing at length to be famished, dayly put out of the Citie a great number of poore people and other, but the hunger encreasing, they were forced to eate their horses, dogs, cats, rats, and mise: and when such and other like things were consumed and eaten, then the plague of famine entred the Citie, so that the people for default of reliefe died, that the liuing might scarcely burie the dead, whereby that Noble Citie was brought into so much misery, that it is not lesse maruel than pitifull to heare.

In this meane time during this siege of Roane, the Duke of Excester besieged the Citie of Enerops: also about the twentie of August king Henry had thre maruellous victozies in Normandy. The first was that 100. Englishmen took thre great Lords at a place called Bilbuisse, & put to flight 380. persons besides. The second was, 400. of his enemies entred within the suburbs of the Towne of Chyolens, and 11. Englishmen chased them away and toke foure of them, and one 12. and toke 40. of their horses. The third was, the enemies would indeed haue taken the Towne which was called Leuers, but the Captaine of the same with an hundred of our men went out against 1000. of them, and overcame them, and toke 180. Gentlemen of the enemies. About this time also Captaine de la Bouche

toke the towne of Pontois by Paris.

When the Citizens of Roane, perceined themselves maruellously afflicted by famine, (as is befoze shewed) and also to be in dispaire of succor, from the Frenchmen, now after halfe a yeres siege and moze, vpon certaine conditions, they deliuered to the King of England their Citie, Castle, tower, abbayes, Churches, houses, citizens, captaines, garrisons, and generallie all things that were within the Citie, whatsoeuer they were. The xix. day of Januarie, there had died within this Citie (as was said) for default of victuals during this siege mo than xxx. thousand people. This noble King the rather to relieue this oppressed Citie, ordained the same to be the chiefe chamber of all Normandie, and ordeined his erchequer, his treasure, and his coynage to be kept in the same; he also edified a strong tower behinde the Castle. Whilist the King ordered his businesse at Roane, hee sent diuers Lords with strong puissance of people, to receiue the Castles of townes bordering vpon Roane, amongst whom the Duke of Clarence, in thort time reduced to the King, the mightie Castle of Galiard, the towne of Vernon, the towne of Maunt, the Castle of Wandmount, and many other strong places and holds.

Ann. reg. 7.

The Earle of Salisbury, with the garrison to him assigned toke the towne of Hounslow, the towne of Houndeur de Willers, the towne of Cwe, the towne of Gurney, the new Castle, & generally all the places in that part.

This yere Quene Ioane mother to the Duke of Britayne, and the Kings stepmother being defamed of some wicked practise, by witchcraft, or sozerie, that she had deuised the Kings death, by the counsell of Iohn Randolph Doctor of Diuinitie, of the order of the friars minors, then of the couen of Shrotonbury, hir confessor, forsaisted all hir lands and goods by Parliament, and hauing all her seruants put from hir, was committed to the custodie of Iohn Pellam, and by him sent to the Castle of Leeds in Kent, hee appoynted nine seruants to attend hir, and to bring her into the Castle of Weinsay, there to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. Friar Randolph, being apprehended in the Isle of Jersey, was conueyed to Chirbrughe and there imprisoned, and from thence was sent to the towne of London, where at length, to wit, in the yere of Christ 1429. on the fift of Iune, he was slaine by the parson of Saint Peters Church in the tower, falling out at words with him, and after Quene Ioane was deliuered of hir imprisonment.

King Henry sent his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, accompanied with the Earle Marhall, and a great power of armed men, to lay siege befoze the towne and Castle of Luorie, which towne, after many assaults and batels, the Duke toke by force: but the Castle thereof was not yeilded, till the 13. of May. The King also sent the Earle of Huntington with a power from Maunt, to the towne of Pontois, by which, if it were taken, he might haue the moze sure and easie passage to Paris. Those which were sent, at the entrie of the night were come nigh vnto Pontois, where, in a wood they left their horses, and that done, in the darknes of the night, they went on foote to the ditch of the towne, which then were dyke, where part of them lay on the banks bankes of the ditches, with their ladders in their hands ready to scale the wals when time would serue, and the residue hid them in the vines where they might be ready to enter the towne at the opening of the gates. At the bzeake of the day, they of the towne changed their watch, at the which change, the walles were left without watches for the time. But the Englishmen seeing time to accomplish their intent, raised their ladders, and scaled the wals, and by that meanes, entred the towne: where, some of them forthwith bzake the gate, and made entrie for the rest of their company, which, when the garrisons of the towne perceiued, as men amazed, they turned themselves to flight. But not long after, they armed them, and assailed their enemies, but to the Englishmens great auaille, the Earle of Huntington with his company set spurs to their horses, and halted them to the succour of their first company, whereby the Frenchmen as all discouraged and in despaire to saue the towne, at the sight of these new rescues that came to the Englishmen, leauing behinde them all their riches and substance endeuored themselves to escape by flight, and so the towne of Pointois, auoided of al Frenchmen, was left free to the English. After these enterprises thus atchieued, the King with all his companie came to the towne of Pointois, where he abode a certaine time, from whence he sent the Duke of Clarence with a chosen power of men to Paris, to view the scituacion and strength thereof, before which Citie, when he had tarried certaine dayes and had sene all that him liked, and that none of the Frenchmen would issue out of the Citie to fight with him, he returned to the King, and ascertained him of all that he had sene.

yelded.

On the viii. of August, King Henry with all his host departed from Pointois. And because the Castle of Bokinuillers had done certaine inhumane cruelties to the Kings lands that bordered thereabout, to the intent to repress their malice, the King lodged himselfe not far from thence, and sent certaine to assault the same Castle, where both the inhabitants and garrisons feared so much the King, that as men desperate of all succours, they yelded both Castle and goods. And then all the townes, Castles, and holds within a great circuite, without abiding battaile, yelded them to the King: but that strong and mighty towne of Syfors, whereof the Castle is much more defensible than the towne, would not submit to the King, wherefore on the last day of August the King with all his host toke his iourney thither, and enclosed the towne with his pavilions and tents. Yet wirt him and them of the towne, were many sharpe battailes and cruell assaults, but at all times the Englishmen put the Frenchmen to flight, wherefore the inhabitants and garrisons of the towne and Castle deliuered the same to the King in the xliiii. day of September.

Esquerant.

In this meane time the Dolphin assembled an host of 20000. men at Ponfrea and Faulcien, in purpose to fight with the Englishmen, and for the same by his letters he sent to Troyes in Champeigne for the Duke of Burgoyne, desiring him to haue his company in his iorney. At whose request the same Duke incontinent vpon sight of his letters, and vpon the suretie of the Dolphins oth, safely to goe and come, came vnto him to the place aforesaid, where notwithstanding his former oath, against both Gods law and mans law, law, the Dolphin caused him at his coming, abhominably and cruelly to be murdered. After whose death the Dolphins servants disposed him of his array, and cast his naked body into a vile pit. The Duke being thus murdered, Philip his sonne, who had married the Lady Micquell the Dolphins sister, entered into all his fathers possessions: and shortly after, he toynd in amitie with the King of England, promising him in marriage his sister in law the Lady Katherine, & to be heire to King Charles: King Henry promised to deliver to him so many of them as were guilty of his fathers murdering, as came into his hands, and the Dolphin should be for ever excluded from all title to the crown of France. The Earle of S. Paul was gouvernor of Paris although he were but rini. yeres of age, he governed the Citie wisely, to the Duke of Burgoynes behoofe, who had put him into that charge. The Dolphin would have excused himselfe of the murder lately committed, but could not, for he was led and governed by them that had committed it. Indee diuers of them had their friendes killed, in the murder of Paris, when the Earle of Erminake and the other prisoners were killed there, and therefore to be reuenged on the Duke they cared not in what danger they put the Realme, nor in what blame the Dolphin came, who notwithstanding he put them from him, and they went out of the Realme, all this would not appease the matter, nor reconcile the Dolphin to the Duke Philip.

King Henry with his whole armie returned to Paunts, where of his host he made three battails, whereof the one he deliuered to the Duke of Gloucester, whom he sent to laboure the strong towne called Saut Germainys, which after many battails and skirmishes, in short time was yielded to him for the King. The second battail he sent to the Castle of Mount Oye, which in like manner fearing the Englishmens puissance, yielded them to the King. And with the third of the said battails the K. in his owne person went to assiege Melun, which aboue all other was most strong. The situation of this towne was in a plenteous Ile, betwixt two armes of the sea, no man mought approach nigh to assault it by land, but onely by the bridge: and by water no vessel might come nigh vnto it, for the infinite multitude of piles that were fired and hid in the riuers. This towne was also defended with high and strong walles, within it also there were people in great number, as well of the inhabitants as of garrisons of men of war, that were purposely deputed for the defence thereof. Wherefore the King considering the strength, and defence of this place, assembled diuers ships and other small vessels, where in by right great labour, hee first anoyded and clemented the riuer of the said piles, which being done, he made all those vessels to be fastned together with chaines, and then he commaunded to be made certaine small Castles and towers of timber, which when they were finished, hee intended by strength of men, in those ships to assault the walles of the towne, but the garrisons and inhabitants being feared at the sight of these towers, before they were all finished, they sent their captaines to the King to treat with him for peace, which was granted them upon condition, that if they were not aided by the last of Nouember, by the Frenchmen, they should deliuer the towne to to the King, and when the day came they according to covenant deliuered the towne to the King, and then the King returned to Gaunt, and sent the Duke of Ercester to besiege the Castle of Gallard, which to him was yielded the 20. of December.

King Henry solemnized the feast of the Patience of our Lord in the Citie of Roane: he sent the Earle of Salisburie to take the towne of Freseay, which in short time was deliuered to him. The Earle of Arundell and the Earle of Huntingdon, were sent to subdue the prouince of Shenon, where the Dolphin had deputed a capitaine with a strong power, which capitaine met the two Earles and gaue them battaile, but the Englishmen remained conquerours, and thus the two Earles subdued the prouince of Shenon, without any great resistance.

Whil实现 these and many other victozies were atchieued, the King continuing in the Citie of Roane, lauding God, the Ambassadors of Charles King of Fraunce, and of Philip Duke of Burgoigne, came to treat of peace, where of the King they were honorably receiued, and hee sent backe with them to the French King, and the Duke of Burgoigne, his Ambassadors with full authoritie to conclude this long sought peace, of which Ambassadors, the principall was the Earle of Marwicke in companie of certaine Bishops and other discrete men, accompanied with a strong power of armed men. These Ambassadors were first brought to the Duke of Burgoigne, because hee was next vnto them, and after they toke their iourney vntill they came to the Citie of Troyes, where they found King Charles of Fraunce, with the Quene his wife, and that beautifull Lady Katherine their daughter. And entering into communication of peace with the Kings Counsell of Fraunce, the way of peace was found betwixt those two Kings by alliance, that is to say, by a marriage to be made betwixt the most victorious King of England, and the Lady Katherine daughter to the King and Quene of Fraunce: but because they perceived that many things might not be done without the presence of the Kings, as well for the apposition of their seales for the ratifying of the articles of this peace, as for the solemnization of the matrimonie, and also that King Charles was a man of many yeeres, they condescended that the King of England at a certaine day amongst them limited should come to the foresaid Citie of Troyes, with as great an armed power as he would: at which day appointed, if he failed to be there, all his communication of peace should be as void. These things thus concluded and set downe in writing, the Earle of Marwicke with his company returned to the King of England, to whom they declared by order what they had done, who was content in all things to performe their appointments, and prepared for his iourney. He called together Knights, men of armes and archers to the number of sixtene thousand, of them the more part were archers: and when the time came that hee would depart towards Troyes (as hee was accustomed) hee diuided his people in three parts and battels, and two wings, and in that manner the eight day of May, he entered his iourney toward Troyes in Campaigne, where hee was mette by by the Duke of Burgoigne accompanied with many noble men, two leagues without the towne, whom hee receiued with great honoꝛ and due obseruance. Then this most victorious King accompanied both of English and Frenchmen of euery estate and degree, entered the foresaid Citie of Trops, the streets whereof without any abiding hee passed untill he came to the Kings Palace, where King Charles and the Quene his wife abode his comming, of whom he was receiued goodly and after a princely manner. When the King of England was thus royally receiued, after the due resolutions on his part made to King Charles and the Quene, hee departed from them, and by the Duke of Burgoigne and other great estates as well of England as of Fraunce, he was conueyed to his lodges. The Citie was diuided into two parts, whereof the one halfe was assigned to the Frenchmen and Burgonians, and the other halfe to the Englishmen: and because that part assigned to the Englishmen, sufficed not to receiue them all within the walles, but that a great part of them must be lodged in the suburbs, the King of England, because his people on that part should haue free concourse together, he caused the wall on that part of the Citie where he was lodged, to be cast downe to the ground. King Charles gaue authoritie and power to Isabel his wife and Quene, to Philip Duke of Burgoigne, and to certayne other of his Counsell plenarily to conclude the peace with King Henry, for him and for his Realme of Fraunce, vnder such conditions as should be decreed, and also to pꝛoue, ratifie, and confirme the same, by oth solemnized in the person of King Charles, without fraud, in all things to be obserued vnto the said King Henry, his heires and successors, by the said King Charles his heires and successors, &c. On the 21. of May, in the xl. yere of the reigne of King Charles, in the Cathedral Church of Trops, the King of England with the Duke of Clarence his brother, and other Dukes, Carles, Bishops, Barons, Lords of estate, and other prelates of England, and Isabel the Quene of France, with the Duke of Burgoigne, and other of the Kings Counsell of France, and in that part his especiall commissioners, for and in the name of the King of Fraunce, and also for themselves, and in their proper names, in a great assembly of the three estates of France, vulgarly called their Parliament, concluded a peace betwixt the two Realmes of England and France, and the same ratified and approued with the conditions and articles that in part shall follow, whereupon writings were made, sealed with the broade seale of the said King Charles. When immediatly Isabel the Quene and the Duke of Burgoigne, in the name of King Charles, made a solemne oth vpon the holy Euangelists, that the same Charles, his heires and successors should obserue and keepe, without fraud, the peace made betwixt the two Realmes. And the same oth the Quene and the Duke of Burgoigne in their owne names and for themselves, their heires and successors, made vnto the King for him, his heires and successors, and after them as many as were there present both of the Kings Counsell, and also of the Parliament, as Bishops, Lords, knights, and commons, made the same oth to the King. And the 23. and 24. day of May the Chancelloꝛ of France, and many other Lords, bishops, prelates,

lates, and noble men gave the like faith and oth to King Henry of England.

Roger Wall.

The third of June, being present the Councell of King Charles, Isabel Quene of France, the Duke of Burgoigne, and the Parliament of France, and also the Duke of Clarence, with many Bishops, Lords, and Knights of England, with King Henry, the matrimonie was solemnized betwixt the most victorious King Henry of England, and the excellent and glorious Lady Katherine daughter to Charles of France and Isabel his Quene. The peace that was confirmed betwixt the said two kings and their Realmes was read as followeth.

King Henry from now forth during the life of King Charles, shall not name or write himselfe King of France, nor shall not suffer himselfe of his people so to be named or written. After the death of King Charles, King Henry shall be King of France peaceably with his heires and successors. And because King Charles by reason of his infirmities is unable to governe the common weale, King Henry during the life of Charles, shall rule and governe the Realme of France, to the profite and honor of the same King Charles. King Charles in all his writings shall name the same King Henry our sonne and heire of France, during the life of the said King Charles. King Henry shall be written, Henry King of England, and heire and regent of France, and in the like manner he shall write himselfe in all things that shall be authorized under his owne seale. King Henry shall call King Charles his father, and Quene Isabel his mother, and shall honor them. Nor King Henry shall not prohibite, withhold, nor defend King Charles his father of the crowne of France, nor the issues or revenues thereof. And the Quene his mother at all times during her life, he shall keepe in due estate as belongeth to his maiestie. &c. with divers other articles which for brevitie I set not downe in this place.

After the final end and accomplishing of this marriage, covenants and conditions, ratified in all parts, King Henry accompanied of King Charles and of his counsell, of the two Quenes, Isabel and Katherine, and of the Duke of Burgoigne, departed from Troyes, and took his journey to Paris, and from Paris not many dayes after they all went to lay siege to the Citie of Sens, which was to them contrary, but before the whole host were settled in their places, the captaine Citizens and garrisons submitted their bodies and Citie with all that they had to the King. Then they hasted to Monstreau, which to wne they took by force.

King Henry
besieged Sens
June.
Tho. Walling.

On the 16. of July they went to the Citie of Melune, and enuironed the same with a strong siege, for there were the Kings of England, of France, and Scotland, the Dukes of Burgoigne, Banier, Clarence Bedford, and Gloucester, the Earles of March, Warwick, Huntington, and Somerset, &c. This siege continued 14. weekes and od dayes, from the feast of Mary Magdalen, to the feast of All Saints, not without in a manner every day, a conflict and foze skirmish, but at length for want of victuals the besieged, yielded themselves to the Kings of England and France, from whence the foresaid Kings with a great part of their armie went to Paris.

King

King Henry kept his Christmas in the Citie of Paris, in the Castle of S. Anthony. And after he had holden a Parliament there he went to Roane. and there with his Normans, and Englishmen held a Parliament. And then when he had established sure guard for his Realme of France, and Dutchie of Normandie, he passed through Picardy to Calais, and so to Douer, where with his Quene he landed on Candlemasse day.

The fourteenth of Februarie Quene Katherine was crowned at Westminster, unto whom the King assigned to his dowrye 10000. markes: also he consented to the deliuerie of the King of Scots, who had been long prisoner in England, with condition, that before his departure out of England, he shall take to wife the Duke of Somersets sister, néce to the cardinall of Winchester.

The xxii. of March being Easter éne, Thomas duke of Clarence, the Kings brother, the Lord Rose Parrhall, and his brother Gilbert Vmframville Earle of Bime, and Iohn Gray made Earle of Tankerull in Normandy, with many other Lords, were slaine beyond the water of Leire in France, & many Lords were taken prisoners, of the which were the Earle of Huntington and the Earle of Somerset and his brother, the Lord Fitz Walter, and other, the bastard of Clarence, with strength, got his fathers body, brought it into England and buried it at Canterbury, besides R.H. the fourth his father.

Ann. reg. 9.

In a Parliament at Westminster it was ordeined that no man should proffer gold in payment, but if it held waight, wherefoze were ordeined balances and wrights. The King suppressed the French houses of religious monks and friers, and such like in England, because they thought til of the conquest ouer France, their lands were giuen by him and Henry the first, to monasteries and colledges of learned men.

Prisoners taken in England suppressed

In this Parliament was demanded a subsidie. The Bishop of Winchester lent the King 20000. pound to restrain the matter. The King hauing disposed all things in order concerning the Realme of England and the wars in Scotland, leauing in England his Quene with a great power, to the number (after Enguerant) of 30. thousand, returned into France, where, after he had visited the King and Quene of France at Paris, he took the Castle of Brewor by assault. And when hee heard, that his enemies prepared themselves to battaile, he approached the shoud of Loyze, about which shoud it was said his enemies were: but against him came no man. Therfoze the King led his host to lay siege to the Citie of Sens, commonly called the Kings new towne, which towne for lacke of victuals yelded themselves and the towne to the King.

Titus Livius.

Iohn Lord Mortimer brake south of the tower of London, and being afterwards taken, he was drawn and hanged: as shall be shewed in the second pære of the raigne of King Henry the first.

In the moneth of October, when King Henry had deliuered the Citie of Paris from all annoyances, hee with his host went to besiege the Citie of Meaulx in Brie, to which Citie nigh adioyning, is a place called the Market of Spear, betwixt which two places floweth the river of Marne, which which also environeth both the same places.

This Citie was besieged all the winter, wherein were so many, and so great stormes and floods of raine, that the Kings host was often annoyed with hunger and colde.

The 6. of December, at foure of the clocke in the afternoone, Lady Katherine Quene of England, brought forth hir first begotten son in the Castle of Windsor, and his name was giuen him Henry: for there receiued him at the font, Iohn Duke of Bedford his uncle Lord Warden of England, and Henry the Kings uncle Bishop of Winchester, and Iaquelyn Dutches of Holland that remained then in England. Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, doing the office of Baptisme.

King Henry held his feast of Christs Passiuitie at the siege before Melore, for he would not giue over his siege.

An. reg. 10. In the moneth of Februarie the Knights that were in garrison, and the principall of the Citie of Meaux perceiuing that the sommer coming should cause the siege to be more light, and lesse painfull to the Englishmen, and difficult vnto themselves, departed the Citie, and went into that place, that is called the Market of Meaux, as to the more defensible holde, after whose departing the common people hauing none abilitie to resist the Kings power, yielded themselves and the Citie to the King. After this in the moneth of May, when the King had soze beaten the foresaid Market of Meaux, he constrained the Frenchmen that were besieged, to condescend vnto certaine covenants, and to deliuer the place vnto him: and shortly after were deliuered to the King the towne of Dreux in Maloie, the Castle of Pier Pont-meraleto, Offemount and many others. After the rendring of these townes and Castles, the King sent ouer into England prisoners 160. which landed at Hampton on the first of Iuly, from whence they were brought in carts to the tower of London, and the King returned to Paris.

Quene Katherine sailed into France.

In the moneth of Aprill Katherine Quene of England shipped at Hampton, and sailed ouer into France with a strong power, vnder the conduct of Iohn Duke of Bedford the Kings brother, Humfrey duke of Gloucester being appointed Warden of England, in the Duke of Bedfords place: when the coming of Quene Katherine was knowne to King Henry hir husband, and to Charles King of France, both these Kings, and with them the Quene of France, accompanied with many great Lords and estates, as well of England as of France, went to meete hir at Boys de Viscenne, where she was joyfully receiued of them, as if she had been an Angel sent from God. The xxx. day of May the two Kings of England and France, with their Quenes departed from Boys de Viscenne, and went to Paris: the King of England and his Quene were lodged in the Castle of Loure, and the King of France and his Quene were lodged in the pallace of S. Paul.

King Henry sickned to the death.

King Henry hearing that the Dolphin with a great power besieged the towne of Gailney, hee determined to goe himselte to the raising of the siege, and so came to the towne of Corbeil, and to Senlis, where he waied so sicke, of an hot burning ague, with a vehement fire, that hee was constrained trained to farse and fend his brother John Duke of Bedford, Thomas Beauford duke of Excester, the Carles of March, and Warwicke, to rescue them of Colney: but the Dolphin raised his siege and departed thence. King Henry his disease increasing, made his testament, appoynted his treasure and Jewels to be sold, his debts to be payed, as well to the pleasure of his souldiers as to other unto whom he ought good, either in England or in France: he ordained his brother John Duke of Bedford to be regent and gouernor of France and and Poymandie, and committed the keeping of Henry his sonne to Henry Beaufort Bishop of Winchester, and to Thomas Bewfort, Duke of Excester, he departed this life in the Castle called Boyes de Viscenne, not farre from Paris, on the last of August, in the yere 1422. When he had reigned nine yeres siue moneths and odde dayes. There was present at his death King Charles of France, and the two Quenes: but before his death this most prudent King disposed the guard of the young Prince his sonne, and the defence of the Realme of England, to his brother Humfrey Duke of Glocester, but the custodie of the body of this young Prince, the King committed to his vncle the Duke of Excester, to indoctrine him in all good manners: and the reuenues of the Dutchie of Poymandy, he bequeathed to his brother John Duke of Bedford, for the gouernance of the same Dutchie and of the Realme of France: he appointed his debts to be paid out of his treasure, and of his Jewels. In his life time he redified the castle of Kenelworth, he builded there a most pleasant place, and caused it to be termed le pleasaunt marish, King Henry the eight, caused the said banquetting house to be taken downe, and part of it to be set vp in the base courte at Kenelworth: he redified his royall manour that then was called Shene, now Richmond: he founded two monasteries vpon the Thames not farre from Richmond, the one of Carthusians, which he named Bethlem, the other religious men and women of Saint Bridget, and that he named Sion. He founded Garter, principall King at armes of all Englishmen, and also the brotherhood of S. Giles without Crecles gate of London. He gaue 1000. markes to the woorkes of Westminster Church, moze he gaue to the same Church a faire Psalter, with another booke called Flores historiaram, both verse faire witten, and enlumined, and a royall scepter of gold, for the Quene. The ring that King Richard the second gaue vnto S. Edwards Prince, being taken away, this King Henry ressozed againe, in the which ring there was a Rubie, esteemed worth a thousand markes in value: he gaue to the colledge of Windsoze, or chappell of Knights, of Saint George and of the garter, an Image of massy siluer to the honoz of our blessed virgin Mary, the mother of Christ. Executors of his testament were Henry Fitz Hugh, Walter Hungerford, Walter Bewchampe, Lewes Roblart, William Porter, and Robert Babthorpe Knights, and John Woodhouse, and John Lauenthorpe Esquiers: his goods, cattels, Jewels, and money came to 40000. markes, as appeareth by the record of Henry the first, the first yere. Shortly after his departing, his bowels were enterred in the Church of S. Poze de Fosles, and his corps well enbaulmed and seared, was closed in lead: and accompanied with all the Lords, estates, and commons of England that were there present, with also many Lords and great estates, as well of France, Normandie, Burgondy, and Picardy, was brought with great honour to Paris, and set in the Church of our Lady, where were done for him right solemne exequies, with distribution of money and great almes to the poore. From thence he was brought to Roane, where he abode long. When all things necessarie were prepared for the conueiance of the dead King into England, his body was laid in a chariot, which was drawn by fower great horses: and about the dead corpes they laid a figure made of boiled hides or leather, representing his person, as nigh to the semblance of him as could be deuised, painted curiously to the similitude of a liuing creature: vpon whose head was set an Imperiall diademe of golde and precious stones, on his body a purple roabe furred with ermin, and in his right hand he held a scepter royall, and in his left hand a ball of golde, with a crosse fixed thereon. And in this manner adorned was this figure laid in a bed in the said chariot, with his visage vncovered toward the heauens: and the couerture of his bed was of red silke beaten with golde: and besides that, when the bodie should passe through any good towne, a canaple of marvellous great value, was borne ouer the chariot, by men of great worship. In this manner accompanied of the King of Scots, and of all Princes, Lords, and Knights of his house, he was brought from Roan to Abeville, where the corpes was set in the Church of Saint Wiffrane. From Abeville, he was brought to Hedín, and from thence to Penstreull, so to Bulloigne, and to Calice. In all this iourney were many men about the chariot clothed all in white, which bare in their hands torches burning, after whom followed all the householde seruants in blacke, and after them came the Princes, Lords, and estates of the Kings blood, adorned in bestures of mourning: and after all this, from the said corpes the distance of two English miles followed the Quene of England right honourably accompanied. In this manner they entred Calice, from whence after a few dayes they departed, and continued their iournies by water and land vntill they came to London, where they arrived about the tenth of Nouember, and so were conueyed by London brídge, through Cheape to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul: vpon the couering of the foremost of the fower horses that conueyed the chariot, were imbrodered the ancient armes of England: vpon the couerture of the second horse were the armes of England and Fraunce, in one shield quarterly: vpon the couerture of the third horse was imbrodered the armes of Fraunce, without any manner of difference: and on the fourth horse were the armes of King Arthure, which was three crownes golde in a field azure. When his exequies were solemnised at Saint Pauls Church in London, he was brought from thence to be entered in the Abbey of Saint Peter at Westminster amongst his Noble ancestors, at the fete of King Edward the Confessor, a royall image of silver and gilt was laid vpon his tombe, which Quene Katherine his wife caused to be made for him, but about the latter end of King Henry the eight, the head of the Kings image being of massy silver, was broken off, and conueyed cleane away, with the plates of silver and gilt that couered his body. Thus this most victorious and renowned King entred the way decreed for every creature, in the flower and most lustie time of his age, to wit, but five and thirtie yeres olde, when he had reigned nine yeres, ten moneths, and od dayes. The first of Henry the first, Quene Katherine had assured for hir sonner, Castles, lands, tenements, named and deliuered unto the summe of 40000. scuts, every two scuts worth a noble.

King Henry the sixt.

Henry the first, borne at Windsor, being an infant of eight moneths old, began his raigne the last of August, in the yere 1422. Continuing the time of his youth, the gouernance of the Realme was committed to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and the gard of his person to Thomas Duke of Excester: and to Iohn Duke of Bedford was given the regiment of France, who right wisely and nobly ruled the same so long as he liued. This Henry was of nature gentle and meke: he loued better peace than war, quietnes of minde than busines of the world: honestie than profit: rest and ease, than trouble and care: all iniuries that euer happened to him, which were many, he suffered patiently, and reputed them to be worthily sent of God for his offences.

The 21. of October, Charles King of France passed out of this world, and was buried at Saint Denis in France, after he had been crowned King 46. yeres. He was greatly beloued of his people all his life time, and therefore was called Le Roy Charles le biew ame: but yet he had a sickness the more part of his raigne, that being out of his witt, he would strike all that came nere him: it toke him first in the Citie of Paris shortly after he had been in Flanders to reduce the Flemings to obedience. There was by reason hereof great trouble in France, because those that were nere to him in linage, sought every one to haue the chiefe gouernment in their hands. When he thus died, the Realme was left in miserable state, for people of each strange nation were gouernors in the Realme. First, the Englishmen had conquered a great part, and sought to haue the rest: and the Duke of Burgoyne, with many other great Lords alied with him, sought to conquer all, for the young King Henry of England, who claimed then to be King of France, and likewise in all the money that was coined, the armes of both Realmes were quartered. The Crownes that were stamped in the time of Charles, and al other money more, were forbidden to be currant, and called to the mint. King Henry caused a peece to be stamped called a Salus, worth two and twenty shillings, and Blans of eight pence a peece, and so in no place of France where King Henry was obeyed, any other money was receiued, but such as had the armes of France and England stamped on it.

A Parliament at London began the ninth of November, wherein was graunted to the King a subsidie for thre yeres, five nobles of euery sacke of wolle that should passe out of the land.

The Earle of Salisbury

holdes in France, and raised them.

King Charles of France began now to aduance himselfe into the Duke of Burgoigne lands, and the Constable of Scotland, accompanied with many Lords, and men of war of King Charles side, laid siege to the towne of Car-nens, but the Marshall of Burgoigne assembled men of war to raise the siege, with whom went Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, a valiant man, and now being come together, fought with their enemies, wan the field, toke the Constable, whose sonne was slaine in the field. Many of King Charles men were slaine and taken to the number of ten or twelue hundred good men of warre. After which victorie, the Earle of Salisbury laid siege to Montaguillon in Campaigne, and continued there an eight monethes befoze he could haue it rendred, and then caused the same to be raised and throtwne downe. Then the Earle of Salisbury besieged the Castle of Monnes, which at length was yelded to him: this Castle he also raised and beat downe, which was the strongest place in all Champaigne, it was after repaired by King Charles.

About the same time the Duke of Burgoyne gaue his sister the Lady Anne in marriage to the Duke of Bedford, and so the alliance was made moze strong betweene the English and the Burgonians.

Philip de Comines writeth, that Iohn Duke of Bedford, regent in France for the Englishmen, his monthly allowance in that office amounting to 20000. crownes at the least.

Thomas Langley Bishop of Durham was made Chancelloz of England.

The Dukes of Burgoyne, Bedford, and Byptaine, met in the towne of Amiens, there was also the Earle of Richmond, brother to the Duke of Byp-taine, and many other great Lords, which Earle of Richmond had married Margaret, the Duke of Byptaines eldest sister, sometime wife to the Duke of Guen, and Dolphin of France. These thre Dukes were five or six dayes together in Amiens, in great friendship and reuerence ech to other, promising perpetuall amitie to continue. After this, the Duke of Byptaine returned into his country, the duke of Bedford (regent of France) to Paris, and the duke of Burgoyne to Arras: but within a while after, the Earle of Richmond revolted to King Charles, vpon some misliking he had conceived against the Duke of Bedford: King Charles receiued him ioyfully, and made him Constable of France.

About the same time the Duke of Bedford caused Crotay to be besieged both

both by water and by land, which after foure or five moneths siege, was both towne and Castle deliuered to the Duke, where he ordained Ralph Butler to be capitaine. At that time the Duke of Bedford was obeyed as regent in all places thorough Almaine, Pontieu, and Picardy, from Paris to Reims, Chalons, and Troyes vnto the water of Loyze.

About the feast of S. Andrew the capitaines of King Charles assembled their forces about le Fere, and Belle, and tooke by night the towne of Campeigne, and spoiled the inhabitants of all their goods. Shortly after came the Duke of Bedford to Mondouier with twelue hundred fighting men, and requested the Lord of Hanenles to lay siege to Campeigne, and he would finde him men and money to wage them, whereunto he granted, and after sixtene dayes siege had the same deliuered.

In this meane time, to witt, about the xviij. of Nouember, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein the yong King was set in his maiestie among his Lords. And the xxiij. day of Nouember the King with the Quene removed from Westminster vnto Waltham holy Crosse, and from thence to Hertford, where he held his Christmasse, and the King of Scots with him: and the foresaid Parliament was adiourned vnto the twentieth day after Christmasse: In the which Parliament, among other actes, was ordained that what prisoner that for grand or petit treason was committed to warde, and after wilfully brake or made an escape from the same, it should be deemed petty treason, and the goods of him so escaping should be forfeited to the Lord of the soile that they were found in.

In the moneth of February, James Stewart the yong King of Scots, who was taken by the Englishmen in the eight yere of King Henry the fourth, and had remained in England prisoner till this time, was now according to covenant, deliuered out of Pomfret Castle, vpon pledges, to witt, David eldest sonne to the Earle of Athole, Alexander Earle of Crauford, Alexander Lord of Gourdon, John de Lyndesey, Patricke sonne and heire to Sir John Lyon, Andrew Grey of Soules, David de Ogleby, Sir William de Rothin, David Mognesse, and William Olifant: the same King of Scots was then married in the priory Church of Saint Mary Querries in Southwarke, to the Lady Iane the Dutches daughter of Clarence, by hir first husband John Earle of Somerset, colen to King Henry, and they kept their marriage feast in the Bishop of Winchester's place, by the said Church of saint Mary Querries,

K. of Scots released of imprisonment.

The fouretenth day of February, the foresaid Parliament being againe holden at Westminster, for breaking of the foresaid acte of escaping out of prison, Sir Iohn Mortimer was accused, by a yeoman named William King of Wolmilton in Wilsale, in Northeshire, seruant vnto Sir Robert Scot Knight, lieutenant of the tower of London, of diuers points of treason as followeth: First, that he counselled with the said William King, to the end to breake out of prison, and promised to him for the same ten pound in his purse, an habergeon, and a dublet, the yereley value of fortye pound land, & in pzoesse an Earldome, Also, that the said Mortimer should say, that he would goe into Wales, vnto the Earle of the Marches, and there he would raise fortye thousand men, and with that power he would enter the land, and strike off the heads of the Lord protector, and of the Bishop of Winchester, to the intent that he might tell of play with some of his money. And furthermore he accused him, that the said Mortimer should say, that the Earle of March was but a daw, saue that he was the greatest, noblest, and worthiest of blood, and should be King by right inheritance, and that he himselfe was next rightfull heire to the said crowne after the said Earle of March, wherefoze if the said Earle would not take vpon him the crowne and rule of the land, he said that he else would. And ouer this, the said William alleaged to the said Sir Iohn Mortimer, that he should say, that if he failed of his purpose, and might not ioyne vnto the Earle of Marches, that then he would saile vnto the Dolphin, and aide and take his part, where he wist well he should be accepted, and haue good aide of him to bring about his purpose. All which matter this William would prone vpon the same Mortimer with his body: or as the Lords & commons should a ward. Which Iohn Mortimer, after the Statute aforesaid escaped out of the tower, and was taken againe vpon the towre wharfe sore beaten and wounded, and on the morrow brought to Westminster, & by the authoritie of the said Parliament, he was after drawen to tiburne, hanged, and headed, of whose death (saith Hall) no small slander arose: his body was buried in y<sup>e</sup> gray friers church. Richard Wooduill was created Baron Wooduill: Iohn Sturton Knight Baron Sturton for him and his heires: and Thomas Hoo Knight Baron Hoo and of Hastings.

King Henries people besieging the Castle of Dinry in the marches of Poymandy, they within compounded to yeld at a day assigned, if the Englishmen were not fought withall befoze the same day by the Frenchmen: whereupon as well King Charles as the Duke of Bedford made great lenies of men to keepe the day appointed, and here with they drew both towarde Paris. But when King Charles heard how the Duke of Bedford was comming towarde him with such a puissance, he was counselled to draw backe, and so he did towarde Cleruole in Berch, whom the Duke of Bedford followed, so that he found his armie nere to Cleruole. And when either armie was in sight of the other, they put themselves in order of battell, and the Englishmen made an hedge of their horse behind their battell, because the French should not strike in among them on the backs: and the Frenchmen ordered themselves in battell array, making a great battell of footemen, in the which they put the flower and chiefest men. They appointed their horsemen to set on the Englishmen a traaverse, the battelles on foote came vpon and iopned, where was a sore fight betwixt them, continuing two houres together, that no man might iudge which way the victorie would incline: but at length, the men of King Charles began to breake, and then the Englishmen began to thrust in among them, and did so much, that they discomfited their enemies. There were slaine the Earle Dowglas Duke of Laron, James Dowglas Earle of Moughton, Iohn Earle of Boaghain, with the viscount Nerbon, & many other, to the number of ten thousand (saith Fabian:) foure thousand saith mine Author (a Frenchman) who saith, that the Duke of Bedford bare himselfe most valiantly, fighting ting with an are so fiercely, as he had the praise of all other. The Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke governed themselves also right valiantly.

The Lord of Torsy and other Lords of Normandy, which before had taken part with the Englishmen, this day turned to the French, hoping that the Englishmen should have lost the battell. True it is, that the Frenchmen would neuer suffer their King Charles to be present in person at any battell, but when they thought to pitch a field, they sent him into some strong towne. By the losse of this battell fought on the seventeenth of August before Veruole in Verch, King Charles was put to great hindrance, so that he was not able in puissance to give the Englishmen any battell, hauing enough to do to defend and keepe his townes and fortresses against them.

The Duke of Bedford returned into Normandy, where he punished many that fled from him in the day of battell. Then went he to Paris, where he found the Duke of Burgoyne, who receiued him, and the Dutches of Bedford his wife, the said Duke of Burgoynes sister, right ioyfully, and made to them a great feast, at which feast also were the Carles of Salisburie and Suffolke, the olde Quene of France, mother to King Charles, and many other great estates, of diuers nations, amongst the which; the Dutchesse of Bedford was holden for the most gallantest Lady of all other, and with her, the countesse of Salisburie a very faire Lady. The Duke of Bedford that had neuer iusted before, iusted there.

The Duke of Burgoyne enamoured with the Countesse of Salisburie, whereof came great displeasure and losse to England, by the breach of amitie betwixt the English and the Burgoyans.

The Duke of Burgoyne was a very goodly and amiable man of personage, doing excellently wel whatsoever he toke in hand, and especially in daunting and iusting he excelled all other of his countrey. At this feast, he became desirous of the countesse of Salisburie, and some messages passed betwixt them, which came to the Earle of Salisburies eare, whereof he was nothing contented with the Duke, and therefore sought to doe him displeasure afterward.

This feast being ended, the Duke of Burgoyne went into his countrey of Burgoyne, and there toke to wife the Dutchesse of Flanders which had been wife to his vncle the Duke of Flanders, and had by her two children. She was halfe sister to the duke of Barbon, but she liued not long with him. The duke of Burgoyne also gaue his sister the yongest, named Agnes, in mariage vnto Charles de Barbon Earle of Cleremont, for the which, the Duke of Bedford and other Englishmen were wroth, for that he made such alliance with the enemies without their accord.

This yere the Frenchmen repaired the Castle of Houns in Champaigne, which had been a little before destroyed by the Englishmen, and now it was well stocked with victuals and men, which began to make soze warre to the country, but shortly after the Earle of Salisburie besieged them, and with him Messire John de Luxemburg, who did so much, that the Castle was yielded to him. The Duke of Bedford with his wife the dutchesse, lay for the most part in Paris leading there a pleasant life with the Lady whom he greatly loued, and was lodged in the house of the Tournelles nere to the Castle S. Anthony, where he made faire buildings, and his men still made soze wars against the French towards the riuer of Loyze, and other places, vpon base Nor-

Iaqueline Dutchesse of Henaunt.

This yere the wars began in Henaunt, by reason of Iaqueline Dutchesse of Henaunt, daughter to Duke William of Henaunt, uncle to Philip Duke of Burgoyne, and also daughter to Duke Iohn of Burgoyne's sister, wife to the fozenamed William, and so double cousin german to Philip, Duke Philip now living. This Iaqueline was married to Iohn Duke of Brabant his cousin german, and cousin german also to Duke Philip of Burgoyne, and before that, she was married to the Carle of Pontione, sonne to King Charles le bien aime, eldest brother to King Charles now living, but notwithstanding that she was thus married to the Duke of Brabant, yet was she conveyed by Sir Robert Knight, and brought into England to the Duke of Gloucester, and there married to the said Duke of Gloucester: and so she had two husbands alive at once, Brabant and Gloucester, a thing thought unreasonable, both against God, the world, and the Church, for she had been foure or five yeres in company with the Duke of Brabant, but there had fallen some variance betwixt them, and so she was come from him into Henaunt.

About the last of Aprill began a Parliament at Westminster, wherein was granted a subsidie of twelue pence in the pound of all manner marchandise comming in, or passing out of this Realme, thre shillings of a tunne of wine for the terme of thre yeres to be holden. And furthermore it was enacted, that all merchant strangers should be set to an English host, within fifteene dayes of their comming to their port sale, and to make no sale of any merchandise ere they were so lodged: and then within 40. dayes following to make sale of all they brought, and if any remained unsold at the said fortye dayes end, that then all such merchandise unsold to be forfeited. Also that all strangers that carried any wolles out of this land, should pay thre and fortye shillings foure pence for a sacke custome, where the English merchants and denisons payed but five nobles, &c.

The Duke of eth into Holland.

After the marriage had been solemnised betwene the Duke of Gloucester, and Iaqueline Dutchesse of Holland, as is aforesaid, within a moneth after the Duke of Gloucester assembled an army of twelue hundred fighting men at the least, all Englishmen, and taking the Dutchesse with him in company, passed ouer to Calice, and straight from thence to Lens in Artois, and so into Henaunt, making no outrage as he passed through Duke Philips countries.
At their comming into Henaunt, many towne obeyed them, and other refused so to doe: likewise were the Pobles diuided.

The Duke of Burgoyne hearing of this, was sore offended for the insurie done to his cousin of Brabant, the dishonor of his cousin the Dutchesse Iaqueline, and the euill dealing of the Duke of Gloucester, and therefore, to aide the Duke of Brabant he appointed many of his captaines with twelue hun-byed fighting men Bicarbs, to go against the Duke of Glocester. The Duke of Brabant was a man but of weake complexion, and therfore by the counsell of Brabant it was ordayned, that his younger brother Philip Earle of Saint Pol, should be chiefe Captaine of the warre against the Duke of Glocester. He had a great army, as the more part of the Nobles of Brabant, of Henault, and of Burgoyne, in all fiftie thousand. Pierre de Luxemburg, Earle of Conuarsen, his nére kinsman, had the leading of the army, for himselfe was but young. The Duke of Glocester had put off his men in garrison within the towne of Brayne, in the county of Henault, who made soze warre to the countrey about, but the Earle of S. Pol, and Conuarsen did come and besiege Brayne, continuing afoze it 12. daies befoze they within yelded, compounding to depart with bodics and goods saved. These hauing won Brayne, destroyed it vterly, and that done, toke the field with all puissance, which was great: and the Duke of Glocester likewise came into the field, so that they approached nére together, and the vancurrers skirmished, but the battel toynded not. The Duke of Glocester had sent his herault, and wrytten to the Duke of Burgoyne, calling him traytor, and disloyall to the king of England and Fraunce, for that he had sent men in ayde against him in ayde of the Duke of Brabant, and therfore offered him the combate: whereunto the Duke of Burgoyne answered, that he would accept the combat willingly, denying that euer he had sayled of his promise: but contrariwise, that the Duke of Glocester had done great wrong to the Duke of Brabant, to haue bereft him of his wife, contrary to the ordinance of God, and of holy Church, and for other words which the Duke had vttered against the Duke of Burgoynes honour, he gaue him the lie, and so farre the matter went in words betwixt them, that the day was appointed for the combate, and the Duke of Burgoyne chose for Iudge of the combate, the Emperoz of Almaine, and the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Duke of Glocester a safe conduct, to depart safely into England, to prepare himself of things necessary for the cobat, whereupon both the camps brake vp: the Duke of Glocester went to Mons in Henault, to the Dutches his wife (so termed) and gaue her to vnderstand that he was desirous to trie the combate with the Duke of Burgoyne, and many other things he tolde her, which he perfozmed not; for within foure daies after, he toke all his power with him, and returned into England, doing no hurt by the way to the Duke of Burgoynes countres, and left the Dutchesse in Mons, finally accompanied with the people of that countrey. Shortly after his departure, the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lord Lilladam to the towne of Mons to receiue laqueline the Dutchesse, who being deliuered vnto him, he conueyed her to Cant, where the Duke and she made great semblance of ioy together, she promising to be gouerned alwaies by his aduise, but to go to her olde husband the Duke of Brabant she would not: but what semblance soeuer she made, she had an other thought in her head, as it appeared afterward, for when she espied her time, she stole away into her countrey of Holland, where she was well receined of many Lords, and began forthwith to maintaine warre against Duke Philip of Burgoyne, and sent to the the Duke of Glocester for ayde, who sent to her a thousand fighting men, vnder the conduct of the Lord Fitzwaters, who landed them in a place called Breiwers hauen. During these troubles in Henault, diuers Lords of the countrey, held with the Duke of Glocester, and therefore had their lands soze waisted. Also Messire Englebert Denguien held on the party of Philip Duke of Burgondy: and he, when he toke any of the Englishmen, would cause one of their thombs to be cut off, and so sent into England.

The Duke of Burgoyne fearing least Iaqueline would deliuer the countrey of Holland into the possession of the Duke of Glocester, he assembled his power, & went into Holland, to put the countrey into obeisance. At his coming thither, Iaqueline accompanied with many Nobles of the countrey, and the Lord Fitzwaters, would haue defended his landing, but notwithstanding all the defence they could make, he entred vpon them, and there nere to the Towne of Brussells, they toygned in battell, the Duke of Burgoyne and his people against the Englishmen and Hollanders, taking the Dutchesse Iaquelines part: there was a fierce battell on all sides, but in the ende, the Hollanders and Englishmen were all discomfited, and there died in that place aboue seuen or eight hundred, besides those that were taken prisoners: the Lord Fitzwaters hardly escaped.

After this battell got by the Duke of Burgoyne, diuers towne of the countrey reuolted to him against Iaqueline the Dutchesse, as Doordrecht, Sericze, and many other. Shortly after, the Duke of Burgoyne leauing garrisons in those Townes that obeyed him, to make resistance against the Dutchesse that lay in the Towne of Gant, he returned into his countrey of Flanders and Artois, there to prepare such abilliments as were necessary for him to be at the combat appointed betwixt him and the Duke of Glocester. The Duke of Glocester likewise in England made his prouision of his abilliments and furniture, but the Duke of Bedford brother to the Duke of Glocester, toke great paines to make them friends: and also the counsell of the young king of England, were nothing content with this variance, doubting least it might be occasion that the Duke of Burgoyne might withdraw himselfe from their amitie, whereby their busines in France should be hindered. The Duke of Bedford therefore toke his tourney from Paris to Calice, and so into England, to the end to agree the said Dukes: he toke with him the Dutches his wife, and not pass a soure or five hundred men.

An. reg. 4.

About Michaelmas Peter Duke of Quimbre, Prince of Portugall came into England, and was honourably received and feasted by the Kings vncles, and was also elected into the order of the garter.

Humphrey duke of Glocester married Elia.
nor Cobham.

When Humphrey Duke of Glocester vnderstood that Pope Martine the first had giuen sentence, that the first marriage with the Duke of Brabant and Iaqueline was good and effectuell, and the second espousalles celebrated with the Duke of Glocester and the said Iaqueline to be vnlawfull, he beganne to ware weary of her, by whom he neuer had profit, but losse, and toke to his wife by a second marriage Elianor Cobham, daughter to Reig-nold Cobham Lord of Sterbozow, which Elianor before was his wanton paramour, paramour, to his great reproch, as was then noted.

The morrow after Simon and Iudes day, when the Paioz of London had bene at Westminster to take his charge, as the custome is, at such time as he was holding his great dinner, he was by the Duke of Gloucester Lord Protector sent for in speedy manner, & when he came to his presence, he gaue to him commandement, to see the Citie were surely watched in the night following and so it was done.

Rob. Fabian.
Debate betwene the Duke of Gloucester and the Bishop of Winchester.

On the next morrow about nine of the clocke, certaine servants of the Bishop of Winchester, uncle to the said Protector, would haue entred the Citie by the bridge, but the warders or keepers thereof, kept them out by force, as befoze they were commanded, wherewith they being grievously discontented, gathered to them a greater number of archers, and men of armes, and assaulted the gate with shot and other meanes of warre, insomuch, that the commons of the Citie shut in their shops, and sped them thither in great number, so that great bloodshed would haue followed, had not the wisdome of the Paioz and Aldermen stayed the matter in time,

The Archbischoppe of Canterbury with the Duke of Quimbre called the Prince of Portugall and other, toke great labour vpon them to pacifie this variance betwixt the uncle and the nephew, the Protector and the Bishop, insomuch, that they rode betwixen them eight times, ere they might bring them to any reasonable conformitie, and lastly they agreed to stand to the rule of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, or of such as he would assigne, whereupon the Citie was set in more quiet, and the Bishop of Winchester wrote a letter to the Duke of Bedford, Lord Regent as followeth.

Right high and mightie Prince, and right Noble, and after one leuett earthly Lord, I recommend me vnto your grace with all my heart: and as ye desire the welfare of the King our soueraigne Lord, and of his realmes of England and of France, and your owne weale, with all yours, haste you hither, for by my troth, and ye tarry long, we shall put this land in iopardie with a field, such a brother ye haue here, God make him a good man. For your wisdom knoweth well, that the profit of France standeth in the welfare of England. Written at London, the last of October.

letter to the
ford.

On the tenth day of January next ensuing, the said Duke of Bedforde with his wife, came vnto London, and with them also came the said Bishop of Winchester, and the Paioz and Citizens receiued him at Merton, and conuected him through the Citie vnto Westminster, where he was lodged in the Kings pallace, and the Bischoppe of Winchester was lodged within the Abbots lodging. On the morrow following, the Paioz presented the Regent with a paire of basins of silver, and ouer-gilt, and in them a 1000. markes of gold. The 21. of February, began a great councell at S. Albons, which was after ward reioyned to Southampton, but for that no true conclusion might be made, on the 15. of March was called a Parliament at Leicester, the which endured till the 25. day of June. This was called the Parliament of Battes, because men being forbidden to bring swords or other weapons, brought great battes and staves on their neckes, and when those somuch, that the Duke of Gloucester put a bill of complaint against the Bishop, containning five articles, all which articles were by the Bishop sufficiently answered, and finally, by the counsel of the Lord Regent, all the matters of variance betwene the said two Lords, were put to the examination and iudgement, with the assistance of the Lordes of the Parliament, Henry Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Duke of Excester, Iohn Duke of Bozmaster William Alnewike, then keeper of the priefe seale, which Lords made a decreë and a warde, so that eyther party toke other by the hand with friendly and louing words, none hauing amends of other. Upon Whitsunday following, was a solemne feast holden at Leicester aforesaid, where the Regent dubbed king Henry knight, & then forthwith the king dubbed Richard Duke of Yorke, that after was father to king Edward the fourth, and other to the number of fortye.

After the Parliament, the king went to Killingworth Castell.

On Saturday the euen of Saint Michael the Archangell, in the morning before day, betwixt the houres of one and two of the clocke began a terrible earthquake, with lightning and thunder, which continued the space of two houres, and was vntuersall thzough the world, so that men had thought the world as then should haue ended, and the generall dome to haue followed.
The vnreasonable beasts rozed and dyed to the townes, with hideous noyse.
Also the fowles of the ayze likewise cried out: such was the woꝝke of God at that time to call his people to repentance.

This yère the Duke of Alanson, that before was taken prisoner at the

This yère also, the Earle of Salisbury accompanied with the Earle of Suland held the Citizens very streight, and maugre the Duke of Myleance, and the Marhall of France, the Englishmen wan from them diuers strong holds adoynning to the Citie, and forced them to burne a great part of their suburbs: but one day as the said Earle of Salisburie, Thomas Mountague, rested him at a bay window, a gunne was levelled out of the Citie, the shot whereof strue red so the bars of the prison grate, that one of the same bars stroke the Earle on the head, bearing away one of his eyes, and the one side of his chéke. Sir Thomas Gargaue was likewise stricken, and died within two daies. The Earle was conueyed to Heut on Loyze, where, after eight daies he likewise departed the world, whose body was conueyed into England with all fune- rall pompe, and buried at Wiltam in Barkshire by his progenitors, leaving behinde him one onely daughter named Alice, married to Richard Neuill sonne to Ralph Earle of Westmerland. The damage that the Realme of England received by the death of this notable man manifestly appeared, in that immediately after his death the prosperous good successe which the Englishmen had had, began to decline. In his place was appointed the Earle of Suffolke to be Lieutenant and Capitaine of the siege, loyning with him the Lord Scales, the Lord Talbot, sir Ion Fastolfe, and diuers other ballant Captaines.

King Henry kept his feast of Christs Natiuitie at Eltham.

The 21. of February Richard Neuill was made Earle of Salisburie.

King Henry kept his Easter at Hartford.

So it fell out, that in the Lent season, victuall and artillery about Dyle-ance began to ware scant in the English campe, wherefore the Earle of Suffolk appointed sir Iohn Fastolfe, sir Thomas Ramplstone, & sir Philip Helle, with their retinues, to ride to Paris to the Lord Regent, to informe him of that lacke, who incontinent prouided victuall, artillery and munitions necessarie, and loaded there with many chariots and carts: and so the fare conuey-

ance of the same, he appointed sir Simon Morbrier prouost of Paris, with the guard of the Citie & other, to accompany sir Iohn Fastolph to the army lying at the siege of Myleance: they were in all to the number of 1500. men: these with great difficulty came to the English camp besoze Myleance, where they were ioyfully receiued, & commended for their valiant withstanding of enemies by the way, as they marched. The Earle of Suffolke being thus victualled, continued the siege, & euery day almost skirmished with the French men, who at length offered to treat to saue themselves and their Citie from captiuitie, they submit the Citie, themselves and all theirs vnder the obeisance of the Duke of Burgoin, because he was extract out of the bloude ropall of Fraunce. The Duke with thanks certified them againe, that he would gladly receiue them, if the Duke of Bedford Lord Regent would therewith be contented. Whereupon messengers were dispatched to the Regent, who thought it nesther conuenient nor honourable, that a Citie so long besieged by the king of Englands power, should be deliuered to any other forren Prince. Whereupon the Regent answered the Burgonian ambassadoys, that sith the King of England had bene at all the charges about the siege and winning of the Citie, it was not consonant to reason, that the Duke should enioy the frutes of another mans charge: hereof followed a double mischief to the English proceedings in the Realme of Fraunce, for both the Burgoigne conceived an inward grudge against the Englishmen, for that he suspected them to enuie his glozy: and againe, the Englishmen left the siege of Myleance, which by this treaty they might haue recouered out of their enemies hands, and put their friends in possession of it.

While this treaty was in hand, Charles of Fraunce studied daily howe to prouide a remedie by the deliuey of his in Myleance out of present daunger. And euen at the same time, a monstrous woman, named Ioan la pucell de dieu, was presented vnto him at Chinon, where as then he sojourned, of which woman, her birth, qualities, and estate, the French Historiokes make mention at large, but to be short, so much credit was giuen to her, that she was honoured as a Saint, and so she handled the matter, that she was thought to be sent from God to the ayde of the French King Charles, the seventh of that name. This woman being armed at all pointes like a valiant Capitaine, rode from Poitiers to Bloys, and there found men of warre, victuall and munitions ready to be conueyed to Myleance. Where was it knowne that the Englishmen kept not so diligent watch as they had bene accustomed to do, and therfore this Maid with their French Captaines, comming for ward in the dead time of the night, and in a great rayne and thunder, they entred into the Citie with all their victuall, artillerie, and other necessaries. The next day the Englishmen boldly assaulted the towne, but the Frenchmen defended the walles so, as no great seate chaunced that day betwene them. The Bastard of Myleance gaue knowledge to the Duke of Alanson in what daunger the towne stode without his present helpe, who comming within two leagues of the Citie, gaue knowledge to them within, that they should be readie the next day to receiue him, which accordingly was accomplished:

for the Englishmen suffered him and his armie to enter. On the next day in the morning, the Frenchmen all together issued out of the towne, and wanne the bastell of Saint Low by assault, and set it on fire. And after they likewise assaulted the Tower at the bridge foote, and toke it ere the Lord Talbot could come to the succours, in the which William Gladesdale also Captaine was slayne, with the Lord Molins and the Lord Poy-nings also.

Lord Molins
slain.

The Frenchmen with this good lucke, fetched a compasse about toward the bastell, which was in the keeping of the Lord Talbot, the which like a good Captaine, without all feare issued forth against them, and gaue them a sharpe encounter, that they fledde againe into the Citie with great losse of men and small artillery: of Englishmen were lost in the two bassets to the number of sixe hundred men, or there about. The Earle of Suffolke, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Scales, and other Captaines assembled together in counsell, where it was amongst them determined to leaue their fortresses and bassets, and to assemble in the plaine field, there to abide all the day to see if the Frenchmen would issue forth to fight with them. But when the Frenchmen burst not come forth, the Englishmen set fire on their lodgings, and departed in good order of battell from Orleans. And the next day which was the eight of May, the Earle of Suffolke rode to Jargeaur with 400. men, and the Lord Talbot with another company turned to Melun: and after he had fortified that Towne, he went to the Towne of Launay, and wanne it together with the Castell.

The siege of
broken by.

Thus when the Englishmen leuered themselves into garrisons, the Duke of Alanson, the Bastard of Orleans, Ioan le pucell, the Lord Cancourt, and diuers other Captaines of the Frenchmen came on the 12. of June before the Towne of Jargeaur: where the Earle of Suffolke and his two brethren soiourned, and gaue to the Towne so fierce an assault on three parts, that Poitou de Senetrailles perceiuing another part boide of defence, scaled the walles on that side, and without difficulty, tooke the Towne, and slue sir Alexander Poole, brother to the Earle, and many other to the number of 200. but the French lost 300. good men. Of the Englishmen were taken 40. with the Earle of Suffolke and his brother Iohn. The Frenchmen as they went to Orleans, slew their prisoners all saving the Earle and his brother. Shortly after the same French army came to Mahun, where they toke the Tower at the bridge foote, and put therein a garrison: from thence they remoued to Wangeney, and contrayned them in the Towne to yeeld. At this place there came to the Duke of Alanson, the new Constable Arthur of Brittain, and the Lord Dalbert with other, also the Earle of Wandsone came to them, so that they were now ioyned to the number of 23000. men, the which shortly after fought with the Lord Talbot, nere to a village in Beause, called Batay, at which battell, the L. Talbot was soze wounded at the backe, and taken, & the rest put to flight: in which fight were slaine aboue 1200. and 40. taken, of whom the L. Talbot, the L. Scales, the L. Hungerford, and sir Thomas Rāpston were chiefe. This ouerthrow did so much abate the Englishmen, that immediately thereupon the towne of Januile, Mahun, Fozf, and diuers other returned from the English part, and became French. Charles the French king perceiuing fortune to smile vpon him, determined to conquer the City of Reimes that he might be there crowned, in his iourney thitherward he besieged the City of Aurerre, and had it. From thence he went befoze Troies which was deliuered to him, and then Chalons, &c. In semblable orde they of Reimes yeld themselves: in the which towne the said Charles (in the presence of the Dukes of Lozain, and Barre, and of all the noble men of his sation) was sacred king of France, by the name of Charles the seuenth.

The Duke of Bedford aduertised of all these doings, assembled his power about him, and hauing together 10000. men, besides Rozmans, departed out of Paris in warlike fashon, and passing through Bray to Monstrean Fault Pone, sent by his herault Bedford, letters to the French king, signifying to him, that where he had contrarie to his small conclusion, accorded betwene his brother king Henry the first, and king Charles the first, by allurement of a diuellish witch, taken vpon him: the name, title, and dignitie of the king of France, and further, had by murther, stealth, craft, and deceitfull meanes violently gotten, and wrongfully kept diuers Cities and Townes belonging to the king of England his nephew: for pzoofe whereof he was come downe from Paris with his army, into the countrey of Bzle, by dint of sword to proue his writing and cause true, willing his enemies to chouse the place, and in the same he would giue him battell. The new French king being come from Reimes to Dampmartine, studying how he might compass them in Paris, was halfe abashed at this message, but yet to set a good countenance on the matter, he answered the Herault, that he would soner seeke his master, than his master should neede to pursue him. The Duke of Bedford hearing this answer, marched toward the king, and pitched his felde in a strong place. The French king though at the first he meant to haue abidden battell, yet when he vnderstood that the Duke was equall to him in number of people, he chaunged his purpose, and turned with his armie a little out of the way. The Duke of Bedford perceiuing his faint courage, followed him by Hilles and Dales, till hee came to a Towne not farre from Senlis, where he found the French king and his armie lodged:
wherefoze he ordered his battels, setting the Archers befoze, and himselfe with the Noble men in the maine battell, and put the Rozmans on both sides for winges. The French king also ordered his battels to the most aduantage. Thus these two armies lay two daies and two nights, eyther in sight of other without any great doing, except a few skirmishes. At length in the dead of the night, as priuily as might be, the French king brake vp his campe, and fled to Bray. The Duke of Bedford had much adoe to stay his people in the morning from pursuit of the French kings armie: but for that he mistrusted the Parisians, he would not depart farre from that Citie:
and so returned thither againe.

Ann. reg. 8.

In this season Pope Martine the first, meaning to subdue the Bohemians that dissented from the Church of Rome in matters of faith, and religion, appointed

appointed Henry Beawford Bishop of Winchester. Cardinall of S. Eusiby, to be his legate in an army to invade the kingdome of Boheme, and to bring a power of men with him out of England, and because the warre touched religion, he licensed the Cardinall to take a tenth of the spiritualtie, the Bishop gathered the money, and assembled 4000. men and moze. As this Bishop was come to Dover, ready to haue passed the seas into Flanders, the Duke of Gloucester (hauing receiued letters from the Duke of Bedford, containing an earnest request to relæue him with men of war) writ to the Bishop of Winchester, willing him to passe with all his army toward the Duke of Bedford. The Cardinall least he should runne into the note of infamy, if he refused to ayde the Regent of France, passed ouer with his power, & brought the same vnto his cosen to the Citie of Paris, where he remained not long, but passed on his iourney towards Boheme, from whence in short time he returned into England.

The first of Nouember, king Henry being about the age of nine yeres was solemnly crowned in Saint Peters Church of Westminster, at whose coronation were made 36. knights of the Bath, & after solemnization in the Church finished, an honourable feast in the great Hall of Westminster was kept, whereof ye may read a large discourse in Robert Fabian. After which feast great preparations was made for the kings iourney into France.

Richard Duke of Yorke was constituted Constable of England in absence of Iohn Duke of Bedford Regent of France, he was made Constable, for, and because of a battel to be fought betwene Iohn Vpton, and Iohn Downe he was confirmed Constable of England for terme of life, so that he did no waies derogate Iohn Duke of Bedford, that was beyond the sea, dated the 11. of January.

Combat fought in Smithfield.

The 11. of January a battell was done in Smithfield within the lisses befoze the king, betwene two men of Feuerham in Kent, Iohn Vpton notable appellat, and Iohn Downe gentleman defendat, Iohn Vpton put vpon Iohn Downe, that he and his compiers should imagine the kings death, the day of his coronation: when they had long fought, the king toke by the matter and forgave both parties.

The 11. of Aprill the king toke shipping at Dover, & landed the same day at Caleis, hauing in his company the Dukes of Yorke and Suffolke, the Bishops of Bath, Ely, and Rochester, the Carles of Huntington, Stafford, Warwicke, Dorset, Denonshire, Portaine of Clewe, and of Arundell, and Barons, the Lord Boucher, Beaumont, Typtoft, Fitz water, Roos, Arundale, Audley, Fauconbridge, Gray Cordner, Scroope, and Wels.

Whilist the king remained at Caleis many skirmishes were fought betwene the Englishmen and the French in diuers parts of France, and the Frenchmen preuailed greatly by helpe of a woman which they named The mayden of God. So that lastly she with her company came to the towne of Champaigne, to the ende to reioice the siege laid thereunto by the Duke of Burgoigne and other of the English Captaines, and the 23. of May she gaue battell to the Englishmen, and fought with them a long time, but in the end by the manhood of a Burgonian knight named sir Iohn Luxemborough, she was taken alive, and her company distressed, she was conveyed to the Citie of Roane, and there kept a season, where she fastned her selfe to be with child, but when the contrary was knowne, she was condemned and burnt.

After this, king Henry by small iourneyes into France, came to Paris, where he was honourably received of the Citizens and taken for their soueraign Lord and king, whiles he there remained, (saith Gagwine) the Frenchmen wanne many holdes of the Englishmen, and the Burgonians in the countrie of Bry.

Conspiracy at Abington.

Some after Easter the Lord Protector was warned of an assembly of certaine lewde persons, vnder pretence of religiously minded men, to be assembled at Abington, wherefoze he sent thither certaine persons, and also rode thither himselfe, and there arrested the baily of the towne named William Mandeuill a weauer, the which was appointed for a Captaine, who had named himselfe Iacke Sharpe of Wigmers land in Wales, who being examined, confessed that he meant to haue done many mischiefs, especially against Priests, so that he would haue made their heads as cheape as shēpes heads (that is to say) thre or a pence, for as some write, ten for a penny: many of his complices were taken and sent to diuers prisons. Their Captaine was drawne, hanged, and beheaded at Abington, and his head was sent to London, and set on the bridge: his other fautors were executed in diuers places and countries to the terror of other. Also the 17. of Iuly Richard Russell wolman, was drawne, hanged, and quartered, for that he would haue made Dukes and Carles at his pleasure.

Ann. reg. 10.

Richard Robsart Lord Bourcher deceased, and was buried at Westminster.

King Henry remaining still in France, the Earle of Arundale accompanied with 2000. Englishmen, sent a certaine of his company vnto a towne, called Bealmount, to prouoke the Frenchmen to issue out of the towne, which small company when Boyssicant and Senerales then Capitaines behelde, they with their souldiers sped them forth to take the said Englishmen, the which by little and little gaue backe, till they had tolled the Frenchmen a good space from the towne, and then set vpon them with a stout courage, and helde them on hande till the Earle with his companie rescued them: then betwixt them was a cruell fight, but in the ende the Frenchmen were chased, and the said Sentrayle with many sōtemen of the said towne were slaine.

In the moneth of Nouember king Henry by small iourneyes into France,

remoued from Roane to Pontople, and so to Saint Dioneffe, & then to Paris, where he was receiued with great honour by the Cittizens, and taken for their foueraigne Lord and King. There were in his company of his owne nation, his vnckle the Cardinall of Winchester, Iohn Kempe Cardinall and Archbisshop of Poike, the Dukes of Bedford, of Poike, and Suffolke, the Carles of Warwicke, Salisbury, Oxford, Huntingdon, Dymond, Portaine, and Suffolke. Of Gascoine there were the Carles of Longuile, and March, besides many Noble men of England, Gwine, and Poymandie: and the chiefe of the French nation, were the Dukes of Burgoigne, and Lewes of Luxemburg Cardinall and Chancellor of France for king Henry: the Bishoppes of Beauuoy and Poynne both pères of France, besides the Bishop of Paris, and diuers other Bishops, the Earle of Antemount and other noble men. And he had a guard of 3000. archers, some on horsebacke, some on foote. To speake of the honour, where with he was receiued into the Citie of Paris, what pageants were prepared, and how richly, the gates, streets, and byldges on euery side were hanged with costly clothes of arras and tapestrie, it would be too long a proceesse.

On the scuenth day of December king Henry was crownded in Paris, by the Cardinall of Winchester, at the which coronation was present, the Duke of Burgoigne, the Duke of Bedford Regent, and diuers other Nobles of France. After the solempnitie of this feast was ended, the king departed from Paris, and so came to Roane, where he held his Christmasse, and that done, hee returned to Calais, where when he had sojourned a season, hee toke shipping and returned into England, and landed at Douer the eleuenth of February, and then riding toward London, hee was met on Barham Downe, betwixt Douer and Canterbury, by a great companie of Gentles and commons of Kent, all clad in a liuerie with red hodes, the which accompanied him till he came to Blackheath, which was on the one and twentieth day of February, where hee was met by the Maior of London, who rode in a gowne of crimson Veluet, his Aldermen in scarlet, and the Cittizens all in white gownes and red hods, with diuerse woorkes or cognisances bzodred vpon their sleeves after the facultie of their misteries or craftes: and after due obseruance and saluting of the King, they rode on before him towardes the Citie. And when the King was come to the bydge, there was deuised a nightie Giant, standing with a sword drawne in his hand, hauing written certaine speeches in meter of great reioycing and wel-comming of the King to the Citie, on the middell of the bydge, and in diuers other places of the Citie, were diuers faire and sumptuous pageants replenished with goodly and beautifull personages, the order and speeches whereof, are set downe by Robert Fabian in his chronicle. Thus being conueyed to his pallace at Westminster, the Maior with the Cittizens returned to London, and on the 24. day of Februarie the Maior and Aldermen poye to the King, and presented him with a hampire of golde, and therein a thousand pound of nobles.

there of the Welles, for they were not content of their wages; wherefore the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, came down thither in Easter week, at which time many souldiers were arrested: and rode againe to Wirwinc. And hauing not long since buried the Lady Anne his late wife, sister to y<sup>e</sup> duke of Burgoigne, he married there the Lady Iaquet the daughter to Peter Earle of Saint Paule, and shortly after returned to Caleis, where he caused foure of those souldiers to be beheaded, on the xi. of June, and 110. souldiers to be banished the towne, besides 120. that were banished befoze that time. And vpon Midsummer euen the Lord Regent with his new wedded spouse came to London, and remained there till the latter end of August, and then returned againe to Paris.

The Duke of Burgoigne was nothing pleased with this new alliance contracted by the Duke of Bedfords, with the house of Lutzenbourg, but the marriage was consummate ere he could finde any meane to prevent it.

The Frenchmen raised a crew, and sodainly took the towne of Saint Calarie in Normandy, nere to the river of Some, and an other army vnder the leading of sir Ambrose de Lore, wasted all the countrey about Cane. The Duke of Bedford not minding to be idle, sent the Earle of Arundell, Henry the Earle of Warwicks sonne, the Lord Lisle Adam Marshall of France for king Henry, and 1200. men of warre, with ordinance and munitions to besiege the towne of Laigny vpon the river of Marne, the Earle with shot of a Canon brake the arch of the bydge, and got from the Frenchmen their bulwarke, and set it on fire, diuers assaults were made, but the towne was well defended, by 800. men of armes, besides other souldiers. The Duke of Bedford hereof aduertised, gathered an army of 6000. men, wherof were Captaines Robert Lord Willoughby, sir Andrew Ogard, Chamberlaine to the Duke, sir John Saluaine, bailiffe of Roane, sir John Mountgomery, bailiffe of Caur, sir Philip Hal bailiffe of Wernale, sir Richard Ratcliffe deputy of Caleis, sir Ralph Newill, sir Ralph Standish, sir John Handford, sir Richard Enthin, sir Richard Haringdon, bailiffe of Cüreur, sir William Fulthorpe, sir Thomas Griffith of Ireland, David Hall, Thomas Strangwish, Leonard Ormstone, Esquires, and Thomas Gerard. The Duke of Bedford with this army came to the siege befoze Laigny, where he made a bydge of boates, and brought his ordinance so nere the town, that to al people it seemed not long able to resist: but the bastard of Orleans Earle of Dunoy, with other hardy Captaines valiantly defended it. At the length the French king perceluing this towne to be the key betwene the territories of Burgoigne, English and French, & that the losse thereof should turne him to irrecoverable damage, sent the Lord of Rieur, Boyton, the Hire, the Lord Gaiwcourt and 6000. men, with plenty of victuals, to the intent, epyther to raise the siege, or at the least victual the towne. The Frenchmen framed themselves in order of battell, as though they would doe much, but did nothing in effect: but that whilst part of them maintained a skirmish, an other sort conueyed into the towne thirtie oren, and other victual. In that skirmish were slaine diuers valiant Frenchmen, and the rest considering how the Englishmen were planted, being now the beginning of August August, they remoued and went vnto Fort vnder Perre, where by a bridge made of empty pipes, they passed into the yle of France. The Duke of Bedford not minding to lose the more for the lesse, raised his siege, and returned to Paris, nothing more minding then to trie his quarrell by dint of sword against his enemies, if they would thereto agree. And thereupon he sent Bedford his herault to the Lord Gaucourt & other Captains of the French armie, offering them battaile within a conuenient time, and where they would appoint. To the which officer at armes the Captaines answered, that battaile they feared not, nor the English force they much regarded, but they saide there was time to gaine, and time to lose, of the which they doubted not, to espie the one or the other, to their gaine or losse.

The 25. of Nouember the Lord Fitzwalter was drowned on the sea, and many other harines were done by tempest.

The Regent, sent Peter of Lurenborough Earle of Saint Paule, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with a competent number of men to besiege the towne of Saint Alarie, which the Frenchmen a little before had taken, these valiant Captaines enuironed the towne with a strong siege. Within the towne, were sir Lewes de Vicount, sir Philip de la Towre, and sir Reignold de Verseilles Captaines with 300. good fighting men, which by the space of thre weekes, manfully defended the same. But then perceiuing the fiercenesse of the Englishmen, and the weakenesse of themselves, and having no hope of reliefe, rendered the towne, their hozse and harnets onely saued.

After this towne was thus gotten, the Earle of Saint Paule, and the Lord Willoughby returned to the Regent, where they were well welcommed, and after the said Earle departed from Paris, to lay siege to the Castell of Monches, but being encamped nere to the towne of Blangy, he by a sodaine maladie finished his daies and departed this life, leauing his seignories to Lewes his sonne and heire.

On the eight day of July, King Henry beganne his Parliament at Westminister, continued it till Lammasse, and then adiourned it vntill Saint Edwards tide.

Parliament.

This yere in the south west appeared a blasing starre.

During the raigne of this king Henry the first were Lieutenants ouer the Realme of Ireland, Edmond Earle of March, and James Earle of Dymond his deputie: John Sutton Knight Lord of Dudley, and sir Thomas Strange his deputie: sir Thomas Stanley, and sir Christopher Planket his deputie: Lyon Lord Welles, and the Earle of Dymonde his deputie: James Earle of Dymonde the kings Lieutenant by himselfe: John Earle of Shrewsbury, and the Archbishop of Diuelin Lord Justice in his absence: Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, father to Edward the fourth and Earle of Ulster, had the office of Lieutenant by Letters Patents, during the space of tenne yeres, who deputed vnder him at severall times, the Baron of Diuelin, Richard Fitz Eustace Knight, James Earle of Dymonde, and Thomas Fitz Moris, Earle of Hilbare: to this Richard then resident in Diuelin, was bozne within the Castell there, the second sonne George Duke of Clarence, after ward drowned in a butte of malmesey.

John Lord
Talbot.

John Lord Talbot gathered a crew of chosen men of warre in England, to the number of 800. and about the beginning of the moneth of March, sayled into Normandy, and passed by Roan towards Paris, and in his way he toke the strong Castell of Jeing betwene Beauuois and Gisors, and caused all the Frenchmen within to be hanged on the walles, and after rased the Castell, and came to the Regent Duke of Bedford at Paris. The presence of which renowned Captaine, so incouraged the hearts of the English nation, that they thought nothing able to resist their puissance, and so discouraged the hearts of the Frenchmen, that they were in doubt whether it were better to fight or to flie, for he was a chosen Captaine, and in martiall seates fully instructed. When this hardy Baron had communed with the Regent, he departed from Paris with his army, and besieged the Castell of Beaumont vpon Dife, whereof was Captaine sir Amadour de Vignolles, brother to the Pire: which Castell was sone rendred vpon condition. After that he recovered without long siege, the towne of Creile, the bridge of Saint Marens, the new towne of Emoy, Crispy in Taloyz, and Cleramont in Beauuois: and so with great riches and rich prisoners, he returned againe to Paris.

The towne of Saint Denis, which is within two English miles of Paris, was gotten by the practise of one Iohn Notice a Knight of Mleance, from Matthew Gougly, and Thomas Kiriell Captaines, they slew there many Englishmen, and toke many prisoners, but sone after the saide Captaines with strength taken from Paris, laid sech strong a siege about Saint Denis, that finally they agreed to deliuer the towne to the Englishmen.

In the very same season the Earle of Arundell toke the Castell of Bome-line, and rased it to the ground, and after toke the Castell of Doyle, and from thence came to saint Selerine, where the Lord Ambrose de Lore was Captaine, which issued out and fought with the Englishmen so eagerly at the first, that he droue them backe an arrow shot: but the Earle so incouraged his men, that they toke new courages to them, and set so fiercely on the Frenchmen, that they slue a great number, and droue the remnant into the towne. After this victoery, he besieged Louiers, whereof was Captaine the Pire, and his brother, which rendred the towne without stroke. When the Earle enuironed the towne of Saint Selerine with a strong siege, when he had lien there almost thre moneths, euery day attempting somewhat, for the performance of his enterpryse: in conclusion at the thre monethes he gaue so fierce assault, that by force he entred the towne, and slue Iohn maine, and Guillam Saint Aubine, the chiefe Captaines, and 800. of their men of warre, and the children of Loire were taken prisoners: he replenished the towne, and made Captaine sir Iohn Cornewall. When he besieged the strong towne of Silly, and the inhabitants deliuered pledges vpon condition, that if the towne were not rescued within thirte daies, they should rer-der the towne into his possession: which offer was taken, and when the time was expired, the towne was deliuered, where leauing a garrison, the Earle departed to Spain, & in the meane way toke the Castels of Melley and Saint Laurence.

The Lord Willoughby, and sir Thomas Kiriell returning with great victories out of the parties of Burgoigne, toke in their way the towne of Louiers, and furnished it both with men and munitions.

The Earle of Arundell minding to haue besieged the towne of Reys, was there slaine with Ralph Standish, the Earle of Arundell was buried at Beauuois, in the gray friers there.

The Earle of Arundell wounded to death.
Great frost.

Thyough a great frost, that lasted from the 25. of Nouember, vnto the tenth of February, the Thames was so frozen, that the merchandise which came to the Thames mouth, was there landed, and carried thtyough Kent to London.

When the Pope Eugenius the fourth, and his Cardinals after long labour could make no peace betwixt king Henry of England and France, and Charles also named king of France, they at length made a peace betwixt the said Charles and Philip Duke of Burgoigne, wherby the said Duke of Burgoigne became vtter enemy to the king of England, and sone after the said Duke began his order of the Lilly, and the Golden fleece, and ordained certaine knights of that order, and made thereunto many statutes, whereof some of them were like vnto the statutes of the Garter.

This yere on the 14. of September died Iohn Duke of Bedford Regent of France, a man as politike in peace, as hardie in warre, and yet no moze hardy than mercifull when he had the victoꝝ, whose bodie was with all funerall pompe, and solemne exequies buried in the Cathedrall Church of our Ladie in Roan, on the north side of the high altar, vnder a sumptuous and costly monument: which tombe when king Lewes the 11. by certaine vndiscreete persons was counselled to deface, affirming that it was a great dishonour, both to the king, and to the realme, to see the enemy of his father, and theirs to haue so solemne and rich memorfall: he answered saying. What honour shall it be to vs, or to you to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the dead bones of him, whom in his life time, neither my father, nor your progenitoꝝ, with all their puissance, were once able to make flee one foote backward: but by his strength, wit, and policie kept them all out of the principal dominions of the realme of France, and out of this Noble Dutchie of Normandy: wherefore I say, first, God saue his soule, and let his bodie now lie in rest, which when he was aliue, would haue disquieted the proudest vs all: and for the tombe, I assure you is not so decent, nor conuenient as his honour and actes deserued.

The Duke of Bedford died.

Ann. reg. 14.

A too: the saying of a king against defacers of monuments.

After the death of the Noble Prince the Duke of Bedford, the Frenchmen began not onely to withdraue their obedience, which they had by oth promised to the King of England, but also toke sword in hand, and openly defied the Englishmen: but the Englishmen appointed for regent in France Richard Duke of York, sonne to Richard Earle of Cambridge (beheaded at Richard Duke of York, made Regent of France.

Hampten.) This Richard now Regent was so disdained of Edmond Duke of Somerset, being chosen to the King, that by all means possible he sought his hindrance, by reason whereof, ere the Duke of York could get his dispatch, he was constrained to linger till the Citie of Paris, and diuers other the chiefest townes in France were gotten by the French king.

The Duke of York perceiuing his euill will, openly dissembled that which he inwardly minded, and thus either of them wrought things to the others displeasure, till at length, by moztall warre they were both consumed, with almost all their whole lines and offsprings.

The Normans of the countrey of Caur, being hartened by the death of the Duke of Bedford, beganne a new rebellion, slue diuers Englishmen, robbed many townes that were vnder the English obedience, and toke the towne of Warflew by assault, and diuers other townes. But the new Lord Regent being aduertised, sent forth the Lord Scales, sir Thomas Kiriell, and the Lord Hoo, which so afflicted those rebels of Caur, that they slue aboue fise thousand persons, and bent all the Townes and Villages in the countrey, not being walled, so that in that part was neither habitation, nor tillage, for all the people fled into Bytaine, and all the beasts of the countrey were brought to Candebecke, where a good sheepe was sold for an English penie, and a cow for twelue pence. Daily was skirmishing in every part, in so much, that the Lord Scales discomfited at the Rye beside Roan, the Hire and 1500. valiant Frenchmen, of the which, aboue thre hundred were taken prisoners, beside seven goodly fapze coursers. Amongst other of the prisoners, were sir Richard Reiginauld de Fountaines, sir Alaine Gerond, Alaine de Monsey, and Geffrey Gram Capitaine of the Scots. But yet this victorie and others the like, staied not the Frenchmen from working treason daily, in so much, that diuers townes turned to the part of king Charles, and some were taken by practise, as Dappe, Boys de Vincent and other.

A cow for six pence, and a sheepe for a penie.

Here is one chiefe point to be noted, that eyther the disdaine among the chiefe peeres of the Realme of England (as ye haue heard) or the negligence of the kings Counsell, was the losse of the whole dominion of France, betwene the riuers of Seine and Garne, and in especiall of the Noble Citie of Paris: for here befoze were sent ouer thousands for defence of the holdes and fortresses, now were sent hundreds, yea and scores, some rascals, and some not able to draw a bowe, or beare a bill: for the Lord Willoughby, and the Bishop of Terronanne, which had the Gouvernement of the Citie of Paris, had in their company not past 2000. Englishmen. Which weaknesse king Charles wel perceiuing, he appointed the Constable Arthure of Britaine, the Earle of Dunoy, the Lords De la Roch, and Lisle Adam, with other balliant Captaines, and men of warre, as well Burgonians as French, to go befoze Paris, trusting by fauour of certain Citizens, with whom he had intelligence, shortly to be Lord of the Citie, without great losse or battell: so these Captaines came befoze the Citie of Paris, but perceiuing that all things succeeded not accordyng to their expectation, they returned to Mount Martyr, and the next day set on the towne of Saint Dionese, where they slue two hundred hundred Englishmen, and upon composition permitted the other to depart to Paris.

Thomas Lord Beaumont, which of late was come to Paris with 800. men, issued forth of the Citie with 600. souldiers, intending to biewe the doings and number of the French armie, but being espied, hee was sodainly compassed about, so that he was discomfited and taken, and with him 80. prisoners, besides 200. which were slaine in the field, and the remnant chased to the gates of the Citie. The Parisians, especially the master of the balls, and some of the Uniuersitie, and Michaelle Lellier, and many other Burgeses of the Citie, perceiuing the weaknesse of the Englishmen, and the force of the Frenchmen, signified to the French Captaines their mindes, willing them with all diligence to come, that they might receiue so rich a pray to them to be deliuered. The Constable delaying no time, came with his power, and lodged by the Charterhouse, and the Lord Lisle Adam appoaching to the walles, shewed to the Citizens a charter, sealed with the great seale of King Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offences, and granted them their olde liberties, so that they would be to him true and obedient: which being to them declared, they ranne about the towne, crying Saint Denis, liue king Charles. The Englishmen perceiuing this, determined to keepe the gate of Saint Dionis, but the chaines were drawne, and women and children cast downe stones and scalding water on their heades, and the Citizens slue them, the Bishop of Eirtwine, the Lord Willoughby, and sir Simon Mornier, with dozen to the battie Saint Anthonic, whilst this rumour was in the towne, the Earle of Dunois, and other scaled the wals, and some passed the riuer by boates, and opened the gate of Saint Iames, by the which the Constable with his banner displayed entered. The Bishoppe and the Lord Willoughby defended their fortrese terme daies, and yielded. Thus was the Citie of Paris brought into the possession of Charles the French king, &c. now when Paris, Saint Denis, Saint Germaine and diuers other towne in Fraunce were taken for lacke of succour, the Duke of Borke Regent of France, came ouer into Normandy with 8000. men, and in his company the Earles of Salisburp and Suffolke, the Lord Falconbridge and other, but this Regent neuer did good in Fraunce, as appeareth by the histories.

The 19. day of Iuly, the Duke of Burgoigne, with a great multitude of Burgonians and Flemmings appeared befoze Calais, and there pight his Pavilions and Tents, at which season was Lieutenaunt of Calais sir John Ratcliffe Knight, and of the Castell was Lieutenaunt the Baron of Dudley: this siege endured about thre weekes, in which season many knightly actes were done and exercised on both parts.

Calais besieged by the Duke of Burgoigne.

On the second day of August the Duke of Gloucester, protedour of England, with 500. sailles, (as some write,) landed at Calais, and intended upon the third day following to haue issued out of the towne, and to haue giuen battaile to the Flemmings, (but as our English writers testifie,) so sone as the Duke of Burgoigne was ware of the great power of the Lord

Ro Fabian,

Protector,

Protector, he toke with him of his ordinance that he might lightly carrie, and the other that were cumbersome he left behind. When the duke with his host was thus tied, the Lord protector which his people followed him into the country by the space of eleuen dayes, in which season he burnt & tooke towncs of Popering and Bell, and returned to Caleis, and so into England.

An. reg. 15.

This yere was the Castle of towne of Rokesborough in Scotland besieged by the King of Scots, but when he heard that Sir Ralph Gray Knight was coming thither with a competent number to remoue the siege, anon he departed, leauing some part of his ordinance behind him, to his great shame and dishonour.

Quene Katherine Deceased.

The 3. of January Quene Katherine late wife to Henry the fift, and mother to King Henry the sixt, departed out of this transitory life at Bermondsey, and on the eight of february hir body was brought to S. Katherins by the tower, from thence to S. Pauls, and so was buried at Westminster in our Ladys chappell, and hir corpes being taken vp againe in the reigne of King Henry the 7. when he laid the foundation of his new chappell there, she was neuer since buried, but remaineth still aboue ground in a coffin of woods, behind the east end of the quire. This Quene Katherine (saith Hall) after the death of K. Henry the fift hir husband, being yong and lusty, following more hir owne appetite, than friendly counsell, & regarding more hir priuate affection, than her owne honour, toke to husband (saith he) a goodly gentleman, named Owen Tewther, by whom she conceived and brought forth thre sonnes, Edmond, Iaspar, and another which was a monke of Westminster, and a Daughter which liued not long. After whose death, King Henry because they were his brethren, of one wombe descended, created Edmond Earle of Richmond, and Iaspar Earle of Penbrooke: which Edmond had by Margaret Daughter and sole heire to John Duke of Somerset, Henry, which after was King of this Realme, called King Henry the seuenth.

The Dutches of Bedford, sister to Lewes Earle of S. Paul, without counsell of her friends, married a lusty Knight, called Sir Richard Woodville, to the great displeasure of hir vncle the Bishop of Turwine, and the Earle hir brother. This Sir Richard was made baron of Riucers, and after Earle, and had by his Lady many noble sonnes, and faire daughters, whereof one was Lady Elizabeth, after Quene of England, married to King Edward the fourth.

This yere the 14. of January at none, the great Stone gate at London bridge with the tower vpon it next to Southwarke fell downe in the Thames and two of the farthest arches of the same bridge, and yet no man perished in body, which was a great worke of God, from whence she was removed to Bermondsey, and from thence conveyed to Canterbury, where she was solemnly entered by King Henry the fourth her husband.

This yere the King gave licence to Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and Elianor his wife, to build and embattell his mannoꝝ house at Crænewich, to inclose two hundred acres of ground pasture, wood, and heath, and to imbatell his tower in the same parke, &c.

In the meane time, John Duke of Somerset accompanied with the Lords of Fauconbridge, Talbot, Sir Francis Surien Arraganois, Mathew Gough, Thomas Pawlet, Thomas Harrington, Walter Lymbroke, John Geding, William Watton Esquires, and Thomas Hilton bailife of Roane, with a puissance of the English party, besieged the towne of Harflew both by water and by land. The capitaine within the towne was called Sir John de Stuteville, and Sir Robert his brother, with other, to the number of 600. fighting men. The assailants made trenches, both to assault the towne, and to let the French from succours, that they should neither approach noꝝ aide the townes men besieged: divers assautes were given, and great ordinance was laid befoze the gate of the towne, which overthrew buildings: the siege endured long, to the great discomfiture of them within, whereof they advertised the King, who sent thither the Earle of Dwe, the Earle of Dunoy, the bastard of Bourbon, the Lord Gainecourt and other, with 4000. men, these passed the river of Some betwæne Amlas and Cozby, came befoze the towne, and daily skirmished with the Englishmen, but nothing prevailed, and therefore returned. The captaines of the towne rendred the towne to John Duke of Somerset, who made captaines there Thomas Pawlet, William Lymbrike, Christopher Barker, and George S. George, which many yeres manfully defended the towne and haven, but after ward when the said Duke was regent, he not onely lost the towne, but also the Citie of Roane, with many other Cities.

This yere was a parliament holden at Westminster in which were divers notable conclusions ordained, aswell for the preservation of peace at home, as for the maintenance of war in outward regions: and an act was made for buseng and selling by strangers, very profitable to the publike weal if it were observed.

An. reg. 16.

On the 6. of November the Earle of Warwike as regent of France, passed the sea, after he had ben seven times shipped and unshipped, and landed at Harflew with 1000. fresh soldiers, and came to Roan, and then the Duke of Poike returned into England.

The Earle of Warwicke hearing that the Duke of Burgoyne besieged the Castle of Croytie, sent the Lord Talbot, the Lord Fauconbridge, Sir Thomas Kiriell, Sir John Montgomerie, Thomas Lymbroke, Thomas Chandos, Dauby Hall, and other Knights and Esquires, and in all 5000. men. When the Duke of Burgoyne was informed of the approach of the Lord Talbot, and other, hee with all his power saving 400. left in a bastle by him there newly builded, fledde to Abbeville, which bastle was soone gained, and the men either slaine or taken. After this the Lord Talbot sent to the Duke of Burgoin, signifying to him, that except he would come forth, and giue him battell, he would utterly waste his countrey of Picardy, and according to his promise he bent towne, spoiled, and slew many people in Picardy, but for all this doings, the Duke of Burgoyne appeared not, but got him from Abbeville to Ambois, so that the Lord Talbot abode 20. daies in Picardy and Artois, destroying all afoze him, and returned without impeachment.

Owen Tewcher foully hurting his keeper, brake out of Newgate, but was taken after ward by the Lord Beaumont, and brought again to Newgate, and againe escaped. This Owen was thus imprisoned by the Duke of Gloucester, for that he had foure children by Quene Katherine, late wife to Henry the fift, as is aforesayd. This Owen was many yeeres after ward taken at a skirmish about Wigmore, and brought by sir Richard Vehan grandfather to great Vehan the sergeant at armes, to Hereford, and there beheaded, and buried: but after ward Iaspar Sonne to Owen sodainly tooke sir Richard Vehan in his house, or, as some say, at Chepstow Castle, and caused his head to be smitten off. In the moneth of June the Earle of Huntington (as steward of Gwine) with 2000. archers, and 400. spears was sent into Gascoigne, as a supply to the country and commons of the same. Also sir Richard Wooduile, sir William Chamberlaine, sir William Peits, and sir William Story with 1000. men were sent to stiffe the towne in Normandy, which at that time had thereof great neede, for the English Captaines had small confidence in the Normans, and not so much in some of their owne nation, for bribery, with couetousnes ranne fast abroad with French crowns, that bnneth any creature could hold their hands close, or purses shut.

The towne of
burnt.

This yere the towne of Wilco Walbanke, or Newgate in the countie of Chester was pitifully consumed with fire.

This yere, by reason of great tempests, immeasurable windes and raines there rose such a scarcitie, that wheate was sold in some places for two shillings five pence the bushell, wine for twelue pence the gallon, bay salt for fourtene pence the bushell, &c

In this moneth followed such a frost, and after that so deepe a snow, that all the ground was couered therewith, and all the ditches frozen, which wea-ther put the Englishmen in hope to recouer againe the towne of Ponthoisse, by the French King gotten before, by corrupting with money diuers burgesses of the towne, wherefoze the Englishmen being clothed all in white, with John Lord Clifford their captaine, came in the night to the ditches, and passed them without danger, by reason of the frost, scaled the walles, slew the watch, and tooke the towne with many profitable prisoners.

After the regaining of the towne of Ponthoisse Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwick lieutenant generall of France, and of the dutchy of Normandy, died in the Castle of Roan in Normandy on the last of Aprill, the yere of his age 58. And on the fourth of October next following his corpes being honorably conueyed, aswell by water as by land, from Roan in Normandy, to Warwick in England, and was laid with full solemnities in a faire chest made of stone stone in the westdore of the colledge of our Ladies Church, by his noble ancestors, till a chappell by him deuised in his life were made, which chappell founded on the rocke, and all the members thereof, his executors did fully make and apparell, by the authozitie of his said last will and testament: And there after by the said authozity they did translate the said body into the vault aboue said, where he is intombed right princely and poytured with an image armed of copper and gilt, hopped ouer with stauces of copper and gilt, like a chariot.

About the beginning of Lent, Iohn Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot, with other captaines and men of war, to the number of 2000. marching towards Picardy, passed ouer the riner of Some, and thzough the towne of Monteruel, came befoze the fortreffe of Fullenill, which the Duke besieged, Whilest the Lord Talbot entred further into the country. After that the Duke had mounted his great artillery, and began to batter the hold, the captaine within being slaine with a shot thereof, and the batterie being still continued, the place was yelded, in the which the Duke left a competent garrison of souldiours, which after ward soze indomaged the country.

This done, the Duke followed the Lord Talbot, who was already entred a good way within the country of Sauthois, and now ioyning their powers togither, they came to a fortreffe called Liphons in Sauthois, which was also rendzed vnto them, after they had bzent the Church which the countrie people kept against them, and would not yeld it, till they were fired out, and bzent, and slaine, to the number of 300. The fortreffe being by composition deliuered into their hands, the duke with his power lay there about ten dayes, sending diuers troupes of his men abroad into the country, which spoiled the same, toke the fortreffe of Harbonners, and the Lord thereof within it, who soz his ransome, and to haue his subiects and house saued from spoile and fier, compounded with his takers soz 1000. saluz of gold, which he paid to them: finally, after the Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Talbot, with their power had laine in Liphons about ten dayes, they returned into Normandy without any impeachment,

This yere wheat was sold at London soz thze shillings the bushell, malt soz thirtene shillings the quarter, otes soz eight pence the bushell, which soz ced men to eate beanes, pease, and barley, moze then in an hundred yeres befoze: wherefoze Stephen Browne maioz of London sent into Bruse, and caused to be brought to London many ships laden with rie, which did much good to the people, soz bread cozne was so scarce in England that poze people made them bread of serne roots.

In a Parliament at Keding it was ordained, that all merchant strangers should goe to host with Englishmen, and to make sale of their merchandises, and buy againe what they would within the space of six monethes, giuing their host soz euery twenty shillings worth two pence, except the Esterlings, And that euery householder that was assen, should pay to the King 12. pence the yere, and euery seruant alien six pence.

Richard Wich
burnt on the Tower hill.

Hatfield Earle of Penbroke, these were the Kings brethren by the mothers side, John Surton Knight was created Baron of Dudley, the last day of the Parliament at Reading. Sir Richard Wich vicar of Hermetworth in Essex, or middlesex, sometime vicar of Wertsford in Kent, who had before abjured, was burnt on the tower hill the 17. of June. After whose death was great murmur among the people, for some said he was a good man and an holy, and put to death by malice: and some said the contrary, so that many men and women went by night to the place where he was burnt, and offered their money, images of war, and other things, making their prayers, kneeling, and kissing the ground, bare away with them the ashes of his body for holy reliques, &c. This endured eight dayes, til the maiors and aldermen ordained men of armes, to restrain the people, who apprehended many, and sent them to prison, among whom was taken the vicar of Berking Church beside the tower, in whose parish all this was done, who had received the offering of the simple people. And to excite them to offer the more fervently to the fulfilling of his false couetousnes, he had medled ashes with the powder of spices, and strewed them in the place where the priest was burnt, and so the simple people were deceived, weening the swete savour had come of the ashes of the dead priest: all which the said vicar of Berking church confessed in prison. This haue I noted the more at large, because some haue writte the vicar of Berking to be burnt, which is false, for he was not burnt, though he better deserued than the other.

The Duke of
of France.

After the death of the Earle of Marwarke, the Duke of Borke was againe made regent of France, which being accompanied with the Earle of Orford, the Lord Boucher called Earle of Ewe, Sir James of Dymond, the Lord Clinton, Sir Richard Wooduile, and diuers other noble men on the firste of May shipped at Portsmouth, and sailed thence into Poymandy, before whose arriual, the French King soe græued with the towne of Ponthoife, assembled a great army, and besieged the said towne himselfe in person, enuironing it with bastiles, trenches, and ditches, beating the walles and bulwarks with the shot of great ordinance, giuing thereunto diuers great assaults, but John Lord Clifford like a valiant captaine defended the towne so manfully, that the Frenchmen rather lost than won.

The Duke of Borke at his landing, sent for the Lord Talbot, and a great number of souldiours, and so came nere to the towne of Ponthoife, and there incamped himselfe, and sent word to the French King, that thither he was come to giue him battell, if he would come out of his strength and bastiles, but the French King determined not to venture his person with men of so base estate, but meant to keepe his ground, bidding the Lord regent to enter at his perill: and in the meane season did what he could to stop the passage of the river Dife, so that no victuall should be brought to the English army by that way.

The Duke of Borke perceiving that the French King minded not to fight, purposed to passe over the river of Dife, and so to fight with him. Whereupon he remoued his campe, and appointed the Lord Talbot and other to make countenance, as they would passe the river by force at the port of Beaumont, amount, and appointed another company in boates of timber and lether, and bridges made of cords and ropes to passe ouer beneath the abbey. Whilest the Lord Talbot made a crie as though he would assault the gate, certaine Englishmen passed the water in boates, and drew a bridge of cords ouer, so that a great number of them were got to the other side, ere the Frenchmen were abashed what had hapned. When they saw the chance, they ran like mad men to haue stopped the passage, but it was too late, for the most part of the Englishmen were got ouer, insomuch, that they chased their enemies backe, and slue Sir Guiliam de Chastell, and diuers other. The Frenchmen seeing their euill hap, returned to their King, and tolde him what had happened, whereupon he doubting to be assailed to his disaduantage, thought not good longer to tarry, but with all speede, removing his ordinance into the baskle of Saint Martin, which he had newly made, dislodged in the night from Pansbupston, and went to Poytie, leauing the Lord de Corigni Admirall of France with 3000. men, to keepe the baskle. The Englishmen the next day came before the towne of Ponthois, thinking there to haue found the French King, but he was gone, and in his lodging they found great riches, and much stuffe, which he could not carrie away for feare of the sodaine inuasion. The Duke with his power entred the towne, repaired the wals, and diuers times assaulted the baskle of the Frenchmen. After this the Duke intending once againe to offer the French King battell, left behinde him at Ponthois, Sir Geruais Clifton, Sir Nicholas Burdet, Henry Chandos, and a thousand soldiers, and therewith removing with his whole army came before Poytie, where he set himselfe and his men in order of battell ready to fight. There issued out some Frenchmen, but to their losse: for diuers of them were slaine, and fower valiant horsemen taken. The Duke perceiuing the Frenchmen durst not encounter in field with the English power, dislodged from Poytie, & came to Spaunt, and from thence to Roen.

When the Regent and the Lord Talbot were returned againe into Normandy, the French King considering how much it should redound to his dishonour to let rest the towne of Ponthois, in his enemies hands, he effectuously returning sodainly againe vnto Ponthois, he first by assault gat the Church, and after the whole towne, toke the captaine and diuers other Englishmen, and slue to the number of thre hundred, amongst the which Sir Nicholas Burdet chiefe butler of Normandy was one. Anreg. 19.

After this King Henry, and King Charles, agreed to send Ambassadors to commune of peace: King Henry sent Henry Beaufort Cardinall of Winchester, with diuers other noble men to Caleis, with whom was also sent Charles Duke of Orleans yet prisoner in England, to the end he might be both authoz of the peace, and procurer of his owne deliuerance. The French King sent the Archbishop of Reims, and the Earle of Dunois, and the Duke of Burgoigne sent the Lord de Creue-Cure, and diuers other: all these met at Caleis, where the Duke of Orleans courteously receiued the Earle of Dunois (his bastard brother) thanking him greatly for his paines taking in gouerning his lands and countrie. absence, abſence, diuers communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the Duke, as for a ſmall peace, but nothing was concluded, ſauing that another meeting was appointed. The Duke of Bliance was ſet at libertie, paying for his ranſome 300000. crownes.

The 26. of nouember was a challenge in armes done beſore King Henry within liſts, in Smithfield, betwene Sir Richard Wooduile, a knight of England, and a knight of Spaine, but the King tooke vp the matter into his hands, after the third ſtroke.

This yere King Henry being of himſelfe alwayes naturally inclined to doe good, and fearing leaſt he might ſeeme vnthankfull to Almighty God for his great benefits beſtowed vpon him, ſince the time he firſt tooke vpon him the regiment of his Realme, determined for his primar notable worke, to erect and found two famous Colleges in the honour and worſhip of his holy name, and for the increaſe of vertue, the dilation of cunning, and eſtabliſhment of Chriſtian faith, whereof the one in Cambridge, to be called his College Royall of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas: and the other at Eaton, beſide Windſore, to be called his Colledge of our Bleſſed Ladie. And for the perſormance of this his deuout purpoſe, he enſcoſſed certaine Biſhops with other noble and worſhipfull perſonages, by his letters pattents, with lands and poſſeſſions, parcell of his inheritance of the Dutchie of Lancaſter, to the cleere value of well nere ſolwer and thirtie hundred pound by yere, which letters patents he after confirmed by his acte of Parliament, declaring alſo by his will vnto his ſaid ſceoffes, his intent and meaning, how the ſame ſhould be imploied vpon the edifications of his ſaid two Colledges, whercof in my iudgement the deuiſe is ſo excellent, and the buildings ſo princely and apt for that purpoſe, as I cannot omit to ſet forth vnto you the very plat of the whole Colledge in Cambridge, euen as I finde mentioned, almoſt Verbatim, in his ſaid will, ſuppoſing, that if the reſt of the houſe had proceeded according to the Chappell already finiſhed (as his full intent and meaning was) the like Colledge could ſcant haue been found againe in any Chriſtian land. This Colledge was begun in his time, and finiſhed ſo farre, that in Anno 1443, (which was the 23. of his raigne) the cemiterie or Church yarde, the altar, &c. (as the manner was) were conſecrated by the Biſhops of Salisburie and Lincolne. The words of the Will are theſe: As touching the dimensions of the Church of my ſaid Colledge, of our Ladie and Saint Nicholas of Cambridge, I haue deuſed and appointed, that the ſame Church ſhall containe in length 288. foote of aſſiſe, without any Ale, and all of the wideneſſe of ſortie foote. And the length of the ſame Church from the Weſt ende vnto the altars at the Quire doore, ſhall containe 120. foote. And from the Pronoffs ſtall, vnto the græce called Gradus Chori, 90. foote, for 36. ſtals on either ſide of the ſame Quire, anſwering to lxx. ſellowes, and ten priests conduits, which muſt be de prima forma. And from the ſaid ſtals vnto the Eaſt ende of the ſaid Church, 62. foote of aſſiſe. Church to be in height ninety fote imbatteled, vaulted and Charercofed, sufficiently butteraced, and every butterace lined with finials. And in the east end of the same Church shall be a window of nine dayes, and betwixt every butterace a window of five dayes. And betwixt every of the same butteraces in the body of the Church, on both sides of the same Church a closet with an Altar therein, contayning in length twentie fote, and in bzeadth ten fote, vaulted and finished vnder the soile of the Ile windowes. And the pavement of the Church to be enhanced foure fote above the ground without. And the height of the pavement of the Quire one fote and a halfe above the pavement of the Church. And the pavement of the Aultar thre fote above that. And on the North side of the Quire a Vestrie contayning in length fiftie fote, and in bzeadth, twentie two fote, departed into two houses beneath, and two houses above, which shall containe in height twentie two fote in all, with an entrie from the Quire vaulted. And at the West end of the Church a Cloyster square, the East pane contayning in length, 175. fote and the West pane as much. The North pane two hundred fote, and the South pane as much, of the which the Deambulatorie thirtene fote wide, and in height twentie fote, to the Cozbill table, with cleare Royses and Butteraces with finiales, vaulted and imbatteled. And the ground thereof, foure fote lower than the Church ground. And in the middle of the West pane of the Cloyster a strong Tower square, contayning foure and twentie fote within the walles. And in height one hundred and twentie fote to the Cozbill table. And foure small Turrets over that lined with Pyacles. And a doze into the sayde Cloyster inward, but outward none. And as touching the dimensions of the housing of the sayde Colledge, I have deuised and appoynted in the South side of the said Church a Quadraunt, closing to both ends of the same Church, the East pane whereof shall containe two hundred and thirtie fote in length, and in bzeadth within the Walls two and twentie fote. In the same panes middle a tower for a Gatehouse, contayning in length thirtie fote, and in bzeadth two and twentie, and in height forty fote, with thre Chambers over the Gate, every one over the other. And on either side of the same Gate foure Chambers, every one contayning in length five and twentie fote, and in bzeadth two and twentie fote. And ouer every of these Chambers, two Chambers above of the same measure or moze, with two Towers outward, and two Towers inward.

The South pane shall containe in length 238. fote, and in bzeadth two and twentie fote within, in which shall bee seven Chambers, every one contayning in length nine and twentie fote, and in bzeadth two and twentie fote with a Chamber parcell of the Proouosts lodging, contayning in length five and thirtie fote, and with a Chamber in the East corner of the same pane, contayning in length five and twentie fote, and in bzeadth two and thirtie fote. And ouer every of all these Chambers two Chambers, and with five towers outward, and thre towers inward. The West pane shall containe in length 230. fote, and in bzeadth within 24. fote, in which at the ende toward the Church shall be a Library, contayning in length 110. fote, and in bzeadth

And vnder it a large house for reading and disputations, containing in length fourtie fote: And two chambers vnder the same library, each containing nine and twentie fote in length, and in breadth foure and twentie fote. And ouer the said library a house of the same largenes, for diuers stufte of the said Colledge. In the other end of the same pane a hall, containing in length 100. fote, vpon a vault of twelue fote high, ordained for the cellar and buttrie: and the breadth of the hall sixe and thirtie fote, on euery side thereof a bay window. And westward beyond these houses, and the said kitchin ordained for the hall, a bakehouse, a brewhouse, and other houses of office, betwene which there is left a ground square of fourescore fote in euery pane, for woode and such stufte. And in the middle of the said large quadrant shall be a conduit, goodly deuised for ease of the same colledge. And I will, that the edification procede in large forme of my said colledge cleane and substantiall, setting apart superfluitie of too great curious woorkes, of entaile and busse moulding. And I haue deuised and appointed that the precinct of my said colledge, as well on both sides of the garden from the colledge to the water, as in all other places of the same precinct, be inclosed with a substantiall wall, of the height of fourtene fote, with a large tower at the principall entrie against the middle of the east pane out of the high stræte. And in the same tower a large gate, and another tower in the middle of the West end at the new bidge. And the same wall to be crested, embattelled, and fortified with towers, as many as shall be thought conuenient thereunto. And I will, that my said colledge be edified of the most substantiall and best abiding stufte, of Stone, lead, glasse, and yron, that may best be had and prouided thereto.

Thus much I haue enlarged by occasion of reading this good Kings will: the cunning deuise whereof I leaue to the considerate iudgement of such as be expert in architecture, heartily desiring almighty God to put into the heart of some noble Prince of his land, one day to make perfect this royall woрке, so charitably begun.

Roger

Roger Bolinbrooke a great astronomer, with Thomas Southwell a chap-non of S. Stephens chappell at Westminster, were taken as conspiratours of the Kings death, for it was said, that the same Roger should labour to consume the Kings person by waie of Pseudomancie, and the said Thomas should say Masses in the lodge of Harnesey Parke beside London, vpon certaine instruments, with the which the said Roger should vse his craft of Pseudomancie, against the faith, and was assenting to the said Roger, in all his woyses. And the five and twentieth day of Iulie being Sondae, Roger Bolingbroke, with all his instruments of Pseudomancie, that is to say, a chayre painted wherein he was wont to sit, vpon the foure corners of which chayre stood foure swordes, and vpon euery sworde an image of copper hanging, with many other instrumentes: he stood on a high scaffolde in Paules Churchyarde, before the crosse, holding a sword in his right hand, and a scepter in his left, arrayed in a marvellous attire, and after the sermon was ended by master Low Bishop of Rochester, he abjured all articles longing to the craft of Pseudomancie or misdoynge to the faith, in presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cardinall of Winchester, the Bishop of London, Salisbury and many other.

On the Tuesday next following, dame Elianor Cobham, daughter to Reginald Cobham Lord of Struborough: Dutchesse of Glocester fled by night into the Sanctuary at Westminster, which caused hir to be suspected of treason.

In the meane tyme Roger Bolingbroke, was examined befoze the Kings Counsaile, where he confessed that he wrought the said Pseudomancie at the stirring and procurement of the said Dame Elianor, to knowe what should befall of hir, and to what estate she should come, whereupon she was cited to appere befoze Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterburie, Henry Beau-forte Bishop of Winchester Cardinall, Iohn Kempe Archbishop of Poze Cardinall: William Ascothe Bishop of Salisbury, and other in Saint Stephens chappell at Westminster, there to answer to certaine articles in number 28. of Pseudomancie, witchcraft, sorcerie heresie, and treason, where when she appeared, the foresaid Roger was brought forth to witnes against hir, and said, that she was cause and first stirred him to labor in the said arte.
 When on the eleventh of August, she was committed to the warde of Sir Iohn Steward, Sir William Wolfe Knights, Iohn Stanley Esquire, and other, to be conueyed to the Castle of Leedes, there to remaine til thre weekes after Michaelmasse.

Shortly after a commission was directed to the Carles of Huntington, Stafforde, Suffolke, and Northumberland, the treasurer Sir Ralph Cromwell, Iohn Cornwall, Lord Fanhope, Sir Walter Hungerforde, and to certaine Judges of both Benches, to enquire of all manner of treasons, sorceries and other things that might be hurtfull to the Kings person, befoze whom the said Roger, and Thomas Southwell, as principals, and dame Elianor as ac-cessarie, were indicted of treason in the Guilde Hall of London.

The thꝛe and twentieth of October dame Elianor appéred againe, and wiſneſſes were bzought ſozth and examined: and ſhe was conuict of the ſaid articles: then was it asked if ſhe would ſay any thing againſt the wiſneſſes, whereunto ſhe answered nay, but ſubmitted hir ſelfe. The 27. day of October ſhe abiured the articles, and was adioyned to appéere againe the ninth of November. In the meane time to woth on the 26. of October Thomas Southwell died in the Tower of London, as himſelfe had pꝛopheſied that he ſhould neuer die by Juſtice of the Lawe.

On Monday the 13. of Nouember, ſhe came from Westminster, by water, and landed at the Temple bzidge, from whence with a taper of ware of two pound in hir hande, ſhe went thꝛough Flæteſſtꝛæte, hoodleſſe (ſaue a kercheſe) to Pauls, where ſhe offered hir taper at the high altar. On the Wednesday next ſhee landed at the Swan in Thamis ſtꝛæte, and then went thꝛough Bzidgeſtꝛæte, Grace church ſtꝛæte, ſtraight to Leaden Hall, and ſo to Chriſt Church by Aldgate. On Fryday ſhe landed at Quene Hine, and ſo went thꝛough Cheape to S. Michaels in Coꝛnehill, in ſozme afoꝛeſaid: at all which times the Maioꝛ, ſherifes, and craftes of London, receiued hir and accompanied hir. This being done ſhe was committed to the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley, whereſin ſhe remained during hir life in the Caſtle of Cheſter, hauing pꝛeſely 100. markes aſſigned ſoz hir finding, in the 22. of Henry the ſixt ſhe was remoued to Kenſlwoꝛth, there to be ſafely kept, whole pꝛide, falſe, couetiſe, and kecherie, were cauſe of hir conſuſion.

The 18. of Nouember Roger Bolingbroke, with Sir John Hum pꝛeſt, and William Woodham Eſquier, was arraigned in the Cuſt Hall of London, where the ſaid Iohn and William had their charters, but Roger Bolingbrooke was condemned, and had iudgement of Sir Iohn Hody, chiefe Juſtice of the Kings Bench, and the ſame day he was dꝛawn from the tower to Tiboꝛne and there hanged and quartered: and when the ſaid Roger ſhould ſuffer, he ſaid that he was neuer guiltie of any treaſon againſt the Kings perſon, but he had pꝛeſumed ſo far in his cunning, whereof he cried God mercy: and the Juſtice that gaue on him iudgement liued not long after.

Henry Beauchampe ſucceeded in his fathers inheritance, who being kept kept two yeeres in the kings hands, was restozed to al his liuings with great gloz, for he was crowned King of Elight, by the Kings owne hands, and nominated chiefe Earle of England.

Henry Beauchamp Earle of Warwick.

The Duke of Orleans being deliuered (as is afoze shewed) and speaking now better English than French, after his arriual in France, repaired to the Duke of Burgoyne, and according to his promise, married the Lady Mary Cleue in the towne of Saint Omers, on whom he begat a sonne, which after was French King by the name of Lewes the twelfth.

Richard duke of Yorke regent of France and gouernoz of Normandy, sent the Lord Willoughby with a great number of souldiers, to destroy the county of Amiens, and John Lord Talbot was appointed to besiege the towne of Diepe: and the regent himselfe, accompanied with Edmond Duke of Somerset, set forthward into the dutchie of Anisw. The Lord Willoughby entred the country of his enemies vpon such a sodaine, that a great number of people were taken ere they could withdraue into any place of safegard. The Frenchmen in the garrisons adioynning, affronted with the clamor and crye of the people, issued out, and manfully fought with the Englishmen, but in the end the Frenchmen slaine in the forefront, they turned their backs and fled, the Englishmen solowed and slew many, and such as escaped the sword were robbed by the earle of Saint Pole, which was comming to aide the Englishmen: in this conflict were slaine aboue 600. men of armes, and a great number taken.

The Dukes of Yorke and Somerset entred into Anisw and Paine, and there destroyed townees, and spoiled the people, and with great prayes and prisoners repaired againe into Normandy, whither also the Lord Willoughby withdrew after his enterpryse atchiued. The Duke of Somerset entred into the marches of Bzptaine, and toke by assault a towne named la Gerch, appertayning to the Duke of Alanson, spoiling and burning the same, from thence he went to Ponray, where he sojourned two moneths, sending forth daily his men of war, to destroy the countries of Anisw, Traonnois, and Chatragonnois. The French King sent the Marshall Loyach with foure thousand men to resist the inuasions of the Duke of Somerset, but the Duke discomfited him, slew 100. of his men, and toke 62. prisoners of the best of them. The Duke after this encounter toke the towne of Beaumont le Vicount, and manned all the fortresses on the frontiers of his enemies, and with rich booties and prisoners returned to the Duke of Yorke.

In the meane time the Lord Talbot besieged the towne of Diepe, enuironing it with deepe trenches and rampiers, building also vpon the mount Powlet a strong bastle, but at length perceiuing the towne to be strongly defended, he deliuered the custodie of the bastle to his bastard sonne a valiant yong man and departed to Roan for aide, money, and munition.

The French King sent his sonne the Dolphin of Mienne, with the Earle of Dunois and 15000. men to raise the siege from Diepe: thre dayes they assailed the bastle, in the which 600. Englishmen were inclosed: at length the Frenchmen wan it, and toke the bastard Talbot prisoner, with Sir William Poitow, and Sir Iohn Repley, which shortly after were redeemed. The other Englishmen, seeing the battle won by the Frenchmen, stood all a day in order of battaille, and in the night following returned to Roan.

Whil实现 these things were in doing, Philip Duke of Burgoigne made sharpe war against the Earle of S. Pole, in taking from him his townes and Castles, so that he was constrained to renounce his allegtance, promised and swoyne to the King of England, and returned to the French parte.

A combat in Smithfield.

The 30. of January a challenge was done in Smithfield within liffes, befoze the King, the one, Sir Philip le Beawfe of Aragon a Knight, and the other an Esquire of the Kings house called Iohn Anley or Astley, these comming to the field toke their tents, and then was the Knights sonne made Knight by the King, and so brought againe to his fathers tent. When the Heraults of armes called them by name to doe their bat taile, and so they came both all armed with their weapons: The Knight came with his sword drawne, and the Esquire with his speare, which speare the Esquire cast against the Knight, but the Knight auoyded it with his sword, and cast it to the ground, then the Esquire toke his are, and went against the Knight sodainly, on whom he stroke many strokes hard and foze upon his basenet and on his hand, and made him lose and let fall his are to the ground, and byast by his vmbur thre times, and caught his dagger and would haue smitten him in the face, soz to haue slaine him in the field: and then the King cried ho, and so they were departed, and went to their tents, and the King dubbed Iohn Astley Knight soz his valiant toney, and the Knight of Aragon offered his harnes at Windsoze.

An. reg. 21.
Duke and Earle created.

Iohn Beauford Earle of Somerset, was made Duke of Somerset: and Lord Iohn Talbot soz his approued pzooves shewed in France, was created Earle of Shrovelsbury, & his sonne Lord Talbot, and then with a company of 3000. men sent againe into Poymandy, soz defence of that Countrie the 25. of May.

1443.
Commotion
at Norwich.

The Citizens of Norwich, rose against the Prior of Christs Church, with in the same Citie, and would haue fiered the priozy, they kept the towne by strength against the Duke of Norfolke, and all his power, wherefoze the King sent thether the chiefe Iudge Iohn Fortescue, with the Earles of Stafford and of Huntington, who indicted many Citizens, and the Prior also. The Liberties of the Citie were seyled into the Kings hand, and Sir Iohn Clifton made captaine there, and many of the Citizens fled ouer the seas and into knowne places.

Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington, at Windsoze was created Duke of Excester. Iohn Beawford Duke of Somerset deceased, and was buried at Wimborne.

Colledge and

William Chicheley Aldermen of London, augmented with goodly legacies, for the sustentation of the poore, which Colledge at the suppression was valued by the p[er]re in lands 156. pound 2. shillings, &c.

This archb[ish]op also founded two Colledges in Oxford, the one All soules Colledge (unto the which King Henry the first gaue lands lately belonging to the p[ri]ors aliens, to wit, 4. p[ri]ories, Alberbery in Salop, Rumney in Kent, Languenith in South Wales, & Wodon Pinkney in Northamptonshire, and therefore the said K. in the Charter is called founder :) The other Barnard Colledge since suppressed by King Henry the 8. now by Sir Thomas White againe redified, and named S. Johns Colledge. He also redified the new Library at Canterbury, and furnished the same with bookes, builded a great part of their keple, repaired their church, and gaue to the couent and Church many ornaments, and rich Jewels, he caused his owne tombe in the same Church to be builded during his life, he was the new builder, or especiall repayer of the faire large parish Church of Crodowne, as appeareth by his armes grauen on the wals, keple, and porch of the same Church.

John Scaffold bozne at Hoke in the parish of Abbotsbery in Dorsetshire, docto[or] of lawes, deane of Saint Martins le Grand in London, after Bishop of Bath and Wells, about the 12. of Henry the 6. made Chancello[er] of England, was by Eugenius the fourth, made Archb[ish]op of Canterburie.

Also Lewes Lushebrughe Bishop of Elie deceased at his maner of Hatfield Anno's Eli[ab]. and was buried at Elie. To whom Thomas Bourchar succceeded, being translated from Worcester.

Whilist England was disquieted, and France by spoile defaced, all Christendome lamented the continuall destruction of so noble a Realm, and the effusion of so much Christian blood: wherfore to agree the two puissant kings, all the Princes of Christendome trauailed so effectually by the Orato[rs] and Ambassadors, that a diet was appointed to be kept at the Citie of Tow[er] in Tow[er]aine, where, for the K. of England appeared William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, docto[or] Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, keeper of the Kings p[ri]nt seale, Sir Robert Ros, and other: and for the French King were appointed Charles Duke of Orleans, Lewes de Borbon Earle of Glendosne, great master of the French Kings household, Pierce de Bresse steward of Hoptowne, and Bartram Beannan Lord of P[re]cignit.

There were also sent Ambassadors from the Empire, from Spaine, from Denmarke, and from Hungarie, to be mediato[rs] betwixt the two Princes, many meetings were about this busines, but no small concord could be agreed vpon, moze then a certaine truce for eightene months, which after was prolonged to the p[er]re 1449. but in the meane time broken, as ye shall heare after ward.

In this treatie William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, imagining with himselfe, that the next way to come to a perfect peace, was to moue some marriage, betwene the French Kings kinswoman, the Lady Margaret Daughter to Reyner Duke of Aniole, and King Henry of England: this Duke Reyner named himselfe King of Sicill, Naples, and Ierusalem, hauing onely the title of those Realmes, without any profit. This marriage was at the first made strange to the Earle, and one thing seemed to be agree at let to it, to wit, because the King of England possessed a great part of the Dutchie of Anioiw, and the whole countrie of Haine, which pertained (as they said) to Duke Reyner. The Earle of Suffolke condescended, that the Dutchie of Anioiw, and the countie of Haine should be deliuered to the Duke, demanding with his daughter for hir marriage nothing. And to the intent that of this truce might insue a finall concozd, a day of enteruiew was appointed betwene the King and the Duke, in a place conuenient, betwene Chartres and Roan.

When these things were concluded, the Earle of Suffolke with his company returned into England where he declared what an honorable truce he had taken, through y<sup>e</sup> which there was great hope of a finall peace, by meanes of the honorable marriage which he had concluded. But though this marriage pleased well the King, and diuers of his counsell, yet other some were against it. For the performance of the conclusions, the French King sent the Earle of Wandosme great master of his house, and the Archbishop of Reims first p<sup>er</sup>ere of France, and diuers other into England, where they were honorably entertained, and after that the instruments were sealed, and deliuered on both parts, the said Ambassadors returned with great rewards.

An. reg. 23.

When these things were done, the King created Hamfrey Earle of Stafford Duke of Buckingham: and Henry Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, King Henry hartily tendering him for his parents sake, bestowed vpon him the Dukedome of Warwick: vnto whom also the King gaue the Castle of Buxlow, with all the appurtenances, which King Iohn had kept in his hands and his successors after him: he gaue vnto him also the Isles of Gernsey and Jernsey, Serke, Erme, and Aurney with all the pziories aliens in the same. The Earle of Dorset was created and made Marquesse of Dorset, and William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke was created Marquesse of Suffolke: also John Talbot Knight, the son of Iohn Earle of Shrewsbury, was created Baron Little for him and his heires males on the 26. of July.

In the moneth of Nouember William de la Pole marques of Suffolke with his wife and many honorable persons both men and women richly apparelled, sailed into France, for the conuenance of the Lady Margaret, nominated Q. into the Realme of England. This noble company came to the Citie of Towlers in Touraine, where they were honorably received & entertained, both of the French K. and of the Duke Reiner, where the marques of Suffolke as procurator to King Henry, espoused the said Lady in the Church of S. Martin. At which marriage were present the father & mother of the bride, the French King which was uncle to the Duke Reiner, and the French Quene aunt to the Dutches his wife: there were also the Dukes of Orleans, of Catabze, of Anson, and of Bypaine, 7. Earles, 12. Barons, 20. bishops, besides knights and gentlemen. When the feast, triumphs, bankets, and iusts were ended, the Lady was deliuered to the marques of Suffolke, which in great estate coueied her through Normandy vnto Diepe, where a while they remained.

On Candlemas euen in diuers places of England, was great weathering of wind, hayle, snow, rayne, thunders with lightning, whereby the Church of Waldoke in Hertfordshire, the Church of Walden in Essex, and diuers other were sore shaken. And the steeple of Saint Pauls in London, about two of the clocke in the afternoone, was set on fire in the midst of the shaft, first on the west side, and then on the south, and the people espying the fire, came to quench it in the steeple, which they did with vinegar, so farre as they could finde, so that when the Maior, with much people came to Pauls, to haue holpen if need had bene, they returned againe every man to his home, trusting to God all had bene well, but anone after, betwene eight and nine of the clocke, the fire brast againe out of the steeple, moze feruent then befoze, and did much harme to the lead and timber thereof: but the Maior and much people came thither, and with vinegar quenched the fire that was feruent, so that no man was perished. The steeple of Waltham in Essex, and of Kingstone in Surrey, was also fired by the same lightnings. The fire at Pauls being quenched, standart of tre being set up at Leaden-Hall in Cornehil of London, made fast in the midst of the pavement, and decked with Holme and Iule, for disport of Christmas to the people of the Citie, it was torne and cast dolwne with such violence that the stones of the pavement, were cast about in the streete, and into diuers mens houses, to the great terrour of the people, that neuer had siene so strange a tempest.

The Lady Margaret being transpozted from Deepe, landed at Porchester, from whence she was conueyed by water to Hampton, and rested there in a place called Gods house, from thence she went to Southwike, and was married to the King in the Abbey of Wichefield on the 22. of Aprill, and from thence she was honozably conueyed by the Lords & estates of this land, which met with her in sundry places with great retinues of men, in diuers liueries with their sleeves bordered, and some beaten with Goldsmiths worke in most costly manner, and specially of the Duke of Gloucester, who met her with 500. men in a liuerie, and so was conueyed to the Blacke Heath, where she was met by the Maior, Aldermen & Sherifes of the Citie in scarlet, and the crafts of the same, all riding on horseback, in blew golwnes with bordered sleeves, and red hoods, on the 28. of May, who conueied her with her train through Southwarke, and so through the Citie of London, then beautified with pageants of diuers histories, and other shewes of welcome, maruellous costly and sumptuous, which Iouerpasse, saue onely to name a few. At the hydge foote toward Southwarke, a pageant of peace and plenty, Ingreddimini, & replete terram, and certaine verses in English. Noes ship vpon the bridge, Iam non ultra irascar super terram, verses in English. At Leaden Hall, madam Grace Chancelor de Dieu, verses in English. At the tunne in Cornehill, of Saint Margaret verses in English. At the great conduit in Cheape of the five wise and five foolish virgins, verses in English. At the crosse in Cheape, of the heauenly Ierusalem, verses. At Pauls gate, of the generall resurrection and iudgement, with verses accordingly, all made by Iohn Lydgate.

On the 30. of May she was solemnly crowned at Westminster. This woman excelled all other, as well in beauty and favour, as in wit and pollicie, and was of stomacke and courage not inferiour to any: her badge was the daisie flower. This marriage seemed to many both unfortunate, and unprofitable to the Realme of England, and that for diuers causes: first the king had with her no dooery, and so the fetching of her, and other charges about her, the Marques of Suffolke demaunded a whole fiftenth in open Parliament: and also there was deliuered for her the Dutchie of Anion, the Citie of Mans, and the county of Haine. Furthermoze, the Earle of Arminake toke such displeasure with the king of England for the marriage, that he became bitter enemy to the Realme of England, and was the chiefe cause that the Englishmen were expelled out of the Dutchie of Aquitaine.

Ann. reg. 24.
Parliament.
1446.

A Parliament was summoned, in the which it was concluded, that by good foresight Normandy might be so furnished for defence before the ende of the truce, that the French king should take no aduantage through want of timely provision: hereupon money was granted, and an army leued, the Duke of Somerset appointed to be Regent of Normandy, and the Duke of Poike discharged of that office.

The Marquesse of Suffolke the second of June, in the first session of this Parliament, before the Lords spirituall and temporall in the high house assembled, eloquently declared his paine and diligence sustained in his legacy, as well for the concluding an abstinence of warre, as in making of the marriage, opening also to them, that the said truce expired the first of Aprill next coming, except a final peace, or a further truce were concluded in the mean season: and therefore he aduised them to foresce and provide things necessary for the warres, least happily the French perceiving them unpurueyed, would take the aduantage, and agree neither to peace nor amitie. Likewise on the next morrow, he descended into the common house, accompanied with certaine Lords, and there declared the same matter to the Knights, and bourgeois, praying the commons for his discharge, that as well all his doings and proceedings in the kings affaires, beyond the sea, as also his aduertisements and counsaile opened to the Lordes and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them enacted, and enrolled in the recordes of the Parliament. Whereupon on the next morrow William Burley then speaker, and then company of the lower house, repaired to the kings presence then sitting amongst the Lords, and there humbly required that the request of the Marquesse might be granted, and so likewise the Lordes made the like petition, kneeling on their knees, and the king condescended to their desires, and so the whole matter was enacted and recorded for his acquittall.

Henry Beauchampe Duke of Warwicke, chiefe Earle of England, Lord Spencer and Burgaunie, king of the yle of Wight, and Gernsey and Iarnsey, and Lord of the Castell of Bristow, married Cicely daughter to Richard Neuell Earle of Salisbury, and had issue a daughter named Anne, who died at the age of five yeres, he at the age of 22. yeres died in the Castell of Hanley, and was buried at Theobur.

John David appeached his master William Catur, an armozer dwelling in S. Dunstons parish in Fleetstreet, of treason, and a day being assigned them to fight in Smithfield, the master being welbeloued, was so cherished by his friends, and plied so with wine, that being therewith ouercome, was also unluckely slaine by his seruant: but that false seruant (for he falsely accused his master) liued not long unpunished, for he was after hanged at Tyborne for felony: let such false accusers note this example, and loke for no better ende, without speedie repentance: my selfe haue had the like seruant, that likewise accused me of many articles, he liueth yet, but hath hardly escaped hanging since, God make him penitent.

A combate in Smithfield. A false accuser of his master, was hanged.

Thomas sirz Thomas Wytoz of Isilmayne appeached sir James Butler Earle of Wymond of treasons, which had a day assigned to fight in Smithfield, the lists were made, and the field prepared, but when it came to the point, the king commaunded they should not fight, and toke the quarrell into his hands, which was done at the instance of certaine preachers and doctozs of London, as master Gilbert Worthington, parson of S. Andrewes in Holborne and other.

Pope Eugenius sent a golden Rose to the king of England, expressing the property and application of the same, with the ceremony that is pærely vsed on Palme Sunday, touching the same Rose, exhorting the king against the Turkes. Which Rose Lodouicus Cordona doctoꝝ of diuinitie did present to the king in S. Stephens chappell at Westminster vpon Saint Andrewes day, in presence of the Dukes of York and Excester, Cardinal Kempe Archbishop of York, & John Stafford Archbishop of Canterbury Chancellor of England.

Record, Ecclesi. Cant.

King Henry kept his Chyristmasse at Saint Edmondsburie, and remayned there till Easter. In which meane space, to wit on the 10. of february began a Parliament at S. Edmondsburie in Suffolke, at which time for feare of the Duke of Glocester, all the waies about the same town were kept with armed men both day and night, so that many died with colde and waking. Humfrey Duke of Glocester being at the Castell of the Elles in Wilshire, came from thence to the Parliament, and was lodged in the hospitall, where shortly after he was arrested by John Lord Beaumont High Constable, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Somerset & other, who appointed certaine of the kings household to wait vpon him: but on the 24. day he died for sorow, as some said, that he might not come to his answer: his body was shewed to the lordz & commons, and seemed to die of a palsey, or of an impostume: he was honorably buried at S. Albons: 32. of this principall seruants were arrested & sent to diuers prisons, & five of them were arraigned at London, and condemned, whose names were sir Roger Chamberlain knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turley Esquires, & Richard Nedam gentleman, which were all five drawn from the Tower of London to Tyborne, & there hanged, letten down quicke, stript naked, marked with a knife for to be quartered, and then a charter shewed for their liues by the Duke of Suffolke: but the yeoman of the crowne had their linelode, & the hangman had their cloths, or wearing apparell. The Pardon for liues was obtained through the earngst sute & laboure of master Gilbert Worthington, then parson of S. Andrewes

The 5. of August deceased John Holland Duke of Crester, and was buried in the hospitall of Saint Katherine nigh to the Tower of London. About the same time deceased the sozenamed Doctor Gilbert Worthington, parson of Saint Andrewes in Holborne, a most famous preacher, and greatly noted for his good life. Also about the same time, to wit the 24. of October deceased William Lichfield doctor of Divinity, Parson of Alhallowes the Poze in Chamnis street, the which was counted a god and holy man, he made in his daies 3083 sermons, as appeared and was found in his booke of his owne hand writing, besides many booke that he compiled of Divinitie yet extant, especially one in a fine verse intituled, The complaint of God to man, and Answer of the penitent to God, &c.

John de la Pole marques of Suffolke made Duke of Suffolke.

In this 26. yere of the raigne of this king, I finde no great matter worthy the recitall, but that the Marquesse of Suffolke, by great fauour of the king and Quene, was created Duke of Suffolke, which dignitie he long enjoyed not: for Richard Duke of York being greatly alied by his wife, to the chiefest peres and potentates of the Realme, ouer and besides his owne progenie, perceiuing the king to be a ruler, and not to rule, but the whole burthen of the Realme to rest in the ordinance of the Quene, & the Duke of Suffolke, began secretly to allure his friends of the Nobilitie, and priuily declared vnto them his title to the Crowne, and likewise did he to certaine gouernours of Cities and Townes, which priuily attempt was so polittely handled and secretly kept, that his prouision was ready befoze his purpose was opened.

John Sturton was made Baron of Sturton.

After the death of Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, the affaires in Fraunce, were neither wel looked to, nor the gouernours of the countrey wel aduised, for an English Captaine, called sir Frances, surnamed de Aragonnoys, took a towne named Fogars, vpon the borders of Normandie belonging to the Duke of Brittain. For the which he complained him to the French

French King, and be at the said Dukes request sent vnto the King of England, to aske restitution of the harme. The which messengers were answered of the Kings Counsell, that the dede was right displeasent vnto the King, and that sir Frances Aragon had interposed the feate of his owne presumption. Whereupon it followed shortly after, that the French by like policie toke the Towne and Castell of Mountallarche, and after that many other, so that the taking of the foresaid Towne of Foglars by the Englishmen, was the occasion by the which the French after gat all Normandie.

An. reg. 27.

This yere the Frenchmen got many Townes in Normandie out of the possession of the Englishmen. Also the Citie of Roane was yielded to the French, with condition that the Captaines and garrisons might depart with armour and goods, and not long after was rendered (with the like condition as of Roane) the townes of Harflew, and Hounflew. A Knight of Fraunce called sir Lewes de Breyll, chalenged an Esquire of England named Ralph Chalons of certaine seats of warres, the which to proue, a day to them was giuen to make at a Towne in Fraunce named Gaunce, where the French Knight at that day was present: but Chalons ranne the French Knight through the bodie with his speare, whereof the said Lewes died.

Roan yielded
to the French.

Ann. reg. 28.

About the same time also, began a new rebellion in Ireland, but Richard Duke of Yorke being sent thither to appease the same, so asswaged the furie of the wilde and sauage people there, that he wan such fauour amongst them, as could neuer be separated from him and his linage.

Richard Duke of Yorke was fauor of the Irish.

John Vicount Beaumont, was made Chamberlaine of England, Henry de Bromefield Lord Vesey, William Bourcher Knight, Lord Bunile, William Beauchampe Lord S. Amonde, Thomas Percy Lord Egremonde, these were created the 6. of Nouember.

Barons created.

The French king assembled an army royall, and comming befoze Cane, besieged it on all sides, and assaulted the walles, but the Duke of Somerset, and the other Captaines within the towne, manfully withstood their enemies, beating backe the assailants. The French king with his great ordinance shot daily at the wals, and did some hurt, but to the Castell which stode on a rock, and in it a dungeon, unable to be beaten down, he did no harm at all. Though the Duke of Somerset were the kings lieutenant, yet sir Dauid Hall, as Captaine of this towne for his master the Duke of Yorke, owner therof, toke vpon him the chiefe charge, sir Robert Vere was Captaine of the Castell, and sir Henry Radford, Captaine of the dungeon: daily the shot was great, but more terrible then hurtfull, sauing that one day, a stone shot into the towne, fell betwixen the Dutches of Somerset and her childzen, which being amased with this chance, besought her husband kneeling on her knees, to haue mercy and compassion of his small infants, that they might be deliuered out of the towne in safetie. The Duke moued with the sorow of his wife, and loue of his childzen, rendered the towne, with condition to depart with all their goods. Sir Dauid Hall, with diuers other departed to Cherbrough, and from thence

thence sailed into Ireland, to the Duke of Forke, making relation to him of all these doings, which thing kindled so great a rancor in the Dukes heart, that he neuer left persecuting the Duke of Somerset, till he had brought him to his fatall confusion. After the obtayning of this strong towne of Cane, the Earle of Clerement, besieged, the Citie of Hissur, whereof was Captaine Mathew Gowgh, with 300. Englishmen, who in the ende deliuered the towne vpon condition to depart. Then was Salaisie besieged, whereof were Capitaines, for the Earle of Shrewsbury that was owner, Andrew Trollope, and Thomas Cotton Esquires, which agreed to deliuer it on conditions. The towne of Donfront was likewise rendered, so that there rested now, onely English, the towne of Chirburgh, whereof was Captaine one Thomas Gouuile, which as long as victuals serued, defended the towne right manfully, but in the ende, vpon composition yelded the towne, & went to Calais, where the Duke of Somerset, and many other Englishmen then sojournd. Thus was Normandy lost cleerely out of the Englishmens hands, after it had continued in their possession the space of 30. yeeres, by the conquest of Henry the fift. In which Dutchie were an 100. strong townes and fortresses, to be kept, and holden, besides them that were destroyed by the warres, and in the same is one Archbishoppicke, and sixe Bishoppicks. Whilist the French made these conquestes in the Dutchy of Normandy the common people make exclamations against the Duke of Suffolke, affirming him to be the onely cause of the deliuerie of Anslow, and Payne, the chiefe procurer of the Duke of Glocesters death, the losse of Normandy, &c. Whereupon the Quene doubting not onely the Dukes destruction, but also her own confusion, caused the Parliament begunne at Westminster, after Christmas adourned to the blacke Friers in London, then to be adourned to Leicester, thinking there to haue suppressed the malice conceiued against the Duke and her, at which place fewe of the Nobilitie would appeare. Where it was againe adourned to Westminster, where was a full appearance. In the which session the commons of the neather-house put vp to the King and the Lords many articles of treason, mispision, and euill demeanour against the Duke of Suffolke, as ye may read in Hall. The Quene therefoze, doubting some commotion to arise, caused the said Duke to be committed to the Towre, where he remained not past a moneth, but was released to the kings fauour. This doing so much displeased the people, that in sundrie places of the Realme, they assembled together in great companies, and chose to them a Captaine, but were overcome as shall be shewed.

The ninth of Ianuary, Adam Molins Bishop of Chichester, keeper of the kings priuie seale, through the procurement of Richard Duke of Forke, was by shipmen slaine at Portesmouth.

The ninth of February Thomas Thany, otherwile called Blew beard a faller, was taken besides Canterbury, for rapsing of a rebellion, who was hanged and quartered.

After this little rage allwaged, about the Dates of Easter, the Parliament was adiozned to Leicester, whither came the King & Quene in great estate, estate, and with them the Duke of Suffolke, as chiefe counseller, where the commons of the lower house besought the King, that such persons as assented to the release of Anslow, and deliuerance of Payne, might be duely punished. And to be prouide to that fact they accused as principall, the Duke of Suffolke, with John Bishop of Salisbury, sir James Fines Lord Say, Daniel Triuillian, and other whom they indited of treason, and many other matters touching the king and his commons, as it appeareth by the verdict of thre inquestes, to the number of a thirtie persons, wherupon the king to appease the commons, first sequestred the Lord Say, being Treasurer of England, and other from their offices, and robes, and after banished William de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, for five yeeres, who taking ship, at Ipswich in Suffolke, on the third day of May, sailed towards France, but was encountered with a ship of warre, appertaining to the Duke of Excester, Constable of the Tower of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The Captaine of which barke, with small fight entered into the Dukes ship, and perceiuing his person present, brought him to Dover Roade, and there on the side of a cocke boate, caused his head to be stricken off, and left his bodie with the head lying there on the sandes, which corpes being there found, by a chaplaine of his, was conueyed to Wingham colledge in Suffolke, and there buried faith Hall: but I otherwise finde him to be buried in the Charterhouse of Kingstene vpon Hul.

This William de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Alice his wife, daughter to Thomas Chawcer, sonne to Geoffrey Chawcer the famous Poet, translated and increased the Manor place of Eweline in Dorsetshire: they builded a new parish Church of Eweline, a comely peece of towre standing on an hill: and also hard adioyning to the west ende of Eweline parish Church, they founded a pretie hospitall of almes house for two priests chaffe of bodie and deuout in soule, and thirtene poore men to dwell and be sustayned in for ever, one of the priests to be master of the almes house and almes people, them to instruct as well by his sonnd doctrine, as good life, the other priest a scholemaster, freely to teach the children of the tenants of the said Lordshippe of Eweline and other Lordships pertaining to the said almes house their Grammar, and either of those two priests to haue tenne pound the yeere. One of the thirtene poore men to be called minister, to present the faultes of the other to the master, and to ring their common bel to seruise, and to haue sixteen pence the weeke, the other twelue poore men to haue euery of them fourtene pence the weeke. This house hath to name Gods house, or the house of almes, vnto the which he gaue thre Manors, Ramruge in Hampshire, Conocke in Wilshire, and Herche in Buckinghamshire, with their appurtenances, all which at the suppression was valued but 20. pound the yeere, such large peniworth was then made by such as ment to purchase: they also founded the hospitall of Donnington.

The death of the Duke of Suffolke brought not the Realme in quiet, for those that fauoured the Duke of York, and wished the crown vpon his head procured a commotion in Kent in this manner.

Jacks Cade
Captain of the
r. bills in Kent.

In the moneth of May, the commons of Kent in great numbers assembled, hauing to their Capitaine lacke Cade, who named himselfe Mortimer, coken to the Duke of York; or as hee was named of some Iohna-mendall: this Capitaine brought a great number of people to the Blacke heath, and there kept the field moze then a moneth, pilling the countrey about, to whom the Citie of London at that time was full fauourable. And the said Captain (as I finde recorded) sent for such Citizens of London as it pleased him to commaund to repayze vnto him, vnder letters of safe conduct, as followeth.

The safegard and signe manuell of the Capitaine of Kent, sent to Thomas Cocke draper of London, by the Capitaine of the great assemble in Kent.

By this our wytting ensealed, we grant and will permit truly, that Thomas Cocke of London draper, shall come in good suretie and in safegard to our presence, without any hurt of his person, and so auoid from vs againe at his pleasure, with all other persons assigned at his denomination with him comming in likewise.

For your instruction, first yee shall charge all Lumbards and strangers, being merchants, Iewelers, Venetians, Florentines, and other, this day to dye to them togither, and to ordaine for vs the Capitaine 12. harnesses, complete of the best fashon, 24. bygandines, 12. battaille ares, 12. glaues, six horses with saddle and bydle completely harnesssed, and 1000. markes of readie money: and if this our demaund be not obserued and done, we shall haue the heads of as many as we can get of them.

What answere to this demaund was returned I finde not, but like it is the same was granted and perfozmed. for I finde not the said Capitaine and Kentishmen, at their being in the Citie, to haue hurt any stranger.

In the meane time the king sent notable men to the said Capitaine and his fellowship, to know their purpose and the cause of their insurrection: vnto whom the Captain answered, that he and his company were assembled there to redresse and reforme the wrongs that were done in the Realme, and to withstand the malice of them that were destroyers of the common-weale, and to amend the defaultes of them that were chiefe counsellors to the king, and shewed vnto them the Articles of complaints touching the misgouernment of the Realme, wherein was nothing containyd but seemed reasonable, whereof a copie was sent to the Parliament holden that time at Westminster, with also one other bill of requestes by them made, of things to be reformed, and to haue answere thereof againe, but he had none. The bill of Articles they intituled

The complaint of the commons of Kent, and causes of the assembly on the Blackebearth.

1 Item, it is openly nolyed that Kent should be destroyed with a royall power, and made a wilde forest, for the death of the Duke of Suffolke, of which the commons of Kent thereof were neuer guiltie.

2 Item, the king is stirred to liue onely on his commons, and other men to haue the reuenues of the crowne, the which hath caused pouerty in his excellencie, and great payments of the people, now late to the king granted in his Parliament.

3 Item, that the Lords of his royall blood be put from his daily presence, and other meane persons of lower nature exalted and made chiefe of his priuy counsell, the which stoppeth matters of wrongs done in the realme from his excellent audience, and may not be redressed as law wil, but if by bribes and gifts be messengers to the hands of the said counsell.

4 Item, the people of his Realme be not paid of debts owing for stufte and purueiance taken to the vse of the kings household, in vndoing of the said people, and the poore commons of this Realme.

5 Item, the kings mentall seruants of household, and other persons, asked daily goods and landes, of impeached or indited of treason, the which the king graunteth anon, ere they so endaugered be conuict. The which causeth the recetuers thereof to enforge labours and meanes applied to the death of such people, so appeached or indited, by subtle meanes, for couetise of the said grants: and the people so impeached or indited, though it be vntrue, may not be committed to the lawe for their deliuerance, but helde still in prison, to their uttermost vndoing and destruction, for couetise of goods.

7 Item, it is nolyed by common voices, that the kings landes in France be aliened and put away from the crowne, and his Lords and people there destroyed with vntrue meanes of treason, of which it is desired, enquires though all the Realme to be made how and by whom, and if such traytors may be found guiltie, them to haue execution of law, without any pardon, in example of other.

8 Item, collectors of the 15. peny in Kent be greatly bered and hurt in paying great summes of money, in the Exchequer to sue out a writt called Quorum nomina for allowance of the Barons of the ports, which now is desired, that hereafter in the lieu of the collectors, the Barons aforesaid may sue it out for their ease at their owne costes.

9 Item, the Sherifes, and vnder Sherifes, let to ferme their offices and bayliffes, taking great suretie therfore, the which causeth extortions done by them and by their bailiffes to the people.

10 Item, simple and poore people that vse not hunting, be greatly oppressed by indiffements fained and done by the said sherifes, vnder sherifes, bayliffes, and other of their assent, to cause their increase for paying of their said ferme.

11 Item, they retorne in names of Enquestes in writting into diuers Courtes of the Kings not summoned nor warned, wherethrough the people daily lese great summes of money, well nie to the vttermoost of their vndowing: and make leuse of amercenments called the Græne ware, moze in summes of money than can be found due of recozd in the Kinges bookes.

12 Item, the ministers of the court of Douer in Kent bere and arrest diuers people throught all the shire out of Castell ward passing their bands and libertie vsed of olde tyme, by diuers subtle and vntrue meanes and actions falsly fained, taking great fee at their last in great hurt of the people on all the shire of Kent.

13 Item, the people of the said shire of Kent, may not haue their free election in the choosing knights of the shire, but letters ben sent from diuers estates to the great rulers of all the countrie, the which imbraceth their tenants and other people by force to chosse other persons than the common will is.

14 Item, whereas knights of the shire shold chosse the kings collectors indifferently without any bribe taking, they haue sent now late to diuers persons, notifying them to be collectors, whereupon giftes and bribes be taken, and so the collectors office is bought and solde extortionously at the knights last.

15 Item, the people be soze bered in cosses and labour, called to the Sessions of peace in the said shire, appearing from the farthest and vttermoost parts of the West vnto the East, the which causeth to some men fine daies iourney, whereupon they desire the said appearance to be diuided into two parts, the which one part to appeare in one place, another part in another place, in releuving of the greiuanee and intollerable labours and verations of the said people.

The requests by the Captaine of the great assembly in Kent.

INprimis, desireth the Captaine of the commons, the welfare of our soueraigne Lord the King, and all his true Lords spirituall and tempozall, desiring of our said soueraigne Lord, and of all the true Lords of his counsell, he to take in all his demaines, that he may raigne like a King royall, according as he is bozne our true Christian king annointed, and who so wil say the contrary, we all will liue and die in the quarrell as his true liege men.

2 Item, desireth the said Captaine, that he will auoid all the false progeny
and

and affinitie of the Duke of Suffolke, the which beane openly knowne, and they to be punished after the custome and lawe of this land, and to take about his noble person the true Lords of his royall blood of this his Realme, that is to say, the high and mightie Prince the Duke of Yorke, late exiled from our said soueraigne Lords presence (by the motion and stirring of the traiterous and false disposed the Duke of Suffolke and his affinitie) and the mightie Princes and Dukes of Excester, Buckingham, and Suffolke, and all the Carles and Barons of this land: and then shall he be the richest king Christen.

Item, desireth the said Captaine and commons punishment vpon the false traitors, the which contrived and imagined the death of the high and mightie excellent Prince the Duke of Glocester, the which is too much to rehearse, the which duke was proclaimed as traitor. Vpon the which quarrel, we purpose all to liue and die vpon that it is false.

Item, the Duke of Excester, our holy father the Cardinal, the Noble Prince Duke of Warwicke, and also the Realme of France, the Dutchy of Normandy, Gascoigne, and Guen, Anioy and Maine, were desiered and lost, by the meanes of the said traitors, and our true Lords, Knights, and Esquires, and many a good yeoman lost and solde ere they went, the which is great pittie to heare, of the great and grievous losse to our soueraigne Lord and his Realme.

Item, desireth the said Captaine and commons, that all the extortions vied daily among the common people, might be laid downe, that is to say, the greene Ware the which is falsely vied, to the perpetuall destruction of the kings true commons of Kent. Also the kings Bench, the which is too greese full to the shire of Kent without prouision of our soueraigne Lord and his true Counsell. And also in taking of wheat and other graines, beefe, mutton, and all other victuall, the which is impoytable to the said commons, without the breke prouision of our said soueraigne Lord, and his true Counsell, they may no longer beare it. And also vnto the statute of labourers, and the great extortioners, the which is to say, the false traitors, Sleg, Crowmer, Ille, and Robert Est.

These Bills when the Counsell had well perused, they did not onely disallow and condemne them and the authoys, as proud and presumptuous, but also perswaded the King rather to suppress those rebels by force, than by faire promises. Whereupon the king remoued from Westminster vnto Cheneuich, from whence he would haue sent certaine Lords with a power to haue distressed the Kentishmen, but the men said to their Lords they would not fight against them that labour to amende the Commonweale: whereupon the Lords were diuied to leaue their purpose. And because the Kentishmen cried out against the Lord Say the Kings Chamberlaine, hee was by the King committed to the Tower of London. Then went the King againe to London, and within two daies after went against the Kentishmen with fiftene thousand men well prepared for the warre, but the false Kentishmen fledde the night befoze his comming into the wood countrie nere neere vnto Senocke, whereupon the king returned againe to London, and sent sir Humfrey Stafford knight, with William Stafford Esquire his kinsman saith Pigot, and other Gentlemen, to followe the Kentishmen, who finding them at Senocke, set vpon the rebels, and fought with them a long time, but in the end both the Staffords were slaine, with many other of their people. When Iacke Cade had thus overcome the Staffords, he sozthwith apparelled himselfe with the knights apparell, and after he had refreshed his people, he returned to the Blacke heath, and there pight againe his field, and lay there from the 29. of Iune, till the first day of Iuly, in which season came vnto him the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Buckingham, with whom they had a long communication, and found him right discret in his answers. Wholueit they could not cause him to submit himselfe and lay downe his people.

King Henry
went to Killingworth.

In the meane while, the King and Quene hearing of the increasing of his rebels, and also the Lords fearing their owne seruants, least they would take the Captaines part, remoued from London to Killingworth, leaving the Citie without ayde, except onely the Lord Scales, which was left to keepe the Tower, and with him a manly and warly man named Matthew Gough. Then the Captaine of Kent thus houcring at Blacke heath, to bying himselfe the moze in fame, that he kept god iustice, beheaded there a petie Captaine of his named Paris, forsomuch as he had offended against such ordinances as he had established in his host: and hearing that the King and his Lords were thus departed, drey him neere vnto the Citie, so that vpon the first of Iuly, he entred the Borough of Southwarke, then being Wensday, and lodged him there at the Hart, for he might not be suffered to enter the Citie.

sex pight the i-field on the 29. of Iuly.

And vpon the same day, the commons of Essex in great number pight them a field vpon the plaine of Milles end.

And vpon the second day of the said moneth, the Mayor called a common counsell at the Guildhall, to puruey for the withstanding of these rebelles, in which assembly were diuers men of sundry opinions, so that some thought god that the said rebelles should be receiued into the Citie, and some other wise. Among the which Robert Horne Stockfishmonger then being an Alderman, spake soze against them that would haue them enter. For the which, the commons were so moued against him, that they ceased not till they had him committed to warde. And the same afternone about fise of the clocke, the Captaine with his people entred by the bydge, and cut the ropes of the drawe bydge asunder with his swoorde. When he was passed into the Citie, he made in sundry places thereof Proclamations in the Kings name, that no man in paine of death should robbe or take any thing without paying therefoze. By reason whereof, he wanne the heartes of the commons, but all was done to begaile him. After as he came by London stone, he strake it with his swoorde, and saide: Now is Mortimer Lord of this Citie, and then shewing his minde to the Mayor for the ordering of his people, he returned into Southwarke, and there abode as he befoze had done, his people comming and going at lawfull howses when they would.

On the morrow the third of Iuly, the said Captaine againe entred the Citie, & caused the Lord Say to be set from the Tower to the Guildhall, where he was arraigned befoze the Maior and other the Kings Iustices, and Robert Horne Alderman befoze named should haue bene likewise arraigned, but that his wife and other friends for fine hundred markes gat him released to his liberty. The Lord Say desiring he might be tried by his pæres, was by the rebels forceably taken from the officers, and brought to the Standard in Cheape, where they strake off his head, pight it on a pole, and bare it befoze them, and his body they caused to be drawne naked at a horse taile vpon the pavement from Cheape into Southwarke to the saide Captaines inne.

Also a squire called Crowmer that was then Sheriffe of Kent, that had wedded the said Lord Saies daughter, by commaundement of the Captaine was brought out of the flêete, that was committed thither for certaine excoptions that he had done in his office, and led to pile end without London, and there without any iudgement his head was smit off, and the Lord Saies head and his were boyn vpon two long poles vnto London bridge, and there set vp, and the Lord Saies body was quartered.

The same day the Captaine went vnto the house of Philip Malpas draper, and Alderman, and robbed and spoiled his house, taking from thence great substance, and returned into Southwarke. On the next morrow he againe entred the Citie, and dined that day in the parish of Saint Margaret Patins at one Gherstis house, and when he had dined, like an vncourteous guest he robbed him, as the day befoze he had Malpas. For which two robberies, although the poore people dzew to him and were partners in the spoyle, yet the honest and wealthy commoners cast in their mindes the sequelle of this matter, and feared least they should be dealt with in like maner. When the Maior and Aldermen with assistance of the worshipfull commoners in safegard of themselves and of the citie, toke their counsel how they might dzue the Captaine and his adherents from the citie, for the performance wherof, the Maior sent vnto the Lord Scales, and Mathew Gough, then hauing the Tower in their gouernment, requiring their ayde and assistance, which they promised.

On the fift of Iuly, the Captaine being in Southwarke, caused a man to be beheaded there, and that day entred not the Citie. When night was come, the Maior and the Citizens, with Mathew Gough kept the passage of the bridge, and defended the Kentishmen which made great force to reenter the Citie. When the Captaine seeing this bickering, went to barnes, & assembled his people, and set so fiercely vpon the Citizens, he dzane them backe from the stoupes in Southwarke, & bridge fote, vnto the drawbridge, in defending whereof, many a man was drowned and slaine. Among the which was Iohn Sutton Alderman, Mathew Gough a Squire of Wales, and Roger Hoiland Citizen. This skirmish continued all night till nine of the clocke on the moorish, so that sometime the Citizens had the better, and sometimes the other, but euer they kept them vpon the brydge, so that the Citizens neuer passed much the bulwarke at the brydge foote, nor the Kentishmen no farther than the drawbrydge. Thus continuing the cruell fight to the destruction of much people on both sides, lastly, after the Kentishmen were put to the worst, a truce was agreed for certaine houres, during which truce, the Archbishop of Canterbury, then Chancelloz of England, sent a generall pardon to the Captaine for himselfe, & an another for his people, by reason whereof, he and his company withdrew them by little and little, and their Captaine put all his pillage and goods that he had robbed, into a barge, and sent it to Rochester by water, and himselfe went by land, and would haue entred into the Castell of Quinborough with a felwe men that were left about him: but he was there let of his purpose: wherefore he fled into the wood country beside Ayles in Suffe. The Captaine and his people being thus departed, not long after proclamations were made in diuers places of Kent, Suffe, and Southery, that who might take the foresaid Captaine alue or dead, should haue a thousand markes for his trauell.

The Copy of the Writ and Proclamation by the King. for the taking of the said Cade and his fellowship.

Henricus Dei gratia Rex Anglia & Francia, & Dominus Hibernia, vniuersis & singulis custodiis, &c.

For as much as one Iohn Cade bozne in Ireland, which calleth himselfe Iohn Mortimer, and in some witting calleth himselfe Captaine of Kent, the which Iohn Cade the last yere tofore his dwelling in Suffe with a Knight, called Sir Thomas Dagre, sue there a woman with child, and for that cause toke the greeth of the Church, and after for that cause swore the Kings land: the which Iohn Cade also after this, was sworn to the French part, and dwelled with them, which hath now of late time, (to the intent to enrich himselfe by robbing and dispoyling of the kings liege men, as it is nowe openly knowne, to bying himselfe to great and high estate) falsely and vntruly deceiued many of the kings people, and vnder colour of holy and god intents, made them to assemble with him against the kings regality and his lawes, and nought setting by the kings Grace and pardons granted, not onely to him, but all the kings subjects, the which by his deceit haue assembled with him, the which he with great reuerence receiued on Monday last passed, and so did all that were assembled with him: notwithstanding all this, he laboureth now of new to assemble the kings people againe, and to that intent beareth them on hand, that the kings letters of pardon graunted to him and them, be not auailable nor of none effect without authoritie of Parliament: whereas the contrary is true, as it is openly knowne by that, that the king grants from time to time his Charters of pardon to such as him list, of all manner of crimes and offences both generall and speciall.

The king therefore willet and commaundeth, that none of his subjects

give faith nor credence to the said false informations of the said false traitor, nor accompany with him in any wise, nor comfort, nor sustaine him nor his with victuall, nor with any other things. But will whosoever of the kings subjects may take him, shall take him, and that whosoever taketh him, and bringeth him quicke or dead, to the king or his counsell, shall have a thousand markes for his labour truly paid him without faile or delay by the provision of the kings counsell. And whosoever taketh any of those that from this day forth accompany with him, shall have five marke for his reward, truly to be paid in manner and forme abovesaid.

And ouer this, commaunding all Constables, Ministers, and Officers of the said shire, that none of them on paine of death take vpon them to execute any commaundement by word or writing sent or made vnto them by the said Cade, calling himselfe Mortimer and Captaine, be it to reare any people, or to any other intent: but to arrest and make to be arrested such as take vpon them to bring any such commaundement by writing or by word. Et hoc nullatenus omitatis, Teste me ipso apud Westminister, x. die Iulij, anno regni. 28.

After which proclamation thus published, a gentleman of Kent named Alexander Eden awaited for his time, that he tooke the said Cade in a garden in Sussex. And there he was slaine at Ipothfield, and brought to London in a cart, and there quartered, his head set on London bridge, and his quarters sent to diuers places in Kent. Captaine of Kent taken and beheaded.

This yere the commons also in diuers parts of England, as in Sussex, Wilshire, and other places, did much harme to many persons, among the which, on the 29. of June, William Alcock Bishop of Salisbury (after he had said masse at Edington) was by his owne tenants drawne from the altar, in his Albe with his stole about his necke, to the top of an hill, and there by them shamefully murdered: for they cleaued his head as he kneled on his knees in his prayers, and after spoiled to the naked skin, and then they renting his bloody shirt, tooke euery man a peece, and made boast of their wickednesse: and the day befoze his chariot was robbed of his treasury to the value of ten thousand markes. Bishop of Salisbury murdered.

Alexander Eden Esquire, Sheriffe of Kent, for his good seruice against the late rebels, is made Custos or keeper of the castle at Rochester. Ann. reg. 29. Alexander Eden.

In the moneth of September, Tresham that was speaker in the last Parliament, was beheaded in Northamptonshire.

After Michaelmas, Richard Duke of Yorke comming out of Ireland, tooke John Sutton Baron of Dudley, and Reginald Abbot of Saint Peters at Gloucester, and shortly after he tooke John Gargraue keeper of the Kings Bench at London, and sent them to the castle of Ludlow.

The first of Nouember began a Parliament at Westminster, and the first of December the Duke of Somerset which was newly come out of France, was put under arrest, and his goods by the commons was sowly despoiled and bozne away from the Blackfriars. After which riot, on the next morrow, proclamation was made through the citie by the Duke of Yorke, Parliament at Westminster.

and the Duke of Suffolke, that no man should spoyle or rob, vpon paine of death: and the same day at the Standard in Cheape was a man beheaded for doing contrary to the proclamation.

King Henry
rode into Kent with an army.

The fourth of December, the King and his Lords rode through the Citie of London, with a great armie of men well appointed, and deuised into thre battels. Also the Citizens armed stood in the strætes of the Citie, where through the king passed, which altogither made the greatest shew of armed men that had bene sene in London within the memozy of any man then liuing.

Rebels in Kent and Suffes
executed.

The 18. of January, the King with certaine Lords, and his Iustices rode towards Kent, and there indighted and arraigned many, whereof to the number of 26. were put to death, eight at Canterbury, and the residue in other towne of Kent and Suffes. And the King returning out of Kent on the 27. of February, the men of that countrey, naked saue their shirts, in great numbers, met him on the Blackheath, and there on their knes asked mercy, and had their pardon. Then the King rode royally through the Citie of London, and was of the Citizens ioyfully receiued, and the same day against the Kings coming to the Citie, nine heads of the Kentishmen that had bene put to death, were set on London bridge, and the Captaines head that stood there before, was set in the middelt of them.

Robert Gagwine

The malice begunne, increased betwene the Lords of the land, and especially against the Duke of Somerset, and other of the Quenes Counsell, for the lésing of Normandy, whereof the chiefe Citie of Roan was lost or giuen by by appointment, the yere proceeding (as witneseth Gagwine) vpon condition that the Duke of Somerset with his wife and English souldiers, should with such goods as they might carry, depart freely from the Citie: For which free passage he should pay vnto the French king 56. thousand Scuttes, which amount to fourténe thousand markes sterling. And also he was bound to deliuer into the French kings possession, all Townes and Castels that at that day were in the possession of Englishmen, within the Dutchie of Normandy: for the performance of which conenants, the Lord Talbot was sent for one of the pledges, and so by one Floquet all the Towns and Castels were to the French kings vse receiued, Barthe onely excepted, whereof the Captaine named Curson, with the assistance of sir Thomas Auringham, in despite of all the French kings power laid both by sea and land, held the same a full moneth or moze, and then for lacke of rescue, gaue it by by appointment.

Richard Duke
of Yorke pretended title to the Crowne.

Richard Duke of Yorke, pretending a title to the Crowne, and heire to Lionell Duke of Clarence, came this yere out of Ireland vnto London, in the Parliament time, there to consult with his especiall friendes, John Duke of Suffolke, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his sonne, which after was Earle of Marwicke, Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, and Edmond Brooke Lord Cobham, &c. After long deliberation and aduise taken, it was concluded, to keepe their chiefe purpose secret, and that the Duke should raise an army of men, vnder a pretext to remoue diuers counsellers about the

the King, and to reuenge the manifest iniuries done to the commonwealth by the same rulers, of the which as principall, the Duke of Somerset was namely accused, both for that he was greatly hated of the commons for the losse of Poymandy, and for that it was well knowne, that he would be altogether against the Duke of Yorke, in his challenge to be made to the crowne, when time should serue: Wherefore when the Duke of Yorke had thus framed his foundation of his long intended enterprize, he assembled a great host, to the number of 10000. in the marches of Wales, publishing openly that the cause of this his gathering of people, was for the publike wealth of the Realme, for affirming the same to be true, he wrote his letters in forme as followeth:

Forasmuch as I Richard Duke of Yorke am informed, that the King my soueraigne Lord, is my heauy Lord, greatly displeased with me, and hath me in mistrust by sinister information of mine enemies, aduersaries, and euill willers, where God knoweth, from whom nothing is hid, I am, haue been, and euer will be his true liege man, and so haue I said befoze this diuers times, as well by mouth as by writing, notified and declared to my said soueraigne Lord. And for that this notice so comen vnto me of the displeasure of my said soueraigne Lord is to me so græuous, I haue prayed the reuerend father in God the Bishop of Hereford, and my cosen the Earle of Shrewsbury to come hither, and heare my declaration in this matter. Wherein I haue said to them, that I am true liege man to the King my soueraigne Lord, euer haue been, and shall be to my dying day. And to the very proue that it is so, I offer my selfe to sweare that, on the blessed Sacrament, and receiue it, the which I hope shall be my saluation, at the day of doome: And so for my speciall comfort and consolation, I haue prayed the said Lords to report and declare vnto the Kings highnes my said offer. And to the ende and intent, that I will be ready to doe the same oth in presence of two or thre Lords, such as shall please the Kings highnes to send hither to accept it. In witnes whereof I haue signed this scedule with my signe manuell, and set thereunto my signet of armes. Written in my Castle of Ludlow, the 9. of January, the 30. yere of the raigie of my soueraigne Lord King Henry the sixt.

The 16. of February, King Henry accompanied with the Duke of Somerset, and many other Lords, toke towards the marches of Wales, for as much as he was credibly informed, that the Duke of Yorke, assisted with diuers other Lords and men of name, had in those parts gathered a strong power of people, and with them was entring the land, and so held on his iourney towards him: but when the Duke had witting of the Kings great power, he returned from the way which was taken by the Kings host, and hasted towards London. And when he had receiued knowledge from the Citie, that he might not there be receiued, he went ouer Kingston bridge, and so into Kent, and there vpon Went heath nere vnto Dertford, he pight his field, whereof the King hauing knowledge, sped him after, and lastly came vnto Blacke heath, and there pight his field. When both the hostes were thus unbattelled, embattelled, mediation of peace was made betwene them, for furtherance whereof, to the Duke were sent the Bishops of Winchester and of Ely, with the Carles of Salisbury and Warwick. To whom it was answered by the Duke, that he nor none of his company intended any hurt to the Kings person, nor to any of his Counsell, being louers of the commonwealth, and of him and his land: but his intent and purpose was to remoue from the King a few euill disposed persons, by whose meanes the common people was grievously oppressed, and the commonaltie greatly impouerished, of whom he named the Duke of Somerset to be the principall, &c. And further to vnderstand of the Dukes meaning by this his forcible entring of the Realme, (as himselfe pretended) may appere by certaine letters by him written to the King, and also the Kings answers to the same, both which I thinke good here to set doونه as I finde them recozded.

Richard duke
of Yorke his letter to king
Henry.

Please it your highnesse to conceiue that sith my departing out of this your Realme, by your commaundement, and being in your seruice in your land of Ireland, I haue bene informed that diuers language hath been said of me to your most excellent estate, which should found to my dishonour and reproch, and charge of my person: howbeit that, I aye haue bene, and euer will be, your true liege man and seruant: and if there be any man that will or dare say the contrary, or charge me otherwise, I beseech your rightwisenes to call him befoze your high presence, and I will declare me for my discharge as a true knight ought to do, and if I do not, as I doubt not but I shall, I beseech you to punish me as the worst man of your land: and if he be found vnttrue in his suggestion and information, I beseech you of your highnes that he be punished after his desert, in example of all other. Please it your excellence to know, that as well befoze my departing out of this your Realme, for to go into your land of Ireland, in your full noble seruice, as sith, certaine persons haue lien in awaite for to hearken vpon me, as sir John Talbot knight at the Castell of Holt: sir Thomas Stanley knight in Cheshire: Pulford at Chester: Elton at Worcester: Brooke at Gloucester: and Richard growne of your Chamber at Beaumarres: which had in charge (as I am informed) for to take me and put me into your Castell of Conway, and to strike off the head of sir William Oldehall knight, and to haue put in prison sir William Devereux knight, and sir Edmond Malso knight, withouten enlarging, vntill the time that your highnes had appointed their deliuerance.

Item, at such time as I was purposed for to haue arrived at your haven of Beaumarres, for to haue come to your noble presence to declare me your true man and subiect, as my dutie is, my landing was stopped and forbarded by Henry Norres, Thomas Norres, William Bulkley, William Graft, and Bartholomew Bould, your officers in Northwales, that I should not land there, nor haue victuall nor refreshing for me and my fellowship, as I haue written to your excellence here befoze, so farre forth that Henry Norres deputie to the Chamberlaine of Northwales said vnto me, that he had in commaundement that I should in no wise haue landing, refreshing, nor lodging, ging, for men nor for horse, nor other thing that might turne to my worship or ease, putting the blame vpon William Say Alder of your chamber, saying and affirming that I am against your intent, and as a Traitor, as I am informed: and moreover, certaine letters were made and deliuered vnto Chester, Shrewsbury, and to other places for to let mine entrie into the same.

Item, aboue all wrongs and iniuries abovesaid done vnto me of malice, without any cause, I being in your land of Ireland, in your honourable seruice, certain commissions were made and directed vnto diuers persons, which for the execution of the same, sate in certaine places, and the Iuries impanel-led and charged, to the which iuries, certaine persons laboured instantly to haue me indited of treason, to the intent for to haue vndone me and mine issue and corrupted my blood, as it is openly published: beseeching your Maiestie royall, of your righteousnes, to examine these matters, and thereupon to doe such iustice in his behalfe as the cause requireth: for mine intent is fully to pursue to your highnes for the conclusion of these matters.

Cosin, we haue seene the bill that ye toke vs late, and also vnderstande the good humble obedience that ye in your selfe shewe vnto vs, as well in word as in deed, wherefore our intent is, the more hastily to ease you of such thinges as were in your said bill. Howbeit that at our more leisure we might aunswere to your said bill, yet we let you to wist, that for the causes aforesaid, we will declare you now our intent in these matters: sith it is that a long time among the people hath bene vpon you many straunge language, and in especiall anone after your disordinate and vnlawfull slay-ing of the Bishoppe of Chester, diuers and many of the vntre shipmen and other, said in their manner, wordes against our estate, making manace to our owne person by your sayings, that ye should be fetched with many thousandes, and ye should take vpon you that, which ye neyther ought, nor as we doubt not, ye will not attempt, so farre soth that it was said to our person by diuers, and especially we remember of one Walsnes which had like wordes to vs. And also there was diuers of such false people, that went on and had like language in diuers of our Townes of our land, which by our subiectes were taken and duely executed: wherefore we sent to di-uers of our courtes and places, to hearken and to take heede if any such manner comming were, and if there had bene, for to resist it: but comming into our land our true subiecte as ye did, our intent was not that ye, nor lesse of estate of our subiectes, nor none of your seruantes should not haue bene letted nor warned, but in goodly wise receiued: Howbeit that perad-uenture your suddaine comming, without certaine warning, caused our seruantes to doe as they did, considering the causes aboue said. And as to the enditement that ye spoke of, we thinke verily, and holde for certaine, that there was none such. And if ye may truly proue that any person was thereaboutes, the matter shall bee demeaned as the case shall require, so that hee shall know it is to our great displeasure. Vpon this for the easing of your heart in all such matters, we declare, repute, and aduise your our true and faithfull subject, and as our welbeloued Cousin.

Please it your highnes tenderly to consider, that great murmur and grudging is vniuersally in this your Realme, in that Iustice is not duly ministred to such as trespasse and offend against your lawes, and in especiall of them that be endited of treason, and other being openly noised of the same, whereby great inconueniences haue fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter in your said Realme, which God defende, but if by your highnes prouision couenable bee made for due refozation and punishment in this behalfe. Wherefoze I your humble subject and true liegeman, Richard Duke of Yorke, willing as effectually as I can, and desiring the suretie and prosperitie of your most royall person, and the welfare of this your noble Realme, counsell and aduertise your excellencie for the conseruation of godd tranquillitie and peaceable rule among all other subjects, for to ordeine and prouide, that true iustice be had, against all such that to be endited, or openly named, wherein I offer my selfe, and will put my endeuer for to execute your commaundement in the premises, for the punishing of such offenders, and redress of the sayde misrules, to my might and power. And for the hastie execution hereof, like it your highnes to adressse these letters of priuie seale and writs to your officers and ministers, to doe, take, and arrest all such persons so noyed and endited, of what estate, degre, or condition soeuer they be, and them to commit to the Tower of London, and to other of your prisons, there to abide without baile or mainpryse, vntill the time they be utterly tried, and determined after the course of your lawes.

King Henry to the Duke of Yorke.

Cousin, as touching your bill last put vp to vs, we vnderstand well that ye of godd hart, counsell and aduertise vs to the setting vp of iustice, and to the speedie punishing of some persons endited or noyed, offering your seruice to bee readie at commaundement in the same, sith it is that for many causes mouing vs to haue determined in our soule to stablish a sad, and a substantiall Counsell, giuing them moze ample authoritie and power than euer wee did afoze this: in the which wee haue appointed you to bee one. But sith it is not accustomed sure, nor expedient, to take a conclusion and conduct by aduise or counsell of one person by himselfe for the conseruation, it is obserued that the greatest and the best, the rich and the poore, in libertie, vertue, and effect of your voyces be equal: we haue therefore determined within our selfe to send for our Chancelloz of England, and for other Lords of our Councell, yea and all other, together within short time ripely to commune these and other our great matters, in the which communication, such conclusion by the grace of God shall be taken, as shall found to his pleasure, the weale of vs and our land, as well in these matters as in any other.

At length it was agreed by the King, that the Duke of Somerset should be committed to warde there to abide and answer such articles as the Duke of Yorke would lay against him, vpon which promises so made by the King to the Duke, who saue that the people of Kent, and of other places came not to him as they had promised, and that they were not strong enough, for the Kings part was much more than his, he brake vp his field on the first of March, and yielded himselfe to the King at Wertsford, where contrary to promise before made, he found the Duke of Somerset chāse about the King. Then was the Duke of Poike sent before to London, and holden partly as prisoner, and straighter should haue been kept, but it was noised that Sir Edward Carle of March, sonne to the said Duke of Poike was comming toward London with a strong power of Welshmen, which feared so the Quene and Counsell, that the Duke was set at full libertie. And on the tenth of March, the said Richard Duke of Poike made his submission, and toke his oth to be true, faithfull, and obedient subiect to King Henry the first, King of England, in St. Pauls Church at London, there being present the King and most of his Nobilitie, that is to say, the Dukes of Buckingham, Northampton, and Somerset: the Carles of Warlike, Arundel, Salisburie, Shrophshire, Deuonshire, Wiltshire, Northumberland, Stafford and Dorset: viscounts of Beaumont and Wells: barons Fitz Warren, Sainmond, Cobham, Douglas, and others: Bishops, the Cardinall, Archbishop of Poike, and Caunterburie, Winchester, Ely, and London, in these words following.

Richard duke of Poike his submission and oth to Henry the first.

I Richard Duke of Poike, confesse and beknow that I am and ought to be humble subiect and liegeman to you my soueraigne Lord King Henry the first, and owe therefore to beare you faith and truth, as to my soueraigne liege Lord, and shall doe all dayes vnto my liues ende, and shall not at any time will or assent that any thing be attempted or done against your most Noble person, but wheresoeuer I shall haue knowledge of any such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speede and diligence possible to mee, make that your highnes shall haue knowledge thereof, and ouer that doe all that shall bee possible to mee, to the withstanding and let thereof, to the uttermost of my life: I shall not any thing take vpon mee against your royall estate or obeysance that is due thereto, nor suffer any other man to doe, as farre forth as it shall bee in my power to let it: And also shall come at your commaundement whensoeuer I shall bee called by the same, in humble and obessant wise, but if I bee letted by any sicknes or impotence of my person, or by such other cause as shall bee thought by you my soueraigne Lord reasonable. I shall neuer hereafter take vpon mee to gather any rowe, or to make any assembly of your people, without your commaundement or licence, or in my lawfull defence, in interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defence, I shall repozt mee at all times to your highnes, and if the case require, to my pēres, nor any thing attempt against any of your subiects, of what estate, degree, or condition that they bee. But whensoeuer I finde my selfe wronged and agræued, I shall sue humbly for remedie to your highnes, and procéde after the course of your lawes, and in none otherwise, sauing in mine owne lawfull defence in manner aboue sayde, and otherwise haue to your highnes as an humble and true subiect ought to haue him to his soueraigne Lorde. All these things abouesaid I promise you truly to obserue and keepe, by the holy Euangelists

nangellſſe contained in the booke that I lay my hand here vpon, and by the holy Crosse I here touch, and by the blessed sacrament of our Lordes body, that I shall now with his mercie receiue. And ouer I agree mee and will, that if I any time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, any thing attempt by way of ſeate or otherwiſe againſt your royall Maieſtie and obeifance that I owe thereto, or any thing take vpon mee otherwiſe than is aboue expreſſed, I from that time forth be vnable, held and taken, as an vntrue and openly forſworne man, and vnable to all manner of worſhip, eſtate, and degree, be it ſuch as I now occupie, or any other that might in any wiſe growe vnto me hereafter. And this I haue here promiſed and ſworne, proceedeth of mine owne deſire and free voluntee, and by no conſtraining or coaction. In witnes of all the which thinges aboue wriſſten, I Richard duke of Yorke aboue wriſſen ſubſcribe, with mine owne hand and ſeale.

An. reg. 31.

This oath he alſo toke at Weſtminſter, and at Couentrie, at ſundrye times, although he little eſteemed thereof, as by the ſequelle may appere.

This yere deceased Iohn Stafford Archbiſhop of Canterburie, late Lord Chancelor of England, and was buried at Canterburie. After him ſucceeded in the archbiſhoprick Iohn Kemp, borne at We in Kent, doctor of lawes, firſt biſhop of Rocheſter, then of Chicheſter, then of London, then Archbiſhop of Yorke, Chancelor of England, and Cardinall of S. Albini: and now Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and Cardinall of S. Ruſine, & was ſuthronized at Canterburie on the 11. of December.

On the twelſe day after Chriſtmas, the King holding his Chriſtmas at Weſtminſter with great ſolemnitie, made his two brethren by the mothers ſide knights.

The Earle of Kendall, and the Lord Leſpary came Ambaſſadours from the cheefes Magiſtrates of the citie of Burdeaur, which ſignified to the counſell, that if they woulde ſend an armie into Gaſcoigne, the people of the countrie woulde reuolt from the French part, and againe become Engliſh. This newes ſore troubled the heades of the Counſell, which cauſed them, leaſt inwarde ſedition might hinder outward victorie, to let the duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to goe to the caſtell of Wigmoze in the marches of Wales, by whole abſence the duke of Somerſet roſe in ſuch high fauour, both with the King and the Queene, that his word was onely heard and regarded. The Counſell hoping now to haue the citie of Burdeaur, with the countrey round about, appointed Iohn Lord Talbot Earle of Shrewſbury, to go thither with an armie, who arriuing in the Ile of Poyze, paſſed forth with his power, being leaſt three thouſand men, and toke the ſtronge towne of Fronſake, and diuers other townes and ſortreſſes. The inhabitants of Burdeaur hearing of the Earles arriuall, ſent to him meſſengers in the darke night, requiring him with all ſpede, to come and receiue the citie. The Earle haſtened forth, and came beſore that citie, ere the Frenchmen within vnderſtood any thing of the citizens purpoſe. But when they heard that there was a gate ſet open for the Engliſhmen, reſtored to the

to enter, they thought to haue escaped secretly by a pofferne, but they were pursued, slaine, and taken by the Lord de Lespare, and other of the English armie.

After the regaining of Burdeaur, there arrived at Blay, the bastard of Somerset, sir Iohn Talbot Lord Lisle by his wife, sonne to the said Earle of Shrewsburie, the lord Molins, the lord Harington, the lord Cameis, sir Iohn Howard, sir Iohn Mountgomerie, sir Iohn Vernon with 2200. men, victuals and munitions.

In the moneth of March, was the towne of Harflew won by the French men, and shortly the citie of Bayons was giuen by by appointment, that the soldiers should leaue their armour behind them.

When the Earle of Shrewsburie was furnished as is aforesaid, first hee fortified Burdeaur with Englishmen, and store of victuals, and artillerie, then he rode into the country abroad, where he obtained citie and townes, without stroke, amongst other townes, the towne and castle of Chastillon in Perigot was to him deliuered, the which he fortified.

In the meane time the French King being aduertised of these things, raised an armie to resist the inuasion made by the Earle, and first he appointed his captaines to besiege the towne of Chastillon, to the rescue whereof the Earle hastened forward, hauing in his companie eight hundred horsemen, vnder the leading of his sonne the lord Lisle, the lord Molins, the lord Cameis, sir Edward Hull, sir Iohn Howard, and sir Iohn Vernon: hee appointed also five thousand footemen, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Kendall, and the lord de Lespare to follow him with speede. In his way hee took a tower, which the Frenchmen had before taken, and slue all that hee found therein, and after by the way hee met five hundred Frenchmen a foraging, of whom he slue the more part, and chased the other to the campe.

The Frenchmen that lay at the siege, perceiving by these runners away that the Earle approached, left the siege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched and fortified. The Earle aduertised how the siege was removed, hastened forward toward his enemies, doubting least they would haue been fled, and gone before his coming: but they abode the earles coming, and so receiued him, that though by manly courage hee first wan the entrie at their campe, yet at length, they compassed him about, and shooting him through the thigh with a hand gun, slue his horse, and finally killed him, lying on the ground. There died also the lord Lisle his sonne, & his bastard sonne Henrie Talbot, and sir Edward Hull, and thirtie other men of name, the lord Moleins was taken prisoner with threescore others. The residue of the English people fled to Burdeaur and other places, of whom in the flight were slaine aboue a thousand persons.

Thus at this battell of Chastillon fought the twentieth of Iulie, ended his life Iohn lord Talbot, & of his progenie the first Earle of Shrewsburie, after that he had valiantly made war in seruice of his prince 24. yeeres, he was buried at Whitchurch in Shropshire.

After this, the towne of S. Millan, Liborne, and all other townes which the Earle of Shrewsbury had conquered, rendered themselves to the French men, Burdeaur onely excepted. The which Citie being the last refuge of the English people, the French King in person besieged with all his puissance, and in conclusion constrained both the garrison and inhabitants to yelde, so that the Englishmen and Gascoignes might safely depart with all their substance,

Thus was the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which had continued in the possession of  $\bar{e}$  Engli. sh, from the yere of our Lord. 1155. unto this yere 1453. which is nere hand thre hundred yeres, by the marriage of Alienor, daughter and heire to William Duke of Aquitaine, wife to King Henry the second, finally reduced and brought againe to the French obedience and seruitude. Within that onely dutchie be foure Archbishops, foure and twentie Bishops, fiftene earldomes, two hundred and two barones, and aboue a thousand captainships, and bailiwickes, whereby ye may perceiue what a losse this was to the Realme of England.

The 13. day of October, the Quene at Westminster was deliuered of hir first sonne, who was named Edward.

When the wars were ended in foraine parts, ciuill dissention began againe to renew within the Realme, being diuided into two seuerall factions: for King Henry descended of the house of Lancaster, claiming the crowne from his grandfather King Henry the fourth: and Richard Duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell Duke of Clarence, thirde sonne to King Edward the thirde, wrestled for the game, by reason whereof, the nobles, as well as the common people, were into many parts diuided, to the bitter destruction of many a man, to the great ruine and decay of this Realme. For while the one partie studied to destroy the other, all care of the commonwealth was set aside, iustice and equitie clereely cried.

The Duke of Yorke aboue all things, first sought meanes howe to prouoke the malice of the people against the Duke of Somerset, imagining that hee being made away, his purpose should shortly come to conclusion.

He also practised to bring the King into the hatred of the people, for that he was not a man of stomacke sufficient to supply the rowme which he held. Many of the high estates not liking the world, and disallowing the acts and doings both of the King and his counsell, determined to practise both things might come to some alteration: which when the Duke understood, he chafely intertained and won the fauour of the two Neuils, both named Richards, the one Earle of Salisbury, the other Earle of Marwick, the first being the father, and the second the sonne. This Earle of Salisbury, was second sonne to Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married, and the said Richard was espoused to lady Alice the only child, and sole heire of Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, slain at the siege of Mleance, of which woman he begat Richard, Iohn and George, Richard the eldest sonne espoused Anne, the sister and heire of the entire blood to Henry Beawchampe

Beawchampe Earle, and after Duke of Warwicke, in whose right and title he was created Earle of Warwicke.

The Duke of Poike with his friends wrought so effectually, and handled his busines so politickely, that the Duke of Somerset was arrested in the Quenes great chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, where he kept his Christmas without great solemnity, against whom, in open Parliament, were laid diuers articles, beginning thus: These articles and points following, giue and minister I Richard Duke of Poike, your liege man, and servant vnto your highnes, summarily proposing and declaring them, against Edmond Duke of Somerset, for the great welfare, and the common auaille and increase of your maiestie royall, and of this your noble Realme, as well to bying to knowledge and vnderstanding the meanes and causes of the great mischiefes and inconueniencies, which late befell vnto this your noble Realme, as in losse of your liuelode beyond the sea, and other wise in punishment of deleruters, and excuse of innocency, and also in putting aside, and eschuing of the great and impoztable hurt and prejudice which been like, withouten that purueyance he had of remedie, to succed in short time. To the which articles of euery of them, I the said Duke of Poike desire of your equall and indifferent right wisenes, that the said Edmonde answer by his faith, & truth the sacrament of his oth thereupon made duely and truly as law and conscience requireth, &c. as I haue at large set downe in my larger Chronicle.

The king at that time hauing laine long sicke at Clarendon, was conueyed to London, by reason whereof, no small determination proceeded in this waightie cause, but all was put in suspence, till the next assemble of the high court of Parliament.

This yere wheat, and other graines were in such plenty, that a quarter of wheat was commonly solde for twelue pence, and fourtene pence: a quarter of malt for sixtene pence, and seuentene pence at the most, and not aboue. A certaine farmer dwelling in the towne of Cruse Kosse, or Kosse towne in Hartfordshire, wanting money, sold twenty quarters of wheat the best, for twenty shillings.

Wheat sold for

John Kempe Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and was buried at Canterbury. This Kempe was bozne at Wile in Kent, whereupon, when he was Archbishop of Poike, he made the parish Church of Wile, a Colledge, where of the gouernour was a prebend, and the other were ministers for diuine seruice, and to instruct youth in grammer and learning, according to his foundation. Which Colledge, at the suppression the 36. of Henry the eight was valued 93. pound, two shillings by yere. The father of this Archbischoppe Kempe lieth buried in the said Church of Wile, with this Epitaph following,

Idem Thomas obiit Anno Domini 1428. 30. die Mensis Maij.

Unto this Iohn Kempe succeeded in the archbishoppycke of Canterburie, Thomas Bourcher brother to Henric earle of Essex, deane of Saint Martins, first bishop of Winchester, then of Ely, and then archbishop of Canterbury, and cardinall of Saint Ciriac, and William Grey was made bishop of Ely: and Richard Neuill earle of Salisburie, was made lord chancelor of England. Whilste king Henry lay sicke, Richard duke of Yorke bare all the rule and governed as regent, and did now discover the sparks of his hatred, hid vnder dissimulation, against the Duke of Somerset: but when the king had recovered his strength againe, and refused to him his princelie gouernement, he caused the Duke of Somerset to be set at libertie, and preferred him to be Captaine of Calais, wherewith not onely the Commons, but many of the nobilitie (sanozers of Richard duke of Yorke) were greatly græued and offended, saying that he had lost Normandie, and would lose Calais.

The duke of Yorke and his adherents, perceiuing that their accusing of the duke of Somerset preuailed not, determined to reuenge their quarrel, and obtaine their purpose by open warre: and so he being in Wales accompanied with his especiall freinds, the earles of Salisburie, and Warwick, the lord Cobham, and others, assembled a power of warlike persons, and marched towards London.

The king being informed thereof, assembled likewise an host, and meaning to meete with the duke, rather in the north parts then about London, where it was thought he had too many freinds, with great speede, being accompanied with Humfrey duke of Buckingham, and Humfrey his eldest sonne earle of Stafford, Edmond duke of Somerset, Henry Percie earle of Norththumberland, James Butler earle of Wiltshire, and of Dunmow, Iohn Bewford earle of Dorset, Jasper Tewder earle of Penbroke, brother to the king, Thomas Courtney earle of Deuonshire, Iohn lord Clifford, the lordes Sudley, Barnes, Rose and others, being in all about 2000. men of warre, departed from Westminster the 21. day of May, toward Saint Albons, to meete with the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwick and Salisburie: the king lodged that night at Madeford, or Matford one this side Saint Albons, and on the morow in the morning early he came to Saint Albons. And about the same time, were there assembled Richard D. of Yorke, Iohn D. of Norfolk, Richard earle of Warwick, Richard earle of Salisburie, William L. Fauconbridge, Edward L. Cobham, and many other knights and esquires, the kings enemies, in a place called Befffelde, beside Saint Albons.

the King hearing of the Dukes coming with the Lords aforesaid, pight his banner in a place called Goselowe, which place was sometimes called Sandforth in Saint Peters Strete, and commaunded in strong manner to keepe the wards and barriers of the same Towne. The Duke of Yorke knowing the strength made against him abiding in the fiede aforesaide, from seuen of the clocke in the morning, vntill it was almost ten of the clocke without any stroke smitten on either part, by the aduise of his counsell sent vnto the King vnder these words following.

Please it vnto your excellent Grace, Richard Duke of Yorke, to take him as your true liege man and humble subiect, and to consider and tender at the reuerence of God, and in the way of charitie, the true intent of my coming, and to be good and gracious Soueraigne vnto me, and all other your true liege men, which, that with all their power and might will be ready to liue and die with you in your right, and to do all things as shall like your Maiestie royall to commaund vs, if it be to the worship of the Crowne of England, and the welfare of this your noble realme. Moreover, gracious Lorde, please it vnto your Maiestie Royall, of your great goodnesse and rightwisenesse, to encline your will to heare and seele the rightwise part of vs your true subiects and liege men. First, praying and beseeching to our Soueraigne Christ Iesus, of his high and mightie power, to giue the vertue of prudence, and that through the prayer of the glorious Martyr Saint Albon giue you very knowledge of our trothes, and to know the intent of our assembling at this time: For God that is in heauen knoweth, our intent is rightfull and true. And therefore we pray vnto that mightie Lord in these words: Domine sis chypens defensionis nostre: wherefore gracious Lorde, please it your Maiestie Royall to deliuer such as we will accuse, and they to hanelike as they haue deserued. And this done, you to be honourably worshipped as most rightfull King and our true gouernour. And if we should now at this time be promised, as afoze this time is not vnknewne haue ben promises broken which haue ben full faithfullly promised, and thereupon great othes swoyne, we will not now cease for no such promises, nor oth, till we haue them which haue deserued death, or else we to die thercoze.

Words in writing by y Duke of Yorke vnto the King.

The answer by the King to the Duke of Yorke.

King Henry charge and commaunde, that no manner person of what degree, estate, or conditton soener hee be, abide not, but that they auoide the fiede, and not be so hardie to make resistance against me in my own Realme. For I shall knowe what traytors dare be so bolde to arise any people in mine owne land, where through I am in great diseale and heauinesse: by that faith I owe vnto Saint Edward, and vnto the Crowne of England, I shall destroy them euery mother soune, and eke they to be hanged, awred, and quartered, that may be taken after ward of them, in example to make all such Traytours to beware, for to make any rising of people without mine owne land, and so trayterously to abide their King and gouernour. And for a conclusion, rather then they shall haue any Lord that here is with me, at this time, I shall this day for their sake in this quarrell my selfe liue and die.

The words of the Duke of Yorke to all gentlemen and others assembled with him.

Sirs, the King our Soueraigne Lord will not bee reformed at our beseeching ne prayer, nor will not in no wise vnderstand the intent wherefore we bee here assembled and gathered at this time, but onely is in full purpose to destroy vs all, and thereupon a great oth hath made, that there is none other way, but that hee with all his power will pursue vs, and if we bee taken, to giue vs a shamefull death, lasing our liuelode and goods, and also our helres shamed for euer. Wherefore sirs, now sith it will none other wise bee, but that we shall utterly dye, better it is to vs to dye in the fielde, than cowardlie to bee put to an bitter rebuke and shamefull death, for the right of England standeth in vs. Considering also in what perill it standeth at this time, and for to redresse the mischiefe thereof, let euery man helpe to his power this daye, and in that quarrell to quste vs like men, to the Crowne of England, praying and beseeching vnto that Lorde the which is eternall, that raigneth in the glorious kingdome celestiaall, to keepe and saue vs this daye in our right, and thozough the giftes of his holy grace we may bee made strong to withstand the great abhominable and horrible malice of them, that purpose to destroye vs and the Realme of England, and put vs to a shamefull death: praye we therefore vnto that Lorde to bee our comfort and our defendoz, saying these wordes, Domine sis clipeus defensionis nostri. And when these wordes were saide, the Duke of Yorke, and the Carles of Marwicke and Salisburie, with their host, betwene eleuen and twelue at none brake in, in thre seuerall places of the saide strate. The King then being in the place of Edmond Westby, Hundreder of the sayde Towne of Saint Albons, hearing of the sayde Dukes comming, commaunded his host to slay all manner Lords, knights, squiers, Gentlemen and peomen, that might bee taken on the partie of the foresaide Duke of Yorke. This done, the Lorde Clifford kept so strongly the barrions of the same Towne, that the foresaide Duke of Yorke might in no wise with all the power that hee had enter, nor brake into the sayde Towne. The Carle of Marwicke knowing thereof, toke and gathered his men together with him, and brake in by the Garden side into the sayde Towne, betwene the signe of the Keye, and the Ercher in Holwell strate: and anon as they were within the sayde Towne, they blew vpp the Trumpet and cried with an high voyce, a Marwicke, a Marwicke, that maruaple it was to heare. And till that time the Duke of Yorke might neuer haue entrie into the Towne, and then with strong hand they brake vpp the Barriers, and fought a fierce and and cruell Battaille, in the which were slaine on the Kinges partie Lordes of name, Edmonde Duke of Somerset, Henry Earle of Northumberland, the Earle of Stafford, the olde Lord Clifford, Sir Robert Vere, Bartin Entewsell, William Chamberlaine, Richard Fortescue, and Ralph Ferrers knightes, Oliuer Maleuory, Oliuer Alterton, Gilbert Scaresbrooke, John Garthe, Thomas Packington, Roger Morecroft, William Tarwin, John Benstede, John Alforde, Reginalde Griffith, Humfrey Acworth, Henrie Hawlin the Quenes messenger, Richarde Chanselar poxter to the King, Alexander Breakepeare, Gilbert Hilding, poxter to the King, William Souche, John Boteraux, Ralph Babthorpe sewer to the king, and Ralph his sonne, the Kings Attozney, William Coruin, William Cotton of Conington in Huntingdonshire, receiuer of the dutchie of Lancaster, Gilbert Faldingar, John Daues, Ellis Wood, Robert Woodward, and Ralph Willoughby Esquires, Hawling the Kings poxter, and William Butler peoman, John Apfinken, John Daue, John at Herthe, Hughe North, William Porter, John Page, Thomas Barker, John Taylor of Henley, Robert Purton, and Henry Himingley peoman of the crowne, Nicholas of the pantrie, John Cockes, William Fishmonger to the duke of Buckingham, Allen Sutton clarke chaplein, and many other slaine, to the number of 5000. and on the other part was slaine about 600. persons, of them that were slaine, been buried at Saint Albons eight and forty persons. And at that battell were wounded Lordes of name, the King shot into the necke with an arrowe, Humfrey duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Sudley, in the visages with arrowes, Humfrey Earle of Stafford in the right hand with an arrow, the Earle of Dorset was so sore hurt that he might not goe, but was saue to be caried home in a cart, and sir Iohn Wenloke knight in likewise hurt and caried from thence in a chaire, and diuers other knights and Esquires sore hurt, and the substance of the Kings hoste despoiled of their harnéis, at their owne request, made deliuey to the dukes hoste for saluation of their liues and fled. The earle of Wiltshire, and Thomas Thorpe, Lord chiefe baron of the Erchequer, with many other fled, and cast away their harnéis in dishes and woods. This done, the duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwick and Salisburie, came vnto the King where hee was, and besought him on their knees, of grace and forgiveness of that they had done in his presence, and besought him of his highnes to take them to grace, and as his true liege men. The King desired them to cease their people, that there should bee no more hurt done, and to obey his commaundement, did cause to bee proclaimed in the Kings name, that all manner of people should cease off their malice, and not to smite one stroke more, and so ceased the battaille. And vpon the day next after, the King and the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwick and Salisburie, came to London, and were lodged in the bishops pallace of London, where they kept their Whitsonside with great ioye and solemnitie, concluding there to hold a Parliament, the same to begin on the ninth of Iuly next following.

This yere in the moneth of Iune appeared a comet or starre, called Stella

Comets, betwixt the north and the east, extending his beames towarde the south.

The parliament began at Westminster on the ninth day of July as was appointed, in the which session, the Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, late deceased at Bury in Suffolke, was openly declared to haue bene a true subiect to the King and Realme: besides this it was inacted, that no person should fudge or repozte any point of vnt ruth of the Duke of Poike, the Earle of Salisburie, and Marwike, or of any Knight, Esquire, archer, or other comming in warlike aray against the King at Saint Albones, considering their enterprize was only to see the Kings person in safegarde. And all the blame was put vpon the Duke of Somerset, Thomas Thorpe baron of the Erchequer, and William Ioseph Esquier the Kings colaterall companion, because they vpon malicious purpose kept a certaine letter from the Kings knowledge, and would in no wise suffer it to be deliuered vnto him, notwithstanding the same made to the advancement of some good assured peace, if it had bene thoroughly and aduisedly read, wayed and considered: in which letter they declared that as humble and saythfull subiects, they onely requi red that it would please the King, whose honoz, health, suretie, and prefer uation they chiefly wished, not to giue credite to their aduersaries malici ous suggestions, till their comming to his presence, vnto the which they humble besought him that they mought be admitted, as his faithfull liege people, to shewe the intent and purpose of their comming, which was to none other end, then to enlarge their fidelitie, and allegaunce towarde his most dread person, intending to put themselves with as much diligence, industrie, and trauaile, in all things that might prefer and aduance his ho nor, suretie, and safegard, as any subiect he had liuing. The keeping backe of this letter did minister matter sufficient to the parliament, to colour, and iu stifie so well done all transgressions, committed in the late battaile at Saint Albons.

In this Parliament was the Duke of Poike made Protector of the realme: the Earle of Salisburie was made Lord Chancelor, and had the great seale to him deliuered: And the Earle of Marwike was made Captaine of Calais, and the territories of the same. And thus the rule of the Realme rested in the Duke and Chauncelor, and all the warlike affaires remained principallie in the Earle of Marwike. And so amongst them it was agreed, that King Henrie should still raigne in name and dignitie, but neither indeede nor in authoritie, not minding to destroy him, least they mought sodaynely prouoke the furie of the com mon people against them, because that of the common people hee was for his holynes of life, and aboundaunt Clemencie, much fauoured and highly esteemed.

Now that the Duke of Poike, and his adherentes had wrested the whole rule and government into their hands: all such persons, as ei ther loued or the Quene fauoured, were put beside the priue counsell, and such put in their places as were knowne to fauour the house of Poike.

Also all officers were changed throughout the Realme at the will of the Protector, Chancelor, and Captaine of Calais, so that they constituted and ruled all things at their owne wills: but they were noted with an execrable offence, of diuers spirituall persons, and namely of the Abbot of Westminster, and his Monkes, for that they toke out of the sanctuarie at Westminster Iohn Holland Duke of Excester, being repugnant to the order taken in the last parliament, and conueyed him to the Castle of Pontfracte.

Duke of Excester fet out of Sanctuarie, and sent to Pontfract Castle.

But Henry Bewford newly inuested Duke of Somerset, and Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, who had lost his sonne in the same battaile, and other Lozdes and men of authoritie fauouring the partie of King Henry, and bewapled the vnsecure estate of the same King, because they perceiued wherunto the cloked curtesie, and dissembled manner of the Duke of Yorke did drawe, thought it necessarie to puruey for a remedie ere the mischiefes happened: hereupon they consulted with the Quene, and by her aduise was a great councill called at Greenwich, where the Duke of Yorke was discharged of his Protectorship, and the Earle of Salisburie depprived of his office of Chauncelorschip, which change amongst the nobilitie, caused sodain alterations, and seditious attempts to spring in the communalitie, especiallie in the Citie of London.

Ann. reg. 34.

In the Moneth of May an Italians seruant walking through Cheape of London, with a dagger hanging at his girdle, a Merchants seruant that befoze time had bene in Italie, and there blamed for wearing of the like weapen, chalenged the stranger, howe he durst bee so bolde to beare weapen, considering hee was out of his natue countrey, knowing that in his countrey no stranger was suffered to weare the like: To the which question such answere was made by the stranger, that the Percer toke from him his dagger and brake it vpon his heade, whereupon the stranger complained to the Mayo, who on the morrowe sent for the pongman to the Guild-hall: wherefoze after his aunswere made vnto the complaint, by agrément of a full Court of Aldermen, hee was sent to warde: and after the Court was finished, the Mayo and sherifes walking homeward through Cheape, were there met by such a number of mercers seruantes and other, that they might not passe, for ought that they could speake of doe, till they had deliuered the pongman that befoze was by them sent to prison.

Rob. Fabian.

And the same daie in the afternoone sodainely was assembled a multitude of lewde and poore people of the Citie, which without heade or guide ranne vnto certaine Italians houses, and especially to the florentines, Lukelles and Venetians, and there toke and spoiled what they found, and did great hurt in sundye places, but mooste in sower houses standing in Broadstrate warde, wherof thre stood in Sainte Bartholmewes Parish the little, and one in the Parish of Sainte Benets Finke.

The Mayo, Aldermen and worshipfull commoners of the Citie, with all their diligence resisted them what they coulde, and sent diuers of them to Newgate: and finally, not without shedding of blood, and maiming of diuers Citizens, the rumour was appeased. The young man beginner of all this businesse, tooke Sanctuary at Westminster, and not long after the Duke of Buckingham with other noble men were sent from the King into the Citie, who there charged the Maior by vertue of a commission, that inquirie shoulde bee made of this ryot, and so called an oyer determiner at the Guild-Hall, where sate for Judges the Maior, as the Kinges lieutenant, the Duke of Buckingham on his right hand, the chiefe Justice on the lefte hande, and many other men of name, where while they were empanelling their inquestes, the other commons of the Citie, many of them secretly put them in armour, and went to haue rung the common bell, so to haue raised the whole force of the Citie, and so to haue deliuered such persons as before for the robberie were committed to ward.

But this matter was discretely handled by the counsell and labour of some discrete commoners, which appeased their neighbours in such wise, that all this furie was quenched: but when word was brought to the Duke of Buckingham, that the communalitie were in harness, hee with the other Lords tooke leaue of the Maior and departed, and so ceased the inquirie for that day.

Upon the morrowe the Maior commaunded the common councell with the Wardens of fellowshipes to appeere at the Guild-Hall, where by the Recorder in the Kinges name and the Maiors, was commaunded euerie Warden, that in the afternone eyther of them shoulde assemble his whole fellowship at their common Halles, and there to giue streight commandement, that euerie man see the kings peace kept within the Citie. After which time the Citizens were brought to such quietnesse, that after that day, the enquirie was duellie perused, and those persons for the sayd riot put in execution and hanged at Tyborne, whereof two were Sanctuary men of S. Martins le Graund, the other a Shipman, for robbing of Anthony Mowricine and other Lombardes.

The French nation hearing of the ciuill dissention within the Realme of England, thought to worke some damage to the English people, in reuenge of olde injuries, wherupon were two hauiers appointed to inuade the towncs standing vppon the riuaige of the sea. The Captaine of the one floete, was William Lord Pomyars, and of the other sir Pierce Bressly Captaine of Dèpe. These two Captaines taking their course out of the mouth of Seyne, seuered themselves, the one Westwarde, and the other Eastwarde, which was sir Peter Bressly, this lustie Captaine sayling almost all the coastes of Sussex, and Kent, durst not once take lande till he arrived in the Downes, and there hauing perfect notice that a little before the chiefe Rulers of the Towne, were departed from thence to auoyde the plague which then there raigne, entered the Haven with fiftene thousand men, and their Shippes all landing at Sandwich, whereof 7000. entered entred the land, the space of thre mile, and there kept and defended the town, untill their other company might come to them, at what time they killed the Maioz, the bayliffes and the other officers of Sandwich, with diuers other Gentlemen of the countrey, and spoiled and robbed the Towne, leading and carrying away carts of furniture and other riches to their ships, and moreover robbed and spoiled two great galleies of ships laden with marchandise comming to London.

The Lord Pomyars likewise toke his course west ward, and by night byent The towne of Foway and other certaine townes in Denonshire, in the moneth of August, Foway byent. and with his pillage returned into Britaine.

The Scottes also entred Northumberland, and burned certaine cottages and houses, but hearing that the Duke of Yorke was marching thitherwarde with a great Armie, they with all haste returned into Scotlande.

In this yere was a great fraie in the North countrey betwene the Lord Egremonde, and the Earle of Salisburies sonnes, whereby many were maimed and slaine, but in the ende the Lord Egremonde was taken, who was by the kings counsell found in great default, and therefore condemned in great summes of money, to be paid to the Earle of Salisbury, and in the meane time committed to Petogate. Rob. Fabian.

Not long after this sir Thomas Percie Lord Egremount, and sir Richard Percie his brother being prisoners in Petogate, condemned in a great summe to the Earle of Salisbury as is aforesaid, brake out of prison by night, and went to the king, the other prisoners toke the leades of the gate and defended it a long while against the sherifes and all their officers, insomuch that they were forced to call more ayde of the Citizens, whereby they lastly subdued them. Register of

The Quene secretly thinking the ouerthrowe of Richard Duke of Yorke, and his faction, perceiuing that she could attempt nothing against him nere to the Citie of London, because the Duke was had more in estimation among the Citizens, then ey eyther the King or Quene, and therefore she caused the King to make a progresse into Warwickshire, for his health and recreation, and so with hauking and hunting came to the Citie of Couentrie, where diuers waies were studied to compasse the Quenes desire: for the accomplishing whereof, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury, and Warwick, were sent for to Couentrie by the kings letters, vnder his private seale, to which place the saide Lords resorted: but being admonished by secret friendes, what was intended against them, they auoyded that daunger, and so not saying farewell, they departed from the Court, the Duke vnto Wigmore in the marches of Wales, the Earle of Salisbury to his Castle of Wyddleham in the North countrey, and the Earle of Warwick sayed to the Towne of Calais, thus were they separated in bodies, but in mindes and heartes knit together in one, hauing alwaies messengers with letters walking betwixt them, to communicate their deuises. An. reg. 36.

Robert Ponings sometime swordbearer and caruer to Iacke Cade proclaimed a traitor.

In this meane time many were apprehended for raising of seditious stirre among other one Robert Ponings late of Southwarke, in the countie of Surrey Esquire, which was sometime a companion and adherent, to the most horrible wicked and heynous traytor and tyrant Iohn Cade in time of his insurrection, being then his caruer, and sword bearer, what time he did his robbery and tyranny in the citie of London, and in many other places, the which Robert stirred the greater part of such as were adherents, &c. For all which doings being pardoned, he hath still persevered in his wickednes, and of late, to wit in the 31. the 32. &c. of our raigne hath assembled numbers of men at Royst Cray, and Frammingham in Kent, &c. Wherefore we proclaime him to be a traytor, and to be apprehended, &c.

Reginald Pecock Bishop of Chichester.

Maister Reginald Pecocke Bishop of Chichester, a secular Doctour of Divinitie, that had laboured many yeeres to translate the holy Scriptures into English, was accused to have passed the boundes of Divinitie and of Christian belöse in certaine Articles, of the which hee was convicted before the Archbishoppe of Canterburie, and other Bishops and Clerkes, and after bitterly abused, revoked, and renounced those Articles openly at Pauls Crosse in his Mother tong, on the fourth day of December, as followeth, In the name of the Trinitie, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, I Reynold Pecocke Bishop of Chichester unworthy, of my owne power and will without any manner coercion or dread, confesse and knowledg that I here before this time presuming of mine naturall witte, and preferring my iudgment and naturall reason before the new and the olde Testament, and the authoritie and determination of our mother holy Church, have helde, witten and taught otherwise than the holy Romane and Univerfall Church teacheth, preacheth, or obserueth. And one is against the true Catholicke and Apostles faith, I have witten, taught and published many and diuers perillous doctrines, booke, workes and wyltings, containing Heresies and errors, contrary to the faith Catholicke, and determination of holy Church: and especially these Heresies and errors following, that is to say:

Item, quod non est de necessitate salutis credere sanctorum communionem.

Wherefore I miserable sinner which here before long time haue walked in darkness, and now by the merce and infinite goodnes of God reduced into the right way, and light of truth, and considering my selfe grieuouly haue sinned and wickedly haue informed and infected the people of God, retorne and come againe to the vnitie of our Mother holy Church, and all heresies and errors witten and contained in my sayde booke, workes and wyltings, here solemnly and openly reuoke and renounce, which heresies and errors, and all other spices of heresies I haue befoze this time befoze the most Reuerend father in God, and my good Lord of Canterbury in diuers and latosull for me subiectally abiured, submitting my selfe, being then and also now at this time a very contrite and penitēt sinner, to the cozection of the Church and of my said Lord of Canterbury.

And ouer this, exhorting and requiring in the name and vertue of almighty God, in the saluation of your soules and mind, that no man hereafter giue faith and credence to my said pernicious doctrines, heresies and errors, neyther my said Bookes keepe, hold, or read in any wise, but that they all such Bookes, woorkes, and writings suspect of heresies, deliuer in all goodly haste vnto my said Lord of Canterbury, or to his Commissioners and Deputes, in eschewing of many inconueniencies and great perils of soules, the which else might be cause of the contrary. And ouer this declaration of my conuersation and repentance, I here openly assent, that my said Bookes, woorkes, and writings, for declaration and cause aboue rehearsed, be deputed vnto the fire, and openly byent in ensample and terror of all other, &c. After this, he was depriued of his Bishopricke, hauing a certaine pension assigned vnto him for to liue on in an Abbey, and sone after he died. His Bookes were intituled:

- 1 Of Christian Religion, and a Booke pertayning thereunto.
- 2 Of Matrimonie.
- 3 Iust aprising of holy Scripture, deuided into three parts.
- 4 The Donet of Christian Religion.
- 5 The follower of the Donet.
- 6 The Booke of Faith.
- 7 The Booke filling the foure Tables.
- 8 The Booke of Worshipping.
- 9 The Prouoker of Christian men.
- 10 The Booke of Councell.

In the moneth of January died the Earle of Deuonshire, in the Abbey of Abingdon, poysoned (as men said) being there at that time with Quene Margaret, King Henry and his adherents perceiuing that the Duke of Poike lay still and stirred not, returned to London, and there called a great council, openly declaring that the French and Scots, emboldened by the still discord within the Realme, would attempt to annoy the same, as of late they shewed apparant tokens of their malicious meaning, and would not cease vpon occasions to doe further displeasures, till they perceiued a perfect concord, and vnsained amity to be concluded betwene him and his friends, and those of the contrary part and confederacie. And to the intent, he would be the author of peace, he promised so to entertaine the Duke of Poike, and his followers, that all old grudges being not onely inwardly forgotten but outwardly forgiven, should be the cause of perpetuall loue and assured amitie. This deuise was of all men present well taken, and aduinged for the best. Whereupon diuers grace persons were sent to the Duke of Poike, and all other the great estates of the Realme, which since the battell of St. Albons neuer met or communed together, commaunding them for great causes to resort to the Kings pallace without delay. At whose commaundement came to London, the Earle of Salisbury on the 15. of January with 500. men, and was lodged in his owne house called the Herber: and on the 26. day came Richard Duke of Yorke with 400. men, and was lodged at Wainards Castell being his owne house. Then came the Dukes of Gloucester and Somerset with 800. men, and were lodged without Temple barre, and the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Egremond, and the Lord Clifford came with 1500. men, and lodged without the Citie. And on the 14. of February came the Earle of Warwick from Calais with 600. men, all in red iackets, embzodered with ragged faues before and behinde, and was lodged at the grey friers. And on the 17. of March, the King and Queen with a great retinue came to London, and were lodged in the Bishops pallace. And because no notorious attempt or bickering should be begunne betwene any of the parties, or their retinues, the Mayor of London, Godfrey Boloigne, and Aldermen of the City kept great watch, as well by day as by night, riding about the Citie, by Holborne and Fleetstreet with 2000. men well armed, to see good order & peace to be kept. The Lords which lay within the Citie held a daily counsell at the blacke friers. The other part sojourning without the walles, assembled likewise in the chapter house at Westminster.

At the length by the diligent tranalle, good exhortation, and prudent advice of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and other learned and vertuous Prelates, both partes were perswaded to come to a communication, where after long debating of their grienances, they were accorded, promising to forget all olde rancours, and to be friends each to other, and obedient to the king, whereof writings were made and sealed. The principall points whereof, the king being reputed as whole arbitrator, consisted herein.

First, that at the costes and expences of the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwick and Salisbury five and forty pounds of yerly rent should be given vnto the Monastery of Saint Albons, to be employed for Edmond late Duke of Somerset, Henry late Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Clifford, which being slaine in the late battell of Saint Albons, were buried in the Abbey Church. The same Duke of Somerset, Earle of Northumberland and Lord Clifford, were declared for true liege men to the king at the day of their deaths, as wel as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwick and of Salisbury. More, the Duke of Yorke should giue to Elianor Dutcheffe of Somerset, and to Henry Duke of Somerset her some, the summe of five thousand markes, &c. The Earle of Warwick should giue vnto the Lord Clifford the summe of one thousand markes: diuers other atwardes betwixt parties were there made, which I am forced to overpasse for breuities sake.

For the outward publishing of this topfull agreement, there was by our Lady day in Lent, or five and twentieth day of March, a solemne procession celebrated within the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule in the Citie

hinde the King, the Duke of York, and the Quene with great familiarity to all mens sights, whatsoeuer was meant to the contrary, which appeared after ward.

The thirtenth day of Aprill there was a great fray in fletestrate, be-twene men of court and the inhabitants of the same strate, in which fray the Quenes Atturney was slaine. For this sake, the king committed the principall gouernours of Furniuals, Cliffords, and Barnardes Inne to pris-

At whose commaundement came to London, the Earle of Salisburie on the 15. of January with 500. men, and was lodged in his owne house called the Herber: and on the 26. day came Richard Duke of Yorke with 400. men, and was lodged at Baimards Castell being his owne house. Then came the Dukes of Grecester and Somerset with 800. men, and were lodged without Temple barre, and the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Egremond, and the Lord Clifford came with 1500. men, and lodged without the Citie. And on the 14. of February came the Earle of Marwicke from Caleis with 600. men, all in red tackets, embrodered with ragged staures befoze and behinde, and was lodged at the grey friers. And on the 17. of March, the King and Quēn with a great retinue came to London, and were lodged in the Bishops pallace. And because no notozious attempt oz bickering should be begunne betwēne any of the parties, oz their retinues, the Maior of London, Godfrey Boloigne, and Aldermen of the City kept great watch, as well by day as by night, riding about the Citie, by Holbozne and Fleetstreet with 2000. men well armed, to see good order & peace to be kept. The Lords which lay within the Citie held a daily councill at the blacke friers. The other part sojourning without the walles, assembled likewise in the chapter house at Westminster.

At the length by the diligent traualle, god exhortation, and prudent aduice of the Archbishops of Canterbury, and other learned and vertuous Prelates, both partes were perswaded to come to a communication, where after long debating of their grienances, they were accozded, promising to forget all olde rancours, and to be friendes each to other, and obedient to the king, whereof writings were made and sealed. The princypall points whereof, the king being reputed as whole arbitratoz consisted herein.

First, that at the costes and expences of the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Marwicke and Salisburie five and forty pounds of yearly rent should be giuen vnto the Monastery of Saint Albons, to be employed soz Edmond late Duke of Somerset, Henry late Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Clifford, which being slaine in the late battell of Saint Albons, were buried in the Abbey Church. The same Duke of Somerset, Earle of Northumberland and Lord Clifford, were declared soz true liege men to the king at the day of their deaths, as well as the Duke of York, the Earles of Marwicke and of Salisburie. More, the Duke of Yorke should giue to Elianor Dutchesse of Somerset, and to Henry Duke of Somerset her sonne, the summe of five thousand markes, &c. Carle though he were vnneth able to deale against them, yet he valiantly encountering them, there was a soze battayle fought betwixt them, soz it lasted almost the space of two daies, yet in the ende the English had the victorie: so that two of those shippes being forced to saue themselves by flight, the other thre were taken, which the Carle brought to Caleis, with all the merchandise abourd in the same, the value whereof in wine, oyle, ware, yron, cloth of golde, and other riches was esteemed to the value of tennethousand pound and better, by reason whereof, those wares were solde wonderfull cheape: there were taken a greate number of prisoners, beside a thousand persons slaine in the fight, and of the Carles part about the number of fiftie.

Now in this meane time, after that the Carle of Marwicke was departed the Realme and gone ouer to Caleis, the Duke of Poike, and the Carle of Salisbury falling to consultation, it was agreed betwixt them, that the said Carle of Salisbury with a warlike company should march toward the King, and signifie to him by way of complaint, both the manifest iniurie done to his sonne, and also the vncourteous breach of the swozne amittie and late agreement, in which sute if he prevailed, he should not then let passe the occasion giuen soz reuenge of displeasures to him done, both by the Quene, and her counsell. The Carle of Salisbury therfore removed from Spoleham Castle, with foure or fise thousand men, taking his way through Lancashire towards London.

In the meane season the Quene assisted by the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, hauing diligent eie to al her busines, imagined that the Carle of Marwicke had kindled this fire, to the intent, to set the Crowne on the Duke of Poikes head: wherefore she appointed James Twiche Lord Audley (because his power lay in those parts) to raise an host of men, and to giue battaile to the same Carle, if he saw cause, & place inconuenient: she allied vnto her all the knights and Esquiers of Cheshire soz to haue their fauour: she held open household among them, and made her sonne the Prince, to giue a liberie of Swans to all the gentlemen of that countrey, and to many other through the land, trusting through their strength to make her sonne King, making priuie meanes to some of the Loyds to moue the King to resigne the Crowne to her sonne, but she could not bring it to passe.

The 21. day of September Richard Carle of Salisbury hauing gathered a well appointed army, toke his way toward Lutetia, where at that time the Duke of Poike lay, to the intent that they both together would haue ridden to the King to Colshull in Staffordshire, to haue excused them of certaine articles laide against them by malice of their enemies, as they saide. Whereupon those that were about the King, and also the Quene, who lay at Eglishall, moued him to assemble a great power, whereof James Twiche Lord Audley was made chiefe, and had the leading of them into the fieldes called called Blozeheath néere unto Ducklestone, by the which the said Duke and the Earle must néeds passe, and there both hostes met and fought a moztall battell, wherein the Lord Audley was slaine with Hugh Venables of Binsterton, Thomas Dutton of Dutton, Richard Molineux of Selson, William Trowbecke, John Legh del Bothes, John Donne of Wikington, and John Egerton of Egerton Knights, Richard Donne of Croton, John Dures Esquires, and many other, in all to the number of 2400. persons, but the greatest losse fell to the of Cheshire, that had received the Princes livery of Swans: but there were taken prisoners the Earle of Salisburie two sonnes Thomas and John, and sir Thomas Harington, which were sent to Chester, but sone after deliuered. After this discomfiture at Blozeheath, the Duke of York perceiuing his destruction to be intended, and his priuie intents thzoughly disclosed to the King and Quene, he thought good no longer to linger his busines, but with all diligence to display and auance his banner, and therefore sending for the Earle of Salisburie, after long communication, they determined to raise an armie, and by fine force epther to die, or to winne their purpose. Hereupon were men forthwith assembled, both out of the North, & of the Welch, which all came to the Marches of Wales, determining there to abide their enemies, or to meet them as occasion serued. There came to him from Caleis the Earle of Marwicke, byzinging with him a great number of expert men in martiall feates, wheresof two were Captaines of great experience, the one called Andrew Trollope, the other John Blunt.

The King hauing aduertisement of the Dukes doing, sent forth Commissioners to leuie a power in all parts of the Realme, where he thought to haue any faithfull saunours, by reason whereof a great number of men were assembled, then the king accompanied with the Dukes of Somerset and Gloucester, and other that saunored the house of Lancaster, marching southward came vnto Worcester, where he stayed for a time, and sent to his aduersaries a messenger, to wit, the Bishoppe of Salisbury Richard Beauchampe, to offer vnto them a free generall pardon for all trespasses whatsoever, if they would giue ouer their enterprise and become true and obedient subiectes. To whom they answered by the mouth of the Earle of Marwicke, in thre pointes: first, that as concerning the pardon, they durst not trust vnto it. Secondly, that notwithstanding such pardons, those that were about the King were vntruly, and cared not to breake the Kings commaundement. Thirdly, although cuerie Lord, being called to the Parliament, ought freely to come, and safely to depart, yet the said Earle of Marwicke, at a certaine counsell holden at Westminster, was in danger of death, if the Lord above had not the better prouided for his escape, for the which cause he with the kings pardon may be likened to a buckler of glasse, or a staffe of reede, of the which there is no trust: we dare not commit our selues vnto the defence of any such pardons.

The King receiuing such an answer was nothing contented therewith, and therefore commaunded his standartes to be aduanced: but before he came néere to the place where the said Lords were incamped, they wrote a letter letter to the King, whereof the tenour was thus.

Most Christian King, right high and mightie Prince, and our most dread soueraigne Lord, after as humble recommendations to your high excellency as will suffice. Our true intent to the prosperitie and augmentation of your high estate, and to the Commonweale of this Realme, hath bene shewed vnto your highnes in such wyting as we make thereof. And ouer that an Indenture signed by our hands in the Church Cathedraall of Worcester, comprehending the pwise of the trueth and dutie that (God knoweth) we beare to your said estate, and to the preheminnence and prerogatiue thereof, we sent vnto your god grace by the Bypo of the said Church, and diuers other Doctoz, and among other, by Maister William Linwoode Doctoꝝ of diuinitie, which ministred vnto vs federally the blessed sacrament of the bodie of Iesus, whereupon we and enery of vs deposed foꝝ our said trueth and duety, accordyng to the tenour of the said Indenture. And sith that time we haue certified at large in wyting and by mouth, by Cartar King of armes, not onely to your said highnesse, but also to the god and woꝛthie Lordes being about your most noble pꝛesence, the largenesse of our saide trueth and duety, and our intent and disposition, to searce all the motions that might serue conueniently to the affirmation thereof, and to our perfect sureties from such inconuenient and unreuerent leopardies as we haue bene put in diuers times here before. Whereof we haue cause to make, and ought to make such exclamacion and complaint, not without reason, as is not vnknowne to the said woꝛthie Lordes, and to all this land, and will offer vs to your high pꝛesence, to the same intent, if we might so doe without said surety, which onely causeth vs to keepe such fellowship as we doe in our full manner. And hereto we haue foꝝborne and auoided all thinges that might serue to the effusion of Christian blood, of the dread that we haue of God, and of your royall Maiestie: and haue also eschewed to approach your said most noble pꝛesence, foꝝ the humble obessance and reuerence wherein we haue, and during our life will haue the same. And yet neuerthelesse we beare, that we be proclaimed and diffamed in our name vnrightfully, vnlawfullie, and sauing your high reuerence, vntruely, and otherwise (as God knoweth) than we haue giuen cause, knowing certainly that the blessed and noble intent of your said god grace, and the righteousness thereof is, to take, repute and accept your true and lawfull subiectes, and that it accoꝛdeth neither with your saide intent, noꝝ with your will oꝝ pleasure, that we should be otherwise taken oꝝ reputed. And ouer that, our Lordships and tenaunts bene of high violence robbed and spoyled, against your peace and lawes, and all righteousness. We therefore, as we suffice, beseech your said god grace to take, repute, and receiue thereunto our said trueth and intent, which to God is knowen, as we shew it by the said tenour of the same Indenture, and not apply your said blessednes ne the great righteousness and equitie wherewith God hath euer indued your high nobilitie, to the importune impatience and violence of such persons as intend of extrême malice to pꝛocæde vnder the shadow of your high might might and presence, to our destruction, for such inordinate couetise (whereof God is not pleased) as they haue to our lands, offices, and goods, not letting of sparing thereto, to put such things in all lamentable and to sorrowfull jeopardy, as might in all wise take effect, by the mystery of Gods wil & power, nor not hauing regard to the effusion of Christian blood, ne any tendernes to the Noble blood of this land, such as serue to the tuition and defence thereof, ne not waighing the losse of your true liege men of your said Realme, that God defend, which knoweth our intent, and that wee haue auoyded there-from, as farre as we may with our sureties, not of any deead that we haue of the said persons, but onely of the deead of God and of your said highnes, and wil not vse our said defence vntill the time that we be prouoked of necessity, whereof we call Heauen and Earth vnto witness and record, and therein beseech God to be our Iudge, and to deliuer vs according to our said intent, and our said truth and duety to your saide highnesse, and to the said Commonweale. Most Christian King, right high and mighty Prince, and most deead soveraigne Lord, we beseech our blessed Lord to preserve your honour and estate in toy and felicity. Witnessen at Ludlow the tenth day of October: R. Yorke, R. Warwicke, R. Salisbury.

After their exultation contained in this letter sent to the King, they with-drew them, and went into diuers parts beyond the seas, for the more surety of their persons. The Duke of Yorke went into Ireland, where he was honourably receiued: the Earle of March, Salisbury, and Warwicke, not without great jeopardy and perill, as well on the land as on the sea, went to Caleis, and abode there.

Then was a Parliament holden at Coventry, wherein were attaint of treason, Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March his son and heire, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Edmond Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, John Lord Clifford, Lord Clinton, sir Thomas Harington, sir John Wenlocke, Thomas Neuill, John Neuill sonnes of the Earle of Salisbury, James Pickering, John Conyers, Thomas Par, William Oldhall, and Henry Ratford, Knights, John Bowler, Thomas Cooke, John Clay, Richard Gyton, Robert Browne, Edward Bowler, Thomas Vaughan, John Roger, Richard Grey, Walter Deuereux, Walter Hopton, Roger Kynderton, William Bowes, Foulke Stafford, the Lord Powis, and Alice Countesse of Salisbury, their goods and possessions escheated, and their heires disherited vnto the ninth degree, their tenants spoiled of their goods, beheaded and slaine, the towne of Ludlow longing to the Duke of Yorke, was robbed to the bare walles, and the Dutches of Yorke spoiled of her goods.

In this moneth of October, Henry the young Duke of Somerset, Henry Lord Roos, and Lord Audley, with men of armes sailed towards Caleis, to the intent the Duke should haue bene Captaine there: but when he came to land, they of Caleis would haue taken him, so that he hardly escaped to the Castell of Swines: his souldiers were stripped out of their harnesse, and let go. The Lord Audley was taken into Caleis, and the Lord Roos

Not long after, Richard Lord Rivers was sent to Sandwich, to keepe the towne and certain great ships which lay there at anker: but when the Earle of Marwicke saw time convenient, he sent some of his men to Sandwich by night, the which took the Lord Rivers and Anthonie Woodville his sonne in their beds, and led them over to Calais, with all the great ships save one called Grace de Dieu, the which might not be had away because she was broke in the bottome. Sir Baudwine Fulford undertooke on paine of losing his head, that he would destroy the Earle of Marwicke, but when he had spent the King a thousand markes in money, he returned again. Then was the Duke of Excester Admirall sent to the sea with a great paye for to distresse the Earle of Marwicke and his paye, he sailing from Sandwich to Dartmouth, for lacke of victuals and many his souldiers forsooke him there. And betwixt Sandwich and Dartmouth he met the Earle of Marwicke coming out of Ireland that had bene there for to speake with the Duke of Yorke, and brought with him his mother that was fled thither for bread, and led her to Calais: but the Duke of Excester durst not set upon the earle of Marwicke, nor the Earle would not distresse him, because he was admirall, and of the Kings blood, but let him passe by.

In the moneth of June 500 men were sent to conduct the Duke of Somerset from Gwines into England, but abiding the wind in the Port of Sandwich, the Earle of Marwicks men spoiled them of their harnes, killed their Captaine Mounifort and many other. The Carles at Calais sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and at large to the commons of England certain articles in writing, beginning thus: Worshipful firs, we, the Duke of Yorke, the Carles of March, Warwik, and Salisbury, sewed, and offered to have come unto the King our soueraigne Lords most noble presence, to haue declared there afoze him for our duety to God and to his highnes, and to the prosperity and welfare of his noble estate, and to the common weale of all his land as true liege men, the matters following, that is to say.

Inprimis, the great oppzession, extortion, robbery, murder, and other violence done to Gods Church and to his ministers thereof, against Gods and mans law.

2 Item, the pouerty and misery that to our great heavinesse our soueraigne Lord standeth in, not having any linclode of the crowne of England, whereof he may keepe his honourable household, which causeth the spoiling of his said liege men by the takers of his said household, which linclode is in their hands that haue bene destroyers of his said estate, and of the said common weale.

3 Item, how his lawes be partially and unrightfully guided, and that by them that should most loue and tender his said lawes, the said oppzession and extortion is most fauoured and supported, and generally, that all righte-ousnes and Justice is eriled out of the said land, and that no man dareth to offend against the said lawes.

4 Item, that it will please his said god grace to line upon his owne linclode, liuelode, wherupon his noble progenitoꝝ haue in daies heretofore liued as honorably and as woꝛthily as any Chꝛistian Princes, and not to suffer the destructione of the said land, and of his true subiects; to liue thereupon, and therefore to lacke the sustenances that should be belonging to his said estate, and finde his household vpon his poꝛe commons, without payment, which neither accordeth with Gods noꝛ mans law.

5 Item, how oft the said commons haue bene greatly and marnellously charged with taxes and tallages, to their great empouerishing, wherof little god hath epyther growen to the King oꝛ to the said land, and of the most substance thereof the king hath left to his part not halfe so much: and other Lords and persons, enemies to the said commonweale, haue to their owne vse, suffering all the olde possessions that the King had in France and Poꝛmandy, Anioꝛ and Paine, Gascoign & Guien, won and gotten by his father of most noble memoꝛy, and other his noble progenitoꝝ, to be shamefully lost oꝛ sold.

6 Item, how they cannot cease therewith, but now begin a new charge of imposition and tallages vpon the said people, which neuer afoꝛe was sen, that is to say, euery towne ship to find men foꝛ the Kings guard, taking ensample therof, of our enemies and aduersaries of France, which imposition and tallage, if it be continued to beire, beires, and successoꝝ, will be the heauiest charge & woꝛst ensample that euer grew in England, and the foresaid subiects, and the said beires and successoꝝ, in such bondage as their ancestoꝝ were neuer charged with.

7 Item, where the king hath now no moꝛe liuelode out of his Realme of England, but only the land of Ireland, and the towne of Caleis, and that no King Chꝛistened hath such a land and a towne without his Realme, diuers Lords haue caused his highnes to write letters vnder his pryue seale, vnto his Irish enemies, which neuer king of England did heretofore, whereby they may haue comfort to enter into the conquest of the said land, which letters the same Irish enemies sent vnto me the said Duke of Poꝛke, and marueled greatly that any such letters should be to them sent, speaking therein great shame and villany of the said Realme.

8 Item, in like wise the King by excitation and labour of the same Lords, wrote other letters to his enemies and aduersaries in other lands, that in no wise they should shew any fauour oꝛ good will to the towne of Caleis, whereby they had comfort enough to proceed to the winning thereof. Considered also that it is ordained by the labour of the said lords, that no where victuall noꝛ other thing of refreshing oꝛ defence should come out of England, to the succour oꝛ reliefe of the said town, to the intent that they would haue it lost, as it may openly appeare.

9 Item, it is deemed and ought greatly to be deemed, that after that the same Lords would put the same rule of England, if they might haue their purpose and intent, into the handes and gouernance of the saide enemies.

10 Item, how continually with the piteous, shamefull, & sorrowful mur-

ther to all England, of that noble, worthy, and Christian Prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the kings true vncle, at Wury, it hath ben labored, studied, and conspired, to haue destroyed and murdered the said Duke of Yorke and the issue that it pleased God to send me of the royall blood, and also of vs the said Charles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for none other cause but for the true heart that God knoweth we euer haue borne, and beare to the profit of the kings estate, to the commonweale of the same Realme, and defence thereof.

11 Item, how the Charles of Shrewsbury and Wilshire, and the Lord Beaumont, our mortal and extreme enemies, now, and of long time past, hauing the guiding about the most noble person of our said soueraign Lord, whose highnes they haue restrained and kept from the liberty and freedom that belongeth to his said estate, and the supporters and fauourers of all the premises, would not suffer the kings said good grace to receiue and accept vs, as he would haue done, if he might haue had his owne wil, into his said presence, breadding the charge that would haue bene laid vpon them, of the misery, destruction, and wretchednesse of the said Realme, wherof they be causes, and not the King, which is himsele as noble, as vertuous, as righteous and blessed of disposition, as any Prince earthly.

12 Item, the Charles of Wilshire and Shrewsbury, and the Lord Beaumont, not satisfied nor content with the kings possessions and his goods, stirred and excited his said highnes to hold his Parliament at Couentry, where an act is made by their prouocation and labour, against vs the said Duke of Yorke, my sonnes March and Rutland, and the Charles of Warwicke and Salisbury, and the sonnes of the said Charles of Salisbury, and many other Knights and Esquires, of diuers matters fallshly and vntruly imagined, as they will answer afoze Almighty God in the day of doome, the which the said Charles of Shrewsbury and Wilshire, and the Lord Beaumont prouoked to be made, to the intent of our destruction and of our issue, and that they might haue our liuelode and goods, as they haue openly robbed and dispoiled all our places and our tenements, and many other true men, and now proceed to hanging and drawing of men by tyranny, and will therein shew the largenes of their violence and malice as vengeably as they can, if no remedy be prouided at the kings highnesse, whose blessednes is neither assenting nor knowing thereof.

We therefore seeing all the said mischieses, hearing also that the French king maketh in his land great assembly of his people, which is greatly to be dread for many causes, purpose yet againe with Gods grace to offer vs to come again to the said presence of our said soueraigne Lord, to open and declare there vnto him the mischieses aboue declared, and in the name of the land to sue, in as reuerent and lowly wise as we can, to his said good grace, to haue pisse and compassion vpon his said true subiectes, and not to suffer the same mischieses to raigne vpon them. Requiring you in Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist vs, doing alway the duety of liege men in our persons to our said soueraigne Lord, to his estate, prerogative, gatiue, and preheminence, and to the surety of his most noble person, wherunto we haue euer bene, and will be as true as any of his subiectes alīue, whereof we call God, our Lady Saint Mary, and all the Saints in heauen vnto witnes and record.

In the meane tīne, the Earle of Wiltshire treasurer of England, the Lord Scales, and the Lord Hungerford went to Newbery, which longed to the Duke of York, and there made inquisition of all them that in any wise had fauoured the said Duke, whereof some were found guilty, and were drawen, hanged, and quartered, and all the inhabitants of the towne were spoiled of their goods. From thence the Earle of Wiltshire went to Southampton, where vnder colour to take the Earle of Marwicke, but especially to steale out of the Realme, as appeared afterwards, he armed five great carrikes of Tene, and stuffed them with souldiers, taking victualles of the kings price without painment, and put a great part of his treasure into the said caricks, and after sailed about in the sea, and at last scale into Dutchland, sending backe againe his souldiers into England. Then were the kings priuy seales directed to all Bishops, Abbots, Priors and other States spirituall and tempozall to lend the king money, therewith to wage souldiers to keepe the sea coasts: but the commons of Kent dreading the like vengeance to be taken vpon them, as was done vpon them of Newbery, sent priuily messengers to Carles to the foresaid Carles, beseeching them in all haste possible to come to their succour, wherevpon the said Carles sent ouer into Kent the Lord Fauconbridge, to know if their deeds would accorde with their words, and anon the people of Kent and other shires adioynning resorted to the said Lord Fauconbridge in great number, and made long proclamations, containing diuers articles and causes of their assembly, all which here I ouerpasse. When the Carles knew the willing hearts of those people, they prepared to come into this land, against whose coming, a long ballet was fired vpon the gates of Canterbury, made in fauor of the Duke of York and the said Carles, beginning thus: In the day of fast and spirituall affliction, The celestiaall influence of bodies transitorie, &c. The Carles of March, Marwicke, and Salisbury, arrived at Sandwich, where met with them Thomas Bourcher Archbishop of Canterbury, who with his crosse boyn before him, & a great number of other people, accompanied them to London, into the which City they entred on the second day of July: with them came the Popes legate, to treat of a peace, if need were.

Then was a conuocation of the Cleargy holden in Saint Pauls Church, where the said Carles being present, the Earle of Marwicke recyted the cause of their coming into the land, with the misgouernments thereof, and then made open oth vpon the crosse of Canterbury, that they had euer bozne true faith and allegiance to King Henry. When the Carles of March and Marwicke, with the Lords Fauconbridge, Clinton, Bourchier called Earle of Ewe, the Prior of Saint Iohns, Audley, Burgauenny, Say, and Scrope, the Archbishop, the Popes legate, the Bishops of Excester, Ely, Salisbury, and Rochester, addrested them forth to the King at Portsmouth, thampton, leaving the Earle of Salisbury to be gouernour of the Citie in their absence. The Lord Scales and Hungerford, that before the comming of the Carles were in the Citie of London, and would haue had the gouernance thereof, went to the Tower of London, and with them the Lords Vesly, Louell, Delaware, Kendale a Gascoigne: Knights, sir Edmond Hampden, Thomas Brune Sheriffe of Kent, Iohn Bruin of Kent, Geruais Clifton treasurer of the Kings house, Thomas Tyrell, the Dutches of Excester and many other. Then was the Tower of London besieged both by water and land, that no victuals might come to them. And they that were within the Tower cast wild fire into the Citie, and shot many smal guns, whereby they burnt and slew men, women, and children in the streets: also they of the Citie laid great guns on the further side of the Thames against the Tower, and brake the walles in diuers places.

The King lying in the Friers at Southampton obtained a strong and mighty field in the meadows beside the Runny, hauing the riuer at his back. The Carles with their power comming to Southampton, sent certaine Bishops to the King, beseeching him to admit the Earle of Warwick to come to his presence, to declare their innocency: which request being denied by the Duke of Buckingham, the Carles sent an herault of armes, desiring to haue hostages for his safe comming & going, but he might not be heard. The third time the Earle of Warwick sent word to the King, that at two houres after none he would speake with him, or die in the field. The Bishop of Hereford a white seier, the Kings confessor, encouraged the Kings part to fight, wherefore after the battell he was committed to the Castell of Warwick, where he was long prisoner.

The tenth day of Iuly at two of the clocke after none, the Carles of Hatch and Warwick let crye throughe the field, that no man should lay hand vpon the King, ne on the common people, but on the Lords, Knights and Esquires: then both hostes incountred and fought halfe an houre, the Lord Edmond Grey of Ruthen that was the kings barward brake the field and came to the Carles party, and was a great helpe to them in obtaining the victorie: many on the Kings side were slaine, and many that fled were drowned in the riuer, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earle of Shrewsbury the Lord Beaumont, and the Lord Egremont were slaine by the kings tent, with many knights and esquires: the kings ordinance of guns might not be shot, there was so great raine that day.

When the field was done, and the Carls had the victorie, they came to the King, he being in his tent, and said in this wise: Most noble prince, displease you not though it haue pleased God of his grace to grant vs the victorie of our most tall enemies, the which by their benemous malice haue vntruly flattered & incited your highnesse to exile vs out of your land, and would haue vs put to finall shame and confusion: we come not to the intent for to bringe quiet ne grieue your said highnesse, but for to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high welfare & prosperitie thereof, and of al your realme, and to be your true liege men while our lines shall endure.

The king with these wordes was greatly recomforted, and anon was led to Northampton with procession, where he rested thre daies, and came to London the sixteenth day of July, and was lodged in the Bishops pallace.

The nineteenth day of July, they that were in the Tower of London, for lacke of victuals yelded and came forth, of the which after ward some were drawne and headed.

The Lord Scales late in an evening entred a wherry with thre persons, and rowing toward Westminster, there to haue taken sanctuary, was descried by a woman, and anon the wherry men fell on him, killed him, and cast him aland beside Saint Mary Duerles. When Quene Margaret heard that the king was taken, she with her sonne and eight persons fled to the Castell of Harblagh in Wales, and was rebbed by the way in Lancasteshire of al her goods to the value of ten thousand markes: from thence she went into Scotland.

The eight of October a Parliament was begun at Westminster, unto the which came Richard Duke of Yorke, that a little before was come out of Ireland, and being lodged in the pallace, the king being there, he brake by the dores of the kings chamber, so that the king giuing him place, took an other chamber. When the said Duke, as right heire by lineal descent from Richard the second, challenged the Realme, purposing to haue ben crowned on Alhallow day next following, and hereupon sent to the Parliament in writing his said claime, title, and pedigree. The which claime after diligent deliberation had and approued, by the said Parliament, peace and concord betwene the king and the Duke on the bigill of Alhallow was established and concluded, as in articles followeth. Parliament.

The articles betwixt king Henry and the Duke of York

Blessed be Iesu, in whose hands all bountie resteth, and is the peace and unitie betwixt Princes and the weale of euery Realme: I know by whose direction agreed it is appointed and accorded as followeth: Betwixt the most high and most mighty Prince King Henry the sixt, King of England and of France, and Lord of Ireland, on the one party and the right high and mighty Prince Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, on that other party, by on certaine matters of variance moued betwixt them, and especially upon the claime and title unto the crownes of England and of France, and royal power, estate, and dignity apperteyning to the same, & lordship of Ireland opened, shewed, and declared by the said Duke, afore all the Lords spiritual and temporall, being in this present Parliament.

First, wheret the said Richard Duke of Yorke hath declared and opened, as aboue is said, title and claime in manner as followeth:

That the right noble and worthy Prince Henry king of England the thirde, had issue and lawfully got Edward his first begotten sonne, bozne at Westminster the sixteenth kalends of July, in the yere of our Lord 1297, and Edmond his second sonne, which was bozne on Saint Marcells day, in the yere of our Lord 1245. the which Edward, after the death of King Henry his father, intituled and called King Edward the first, had issue Edward his first begotten sonne, called after the deceale of his father, King Edward the second, the which had issue, Edward the third: which Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Batfield his second sonne, Lionell the third, Duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gaunt the fourth, Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley the fift, Duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodstocke the sixt, Duke of Glocester, and William of Windsor the seventh. The said Edward Prince of Wales, which died in the life time of his father, had issue Richard, which succeeded Edward the third his grandfather: Richard died without issue: William of Batfield the second sonne of Edward the third, died without issue: Lionell the third sonne of Edward the third, Duke of Clarence, had issue Phillip his daughter and heire, which was coupled in matrimony vnto Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, and had issue Roger Mortimer Earle of March her sonne and heire, which Roger had issue Edmond Earle of March, Roger Mortimer, Anne and Elianor: which Edmond, Roger, and Elianor died without issue: And the said Anne coupled in matrimony to Richard Earle of Cambridge, the sonne of Edmond of Langley, the fift sonne of Henry the third, and had issue Richard Plantagenet, commonly called Duke of Yorke. Iohn of Gaunt the fourth sonne of Edward, and the younger brother of the said Lionell, had issue Henry Earle of Derby, which incontinent after that King Richard resigned the Crownes of the Realmes and Lordshipp of Ireland, unrighteously entered vpon the same, then being alieue Edmond Mortimer Earle of March sonne to Roger Mortimer Earle of March, sonne and heire of the said Philip, daughter and heire of the said Lionell, the third sonne of the said King Edward the third, to the which Edmond the right and title of the said Crowns and Lordship by law and custome belonged. To the which Richard Duke of York, as sonne to Anne daughter to Roger Mortimer Earle of March, son and heire of the said Philip daughter and heire of the said Lionell, the third sonne of King Edward the third the right, title, dignity royall, and estate of the Crownes of the Realmes of England and France, and the Lordship of Ireland, pertayneth and belongeth afoze any issue of the said Iohn of Gaunt, the fourth sonne of the said King Edward. The said title notwithstanding, and without prejudice of the said Richard Duke of Yorke, tenderly desiring the wealth, rest, and prosperity of this land, and to set apart all that might be trouble to the same, and considering the possession of the said King Henry the first, and that he hath for his time been named, taken, and reputed for King of England and of France, and Lord of Ireland, is contented, agreed, and consenteth, that he be had reputed, and taken for King of England and France, with the royal estate, dignity and preheminnence belonging thereunto, and Lord of Ireland during his natural life. And for that time, the said Duke without hurt or prejudice of his said right and title shal take, moztshp and honour him for his soueraigne Lord.

Item, the said Richard Duke of Yorke, shall promise and bind him by his solemn othe, in manner and forme as followeth :

In the name of God Amen : I Richard Duke of Yorke, promise and sweare by the faith and truth that I owe to almighty God, that I shall neuer consent, procure, or stir, directly or indirectly, in p[ri]vile or apert, neither, (as much as in me is) shall suffer to be done, consented, procured, or stirred, any thing that may sound to the abridgement of the naturall life of King Henry the first, or to the hurt or diminishing of his raigne or dignitie rofall, by violence or any other wise, against his freldome or libertie: but if anie person or persons would do or presume any thing to the contrary, I shall with all my might and power withstand it, and make it to be withstode, as far as my power will stretch thereunto, to help me God and his holie evangelists.

The othe of
of Yorke.

Item, Edward Earle of March, and Edmund Earle of Rutland, sonnes of the said Duke of Yorke shall make like othe.

Item, it is accorded, appointed, and agreed, that the said Richard Duke of Yorke, shall be called and reputed from henceforth very and rightfull heire to the Crownes, royall estate, dignitie and Lordship abovesaide, and after the decease of the said King Henry, or when he will lay from him the saide crownes, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the said Duke and his heires shall immediately succede to the saide Crownes, royall estate, dignitie and Lordship.

Item, the saide Richard Duke of Yorke shall haue by authoritie of this present Parliament, castles, mannoirs, lands and tenements, with the wards, marriages, relases, seruices, fines, amercements, offices, anowitons, fees, and other appurtenances to them belonging, whatsoeuer they be, to the p[er]rily value of ten thousand markes ouer all charges and repyses, whereof five thousand markes shall be to his owne state, thre thousand five hundred markes to Edward his first begotten sonne Earle of March, for his estate, and one thousand pound to Edmond Earle of Rutland his second sonne, for his p[er]rily sustentation, in such considerations and such intent as shall be declared by the Lords of the Kings counsell.

Item, if any person or persons imagine or compasse the death of the said Duke, and thereof probably be attaint, of open dede done by folkes of other condition, that it be deemed and adiudged high treason.

Item, for the moze establishing of the said accord, it is appoynted and consented, that the Lordes spirituall and tempo[ra]ll, being in this present Parliament, shall make othes to accept, take, worship, and repute the said Richard Duke of Yorke, and his heires, as aboue is rehearsed, and keepe and obserue, and strength in as much as appertaineth vnto them, all the things aboue said, and resist to their power, all them that would presume the contrarie, according to their estates and degrees.

Item, the said Richard Duke of Yorke, Charles of March and Rutland, shall permit and make other to helpe, ayde, and defend the saide Lords, and euery of them, against all those that will quarrell, or any thing attempt against

against the sayde lordes or any of them, by occasion of agrément or consenting to the sayde accord, or assistance giuing to the Duke and Charles, or any of them.

Item, it is agreed and appointed, that this accord, and enery article thereof, bee opened and notified by the Kings letters patents, or otherwise, at such times and places, and in manner as it shall be thought expedient to the sayde Richard Duke of Yorke, with the aduise of the Lordes of the Kings Councell. The king vnderstandeth certainly, the sayd title of the sayde Richard duke of Yorke, iust, lawfull, and sufficient, by the aduise and assent of the Lordes spirituall and temporall, and the commons in this Parliament assembled, and by authoritie of the same Parliament declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth and accepteth the saide title iust, good, lawfull, and true, and thereunto giueth his assent and agrément of his free will and libertie. And ouer that, by the sayd aduise and authoritie declareth, entitleth, calleth, stablisheth, affirmeth, and reputeth the said Richard Duke of Yorke, very true and rightfull heire to the Coronas, roiall estate, and dignitie of the realmes of England and of France, and of the Lordship of Ireland aforesayde, and that according to the worshipping and reuerence that thereto belongeth, he be taken, accepted, and reputed in worshipping and reuerence, by all the States of the said realme of England, and of all his subiects thereof, sauing and ordaining by the same authoritie, the king to haue the sayd Coronas, realme, roiall estate, dignitie, and preheminance of the same, and the said Lordship of Ireland during his life naturall. And furthermore by the same aduise and authoritie will, consenteth and agreeth, that after his decease, or when it shall please his highnes to laye from him the sayd Coronas, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the sayd Richard duke of Yorke, and his heires, shall immediatly succede him in the said Coronas, roiall estate, dignitie, and worshipping, and them then haue and enjoy, any act of Parliament, statute or ordinance, or other thing to the contrary made, or interruption, or discontinuance of possession notwithstanding. And mozeouer, by the sayd aduise & authoritie stablisheth, granteth, confirmeth, approueth, ratifieth, and accepteth the sayd accord, and all thinges therein contained, and thereunto freely and absolutely assenteth, agreeth, and by the same aduise and authoritie ordaineth and establisheth, that if any person or persons imagine or compass the death of the said Duke, and probably be attaint of open dede done by folkes of that conditions, that it bee deemed and adiudged high treason. And furthermore ordaineth and establisheth by the sayd aduise and authoritie, that all statutes, ordinances and acts of parliament, made in the time of the sayd king Henry the fourth, by the which he and the heires of his body coming of Henry late king of England the fift, the sonne and heire of the sayd king Henry the fourth, and the heires of king Henry the fift, were or bee inheritable to the sayd Crownes and realmes, or to the heritage of the same, bee annulled, repelled, damned, cancelled, void, and of none effect.

And ouer this, the king by the sayd aduise, assent and authoritie, ordaineth

meth and establisheth, that all other acts and statutes made afore this time by act of parliament, not repelled or adnulled by like authoritie, or otherwise bold, be in such force, effect, and vertue, as they were afore the making of these ordinances, and that no letters patents royalr of record, nor acts iudiciall, made or done afore this time not repelled, reuerfed, ne otherwise bold by law, be preiudiced or hurt by this present act. Also it was ordained by the same parliament, that the said Richard Duke of Yorke, should be called prince of Wales Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and protector of England.

The English chronicle printed by William Caxton, and therefore called Caxtons chronicle, declareth how that in the parliament, while the commons of the realme were assembled in the common house, communing and treating vpon the title of the said Duke of Yorke, suddenly fell downe the crowne which hong then in the midst of the said house, which was the fraternity of the abbey of Westminster, which was taken for a prodiggy or token that the raigne of king Henry was ended: and also the crowne which stood on the highest tower of the castell of Dover, fell downe the same yere.

The agreement aforesaid being put in articles was engrosed, sealed, and sworn by the two parties, and also enacted in the high court of parliament: for vpon whereof, the king hauing in his company the Duke of Yorke, rode to the cathedra church of Saint Paul within the citie of London, and there on the day of All Saints, with the crowne on his head, went solemnly in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the bishops palace nere to the said church. And on the saturday next ensuing, Richard Duke of Yorke was by sound of Trumpet, solemnly proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne of England, and protector of the realme.

After this, the parliament kept at Couentrie the last yere, was declared to be a diuelish counsell, and only celebrated for the destruction of the nobilitie, and no lawfull Parliament, because they which were returned, were neuer elected according to the due order of the law, but secretly named by them, which desired rather the destruction than the advancement of the commonwelth. When these agreements were done & enacted, the king dissolved his parliament, which was the last parliament that euer he ended. The D. of Yorke wel knowing that the Duene would spurne against the conclusions agreed in this parliament, caused both hir and hir sonne to be sent for by the king: but she being a stout woman, by the counsell of the dukes of Gloucester and Somerset, not only denied to come, but also assembled a great army, intending to take the king by force out of the Lords hands.

The 21. of Nouember, such abundance of waters ouerflowed in the countres of Huntington, Suffolke, Cambridg, and the yle of Ely, as the like had not been sene before: for it ouerthrew the bridge, with a great part of the hospitall and fraterie at Thetford in Suffolke, and the bridges in Cambridge, running ouer the wheeles of the water mills there, destroying many houses, and coming in at the windowes of the rest.

folke, and the earle of Warwicke his trustie friends, to be about the king, and he with the earles of Salisburie and Rutland, and a convenient number of men, departed out of London the second of December, and sent to the earle of March his eldest sonne to follow him with all his power. The duke came to the castell of Sandall beside Wakefield on Christmas euen, and there began to assemble his tenants and friends. There came to him vnder a colour of friendship, the lord Neuill, brother to the earle of Westmerland, and required of him a commission for him to raise the people for to chastise his rebels, as he said: but when he had raised to the number of 8000 men, he brought them to the lordes of the countrie, that is to say, the earle of Northumberland and the rest.

The Quene ascertained hereof, determined to make with him befoze his power were come together, and so, hauing in his company the prince his sonne, the Dukes of Excester and Somerset, the Earle of Devonshire, the lord Clifford, the lord Rose, and in effect all the Lords of the north parts, with an 18000. men, marched from Yorke to Wakefield, where they placed themselves euen befoze the castell gates: the duke hauing with him not fully 5000. men (as was sayd) contrary to the minde of his faithfull friends, would needs issue forth to fight with his enemies. The duke of Somerset, and other of the Quenes part, deuised how to take them, and so appointed the Lord Clifford to lye in one scalle, and the Earle of Wiltshire in another, and the Duke with other kept the maine battell. The duke of Yorke with his people descended downe the hill in good order of aray, and was suffered to passe on toward the maine battell: but when he was in the plaine fielde betwene his castell and the towne of Wakefield, he was enuironed on euery side, so that he manfully fighting was with his halfe an hower slaine, and his whole armie discomfited: and with him died of his trustie friends, his two bastard vnckles, sir Iohn, and sir Hugh Mortimers, sir Dauid Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Neuill sonne to the Earle of Salisbury, William and Thomas a Parre, brethren, Loyde Harington, Thomas Harington knight, sir Henry Ratford knight, and other, to the number of 2200. whereof many were young gentlemen, and heires of great parentage in the south parts. In this conflict was wounded and taken prisoner Richard Earle of Salisbury and was led by the Duke of Somerset to the castell of Pontefract, and had grant of life for a great ransom, but the common people of the country, who loued him not, took him out of the castell by violence, and smote off his head. There was also taken sir Richard Limbroke, Ralph Stanley, Iohn Harow, captaine Hanson, and diuers other. The lord Clifford perceiuing where the earle of Rutland was conuincd out of the fielde, by one of his fathers chaplaines, and schoolmaster to the same Earle, followed and ouertooke him, and stabbed him to the hart with a dagger as he kneeled befoze him. The same Lord Clifford not satisfied herewith, came to the place where the dead corps of the Duke of Yorke lay, and caused his head to be stricken off, and set on it a crowne of paper, and fixed it on a pole, and presented it to the Quene, not lieng farre from the

the field. The Dukes head with the Earle of Salisburies head were set vp ouer a gate of Poike. This battell was fought in the south fieldes of Wakefildes, by the faire stone bridge of nine arches, on the last of December. Poike of Wakefildes shall be shewed in my larger volume that is to come, God willing.

The Earle of March so commonly called, but now after the death of his father, duke of Poike, lieng at Gloucester, was wonderfully amazed when the sorrowful newes of these mishaps came to his vnderstanding: but being comforted by his friends, he removed to Shrewsbury, & raised therabout a puissant army to the number of 23000. ready to go against the Quene, & his fathers enemies. But when he was setting forward, newes was brought him, that Iasper Earle of Penbroke, and James Butler Earle of Dymond & Wiltshire, had assembled a great number of Welchmen and Irishmen, suddenly to take and surprize him: he being therewith quickened, retired backe, and met with his enemies in a faire plaine nere to Mortimers Crosse, beside Ludlow, not far from Hereford east, on Candelmas day in the morning, at which time the sunne (as some write) appeared to the Earle of March like three sunnes, and suddenly ioined together in one: vpon which sight hee took such courage, that hee fiercely setting on his enemies, put them to flight: and for this cause men imagined hee gaue the sunne in his full brightnesse for his badge or cognizance. Of his enemies were slaine to the number of 3800. The Carles of Penbroke and Wiltshire fled, but Owen Teuther (whome Leiland saith should hee called Meredicke) father to the sayd Earle of Penbroke, which Owen Teuther had married (as was said) Katherine mother to King Henry the first, was there taken and beheaded, and after ward buried in a chappell of the gray friers church in Hereford. There were also taken and beheaded, Dauid Floid, Morgan ap Reuther, sir Iohn Skidmore, and his two sonnes, Thomas Griffich, Iohn Throkmorton, Thomas fitz Henry, and other. During this season, the Quene encouraged with this late gained victorie at Wakefild, with a great number of people out of the north, marched toward London, intending to recover the company of the king hir husband, and to vntee all that had bene done in the last parliament. These northern people, after they were once passed the riuer of Trent, spoiled and wasted the countrie afoze them Andrew Trollope grand captaine, and as it were leader of the battell, with a great armie of Scots, Welchmen, and other strangers, beside the northern men, destroyed the townes of Grantham, Stanfords, Peterborough, Huntington, Kilsdon, Melleborne, and in manner all the townes by the way vnto Saint Albons, sparing neither Abbeyes, Priories, or parish churches, but bare away crosses, chalices, booke, ornaments, and other things, whatsoeuer was worth the carriage, as though they had bene Saracens, and no Christians. At length they came downe to Dunstable, and so to S. Albons, and hearing that the dukes of Northfolke and Suffolke, and the earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the lordes Bonuile & other whom the Duke of Poike had left to gouerne the king in his absence, had by the kings assent assembled a great host, and were incamped with the king nere to the towne. Those northen lords and other that were with the Quene, made forwarde, and entring into Saint Albons, meant to passe through the towne, and so to cope with their enemies, but finding a sort of archers ranged, nere to the great crosse in the market place to defend their passage, they were refused with such a storme of arrowes, which came flying about their eares as thicke as haile, that they were quickly repulsed backe, and with losse dyuen to retire into the west end of the towne, where by a lane that leadeth northwards by to S. Peters strete, they made their entrie, and had there also a sharpe encounter against certayne bands of the Kings people: but yet after great slaughter on both parts, they got through, and upon the heath, at the north end of the towne, called Barnard heath, toward a little towne called Syndridge, in a place called Romans land, they had a far greater conflict, with fower or five thousand of the Kings armie, which gaue the onset so fiercely at the beginning, that the victorie rested doubtfull a certayne time, till at the length through the withdrawing many of the Kentishmen with their Captaine Louclace, that was the backward, King Henries part lost the field: the lords fled, and the King went to Quene Margaret that was come with the northen men (as is afore saide) and her sonne Edward. The Earle of Warwick went toward the Earle of March, that was comming toward London out of Wales. The lord Bonville would haue withdrawn him, but the King assured him to haue no bodily hurt: neuertheles at the instance of the Quene, the Duke of Excester, and the Earle of Devonshire, he was beheaded at S. Albons, and with him Sir Thomas Kiriell of Kent. This battell was fought on Shyrouetuesday, or the 17. of February, in the which battel was slain 1916. persons, of whome no nobleman is remembred, save sir Iohn Gray, which was the same day made knight in company of other twelue in the towne of Colny. The same day Thomas Thorpe baron of the Erchequer was beheaded at Wyghgate by the commons of Kent.

Now after the noble men were fled, and other were fled, and the King left in manner alone, without any power of men to garde his person, hee was counselled by a squire called Thomas Hoo, a man well sene in the lawes, to send some conuenient messenger to the northen lords, aduertising them that hee would now gladly come vnto them (whome hee knew to be his friends, and had assembled themselves together for his seruice) to the ende hee might remaine with them, as before hee had vnder the gouernment of the southerne Lordes. According to this aduise, the King appoynted the same Esquire to beare the message, who first went and declared the same vnto the Earle of Northumberland, and returning backe to the King, brought certayne Lords with him, who conueyed the King first into the Lord Cliffords tent, that stood next to the place where the Kings people had incamped. This done, they brought the Quene and her sonne prince Edward vnto his presence, whome hee ioyfullie received, embracing and kissing them in most louing wise, and yelding heartie heartie thanks to almighty God, whome it had pleased to strengthen the forces of the Northren men, to restore his dærely beloued sonne againe to his possession. The Quæne caused the King to dubbe her sonne Prince Edward Knight, with thirty other persons, which the day befoze had fought on her partie.

Knights dubbed at S. Albons.

This done, they went to the Abbey, whereof the Abbot and the monks they were receiued with hymmes and songs, and so brought to the high altar, and after to the Myne, and so to the Chamber, in which the King was wont to lodge. The Abbot made sute, that order might be taken to restrain the northren men from spoiling the towne, and proclamation was forthwith made to that effect, but it auailed not, for they maintained that the spoyle of all thinges was granted them by reuenant, after they were once passed the riuer of Trent: and so not regarding any proclamation, they spared nothing that they could lay hands on, if the same were meet for them to carry away.

The Quæne hauing thus got the victorie, sent to the Maior of London, commanding him without delay, to send certaine carts laden with Lenten stuffe, for the refreshing of hir armie, which the Maior incontinent granted, caused carts to be laden, and would haue sent them forward, but the commons of the citie would not suffer them to passe, but staied them at Triple gate: during which controuersie, diuers of the northren horsemen robbed in the suburbs of the citie, and would haue entered at Triple gate, but they were repulsed by the commoners, and thre of them slaine, whereupon the Maior sent the Recorder to Barnet to the Kings Councell, there to excuse the matter: and the Dutches of Bedford, the Lady Scales, with diuers Fathers of the spiritualltie went to the Quæne to asswage hir displeasure, conceiued against the citie. The Quæne therfore at their humble request by aduice of hir Councell, appointed certaine lords and knights, with 400. tall persons to ride to the citie, and there to view and see the demeanour of the people, and diuers Aldermen were appointed to meete them at Barnet, and to conuey them to London, but all these deuises were shortly altered into another forme, because true report came, not onely to the Quæne, but also to the citie, that the Earle of March, hauing vanquished the Earles of Penbroke and Wiltshire, had met with the Earle of Warwick, after the last battell at Saint Albons, at Chippingnoztton by Coteswolde, and that they with both their powers were comming towards London. The Quæne therfore, hauing little trust in Essex, and lesse in them of Kent, but least of all in the Londoners, with hir husband and sonne, departed from Saint Albons into the north countrie, where their refuge onely consisted.

The Dutches of Yorke, seeing hir husband and sonne slaine, and not knowing what should succede of hir eldest sonne, sent hir two yongest sonnes George and Richard, ouer the sea to the citie of Atrich in Almaine, where they were of Philip duke of Burgoigne well receiued, and so remained there till their brother had got the Crowne.

The

The Carles of March and Marwike, hauing knowledge that the king and Quene were departed from Saint Albons, rode straight to London, entring the Citie with a great number of men of warre, the first weeke of Lent, oz 28. of februarie, where hee was ioyfully receiued, whose coming thither was no soner knowne, but that the people resorted to him out of Kent, Essex, and other parts in great numbers to see, aide, and assist this lastie prince in whom the hope of all their ioy consisted.

This prudent prince, minding to take time when time serued, called a great Councell both of the Lords spirituall and tempozall, and to them declared the title and right that hee had to the Crowne, rehearsing also the Articles concluded betwixt King Henry and his father by their writings signed and sealed, and also confirmed by act of Parliament, &c. Which after the Lords had considered, they determined, that because Kinge Henrie was insufficient of himselfe to rule the Realme, hee should bee deprived of all kingly honour and soueraigntie, and incontinently was Edward Carle of March sonne and heire to Richard Duke of Yorke (by the lordes of that Councell assembled) named and elected for King and Gouvernour of the Realme. On which day being Sunday, and the second day of March, the people of the Carles part being in their musters in Saint Johns felde, and a great number of the substantiall Cittzens there assembled to beholde their order, suddenly the lord Fawconbridge, which toke the musters, wisely declared to the people certaine Articles and points that king Henrie had offended in, and then it was demaunded of them, whether the sayde Henrie were woorthy to raigne still: but the people cried, Nay, nay. Then was it asked, if they would haue the Carle of March to be their King, and they sayde, Yea, yea: then certaine Captaines were sent to the Carle of March at Wainards Castell, who told him that the people had chosen him King, whereof he thanked God and them. and by the aduise of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Excester, and the Carle of Marwike, with other, he toke it vpon him. Many wealthy citizens of London, not altogether liking of this doing, conueied themselves out of the city, amongst the which were Philip Malpas Alderman of London, Thomas Vaughan Esquire, maister William Ayclif, with many other, who fearing the Quenes comming to London, shipped them in a shippe of Antwerp, purposing to haue sayled thither: but by the way they were taken by a French ship named the Colmayne, and at length deliuered for great ranfome.

Edward Carle of March, being elected as is aboue sayd, on the next morrow went in procession at Paules, and offered there, and after Te Deum being song, he was with great roialty conueied to Westminster, and there in the Hall set in the kings seate with Saint Edwards scepter in his hande, and then asked of the people if they would haue him king, and they cried, Yea, yea. Then after certaine homages by him receiued, he was with procession conueied into the Abbey there, and set in the quire as king, while Te Deum was singing: that done, he offered at Saint Edwards Myne, and then returned by water vnto Saint Paules, and was there lodged within the

The Duke of Ercester, the Duke of Somerset, the Lord Roos, the Lord Hungerford, & many other fled to Poike to king Henrie, and then they with the king, Quene, and prince, fled towarde Scotlande to Berwikke, and so to Edenborough.

King Edward went to Poike, where he was with all solemnitie receiued, there he caused the heads of his father and the Earle of Salisburie with other his friends to be taken down, and buried with their bodies. And then caused T. Courtney earle of Deuon, the Earle of Ryne, sir William Hill, to be headed and their heads set vp in place, James Butler Earle of Wiltshire was beheaded at Newcastle, &c. and then King Edward went to Durham, and when he had quieted the country, returned southward. The Lord Fitz Walter was drowned at Ferrybridge, sir Thomas Fulford was beheaded at Berham, &c.

The town of Berwikke was deliuered to the Scots by King Henry the first on S. Maries day.

Percy, and thre hundreth men. At the siege wherof, was the Earle of Worcester, the Earle of Arundale, the lord Ogle, the lord Mountague, & 1000. men. In the castle of Dunstanbrough was sir Richard Tunstall, Thomas Findren, doctor Morton and other with 120. men: and at the siege therof, the lord Wenloke, the lord Hastings, and two other lords with 1000. men. The Castle of Alnewike was held by thre estates, and 300. men. Against the which was in siege the Earle of Warwick, the earle of Kent, the lord Powes, the baron of Greytstoke, the lord Cromwell, & 10000. men. Henry Bewfort Duke of Somerset, sir Ralph Percie, and others yelded Bambrough on Christmasse euen, and were taken to the kings prison. King Edward graunted to the Duke of Somerset a 1000. markes by the yere, wherof he was neuer payde, the Earle of Penbroke, sir Thomas Findern, and others went into Scotland.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at Durham. And on Saint Johns day, Dunstanburgh was yelded to King Edward.

Ann. reg. 3. On the twelwe euen Peirce le Brasle the great warrioꝝ of Normandie came to help the Quene Margaret with Frenchmen, and 20000. Scots, to remoue K. Edwards men from Alnewike siege, & the residue of other castles there. By whose comming K. Edwards men were asfeard of the Scots, as reculing from the siege, & the Scots asfeard of Edwards men, least they had reculed to bying them into a trap. And Henries men issuing out, of too much boldnes, gaue Edwards men oportunitie to enter into the castle: on the morow after the twelf day, the Earle of Warwick made 15. knights: these thre castels were committed to the keeping of sir Ralph Grey, And after againe King Henry with his quene and their felowship entred them and kept them Parliament at London.

The 29. of Aprill began a parliament at Westminster, in the which was ordained that for the terme of thre yeres, that there should no wools be conuied out of the land, except those that were beyond the water of Wese to the staple of Cales, and there to be solde, the one halfe for Wolpon, and the other part for Argent content, and all that other remnaunt of wools should remaine within the land to make cloth of, and all clothiers should make a broad cloth no shorter then 24. yards in length, and two full yards in breadth: also that no wine tanner in the citie of London, should sell any Wine Galkopne, white, claret, or redde, aboue 8. pence the gallon. Item that no man or woman, vnder the estate of a lord or Lords children, weare any cloth of golde, apparell wrought with golde, furs of sables, &c. That no peoman, or parson vnder that degre, weare in their array for their bodies any bolsters of wool, cotton or other stuffe, or in their dublet any thing saue lining equall to the outside. That no person weare gozvine, laquet, or cloake, but of such length, as the same man standing by sight, the same should couer his buttocks, nor any taylor to stuffe or bolster any garment, or to make him shorter or otherwise then was limited, &c. Also, that no man weare shooes or bootes hauing pikes passing two inches in length, or shoe-makers to make them aboue that syle, &c.

Statute against stuffed or bolstered garments, or their garments.

Shortly

Shortly after Quene Margaret obtained a great power of Scots and other her friends, and so bringing her husband with her, and leaving her sonne called prince Edward, in the Towne of Barwicke, entred Northumberland, toke the Castle of Bambrough, and stuffed it with Scottish men, and made thereof Captaine, Sir Ralph Grey, and came sozward toward the Bishopricke of Durham. Whereof when the Duke of Somerset understode, he without delaie, revolted from King Edward, and fled to King Henry, so likewise did Sir Ralph Percie, and many other of the Kings friends, but many followed King Henry in hope to get spoyle, for his armie byent and spoiled townes wheresoener they came.

About Midsummer the Scots with many French and Englishmen, laid siege to the Castle of Roxham, but were forced to leaue it as they found it. The Earle of Warwicke wan the towne of Barwicke, where he made five Bannerets, and 22. Knights, and went into Scotland, where he burnt Lawghinaban, Jedworth, and Galowey, and many other Townes, and returned to Barwicke.

This yere a quarter of wheate was solde for two shillings at London, <sup>Price of</sup> barley for two and twenty pence, pease for thre shillings foure pence, and of <sup>graine.</sup> otes for 14. pence, and in the countrey of Norfolk, a quarter of wheate was sold for 20. pence, maist for 20. pence, barley and otes for 12. pence.

In the month of Aprill, King Edward made great preparation aganste King Henry, and on S. Markes day Ralph Percie L. Hungerford, with a great power, purposing to haue distressed sir Iohn Neuill, L. Mountacute, was himselfe slaine with many other. 1464.
Ann. reg. 4.

The 15. of May King Henries power being at Berham, the L. Mountacute with a power came thither, & enclosed them round about. There were taken & slaine many lords that were with K. Henry, but he himselfe was fled foure daies befoze into Lancashire, where he & other lived in caues ful hardly vnknowne moze than a yere. On Trinity sunday K. Edward made the L. Mountacute Earle of Northumberland & warden of the Marches. The Earles of Warwicke & Northumberland toke Bambrough castle, and sir Ralph Grey being taken in Bambrough, for that he had swozne to be true to King Edward, was condemned, and had iudgement giuen vpon him by the Earle of Worcester high Constable of England, as followeth.

Sir Ralph Grey, for thy treason, the King had ordained that thou shouldest haue had thy spurs striken off by the hard heeles, by the hand of the master coke, who is here ready to do as was promised thee, at the time that he toke off thy spurs, and said to thee as is accustomed: That and thou be not true to the soueraigne Lord, he shall smite off thy spurs with his knife hard by the heeles: and so shewed him the master coke ready to do his office with his apzon and his knife. Whereouer sir Ralph Grey, the King had ordeyned, here thou maiest see, the kings of armes, and heralds, and thine owne proper coate of armes, which they should teare off thy bodie, and so shouldest thou aswell be disgraded of thy worthip, nobles, and armes, as of thy order of knightthod. Also here is another coate of thine armes reuerfed, the which thou shouldest haue woꝛne on thy body, going to thy death wards, foꝛ that belongeth to the after the law: notwithstanding the disgrading of knight-hood, and of thine armes, and nobles, the king pardoneth that, foꝛ thy noble grand-father, who suffered trouble, foꝛ the kings most noble pꝛedeceſſoꝛs. Now sir Ralph Grey this shall be thy penance: Thou shalt go on thy ſate vnto the towne end, and there thou shalt be laid downe, and draven to a scaffold made foꝛ thee, and thou shalt haue thy head smitten off, thy body to be buried in the friers, thy head where the kings pleasure shall bee. This iudgment was pronounced at Doncaster, against the said Ralph Grey, foꝛ rebelling, and keeping of the castle of Bambrough against king Edward.

After this king Edward returned to Poꝛke, where in despite of the Earle of Northumberland, which then kept himselfe in the Realme of Scotland, he created sir Iohn Neuill, L. Mountacute Earle of Northumberland, and in reꝓose of Iasper earle of Penbroke, hee created William loꝛd Herbert Earle of Penbroke: but after when the Earle of Northumberland was reconciled to his fauor, he restored him to his possessions, name and dignitie, and pꝛeferred the loꝛd Mountacute to the title of Marquesse Monntacute, so that in degꝛe he was aboue his brother the Earle of Marwicke, but in power and possessions far vnder him.

The Earle of Marwicke was sent ouer into France, to demaund the lady Bona, daughter to Lewes Duke of Sauoy, and sister to the lady Carlot then quene of France, which Bona was then in the French court. The earle of Marwick comming to the French king, as then being at Towꝛs, was of him honozably receiued, & curteously entertained: his message was so well liked foꝛ the aduancement of the lady Bona, that his sister quene Carlot obtained both the good will of the king his husband, and also of his sister the foresaid lady, so that the matrimony on that side was clerely assented to, and the Earle of Dampmartine appoynted with other to sayle into England, foꝛ the full finishing of the same: but in the meane while, on the first of May, King Edward toke to wife Elizabeth daughter to Iaquet dutches of Bedford, sister to the Earle of S. In the month of May, the duke of Somerset, the L. Roos, the L. Molyns, Talbois earle of Elyne, sir Philip Wentworth, sir Thomas Fynderne, gathered an hoste in the North countrey, & sir Ioh. Neuill earle of Northumberland with 10000. men came vpon them, whom the comons forsaking, their captaines were taken & beheaded. R. Edward fearing the L. Mountacute, who he had of late made earle of Northumberland, he caused the men of the countrey to desire the rightful heire Percie son to Henry that was slaine at Poꝛke fiede: & so Percie was restored, & Monntacute was made a Marquesse, and his son duke of Bedford, which should wed the kings eldest daughter, and so by possibility should be king of England, thus was he sed with faire woꝛds, but nothing nothing perfozmed. About Michaelmas the king held a counceat at Reading, where the quene was shewed openly, and receiued as quene. After this wedding known, the earle of Marwike and R. Edward were neuer friends.

This peere the 22. of January, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein it was enacted that no merchandize coming out of Flaunders, or out of any land of the duke of Burgoyne, should be sold within any ground of England. Also king Edward caused a new coppe to be made, whereby he gained much, for he made of an old noble a royall, which he commanded to go for 10.s. neuertheless to the same royall was put 8.d. of alay, & so weied the moze by 8.d. being smitten with a new stampe: he likewise made halfe angels of 5.s. and farthings of 2.s. 6.d. angelets of 6.s. 8.d. and half angels, 3.s. 4.d. he made silver monies of 3.d. a groate, & so of other coines after that rate, to the great harme of the commons. I finde by recozde, that William lord Hastings the kings Chamberlaine, was made master of the kings mints or monies of gold or silver in the Tower of London, his Realme of England, territoze of Ireland, and towne of Caleis, with the Marches of the same: the which lord Hastings undertoke to make the same monies under fozm following, to wit, of gold, a peece for 8. shillings 4. pence sterlings, which should be called a noble of gold, of the which there should be 50 such peeces in the pound weight of the tower, an other peere of gold 4. shillings 2. pence of sterlings, & to be of them 100. such peeces in the pound: and a thirde peere of golde weying the fourth part of the first, for two shillings one peny sterlings, and 200. such peeces in the pound, and every pound weight of the sayd tower, to be woorth 20. pound, 16. shillings 8. pence of sterlings, the which should be 23. Carets, 3. graines and halfe fine, &c. And for silver, 37. shillings 6. pence of sterlings, the peere of 4. pence to be 112. groates, & 2. pence in the pound weight, &c. thus much out of the recozde.

It was proclaimed throughout England, that the beakes or pikes of shoon and bootes should not passe two inches, upon paine of cursing by the clergy, and forfeiting 20. s. to be paid one noble to the king, one other to the Cordwainers of London, and the thirde to the chamber of London, and for other citiees and townees the like order was taken. Before this time and since the yere of our Lord, 1382. the pikes of shoes and bootes were of such length, that they were faine to be tied by to their knees with chaines of silver gilt, or at the least with silke laces.

King Edward concluded an amitie & league with Henry King of Castile and Iohn King of Aragon, at the concluding whereof, he granted licence for certain Cotswold sheepe to be transported into y<sup>e</sup> countrie of Spain, which haue there since mightily increased and multiplied, to the Spanish profit, as it is said: but true it is, that long ere this were sheepe in Spain, as may appere by a patten of king Henry the second, the 31. of his reigne, graunted to the weauers of London, that if any cloth were found to be made of Spanish wol, mixed with English wol, the mase of London should se it bent.

Besides this, to haue amitie with his neyghbour the king of Scots, he winked at the losse of Barwike, and was contented to take a truce for fiftene yeres.

An. reg. 7.

King Edward throught the resusall of the French Kings sister in law (as ye haue heard) wan him enemies in France, wherefore in other places he procured him friends, but those friends had stand him in small neede, if fortune had not holpe him to another, euen at his elbow. This was Charles Earle of Charoloys, sonne and heire apparant vnto Philip Duke of Burgoyne, which Charles being then a widower, was counsailed to be a suter vnto King Edward to haue in mariage the Ladie Margaret, sister to the same king, a ladie of excellent beauty, and thought not vnwoorthy to match with the greatest prince of the world.

Anthony the Bassard of Burgoine, called the earle of the Roche, brother to y<sup>e</sup> said earle Charoloys, a man of great wit, courage, & valiance, was appointed pointed by his father Duke Philip to go into England in embassage about this tate, who being furnished for his estate, having in his company gentlemen and other expert in all feats of chivalry, and martiall prowes, to the number of 400. hoxles, toke ship, and arrived in England, where he was of the king and nobles honourably received. His message being declared, was joyfully heard of the king, the which by that assintie saw, how they mought be assured of a buckler against the French: the king therefore granted to the bastards request, and the said bastard openly in the kings great chamber contracted the said Lable Margarer, for, and in the name of his brother the Earle of Charoloys.

Walter Blunt made Baron, and Lord Mountioy.

The third of June, began a Parliament at Westmynster, wherein was refused to the kings hands, all manner of gifts that had bene given from the first day he toke possession of the Realme, to that time, except certaine things then excepted.

Also this yere in divers places of England, many men were arrested, and treason surmised against them, wherethrough many of them were put to death, and the other escaped for great sums of money: amongst the which sir Thomas Cooke, sir Iohn Plumer knights, Humfrey Heyford, and other Aldermen of London were arrested, and charged with treason, wherof they were acquite, but they lost of their goods to the king, to the value of 40000. markes, or moze, as some haue wrytten: and for example, the forenamed sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, was by one named Hawkins accused of treason, for the which he was committed to the Tower: his place in London leased by the Lord Rivers, and his Lady and servants clerly put out thereof. The cause was this: the forenamed Hawkins, came by on a season unto the said sir Thomas, requesting to lend him a 1000. markes upon good surety, whereunto he answered, that he would first know for whom it should be, and for what intent: at length understanding it should be for the use of Quene Margarer, he answered, he had no currant wares whereof any shift might be made without too much losse, and therefore required Hawkins to move him no further: for he intended not to deale withal, yet the said Hawkins required but one hundred pound, at length, and went without it, or the value of one peny, and never came againe to move him, which so rested two or thre yeres after, till the said Hawkins was cast in the Tower, and at length brought to the stake, called the Duke of Erce, Kers daughter (because he was the deviser of that torture) by meanes of which paine, he shewed many things, amongst the which the motion he had made to sir Thomas Cooke was one, by meanes whereof sir Thomas Cooke was troubled as ye haue heard, and one lury, by meanes of sir Iohn Fogge, indicted him of treason: after which, an Oyer determiner was kept in the Guildhall, in which tate with the Mayor, the Duke of Clarence, the earle of Marwike, the Lord Rivers, sir Iohn Fogge, with other of the kings counsel, to the which place the said sir Thomas was brought, & there arraigned upon life and death, where he was acquitted of the said indictment, and sent to the counter in Breadstreet, and from thence to the Kings bench : being acquitted, his wife got again possession of his house, the which she found in an euill plight : for the seruants of sir Iohn Fogge and the Lord Rivers had made haue of what they listed. Also at his place of Giddy hall in Essex, another fort had destroyed the deere in his parke, his conies, and fish, & spared not brasse, pewter, bedding, and all what they might carry : for the which might neuer one peny be gotten in recompence, nor sir T. Cooke be deliuered, till he had paid 8000. pound to the king, and 800. pound to the Duçene, and for that sir Iohn Markham knight, chiefe Justice of the pleas, determined somewhat against the kings pleasure (that the offence done by sir T. Cooke was no treason, but misprision, the which was no desert of death, but to be fined at the kings pleasure) the Lord Rivers and the Dutches of Bedford his wife procured that he lost his office afterward in the 12. yere of Edward the fourth.

Justice in Smithfield.

The marriage aforesaid concluded, the bastard of Burgoigne chalenged the lord Scales, brother to the Duçene, to fight with him, both on horse back and on foote : which challenge the lord Scales gladly accepted, the king causing lists to be prepared in west Smithfield of London for these champions, the length of 120. Tassers yards, and ten foote : and in breadth 80. yards and ten foote, double barred, five foet betwene the bars, the timber & workmanship wherof cost two hundred markes, besides faire and costly galleries for the ladies and other. At the which martiall enterpryse, king Edward himselfe with his nobility was present. The first day being the Thursday next after Corpus Christi day, they ran together with sharpe speares, and departed with equal honour. The next day they turneyed on horse backe, the lord Scales horse had on his chafron a long sharpe pike of Steele, and as the two champions coaped together, the same horse thrust his pike into the nostrils of the bastards horse, so that for very paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one side with his master, and the Lord Scales rode about him with his sword drawn in his hand, till the king commaunded the marshal to helpe by the bastard, who openly said, I cannot holde me by the clouds, for though my horse falle me, I wil not falle my incounter-companion, but the king would not suffer them to do any moze that day. The next morrow, the two noble men came into the field on foote, with two polares, and fought valiantly, but at the last the point of the poll-axe of the Lord Scales happened to enter into the sight of the bastards helme, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knes : but the king sodainely cast downe his warder, and then the marshall seuered them. The bastard not content with this chance, required the king of Justice, that he might perforce his enterpryse : the Lord Scales refused not : but the king calling to him the constable & the marshall, with the officers at armes, after consultation had, it was declared for a sentence definitive, by the Duke of Clarence then constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk then marshall, that if he would go forward with his attempted challenge, he must by the law of armes, be deliuered to his aduersary, in the same state and like like condition, as he stood when he was taken from him. The bastard bearing this iudgement, doubted the sequels of the matter, and so relinquished his challenge. Other challenges were done, and ballantly achieved by the Englishmen, which I passe over. Shortly after came sorrowfull tidings to the bastard, that his father Duke Philip was dead, and thereupon taking his leaue of king Edward, and his sister the new Dutches of Burgoigne liberally rewarded, returned to his brother the new Duke. His yere diuers persons being common Iuroys, such as at Assises were sworn for rewards, or fauour of parties, were iudged to ride from Newgate to the pillory in Coznehill with miters of paper on their heads, and then againe to Newgate: and this iudgement was giuen by the Maior of London.

Charles Duke of Burgoign desirous to see his new wife, wrote to king Edward, requiring him to send his sister ouer vnto him, according to the conditions passed betwene them.

King Edward on the other side not slackening the matter, first called a Parliament, which began at Westminster on the eight of May, wherein was granted two sisters and a disinny.

The 18. of June Margaret sister to king Edward the fourth, beganne her journey from the Wardrobe in London, toward her marriage with Charles Duke of Burgoigne: first she offered in the Church of Saint Paul, and then rode through the City, the earle of Warwick riding before her, with earles and barons a great number, the Dutches of Norfolk, with other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. And at her entry into Cheap, the Maior of London and his brethren the Aldermen presented her with a paire of rich basons, and in them an hundred pound of gold, and that night she lodged at the Abbey of Stratford, where the king then lay: from thence she toke her journey to Canterbury. The king riding after to see her shipping, on the first of July she toke the sea at Margate, and there toke leaue of the king her brother, and departed. There returned back again with the king, the Duke of Clarence, the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Warwick, Shrewsbury, & Northumberland. And there abode with her in the ship, the Lord Scales, the Lord Dacres her chamberlaine, sir Iohn Woodville, sir Iohn Howard, and many other famous Knights and Esquires: she was shipped in the new Ellen of London, and in her naup the Iohn of Newcastle, the Mary of Salisbury, and many other royall ships, and on the morrow landed at Sluce in Flanders, and as soone as her ship and company of ships were entered into the haven, there receiued her sir Simon de Lelien & the water bailly, in diuers boats & barks apparelled ready for her landing. The first estate that receiued her was the Bishop of Etright wel accompanied, & the countesse of Shorne bastard daughter to Duke Philip of Burgoigne, & with her many ladies & gentlewomen, and so proceeding in at the gate of the towne, the same towne was presented to her, she to be soueraigne lady thereof: also they gaue her 12. markes of gold Troy weight, the which was 200. pound of English monney, and so she proceeded through the towne to her lodging, euery householder standing in the street with a torch in his hand burning.

Lady Margaret the kings sister married to the Duke of Burgoigne.

On the moztow the olde Dutches of Burgoigne came to her, accompanied with many great estates. On the thirde of July came the Duke of Burgoigne to Sluce with twentie persons secretly, and was there openly affianced to the Lady Margaret, by the bishop of Salisbury and the Lord Scales, in presence of the Lord Dacre, the Dutches of Norfolk, the Lady Scales, and all the knights, Esquires, and Gentlewomen enuironing the chamber.

On the eight of July being Saturday, by the Duke of Burgoignes appointment, the Lady Margaret remoued by water to the Dame. And on the Sunday in the morning betwixt five and six of the clocke, the marriage was solemnized betwixt them by the Bishops of Salisbury and of Turney, there being present the old dutches of Burgoigne, the Lord Scales, the Lord Dacre, with the knights, Esquires, Ladies and Gentlewomen that came out of England: the great triumphs, feastings, thewes of pageants, with other strange deuises and iustings, were such as I haue not read the like, and would be ouer long in this place to set downe.

This yere many murmurous tales ranne in the City betwixen the Carle of Marwicke and the Quenes blood, the which Carle was euer had in great fauour of the commons of this land, by reason of the exceeding house-hold which he daily kept in all countreies where euer he sojourned or lay: and when he came to London, he held such an house, that five Dren were eaten at a breakfast, and euery Tauerne was full of his meat, so; who that had any acquaintance in that house, he should haue had as much sodden and rost as he might carpe vpon a long dagger.

On the morrow following, came the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Marwike, the bassarde Fauconbridge, with other to the number of foure thousand men. On the first daye of October the duke of Clarence, the Earle of Marwike, the archbishop of Poike, the lord of Saint Johns, with other entred the tower of London, and king Henrie being there prisoner nigh the space of nine yeres, they elected him to be their lawfull king, and forthwith rode with him through London to the Bishoppes pallace, where hee rested till the 13. of October, on which day hee went a pꝛocession crowned in Paules Church: the Earle of Marwike bare his traine, and the earle of Drford his sword, &c.

King Edward with the Lord Hastings, the lord Say, nine hundred Englishmen, and three hundred Flemmings, would haue landed in Essex, but there there the Earle of Driford brother put them off, and after hee landed soze weather-beaten at Ravenspoyne, within Humber on Holdernesse, and there rose on him Holdernesse me, whose captaine was sir Iohn Westerdale a priest, after cast into the Marthalsea at London. As King Edward passed the country, he shewed the earle of Northumberlands letters and scale, that sent for him, saying, that he came to claime no title of the crowne, but only his dukedome of Yorke, nor would not haue done afoze, but at the erecting of the earle of Warwicke, & cried in euery place, king Henry, & prince Edward, wearing an Estrich feather prince Edwards liuery. King Edward came to Nottingham, where sir William Stanley, sir William Norris, and diuers other brought him men, so that hee had then 4000. or moze. Then Edward marched toward Leicester, where the earle of Warwick and marques Mountacute had 4000. men, and would haue fought with king Edward, but that hee had receiued letters from the Duke of Clarence, that he should not fight untill he came. Whereupon hee keeping Leicester still, suffered Edward to march toward London. A little out of Warwicke the duke of Clarence with 7000 men meeting with king Edward, agreed to him and brake al the promises made in France. King Edward coming to London, by master Vrsuicke the Recorders means, and others, entred into the bishop of Londons palace by a posterne, and there toke king Henry and the archbishop of Yorke, and sent them both to the tower on Maundy thursday.

The Earle of Warwicke, the Duke of Excester, marques Mountacute, and the earle of Driford, with many knights, came with their host toward Barnet: wherefoze king Edward toke king Henry with him, and preoccupied the towne of Barnet all the night: the Earle of Warwicke and his retinue remained on the plaine without the towne, shooting guns one at the other. And in the morning being Easter day, and the 14. of Aprill, they fought in a thicke mist from fower of the cloke in the morning til ten, and diuers times the earle of Warwicks men supposed that they had got the victory of the field, but it happened that the earle of Drifords me had a scar with streames both before and behind on their liueries, and King Edwards men had the sun with streames on their liuery: whereupon the Earle of Warwicks men, by reason of the mist not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the Earle of Drifords men that were on their owne part, and then the earle of Driford and his men cried treason, and fled with eight hundred men. The marques Mountacute was priuily agreed with K. Edward, and had gotten on his liuery, but one of his brothers the Earle of Warwicks men espying this, fell vpon him and killed him.

The earle of Warwicke seeing his brother dead, and the Earle of Driford fled, lept on a horse to fly, and coming to a woode where was no passage, two of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked skin. Sir William Tyrrell knight was killed on the earle of Warwikes part. The Duke of Excester fought manfully and was dispoiled, wounded, & left for dead from seuen in the morning til fower of the cloke in the after-noon, and then being brought to a seruants house of his there-cruelly slaine.

At this time Quene Margaret, and Prince Edward her sonne had lien on the sea 17. daies letted with foule weather, and on Easter day at even they landed with their French pay at Weymouth, and so came to Excester, from thence to Tewkesbury, and pitched their field by Seneerne. Edward the fourth being come from London, fought with prince Edward at Tewkesbury on the fourth of May, toke Quene Margaret prisoner with prince Edward her sonne, whom cruelly he smote on the face with his gantlet, and after his servants slue him. Edmond Duke of Somerset, and sir Hugh Courtney fled from Prince Edward & lost him the field. There was slaine Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, Lord Iohn of Somerset, Lord Wenlocke, sir Edmond Hamden, sir William Whittingham, sir William Vaus, sir Nicholas Harvie, sir Iohn Deluis, sir William Filding, sir Iohn Leukenor, sir VV. Lirmonth, sir Iohn Vrman, sir T. Seamer, sir VV. Rowse, sir Thomas Henry. King Edward entring a Church in Tewkesbury with his sword drawn, a Priest brought the sacrament against him, and would not let him enter untill he had granted his pardon to these that follow: Edmond Duke of Somerset, Iohn Bouge Strother Lord of Saint Iohns, sir Humfrey Audley, sir Geruis of Clifton, sir VVilliam Grimesby, sir VVilliam Carie, sir Henry Rose, sir Thomas Tresham, sir VVilliam Newbrough, knights, Henry Tresham, VValter Courtney, Iohn Florie, Lewes Miles, Robert Iackson, Iames Gower sword bearer to Prince Edward, Iames Deluis sonne and heire to sir Iohn Deluis: all these, where they might haue escaped, carried in the Church (trusting in the kings pardon) from saturday till munday, when they were taken out and beheaded.

bassard.

About this time sir VValter VVroitle, and sir Geffrey Gates knights, governors of Calcis, sent sir George Broke knight from Calcis with thre hundred souldiers, to Thomas the bassard Fauconbridge, Captaine of the Earle of Warwikes pause, willing him to raise the countie of Kent, and to go to London, there to take king Henry out of the Tower, and then to go against King Edward.

The fourteenth day of May, Thomas the bassard with a riotous company of shipmen, and other of Essex and Kent, came to London, where being denied passage through the city, he set upon Bishops gate, Aldgate, London bridge &c. along the Thames side, shooting arrowes and guns into the city, fired the suburbs, and burnt more than 60. houses, wan the boltworks at Aldgate, and entered the city, but the porteclose being let down, such as had entered were slain, and then the citizens pursued the rest so far as Stratford and Blackwall, slaying many, and took many prisoners. Thomas the bassard went from London westward, as far as Kingstone upon Thames, to prosecute R. Edward, but the Lord Scales, with Nicholas Faunt Maioz of Canterbury, by faire words caused Fauconbridge to returne to Blackheath in Kent, from whence in the night he stole from the host with 600. horsemen to Rochester, and so to Sandwich, where he abode the kings coming.

The one and twentieth of May king Edward came to London with thirtie thousand men: and the same night king Henry was murdered in the Tower of London: On the morrowe he was brought through Coznehill, from the Tower with a great companie of men bearing weapons as they should haue led him to some place of execution, to S. Paules church in London, in an open coffin bare faced, where he bled: thence he was caried to the Blache Friers, and there bled: and thence to Chersey Abbey in a bote, where he was then buried, but since by king Richard the third, in the second yere of his raigne, removed to Windsor, where hee was buried without the chancell, at the south doore of the quire of Windsor chappell, where he was worshipped by the name of holy king Henrie: whose redde hat of velvet was thought to heale the head-ach of such as should put it on their heads, there he rested for a time, but nowe his tombe being taken thence, it is not (commonly) knowne what is become of his bodie.

Thus ended the king his transitorie life, hauing enjoyed as great prosperitie, as fauourable fortune could afford, and as great troubles on the other side, as the frowning coulde power out: yet in both states hee was patient, and vertuous, that hee maie bee a patterns of most perfect vertue, as hee was a worthie example of Fortunes inconstancie: he was plaine, bright, farre from fraude, wholie giuen to prayer, reading of Scriptures, and almes-deedes, of such integritie of life, that the Bishop which had bene his confessor, tenne yeres, auouched that he had not all that time committed anie mortall crime: So continent as suspicion of vnchast life neuer touched him: and ha-ving in Christmasse a shewe of yong women with their bare breastes laide out, presented before him, he immediately departed, with these wordes, fie, fie, for shame, forsooth you bee to blame: before his marriage hee liked not that women shoulde enter into his Court, and for this respect hee committed his two brethren by the mothers side, Iaspar and Edmond, to most honest and vertuous Prelates, to bee brought vp. So farre he was from couetousnesse, that when the executors of his uncle the Bishoppe of Winchester, surname the rich Cardinall, would haue giuen to him two thousand pounde, hee plainly refused it, willing them to discharge the will of the departed, and woulde scarcely condescende at length to accept the same summe of money toward the endowing of his Colledges in Cambridge and Eaton: he was so religiouslie affected (as the time then was) that on principall Holydaies, hee would weare sackcloth next his skinne. Wh he vsed none, but in most earnest matters these words: forsooth, and forsooth; he was so pittifull, that when coming from Saint Albons, hee saue the quarter of a traytour against his crowne ouer Cripple gate, he willed it to be taken awate, with these words: I will not haue anie Christian so cruellie handled for my sake; manie greate offences hee willinglie pardoned, and receiuing at a time a greate blowe by a wicked man, which compassed his death, hee onlie saide, forsooth, forsooth, yee doo folwie to smite a King annointed so. Another also which thrust him in the side with a sword, when hee was prisoner in the Tower, was by him pardoned, when hee was restored to his state and kingdome: not long before his death, being demaunded why hee had so long helde the Crowne of Englande vniustlie, hee replied, my Father was King of Englande, quettlie enioying the Crowne all his Reigne, and his father my Grandfere was also King of Englande; and I, euen a Child in my Cradle, was proclaymed and Crowned King without anie interruption, and so helde it fortie peeres well neere, all the States dooing homage vnto mee, as to my Auncellores; wherefore I maie saie with King David: The Lotte is fallen vnto mee in a faire grounde, yea, I haue a goodlie heritage, my helpe is from the Lorde which saucth the vprighte in hearte. Hee reigned eyght and thirte peeres, five monethes and odde dayes. And after his redemption of the crowne five monethes; he liued 52. peeres, hauing by his wife one only son, called Edward Prince of Wales, deceased as ye haue heard; hee was of seemly stature, of body slender, his face beautifull, of his owne naturall inclination, hee abhorred all the vices as well of the body as of the soule.

And nowe to returne to king Edward. At his comming to London, the Mayor, Aldermen and other citizens meeting him one mile without the Citie, to witte, betwixt Iseldon, and Sorse ditch, in the high waie hee made knights these Aldermen, Sir Iohn Stokton Mayor of London, Sir Ralph Verney, Sir Richard Lee, Sir Iohn Yong, Sir William Taylor, Sir George Ireland, Sir William Stocker, Sir Matthewe Philip, Sir William Hampton, Sir Thomas Stalbrok, Sir Iohn Crosby, Sir Bartlemew James, Sir T. o: Richard Vrsuicke, Recorder of London, all these he made knights, in reward of good seruice the Londoners had don to him. On the 24. day of May king Edward after he had made banarets, Sir Thomas Grey, Sir Richard Hastings, Sir Iohn Courtney, Sir Nicholas Latimer, Sir Ralph Hastings, Sir Roger Tegets, Sir Iohn Stanley, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Iohn Henningham, Sir William Stanley, &c. he toke his iourny into Kent, with all his army following the bastard, and other his complices to suppress the m, if they were in anie place assembled to resist him; but after they were once dispersed, they durst not shew the m again in armor, those onelie excepted that were withdrawne vnto Sandwiche with the bastard, which for the more parte were mariners, an 8. or 9. hundred, with the le he kept the town, hauing in the haven 47. ships great and smal vnder his gouernance; but the R. appoaching, they sent to him for pardon, which the king granted, and being being in the cite of Canterburie, he sent unto Sandwich his brother Richard duke of Gloucester, to receiue them to mercie, together with all the shippes, which they deliuered: whereupon king Edward not onlie pardoned the bassard, but made him knight, and Vice-admirall. The Lord Denham and Sir Iohn Fog, with other were left in Kent, to sit in iudgement of the rebels of Kent, Sussex, and Essex, whereof were a greate number punished by the Purse, some 200. marks, some 200. l. some more, some lesse. Thus king Edward returned out of Kent with much good, and little loue. Nicholas Fant spaior of Canterburie (that had serued the earle of Marwike, and had of late perswaded the bassard to depart from his offe, and diuers other of his countrymen) were hanged and quartered, and the heads of Spising and Quinten were set vpon Aldegate of London.

On the 4. day of June, George Neuell archbishop of Yorke, and brother to the late earle of Marwike, and the Marques Mountacute, was deliuered out of the Tower of London, and discharged of his imprisonment.

The 1. of July Edward the son of king Edward, was made prince of Wales, duke of Lancaster, and earle of Cornewall.

In the moneth of September Thomas the bassarde Fauconbridge, was taken at Southampton by Richard Duke of Gloucester, hee was conueied to the Castell of Middleham in Yorke shire, and there beheaded, notwithstanding that hee had the kings pardon, his head was sent to London, and set on London bridge.

Th. the bassard lost his head.

The earle of Penbroke and of Richmond fled into Bytaine.

The 12. of November the lady Anne the kings sister, was diuorced from Henry Holland duke of Excester, by meanes of her owne sute.

King Edward kept his Christmasse at Westminster, where hee with his queene on the same feast daie late crowned, and likewise on the Twelste daie the king was againe crowned, and went on procession crowned, but the queene was not then crowned, because she was neere her time of deliuerance, but she went on procession with him; the king kept his estate in the White-hall, with his Prelates and noble estates, where also dined the spaior of London, the aldermen, and manie of the wealthy citizens.

Also diuers other boznes brake out this yere, as at Leueham in Kent, and at Canterburie, called Spaelborn; at Cropdon in Surrey. Also 6. miles besides Dudley castle in a place called Hungerniele, which last when it betokeneth battaile, runneth foule, and troublly water, and when it betokeneth dearth or pestilence it runneth cleere, but that yere it ran foule. There is also a pit in Langley parke in Kent, which is alway full of water, be the weather neuer so dry, except against battel, and then it will be dry, and so it was this yere.

Ambassadors sent into Burgundy.

This yere were sent Ambassadors from king Edward to the Duke of Burgoigne, who landed at Bridges on the 2. of Aprill, where they were honorably received without the tolene by the lord Grantehouse.

The names of the Ambassadors were, Sir John Scot knight marshall of Caleis, master William Harclese Secretarie to the king, master John Russell Doctor and Archdeacon of Barkshire, master Richard Marten Archdeacon of London, sir John Yong knight, and merchant of London, and sir John Crosby merchant of London: on the 4. of Aprill they were conveyed on horsebacke to the Dukes lodging, &c. They passed from thence to the Duke of Brittain, to haue gotten there the two earles of Penbrooke and of Richmond.

Archbishop of Dorke spoiled, and sent to Wilson.

George Neuill Archbishop of Dorke, being at Windsor with king Edward on hunting, the king promised the Archbishop to come to the Dore (a place in Hartfordshire, which the Archbishop had purchased and builded commodiously) there to hunt and make merrie with him, whereupon the Archbishop taking his leaue of the king, went home to his manor of the Dore, and there made great provision for the king, and sent for much plate that he had hid, at the time of Barnet and Tewkesburie fieldes, and besides this, borrowed much of his friendes, and purueled for the king for two or thre daies meate, drinke, and lodging, as royally as hee could: but the date before the king had promised to haue come to the Dore, the king sodainly sent for the Archbishop to come to Windsor, where he was arrested of Treason, that he should helpe the earle of Dorset, and so sent to Caleis, and to Hames, where he continued long after prisoner: all which time the king kept the Archbishopricke in his owne handes. In this meane while Sir William Par knight, and Sir Thomas Vaughan Esquire, and other were sent to the Dore to seale all his goods for the king, which came there to the summe of 20000. l. and all other lordshippes and lands that the said Archbishop had within England, and all his stufte and riches.

Edward at this time brake the bishops miter, that had many rich stones, and made thereof a crowne for himselfe. Thomas Bylling chiefe Justice of the kings bench, and so continued till the first of Richard the third.

John Vere earle of Oxford kept St. Michaels
mount.

Also Sir Io. Vere earle of Oxford, that had withdrauen himselfe from Barnet fiede, first into Scotland, after into France, then getting much goods on the Sea, landed in the West Countrey, and entered St. Michaels Mount, with 77. men, the last of September, whereon he was, by the kings appointment, besieged by Bodrigan and other, but with such fauor, that the earle renouallled the Mount. Then was Richard Fortescue Esquire for the bodie, and theriff of Corneshall sent thither to continue the siege, and king Edward sending pardons to the earles men, so long praised with them, that at the last if the Earle had not submitted himselfe to king Edward, he had bene taken of his owne men, and so Fortescue entring the Mount the 15. of Februarie, found him selfe prouough there to haue serued them till Midsummer after: John Vere earle of Oxford, the Lord Beaumont, two brothers of the saide Earle, and Thomas Clifford were brought prisoners to the king. The earle of Oxford was sent prisoner to Swines, where he remained so long as this king reigned. In all all which time the Lady his wife might neuer come to him, or had anie thing to lue vpon, but that people of their charities would giue her, or what shee got by her needle.

In the moneth of September Lewes de Bruges Lord Gzanthuse, came into Englande from Charles Duke of Burgoigne, and on the thirtenth of October was created Earle of Winchester openlie in the Parliament chamber.

The sixte of October beganne a Parliament at Westminster by authority, whereby an aide was graunted to the king, towarde the charge of his Warres, which was leued of mens landes, as well of Lordes as of other.

An. reg. 13.
Parliament at Westminster.

The Duke of Burgoigne hauing great warres with the French king, sent Embassadors into Englande to requite king Edward his brother in lawe to make warre on the French king, vnto the which request king Edward easily granted, because hee wished to be reuenged on the French king, as of his enemye, for aiding the Earle of Marwike, Quene Margaret and her sonne Prince Edward, and their complices: whereupon he promised and also determined in the beginning of the next yere, to bring a great armie ouer to Caleis, and to invade the kingdome of France. And forthwith with all diligence prepared all thinges readie for his iourney, making many shiffes for the prouision of money to serue his turne. And because the last yere great summes of money were granted him by the Parliament, he deuised this shifte, to call asoforeshim a great number of the wealthiest sort of the people of his Realme, and to them declared his neede, and the requisite causes thereof, hee demaunded of euery of them some portion of money, which they sticke not to giue, and therefore the king willing to shewe that this their liberalitie was verie acceptable to him, hee called this grant of money, a Benenolence, notwithstanding that many grudged thereat, and called it a Paleuolence: but the king vsed such gentle meanes towarde them for their assistance in his necessitie, that they could not otherwise doe, but frankely yelde and giue him competent sums, therewith he prepared a great armie.

king Ed. prepared for his iourney into France.

This yere Henry Holland the Duke of Excester was found dead in the sea betwene Douer and Caleis, but howe he came there the certaintie could not be knowne.

King Edward hauing prepared his armie, led the same to Douer, from thence to crosse the seas to Caleis. The force that passed with him at this present was the greatest that euer came into France, most of them being horsemen, all in very good order well armed. All the nobles of the realme were there, a fewe excepted, they were fiftene hundred men of armes very well mounted, and the most of them barbed and richly trapped, after the manner of the French warres, and well accompanied with horsemen of their retinue, they were at the least fiftene thousand archers on horsebacke, and a great number of footemen and others, as well to pitch their tentes, whereof they were well furnished, as also to attend vpon their artillery, and inclose their campe, and in all their army they had not one pledge. Besides this, were 3000. Englishmen appointed to land in Bypaine.

King Edward
three weekes in passing between Douer and Caleis.

When king Edward came to Douer, the duke of Burgoygne to helpe his passage, sent 500. Boates of Holland, and Zeland, called cuts, which are flate and lowe, builde vertie commodiously for transporting of horses: but notwithstanding all this helpe they had from the Duke, and all the king of Englande coulde commande himselte, hee was aboute thre weekes in passing betweene Douer and Caleis, one ship of Cwe toke 2. or 3. of his small passengers. Before king Edward embarqued, he sent from Douer to the king of France one Herault alone called Garter a Norman borne, who brought a letter of defiance from the king of Englande, in vertie good language, and so excellentlie well penned, that mine Authour was perswaded it was neuer Englishmans doing. The contentes whereof were, that the king shoulde yelde unto him the realme of France, being his inheritance, to the end he might restore the cleargy and nobility to their ancient liberty, ease them of the great charges they sustained, and deliuer them of the miseries they were in, which if he refused to do, he protested what great mischief should ensue thereof, in maner and forme as in such cases is accustomed. The king read the letter softly to himselte, and afterwards all alone withdrew himselte into a Wardrobe, and commanded the Herault to be brought to his presence, to whome he made this answer,

First, that he knew well that the king of England had not passed the seas of his owne free motion, but by the perswasion of the duke of Burgundie, and the communalitie of England.

Secondly, that the summer was now almost past, and that the duke of Burgoygne was returned from Hunz, as a man discomfited and bitterlie vnfurnished of all things.

Thirdly, as touching the Constable (of France) he knew well (he said) that the intelligence with the king of England, because he had married his daughter: but would deceiue the king his master as he had him, notwithstanding all the great benefites that he had receiued of him, which hee then rehearsed, adding thereunto, that the saide Constable mente to liue in continuall dissimulation, and entertaine euerie man to make his profite of him.

Last of all, he alleaged to the Herault diuers reasons to perswade the king his master to peace, and gaue him with his owne hand 300. crownes, promising him a thousand more if the peace were concluded: further openly he gaue him for a present, a goodly peece of crimson velvet of thirtie els. The Herault answered, that he would travel the best he could for peace, and thought the king his master would easilie be wonn thereunto: but he willed the king of France, to send an Herault to the English campe to demand a safe conduct for certain Ambassadors, that hee woulde sende to the king of England, and to directe his letters to the Lord Howard, or to the Lord Stanley, and to himselte also to conueie his Herault. At one time in a maner both the king of England landed at Caleis, and the duke of Burgoygne departed from before Hunz, who in great haste rid straight to Caleis, to the said king with a very smal train, for he had sent his army to spoile the Countrey of Barrois and Lozaine. The king of England departed from Calais in company of the duke, and passed through Bolloigne, & from thence marched to Peronne, where the duke gave the Englishmen but cold entertainment, for he caused the gates to be straightlie kept, and would suffer but few to enter, so that the greatest part of them lodged in the fields. After they were come to Peronne the Constable of France sent to the duke of Burgoyne one of his servants, by whome he excused himselfe for the withholding of S. Quintins, alleaging that if he had restored it hee could haue stood him in no steele in the Realme of France, for he should utterlie haue lost his credite and intelligence, but now seeing the king of England was come ouer in person, he promised to do hereafter all that the duke should command him, whereof the better to assure him, hee sent him a letter of credite to the declaration of the duke. Furthermoze he gaue the duke his faith in writing, to serue and succor him, his friends, and confederates, as well the king of England as others, against all men none excepted.

The duke deliuered the King of Englande his letter, and all the matter of credite, adding somewhat thereto of his owne heade: for hee assured the King, that the Constable would deliuer into his handes, both Saynt Quintins, and all his other places, which the King easilie beleueed, partly because hee had married the Constables piece, and partly because hee sawe him in so greate feare of the king of France, that hee thought hee durst not sayle his promise made to the Duke and him: and the Duke beleueed it also. But the Constable ment nothing lesse, for the feare hee was in of the French king was not so great that it could force him thus far, but he used still his wonted dissimulation.

The king of Englande reioycing at this message sente by the Constable, departed from Peronne with the duke of Burgoyne, towarde Saint Quintins, whereunto when hee approched, a greate Bande of Englishmen ranne before, thinking that the Belles should haue beene roong at their coming, and that the Citizens would haue receyued them with Crosse and Holie water, but when they dyelwe nare to the Towne, the Artillerie shot, and the souldeours issued forth to the skirmish, both on Horsebacke and on foote, so that two or thre Englishmen were slayne, and some taken: and in this state returned they in greate rage to their campe, murmuring against the Constable.

The next morning the duke of Burgondy would haue taken his leaue of the king of Englande to depart to his army in Barrois, promising to doe manvales in his fauor.

The French king sent a seruant of the Lorde Halles in the likenesse of an Herault, with a coate made of a Trumpets Banner, to the English campe, where when hee came, hee was brought to a Tente, and after dinner talked with the king: his message was chiefly grounded vpon the greate desire the king had of long time to bee in peace with the king of Englande, saying further, that since hee was crowned king of France, hee neuer had attempted anie thing against the king of Englande or his Realme.

Secondlie, he excused himselfe, for receiuing in times past the earle of Warwicke into his dominions, saying, that he did it only against the duke of Burgoigne and not him.

Further, he declared that the said duke of Burgoigne had for no other cause called him into Fraunce, but that by the occasion of his comming, he might conclude a better peace for himselfe with the king: and if happilie anie other furthered the matter, it was onelie to amend the broken estate of the ir owne affaires, and for their owne private commoditie: but as touching the king of Englands good successe, they were altogether careles thereof. He put him also in minde of the time of the yere, aheadging that winter approached, and likewise the great charges he sustained.

Lastlie hee saide, that notwithstanding a great number in Englande desired warre with Fraunce, yet if the king of Englande incline to peace, the king for his parte would condescende to such conditions as hee doubted not but hee and his Realme would allowe of: Finally, hee demaunded a safe conduct for certaine Ambassadors, to come well enformed of his masters pleasure.

The king of Englande and part of his nobles liking these ouertures better well, graunted to the Heraulde of Fraunce, as large a safe conduct as hee demanded, and gave him foure Nobles of Golde for a rewarde. He also sent an Englishe Heraulde with him to bring the like safe conduct. And in the next Morning in a Village nere to Amience, the Commissioners of both Princes mette, beeing these. For the king of Fraunce, the baronne of Bourbon Admirall of France, the Lord of Saint Pierre, and the Bishop of Carcuer, called Heberge: And for the king of Englande, the Lord Howard, one Challenger, and Doctor Morton. Many Articles of peace were treated of, but the last resolutions were these: That the French king should be paie to the king of Englande presentlie before his departure out of France, seuentie thousand Crownes, that the Dolphine should marrie king Edwardes eldest daughter, and that she should haue the Duchie of Guien, for her maintenance, or five thousand Crownes yerelie to be paid in the Tower of London, the space of nine yeres, which terme expired, the Dolphine should peaceablie enjoy the reuenues of the whole Duchie of Guien; and then the king of France to be cleerelie discharged of all paymentes to the king of England. Further it was decreed, that the two Princes should meet together, and bee sworn to the treatie, which meeting was obserued in a Towne called Picquigny, on the 29. of August.

The king of England upon receit of his mony, departed toward Caleis in great hast, fearing the duke of Burgoignes malice, and his subiects.

King Edward
returning into England, landed at Dover.

At his departure he left for Hostages with the king of France, till his returne into England, the Lord Howard, and the master of his Horse called Sir John Cheyney. King Edward tooke Shipping at Caleis, and landed at Dover, and was receiued on the Blackheath by the Maior of London and his brethren in scarlet, and 500. commoners, all clad in Purrey, and so conueied to London through the city to Westminster, on the 28 of September.

The French king to compasse his purpose for the getting of the Constable into his handes, toke truce with the Duke of Burgoigne for nine yeres, as a contractour in the league, and not as a Prince alie. King Edward of Englande advertised hereof, sent ouer Sir Thomas Mountgomery to the French king offering to passe the seas againe the next sommer to aid him, and to make warre on the duke of Burgoigne, so that the French king shoulde paie to him 50000. Crownes for the losse which he should sustaine in his custome, by reason that the wooles of Calais, could haue no vent: and also paie halfe the charges, and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of war. The French king thanked king Edward for his offer: but hee alleaged that the truce was already concluded, so that hee coulde not attempt any thing against him, without reproch to his honor: so Sir Thomas Mountgomery was with plate dispatched. There returned with him the Lord Howard, and Sir Iohn Cheyney, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into Englund.

The eighteenth of Aprill, were inhaunted to the honor of knighthode, after the custome of Englund, in the time of peace, his eldest sonne Edward prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, and earle of Chester, his seconde sonne the Duke of Yorke, and with them the earle of Lincolnes sonne and heire, the Duke of Suffolke, the Lord Thomas Grey the quenes sonne, and Richard his brother: the earle of Shrewsburie: the earle of Wilshire, Master Edward Woodville: the Lord Neuill: the Lord Barkleys sonne and heire: the Lord Audeleys sonne and heire: the Lord Saint Amand: the Lord Stanley sonne and heire: the Lord Sturtons sonne and heire: the Lord Hastings sonne and heire: the Lord Ferrers of Chartleys sonne and heire: Master Harbert brother to the earle of Denbroke, Master Vaughan Brian chiefe Iudge: Littleton one of the Iudges of the Common pleas, Master Bodringham, Master Brian Stapleton, Kneut, Pilkinton, Ludlow, Charleton, &c. The same date the king created the Lord Thomas Marques Dorset before dinner, and so in the habit of a Marques aboue the habite of his knighthode, he beganne the table of knightes in Saint Edwardes Chamber. At that time hee ordained that the kinges chamberlaine shoulde go with the ancient and well nurtred knight to advertise and teach the order of knighthood, to the esquiers being in the baine. The king himselfe came in person and did honor to al the company with his noble counsell.

King Edward hauing established all thinges in good order, both within his Realme and without, was yet troubled in his minde, for that the earle of Richmond, one of the blood of king Henry the first on the mothers side, was alive, and at libertie in Bytaine: therefore he sent ouer to Francis duke of Bytaine, one Doctor Scillington, and other Ambassadors laden with no small sum of golde. These Ambassadors declaring their message, affirmed that the king their master, would to haue the earle of Richmond onlie to soine with him in alliance by marriage, and so to plucke by al the remnants of discord, betwixt him and them of the contrary faction. The duke thought at the first, that king Edward would glue to the earle his eldest daughter the lady Elizabeth in marriage, he therefore consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English orators a great sum of money:

money: but ere they were embarqued with their pray, the Duke being aduertised, that the Earle of Richmond was not so earnestly sought for, to be coupled in marriage with king Edwards daughter, as to haue his head parted from his bodie with an axe, and therefore caused his treasurer Peter Landoyse to conuey the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuary at S. Malo, where the English Ambassadors then lay, staying for a conuenient winde: who complained that they were euill vsed to be spoiled both of their money and merchandise: yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into sanctuarie through their owne negligence, after that they had retriued him, they were answered that the earle should be safely kept, either in sanctuarie, or else as a prisoner in the Dukes house, and thus the king purchased for his money, the keeping of his money for a little time.

The 2. day of Nouember was bozne the kings daughter named Anne at Westminster.

King Edward was somewhat displeased with the chance about the Earle of Richmond, but trusting that the D. of Bypaine would according to promise keepe him from doing any grieuance to him, put all doubts thereof out of his minde, and began to study how to keepe a liberall Princely house, and thereupon stozing his chesles with money hee employed no small portion in good house keeping.

John Duke of Norfolke deceased, on the tuesday after the feast of the Epiphanie, the 15. of E. 4.

An. reg. 16.
Order of Saint Georges feast.

This yere King Edward kept the feast of S. George, and order of the Cartier at Windsor in most royall manner, first on the saturday before none, the king being Soueraigne with the knights of the order, entered the chapter within the castle, which Chapter was also continued in the afternoon, in this manner, towards euensong time, being all mounted on horsebacke in their habites of blew, rode to the chapter, from whence they went to the quire on foot, where they remained while euensong was done, and then rode againe to the Castle (in their habites as afoze) where they had their voide of spectacles, &c.

On Sunday morning, the Soueraigne with the knights rode to mattens, which being ended, they entered the chapter, from whence they went to the Deans house to breakfast, and after to the quire againe euery man to his own stall. Then came the Quene with the Lady Elizabeth her eldest daughter, the Dutchesse of Suffolke the kings sister, the Lady Marchionesse of Pontague, the Lady Marchionesse of Dorset, the lady Hastings, &c. all in one liuery of murrey embzodered with garters, except the Marchionesse of Pontague, who rode in a gowne of silke, and these Ladies were placed in the rode last. And in the same order and habite came the Soueraigne, and knights, with the Quene and her Ladies in the after none to euensong. The King this day dined in his great chamber, on whose right hand sate Richard Bewchamp bishop of Salisbury, Chancellor of the order, and on the left hand the D. of Clarence, and the D. of Suffolke. At a side table sate the Marquesse of Dorset, the Carles of Arundale, Northumberland, and Essex, the L. Maltrauers, the Earle Dowglas, the the Lordes Dudley, Ferrers, and Howard, and Sir Iohn Afkeley knight all on one side. And at a table on the other side, sate Maister Dudley Deane of Saint Georges chappell, and with him all on one side, the Chanons of the same chappell in their mantles of murrey, and rundlet of S. George.

On the Sunday the Soueraigne and knights of the order entred the chapter, where they had a short communication, fro whence they went to the quire, where every knight stood before his stall whiles the king had offered a rich sute of vestments, and certaine coapes of the same sute, which the deane receined: that done, the k. went to his stall, and every knight sate him downe in their owne stals, till the offertory, and then the Marques Dorset and the D. of Suffolke offered the sword of Iohn Mowbray late D. of Suffolke deceased, the lordes Maltrauers and Howard, his helme: which being done, & obellance made, every knight stood before their stals, while the k. had offered, and then euerie knight offered according to his stall, to wit, the D. of Clarence, the Marques Dorset, the Duke of Yorke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Essex, and the D. of Suffolke, the Earle of Northumberland, the Earle of Dowglas, the L. Maltrauers, and the L. Howard, the L. Dudley, the Lord Ferrers, Sir Iohn Atley. The masse being ended, they went to the chapter, and thus the feast was ended, from the which were absent of the order out of the Realme, the k. of Sicell, the king of Portugal, the D. of Burgoyne, the D. of Urbin, the Lord Rivers, the lord Scrope, the lord Dursle. Absent within the Realme, the Prince, the D. of Gloucester, the Duke of Buckingham, the lord Hastings, and sir William a Par.

This yere Charles D. of Burgundy was slaine by the Switzers, before the towne of Nancy in Loraine, after whose death the French k. won all the townes which the said D. had holden in Picardy and Artois, and because the towne of Boloigne, and county of Bolongnos appertained by right of inheritance unto the L. Bertram de la Toure Earle of Aunergne, the French king bought of him his right and title in the same, and recompenced him with other lands in the county of Fforestis, and in other places. And because the forenamed towne and county were holden of the earledome of Artois, he changed the tenor, and auowed to helde the same towne and county of our lady of Boloigne, and thereof did homage in the great church of Boloigne, offering there an heart of gold, weping 2000. crownes, ordaining further, that his heires and successors at their entrie into their estates, by themselves or their deputies, should offer an heart of like waight and valew, as a reliefe and homage for the same towne and country.

This yere T. Burdet an esquire of Arrow in Warwickshe, son to sir Nicholas Burdet (who was great butler of pormandy in Henrie the firsts daies) was beheaded (as was said) for a word spoken, in this sort. k. Edw. in his porgresse hunted in T. Burdets parke at Arrow, and slew many of his deere, amongst the which one was a white bucke, whereof Th. Burdet made great account, & therefore when he vnderstood thereof, he wished the bucks head in his belly that moued the king to kill it. Which tale being told to the king, Burdet was apprehended and accused of treason, for wishing the bucks head hoyns & all in the kings belly.

belly. This was the report, and true it is (though some have said the contrary) that there was a park at Arrow; for king Edward the third, in the seventh yere of his raigne, gaue licence to Rob. Burdet to inclose his wood of Arrow into his parke (as appeareth by patten in record:) And the Record also sheweth that the saide Thomas Burdet was accused of poysoning, forcerie and inchantment, for the which he was attainted, by parliament condemned, drowne from the Tower of London to Tibborne, and there beheaded, and then buried in the Grey Friars church at London. This Thomas Burdet (by licence obtained of Edward the fourth in the twelfth yere of his raigne) alienated his lands from his eldest sonne, and true heire, to others at his pleasure, whereof he after soze repented him: And being drowne from the Tower toward his ende (as is afore shewed) selling his said eldest sonne in west Cheape, ouer against the hospitall of Thomas Becket, he procured himselfe to be staked, and there asked his sonne forgiveness, confessing himselfe grieuouse to haue offended God, in wronging him of his inheritance, which he toke to be the cause that God had so iustly plagued him, by the Princes pleasure, to come to such an ende.

Parliament
at Westminster, with the attainder of George D. of Clarence.

King Edward kept his royall feast of Christmas at Westminster.

The 15. of January king Edward the fourth solemnized the matrimoniall feast of his son Richard the Duke of Yorke, and the Lady Anne daughter and sole heire to Iohn Mowbray Duke of Norfolk with great solemnitie. By which marriage, the said Richard was created Duke of Yorke and Norfolk, Earle marshall, Warren and Pottingham.

The 16. day of January began a Parliament at Westminster, wherein George D. of Clarence king Edwards brother, was attainted of treason: In the which attainder (which I haue read) is declared, that the said George Duke of Clarence, against the king his soueraigne Lord, had caused diuers his seruants to informe the people, that Thomas Burdet his servant (which was lawfully and truly attainted of treason) was wrongfully put to death. To his seruants of such disposition he gaue large sums of money, venison, &c. therewith to assemble the kings subiects, to feast them, and then to induce them to beleue, that the saide Burdet was wrongfully executed. He also by such his seruants, laboured to make the people beleue that the king wrought by Magicke, and used the craft to poyson his subiects, such as him pleased, to the great disclander of the king, and encouraging his subiects against him. And ouer that, the said D. bring in full purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the regaltie and crowne of England, and cleerely in opinion to put aside from the same for ever, the king and his heires, vpon one the falsest and most vnnatural coloured pretence that man might imagine, falsely and vntruly published, that the king was a bastard, and not legitimate to raigne. And to continue this his most malicious and traitterous purpose after this seditious language among the people, he induced diuers of the kings natural subiects to be sworn vpon the blessed sacrament, to be true to him and his heires, none exception reserved of their allegiance: and after the same oth so made, he shewed to many, that the king had taken his liuelode from him, and his men were disher-

ted,

ted, but he would indenor to get them their inheritance, as hee would do his owne: hee thewed also, that the king intended to consume him, in like sort as a candle consumeth in burning, whereof hee would in brieft quite him. And over this, the saide Duke got an eremplication under the great seale of Henry the first late king, wherein was contayned, that if the saide Henry and Edward his sonne died without issue male, that the said Duke and his heires should bee kings, &c. Thus much for his attaindoz.

An. reg. 18.

And on the 11. of March, after hee had offered his owne masse penie in the tower of London, hee made his ende in a vessel of Spalme sey, and was after buried at Tetoksburie, by his wife sometime daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, which being with child died of poison but a little before him.

This George Duke of Clarence left behind him two yong infants begot on his wife, the daughter of Richard earle of Marwike, which children succeeded their ancestozs in semblable euill chance: for Edward his heire, whom king Edward had created earle of Marwike, was 24. yeres after in the time of Henry the 7. attainted of treason, and on the tower hill lost his head: And Magaret his sole daughter, married to sir Richard Pole knight, and by Henry the 8. restored to the earldome of Salisburie, was attainted 62. yeres after her father had suffered, and was in the tower beheaded: in whose person died the surname of Plantaginet. This yere was a great mortality and death of the pestilence, not onlie in London, but in diuers partes of the realme, which began in the latter end of September, in the yere last before passed, and continued all this yere til the beginning of Nouember, which was about 14. monethes, in the which space died innumerable of people in the said cite and else where.

This yere king Edward more then he was accusdmed, began to search for the seitures of penall lawes and statutes, as well of the chiefe of his nobilitie, as of other gentlemen, being propretioꝝ of great possessions or abundant-lie furnished with goods, likewise of merchants, and other inferioꝝ persons: by reason whereof, it was of all men iudged that he would prooue hereafter a sore and rigorous prince among his subjects: but this his new inuented practise, and couetous meaning (by reason of foraine affaires, and abridgement of his daies in this transitoꝝ life, which were within two yeres after consumed) toke some but no great effect.

Ambassadors were sent to and fro betwixt the kinges of Englande and of

France, and still the French king fed the king of England with faire words, putting him in hope to match his sonne and heire the Dolphin with the Lady Elizabeth daughter to king Edward, according to the conclusions of agreement had and made priuily betwixt them, although in very deede hee meant nothing lesse: his embassadours euer made excuses if anie thing were amisse, and he vled to send change of Embassadours, so that if those which had bene here afore, and were returned, had saide, or promised any thing (though they were authorized so to do) which might turne to their masters hinderance, the other that came after mought excuse themselves by ignorance of that matter, affirming that they wanted commission once to talke or meddle with that matter, or if he perceiued that any thing was like to be concluded contrarie to his minde, for a shift, he would call his Embassadours home in great haste, and after send an other with new instructions, nothing depending on the old. Thus the French king by cloaking his inwarde determinate purpose, with great dissimulation and large promises, kept himselfe in friendship with the king of England, til he had wrought a great part of his will against the young Dukes of Burgoigne, which R. Edward would not haue suffered if hee had put any great doubt in the French kings faire promises, considering that the Crowne of France was in this meane time so much mozeased in dominions, to the great reinforcement of that Realme.

On the 9. of Nouember was bozne king Edwards thirde daughter, named Briget at Eltham, and was christened in the chappell there by the Bishop of Chichester.

James king of Scots sent into England Ambassage, for to haue the Ladie Cicely King Edwards second daughter, to be married to his eldest son James Prince of Scotland, Duke of Rothesey, and Earle of Carlike. King Edward and his Councell, perceiuing that this affinitie should bee both honorable and profitable to the realme, did not onely grant to this his desire, but also before hand disbursed certaine sums of money, to the intent that the marriage should hereafter neither be hindered nor broken, with condition that if the said marriage proceeded not, then the prouost & merchants of the towne of Edenborow, should be bound for repayment of the saide summe againe. But King James was a man wedded to his owne will so much, that he could not abide any that would speake contrary to his fancie, by meanes whereof, diuers of the Nobilitie of his Realme were greatly troubled, amongst whom Alexander D. of Albany, brother to king James being exiled into France, & passing through England, tarried with king Edward, and vpon occasion moued him to make warre against his brother the saide king James, for that he forgetting his othe, promise and affinitie concluded with king Edward, caused his subjects to make roades into the English borders. King Edward set on by the Duke of Albanie determined to invade Scotland, with an armie: hereupon all the winter season hee mustred his men, rigged his shippes, and left nothing vnprovided for such a iourney, so that in the beginning of the yeere, all things for the warre was in a readinesse: towards the charges whereof, king Edward had borrowed many great sums of money, amongst other, the Citizens of London granted him 5000. markes, which was repaid to them againe in the next yere following.

This yere king Edward created William Lord Barkeley Viscount Barkeley at Grenewich.

King Edward appointed to be his chieftaine of his host toward Scotland, and lieutenant generall, Richard Duke of Gloucester, and with him were adioyned as associates, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas L. Stanley Lord Steward of the kings house, the L. Louel, the L. Graystoke, and divers other noble men, and worthy knights. These came to Alnetwike in Northumberland about the beginning of the moneth of July, where they marshalled their host: The forewarde was led by the Earle of Northumberland, vnder whose standert were the Lordes Scrope of Bolton, sir John Middleton, sir John Dichfield and other, and souldiers to the number of 6700. In the middle ward was the Duke of Gloucester, and with him the D. of Albany, the L. Louel, the L. Graystoke, sir Edward Wooduile, and other to the number of 5800. The L. Neuil was appointed to follow with 3000. The Lordes Stanley led the wing on the right hand of the Dukes battell with 4000. men. The Lord Fitz Hugh, sir William a Par, sir James Harington with the number of 2000. guided the left wing. And besides these, 1000. to attend the ordinance. This royall armie came sodainly by the water side to the towne of Berwike, & entered the towne: but Earle Bothwell captaine of the Castle, would in no wise deliuer it: wherefore the captaines planted a strong siege round about it. The two dukes and all the other souldiers (except the Lord Stanley, sir John Elkington treasurer of the kings house, sir William a Par and foure thousand men left to keepe the siege before the castle) departed toward Edenborough, and in marching bent many townes and bastilles. King James kept himselfe within the Castle of Edenborough. The Duke of Gloucester entered the towne, and at the speciall desire of the Duke of Albany, saued the towne, and the inhabitants from fire, blond, and spoile, taking onely such presentes as they offered to him and his captaines. The Lords of Scotland lying at Haddington, on the second of August wrote to the Duke of Gloucester, requiring that the marriage betwixt the Prince of Scotland and K. Edwards daughter might be accomplished, according to the covenants: and further, that a peace from thenceforth might be concluded betwene both realmes. The Duke of Gloucester answered, that for the marriage he knew not his brothers pleasure, but hee required restitution of all the money pressed out in loane vpon the same marriage: and for peace he would agree to none, except the Castle of Berwike might be to him deliuered. The Scots excused the matter touching the repaiment of the money, for that the time of the contract of the saide marriage was not yet come: and as touching the Castle of Berwike, they affirmed it to appertaine to the realme of Scotland as of olde inheritance. The same time the Archbishop of S. Andrews, the bishop of Dunkill, the Earle of Argile, Lord Cambell, and Andrew Lord of Anandall Chancellor of Scotland, wrote to the duke of Albany a solemne instrument signed and sealed with the seals, concerning a gene-call pardon to him and his seruants vpon certain conditions to be granted, so reasonable, that the duke of Albany willingly accepted of the same: but before he departed, he promised the duke of Gloucester to do and performe all that sooner before he had sworne, and promised to king Edward: and for performance hereof, he againe toke a corporall othe, and sealed a writing at Leuington the third of August.

After he was restored, the Lords of Scotland proclaimed him lieutenant of Scotland: and not long after the castle of Berwick was deliuered to the Lord Stanley and other, where the duke of Gloucester made Sir T. Molineux knight banaret. The duke of Albany also caused the prouost and burgesles of Edinburgh to become bound for the repayment of the money lent by king Edward. And then the duke of Gloucester returned to Sherebhton, &c.

King Edward so greatly fauored William Hariot Mayor of London, that he toke him with certaine of his brethren the Aldermen, and Commons of the citie of London, into the forrest of Waltham, where was ordained for them a pleasant lodge of greene boughes, in the which lodge they dined, with greete chere, and the king would not go to dinner til he saw them serued. After dinner they went a hunting with the king, and slew many deere, as well red as fallow, whereof the king gaue vnto the Mayor and his company good plentie, and sent vnto the Ladie Mayorelle and her sisters the Aldermens wiues, two harts, sixe bucks, and a tunne of wine to make them merry with, which was eaten in the Drapers Hall.

King Edward held his feast of the nation of Christ in his manor of Eltham, and kept his estate all the whole feast in his great chamber, and the Quene in her chamber, where were daily more then 2000. persons serued.

The same yere on Candlemas day, he with his Quene went on procession from S. Stephens chappell into Westminster hall, accompanied with the earle of Anguise, the Lord Grey and sir James Liddall Ambassadors from Scotland, and at his proceeding out of his chamber he made sir Richard Wood under treasurer of England, and sir William Catesby, one of the iustices of the Common place, knights.

An. reg. 23.

Although king Edward reioyced much that his businesse was come to good conclusion with the Scots, yet hee was nowise soe disquieted in his minde towards the French king, whome hee now perceived to haue dallied with him, as touching the agreement of the marriage to be had betwixt the Dolphine and his daughter Elizabeth: for the Lord Howard being returned out of France, certified the king of his owne knowledge, that he being present, saw the Lady Margaret of Austrich daughter to the duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Frederike, receiued into France with great pompe and realtie, and at Ambois to the Dolphine contracted and espoused. King Edward highly displeased with such double dealing of the French king, called his nobles together, and opened vnto them his griefes, who promised him for redress thereof to be readie with all their powers, to make warres in France at his pleasure and appointment. But whilst he was busie in hande to make his pursuance for warres thus against France, whether it was of melancholie and anger which hee had taken

with the French kinges doings, as it were by anie superfluous sarfet, to the which he was greatly giuen, he sodainely fell sicke, and was so grievously taken, that he ended his life, as it were euen sodainely, at Westminster on the ninth daie of Aprill, the yere of Christ 1483. at the age of 41. yeres, when hee had reigned 22. yeres, one moneth, and odde daies, and was buried at Windsor, where he had before provided his resting place: for leaving the old chappell or colledge Church builded by king Henry the first, hee laie a newe foundation from the west end thereof, and builded the beautifull large newe chappell now frequented, almost to the roose, which the Lord Reginald Bray (with some small helpe of the knights of the order) afterward finished. King Edward the fourth toke from the colledge of Eaton, and the kings colledge in Cambridge, which king Henry the 6. had founded (saith sir Tho. Smith) almost 1000. pounds by yere, and gaue to the colledge of Windsor: he with sumptuous buildings repaired the castles of Spottingham and Dover, the Tower of London, the house of Eltham, and builded at Westminster.

deceased.

Philip de Comineus writeth of the death of this king in manner following: Have we not seene (saith he) the late king of England Edward the 4. heire of the house of Yorke, utterly destroy the house of Lancaster, vnder the which both his father and he had liued many yeres? Further hee saith, king Edward having done homage to king Henry the 6. being of the house of Lancaster, did he not afterward hold him prisoner many yeres in the tower of London, where in the end he was murdered? Have we not seene also, the earle of Marwike, principall gouernor of all the saide king Edwards offices (after he had put to death all his enemies, especiallie the duke of Somerset) in the end became deadli enemy to the king his master, gaue his daughter in marriage to the Prince of Wales son to H. Henry, attempted to set by again the house of Lancaster, passed with the said prince into England, discomfited in the field and slain, both he and his brethren, and kinsmen, and diuers noblemen of England, who in time past had done the like to their enemies? After all this the children of these, when the world turned, reuenged themselves, and caused in like manner the other to die: which plagues we may be assured hapned not, but by the wrath of God. For after king Edward was quiet in his realme, and receiued yerele out of France 50000. crownes paid him in the tower of London, and was grown so rich, that richer he could not be, he died sodainely, as it were of melancholie, because of the French kings marriage with the lady Margaret the D. of Austries daughter, for so sone as he was aduertised thereof he fell sicke, and began then to perceiue how he had bene abused, touching the marriage of his daughter, whom he caused to be called the Lady Dolphinesse. Then also was the pension which he had receiued out of France taken from him, which he called tribute, although indeede it were neither the one nor the other. Thus much out of Comineus concerning the death of Edward the fourth, who also affirmeth, that within his remembrance in the Ciuill warres of Englands died aboue 80. persons of the Blood royal. King Edward left issue by Elizabeth his wife, two sons, Edward prince of Wales, and Richard duke of Yorke, and five daughters, to wit, Elizabeth that after was Q. married to king Henry the senenth, Cicilie married to viscount Wels, Briger a Sun at Wertford, Anne married to Th. Howard after earle of Surrey, and D. of Norfolk, Katherine wedded to William L. Courtney, son to the earle of Denonshire; he had also one base sonne knowne to the world, by the name of Arthur, that was after viscount Lisle.

King Edward the fift.

Whose Historie was written by sir Thomas Moore, as followeth.

King Edward, of that name the fourth, after that he had liued fiftie and three yeres (it should bee fortie and one yeres) seauen moneths, and sixe daies, and there of raigned two and twentie yeres, one moneth, and eight daies, died at Westminster the ninth day of April, the yer of our redemption a thousand foure hundred fourescore and three, leauing much faire issue, that is to witte, Edward the Prince, of thirteene yeres of age: Richard D. of Yorke, two yeres ponger: Elizabeth, whose fortune and grace was afterward to be quene, wife vnto H. Henry the seventh and mother vnto the eight: Cicely, not so fortunate as faire: Briger, which representing the vertue of her, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in Wertford, an house of close Nuns: Anne, that was after honourably married vnto Thomas then Lord Heyward, and after earle of Surrey: and Katherine, which long time tossed in either fortune, sometime in wealth, ofte in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last, for then she liued, is by the benignitie of her nephew king Henry the eighth, in very prosperous estate, and worthie her birth and vertue.

This noble Prince deceased at his palace of Westminster, and with great funerall honour and beautinesse of his people from thence conueyed, was entered at Windsor. A king of such gouernance and behauiour, in time of peace (for in war ech part must needs be others enemye) that there was neuer any Prince of this land, attaining the crowne by battell, so heartily beloued with the substance of the people: nor he himselfe so specially in any part of his life, as at the time of his death: Which fauor and affection, yet after his decease by the crueltie, mischief, and trouble of the tempestuous world that followed, highly toward him more increased. At such time as he died, the displeasures of those that bare him grudge, for king Henries sake the first, whome he deposed, was well allwaged, and in effect quenched, in that, that many of them were dead in more than twenty yeres of his raigne, a great part of a long life: and many of them in the meane season growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer strange. He was a goodly personage, princely to behold, of heart contragious, politlike in counsell, in aduersitie nothing abashed, in prosperitie rather ioyfull toyfull than pꝛolod, in peace lust and mercifull, in warre sharpe and fierce, in the field bold and hardy, and nathelesse no further than wisdome would, adventurous, whose wars who so well consider, hee shall no lesse commend his wisdome where he boyded, than his manhood where he vanquished. He was of visage lonely, of bodie mightie, strong, and cleane made: howbeit in his latter daies with ouer liberal diet, somewhat copulent and bozely, and nathelesse not vncomely: he was of youth greatly giuen to fleshy wantonnesse; from which, health of body in great prosperitie and fortune, without a speciall grace hardly restraineth.

This fault not greatly grieved the people: for neither could any one mans pleasure stretch and extend to the displeasure of very many, and was without violence, and ouer that, in his latter daies lesled and well lest. In which time of his latter daies, this realm was in quiet and prosperous estate, no feare of outward enemies, no war in hand, nor none toward, but such as no man looked for: the people toward the pꝛince, not in a constrained feare, but in a willing and louing obedience: among themselves, the commons in good peace. The lords whom he knew at variance, himselfe in his death had appeased: he had left all gathering of money (which is the only thing that withdꝛaweth the harts of Englishmen from the pꝛince) nor any thing intended he to take in hand, by which he should be dueen thereto: for his tribute out of France he had before obtained: and the yere foregoing his death, he had obtained Berwik. And albeit, that all y time of his raigne he was with his people, so benigne, so courteous, and so familiar, that no part of his vertues was more esteemed: yet the condition, in the end of his daies (in which many pꝛinces by a long continued soueraignty, decline into a pꝛolod poꝛt from debonaire behaviour of their beginning) maruellously in him grew and increased: so far forth, that in summer the last that euer he saw, his highnesse being at Windsoꝛe in hunting, sent for the mayoꝛ and aldermen of London, to him for none other errand, but to haue them hunt and be merry with him, where he made them not so statelly, but so friendly and so familiar cheare, and sent benison from thence so freely into the city, that no one thing in many daies before, gat him either mo harts or moze hartly fauor amongst the common people, which oftentimes moze esteeme and take for greater kindnes, a little courtesie, than a great benefite. So deceased (as I haue said) this noble king, in y time, in which his life was most desired: whose loue of his people, and their entire affection toward him, had bin to his noble children, (hauing in themselves also as many gifts of nature, as many pꝛincely vertues, as much goodly towardnes as their age could receiue) a maruellous foꝛtesse and sure armor, if diuision & dissention of their friends had not vnarmed them, and left them destitute, and the execrable desire of soueraignty prouoked him to their destruction, which if either kind or kindnesse had holden place, must needs haue bene their chiefe defence. For Richard the 3. of Gloucester, by nature their vncle, by office their protectoꝛ, to their father beholden, to themselves by othe and allegiaunce bounden, all bands broken that binden man wth man together, without any respect of God or the world, vnnaturally contriued to berreaue them, not only of their dignitie, but also their liues.

But forasmuch as this dukes demaund misistresth in effect all the whole matter thereof this Booke shall entreat, it is therefore convenient, somewhat to shew you ere we farther go, what manner of man this was, that could find in his heart so much mischief to conceiue.

Richard duke of
of Yorke.

Richard duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by war, but by law to challenge the crowne, putting his claime into þ parliament, where his cause was either for right or fano; so farre forth aduanced, that king Henry his blood (albeit he had a goodlie prince) vtterlic reiected, the crowne was by authority of parliament entailed to the duke of Yorke and his issue male in remainder, immediatlie after the death of king Henry. But the duke not induring so long to tarrie, but intending vnder pretext of dissention and debate arising in the realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in king Henry his life, was with manie nobles of the realme at Wakefield slaine, leauing 3. sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard. All three as they were great Statues of birth, so were they great and statelie of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners: Edward reuenging his fathers death, deposed king Henry, and attained the crowne: George duke of Clarence, was a goodlie noble prince, and at all points fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies his brother against him. For were it by the queene and lords of her blood which highly maligned the kings kindred (as women commonly not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be king: at leastwise heinous treason was there laide to his charge, and finally, were he faulty, were he faultles, atainted was he by parliament, and iudged to death, and therupon hastily drowned in a But of malmsey, whose death is. Edward (albeit he commanded it) when he wist it was done, pitiously bewailed, and sorrowfully repented.

Edward.
George duke of Clarence.

The description of Richard
the third.

Richard the 3. son, of whome we now intreat, was in wit and courage equal with either of the m, in body and prowesse far vnder them both, little of stature, ill featured of lims, crooke backed, his left shoullder much higher than his right, hard favoured of visage, and such as is in states called warrelly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth neuer forward. It is for trueth reported, that the dutchesse his mother had so much adoe in her trauell, that she could not bee deliuered of him vncut, and that hee came into the world with the fete forwarde, as men bee borne outwarde, and (as the same runneth) also not untwisted, whether men of hatred report about the trueth, or else that nature chaunged her course in his beginning, which in the course of his life many thinges vnnaturallie committed. For euill Captaine was he in the war, as to which his disposition was moze metly, than for peace: sundry victories had he, and sometimes overthowes, but neuer in default as for his owne person, either of hardinesse or politike order: free was hee called of dispence, and somewhat about his power liberal: with large giftes he gat him vnstedfast friendshippe, for which hee was sayne to pill and spole in other places, and gette him stedfast hatred. He was close and secrete, a deepe dissembler, tolooly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly cōumptnable where where he inwardly hated, not letting to kille whom he thought to kill: dispiteous and cruel, not for euill will alway, but offer for ambition, and either for the surety or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much that indifferent, where his aduantage grew: he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. He slew with his owne hands king Henry the first, being prisoner in the tower, as men constantly said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the R. which would undoubtedly, if he had intended that thing, haue appointed that butcherly office to some other, than his owne bozne brother.

The death of king Henry the first.

Some wise men also weene, that his dist couertly conueyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, than he that were heartily minded to his wealth. And they that thus deeme, thinke that hee long time in R. Edwards life, for thought to be king, in case that the king his brother (whose life he looked that euill died should shorten) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme, that for this intent hee was glad of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must needs haue hindered him so intending, whether the same duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the young king, or enterprised to be king himselfe. But of all this point, is there no certainty, & who so diuineeth vpon conjectures, may as well shote too far as too short. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the selfe night in which R. Edward died, one Mistlebrooke long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Pottier dwelling in red Crosse strate without Cripple gate in London: and when he was with haste rapping quickly letten in, he shewed vnto Pottier that king Edward was departed. By my truth man, quoth Pottier, then will my master the duke of Gloucester be king. What cause he had so to thinke hard it is to say, whether he being toward him, any thing knew that he had such thing purposed, or other wise had any inkling thereof: for he was not likely to speake it of nought.

Reports vncertaine as spoken of hate, or affection.

But now to returne to the course of this history. Were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of old fore-minded this conclusion, and was now at erst thereunto moued, and put in hope by occasion of the tender age of the young princes his nephews (as opportunity and likelihood of speede, putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaine it is, that he contriued their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignity vpon himselfe. And forasmuch as, he well wist, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge & hart-burning betwene the quens kindred, and the kings blood, either party enuying others authority, he now thought their diuision should be (as it was indeed) a furtherly beginning to the furtherance of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first, vnder the pretext of reuenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one partie, to the destruction of the other, and then winne to his purpose as many as hee could, and those that could not be wonn, might be lost ere they looked therefore: for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceiued, he should some haue made peace betwene both the parties with his owne blood.

King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betwene his friends

some what irked him: yet in his god health he some what the lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoeuer busines should fall betwene them, himselfe should alway be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickness, when he perceiued his natural strength so sore enfebled, that he despaired al recovery, then he considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted than that that happened: yet wel foreseeing that many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselves, and good counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commoditie, and rather by pleasant aduise to win themselves fauour, than by profitabill aduertisement to do his children good, he called some of them before him that were at variance, and in especiall the Lord Marques Dorset, the queenes son by her first husband, & William the lord Hastings a noble man then lord Chamberlaine, against whom the queene specially grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him: and also for that he thought him secretly familiar with the king in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him sore, as well for that the king had made him captaine of Calceis, which office the Lord Riuers brother to the queene claimed of the kings former promise, as for diuers other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. When these lords with diuers of both the parties were come in presence, the king sitting vp himselfe and vnder set with pillowes, as it is reported, on this wise saide vnto them;

The oration of the king in his death bed.

My lords, my deere kinsmen and alies, in what plight I lie, you see, and I feele. By which, the lesse while I looke to liue with you, the more deeply am I moued to care in what case I leave you, for such as I leave you, such bee my children like to find you. Which if they should (that God forbids) find you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at war, ere their discretion would serue to set you at peace; yee see their youth, of which I reckon the onely suretie to rest in your concord: For it sufficeth not, that all you loue them, if each of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness happily would suffice; but children must be maintained by mens authoritie, & slipper youth vnder propped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue, but ye giue it; nor ye giue it, if ye graue not. For where ech laboureth to breake that the other maketh, & for hatred of ech of others person, impugnech ech others counsell, there must it nedes be long ere any good conclusion go forward. And also while either party laboureth to be chiefe, flatterie shall haue more place than plaine and faithfull aduise, of which most nedes is due the euil bringing vp of the prince, whose mind in tender youth infect, shall readily fall to mischief & riot, and draw down with his noble realme to ruine: but if grace turne him to wisdom, which if God send, then they that by euill means before pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euill doers draw to nought, and good plaine waies prosper. Great variance hath there long bin betwene you, not alway for great causes: sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruction turneth vnto worse, or a smal displeasure don vs, either our owne affection or euill tongues agriueneth. But this wot I well, yee neuer had so great cause of hatred, as yee haue of loue: That we be all men, that we be christian men, this shall I leave for preachers to tell you (yet I wot nere whether any preachers words ought more more to moue you, than his that is by and by going to the place that they all, preach of.) But this shal I desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my blood, the other of mine altes, & ech of you with other either of kindred or affinity, which spirituall kindred of affinitye, if the sacraments of Christs church beare that weight with vs, that would god they did, should no lesse moue vs to charity, than the respect of fleshly consanguinity. Our Lord forbid, that you loue togither the worse for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better: and yet that hapneth, and no where find we so deadly debate, as among them, which by nature & law most ought to agree togither. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition, Ambition. and desire of bainglorie and foueraignty, which among states thure he once entreth, creepeth forth so far, till with diuision and variance hee turneth all to mischief, first longing to be next the best, after ward equall with the best, and at last chiefe and aboue the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship, and thereby of debate & dissention, what losse, what sorrow, what trouble hath with in these few yeres growen in this realme, I pray God as well forget, as we wel remeber. Which things if I could as wel haue foresen, as I haue with my more paine than pleasure proued, by Gods blessed lady (that was euer his othe) I would neuer haue won the courtesie of mens knees, with the losse of so many heads. But sith things passed cannot be gaine called, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt afore, that we effoonces fall not in that occasion againe. How be those griefes passed, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your cousins my children, if God send them life, and you loue. Of which two things, the lesse losse were they, by whom though God did his pleasure, yet should the realme alway finde kings, and peraduenture as good kings: but if you among your selues in a childes reign fall at debate, many a good man shal perish, and happily he too, and ye too, ere this land find peace againe. Wherfore in these last wordes that euer I loke to speake with you, I exhort you and requyre you all, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me: for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you: for the loue that our lord beareth to vs all, from this time forthward all griefes forgotten, ech of you loue other. Which I berely trust you will, if ye any thing rashly regard, either God or your king, affinitye or kindred, this realme your owne countrey, or your owne suretie. And therewith all the king no longer induring to sit by, laid him downe on his right side, his face toward them: and none was there present that could refraine from weeping. But the Lords recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their wordes appeared, ech forgate other, and ioyned their hands togither, when (as it after appeared by their deedes) their harts were far asunder. As soone as the king was departed, the noble prince his son drey to toward London, which at the time of his decease kept his houtholde at Ludlowe in Wales, which countrey being far off from the law and recourse to iustice, was begun to be far out of god will, and wahren wilde robbers and reuers, walking at liberty vncorreced.

And for this encheason the prince was in the life of his father sent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence, should reſtaine euill diſpoſed perſons from the boldnes of their ſoꝛmer outrages. To the gouernance and oꝛdering of this yong Prince at his ſending thither, was there appoynted Sir Anthonie Woodville Lorde Rivers, and brother vnto the Quene, a right honozable man, as ballant of hand, as poliſtike in counſell. Adioined were there vnto him other of the ſame partie, and in effect euerie one as he was neareſt of kinne vnto the Quene, ſo was planted next about the Prince.

That diſt by the Quene not vnwiſelie deuſed, whereby her blood might of youth be rooted in the princes ſanour, the duke of Glouceſter turned vnto their deſtruction, and vpon that ground ſet the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whomeſoeuer he perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himſelfe their ſanoꝛ, he brake vnto the, ſome by mouth, ſome by witting & ſecret meſſengers, that it was neither reaſon, noꝛ in anie wiſe to bee ſuffered, that the yong king their maſter and kiſnman, ſhould be in the hands and cuſtody of his mothers kinred, ſequeſtered in maner from their company and attendaunce, of which euerie one ought him as faythfull ſeruiſe as they, and manie of them far moꝛe honozable part of kin then his mothers ſide. Whole blood (quoth he) ſauing the kings pleaſure, was full vnmaſtely to be matched with his: which now to be as who ſaie remoued from the king, and the leſſe noble to bee left about him, is (quoth he) neither honozable to his maieſtie, noꝛ vnto vs, and alſo to his grace no ſuretie, to haue the mightieſt of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little leopadie, to ſuffer our well pꝛoued euill willers to growe in our great authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is light of beleſe & ſone perſwaded. For remember I trow king Edward himſelfe, albeit hee was a man of age and diſcretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, moꝛe then ſtoꝛd either with his honour, or our pꝛofit, or with the commoditie of anie man els, except only the immoderat aduancement of the meſelues. Which whether they ſoꝛer thirſted after their owne weale, or our too, it were hard I weene to geſſe. And if ſome folks friendſhip had not holden better place with the king, then ante reſpect of kinred, they might peraduenture eaſilie haue betrayed and brought to conſuſion ſome of vs ere this. Why not as eaſilie as they haue done ſome other alreadie, as neare of his roſall blood as wee? But our Lorde hath wꝛought his will, and thanks be to his grace that perill is paſt. Howbeit as great is growing, if we ſuffer this yong king in our enimies hande, which without his witting might abuſe the name of his commandement, to anie of our vndowing, which thing God and good pꝛouiſion foꝛbid.

Of which good pꝛouiſion none of vs hath anie thing the leſſe neede, for the late made at tonement, in which the kings pleaſure had moꝛe place then the parties tolls: noꝛ none of vs, I beleaue, is ſo vnwiſe ouer ſoone to truſt a new friende made of an old fo, or to thinke y an hotterly kindnes, ſuddenly contract in one holwer, continued yet ſcant a fortnight, ſhould be deeper ſetled in their ſtomack, then a long accuſtomed malice manie yeres rooted. With theſe woꝛdes and wꝛittings and ſuch other, the duke of Glouceſter ſome ſet a fire them that were of the meſelues eath to kindle, and in eſpeciall twaine, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William lorde Haſtings and chamberlaine, both men of honoꝛ and of great power : The one by long succession from his ancestry ; the other by his office, and the kings fauor.

These two not bearing each to other so much lone, as hatred both vnto the Quēnes part, in this point accorded togither with the duke of Gloucester, that they would bitterly amoue from the kings company all his mothers friends, vnder the name of their enimies.

Vpon this concluded, the duke of Gloucester vnderstanding that the Lords which at that time were about the king, intended to bring him vp to his coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be harde for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering a great assemble of people, and in manner of open war, whereof the end hee wist was doubtful, and in which the king being on their side, his parte should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretlie therefore by diuers meanes caused the quēne to be perswaded and brought in the minde, that it neither were nēde, and also should be leopardons, the king to come vp strong. For whereas nowe euerie Lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the coronation and honoz of the king; if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the kings name much people, they should giue the Lordes atwist whome and them had bene sometime debate, to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people not for the kings safegarde, whome no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauing more regarde to their old variance, then their new attonement: for which cause they should assemble on the other partie much people againe for their defence, whose power shee wist well farre stretched. And thus should all the Realme fall on a roze. And of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be litle, and the most harme there like to fall where the least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the twight, and saye that they had vnwiselie and vntruly also broken the amitie and peace, that the king her husband so prudently made betwēne his kin and hers in his death bed, and which the other party faithfullly obserued.

The Quēne being in this wise perswaded, such wordes sent vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother, being about the king, and ouer that the Duke of Gloucester himselfe and other Lords the chiefe of his bande, wrote vnto the king to reuerentlie, and to the quēnes friends there so lovinglie, that they nothing earthly mistrusting, brought the king vp in a great haste, not in good sped, with a sober companie. Now was the king in his waie to London gone from Portsmouth, when the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the Lord Rivers the kings vncle, intending on the morowe to follow the king, and be with him at Stony Stratford, twelue miles thence, early ere he departed. So was there made that night much friendly chere betwēn these two dukes and the lord Rivers a greate while: But incontinent after that they were openlie with great curtesie departed and the Lord Rivers lodged, the dukes secretlie with a fewe of their most priute friends, sette them downe in Councell, wherein they spent a great part of the night: and at their rising in the datoning of the daie, they sent out priuillie to their seruants in their Innnes and Lodginges about, giuing them commaundemente, to make themselves thortly readie, for thei Lordes were to horse backe warde. Upon which messag-ges, manie of thei folke were attendant, when manie of the Lorde Riuers ser-uants were vnbreadie. Howe had these Dukes taken also into thei custodie the keyes of the Anne, that none should passe forth without thei licence: And ouer this, in the high waie toward Stony Stratford where the king laie, they had besetted certaine of thei folke, that should send backe againe, and com-pell to returne anie man that were gotten out of Portsmouth toward Stonie Stratforde, till they shoulde giue other licence: For as much as the dukes themselues intended for the shew of thei diligence, to bee the first that should that day attend vpon the kings highnes out of that Towne: thus bare they folke in hand. But when the Lorde Riuers vnderstood the gates closed, and the waies on euery side beset, neither his seruants nor himselve suffered to go out, perceiuing well so great a thing without his knowledge not begunne for naught, comparing this maner present, with his last nightes chere, in so selue holwers so great a change, maruellouslie mistaked. Howbeit, sith hee could not get a waie, and keepe himselve close he would not, least hee should seeme to hide himselve for some secret feare of his owne fault, whereof he saue no such cause in himselve: he determined vpon the suretie of his owne conscience, to go boldly to them, and inquire what this matter might meane: whom as soone as they saw, they began to quarrell with him, and say, that he intended to set distance betwene the king & them, and to bring them to confusion, but it shoulde not lie in his power. And when he began (as he was a very wel spoken man) in goodly wise to excuse himselve, they tarried not the ende of his answere, but thortlie toke him, and put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horsebacke, and toke the waie to Stony Stratforde, where they founde the king with his company, ready to leape on horsebacke, and depart forwarde to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too streight for both companies. And as soone as they came in his presence, they alight downe with all their companie about them: To whome the duke of Buckingham said, go afoze gentlemen, and yee men keepe your comes.

The Lord Riuers put in ward.

And thus in goodlie arrate they came to the king, and on thei knees in berie humble wise salued his grace, which receiued them in very iolous and amiable maner, nothing eathly knowing nor mistrusting as yet: But euen by & by in his presence they picked a quarrell to the Lorde Richard Grey, the kings other brother by his mother, saying, that he with the Lorde Marques his brother, and the Lorde Riuers his vnckle had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroy the noble blod of the realme: Toward the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lorde Marques had entred into the towne of London, and thence taken out the kings treasure, and sent men to the Sea.

The Lord Gray.

All which thinges these dukes well wist were done for god purposes and necessarie, by the whole counsell at London, sauing that somewhat they must say.
Unto which words the king answered: What my brother Marques hath done I cannot say: but in god faith I dare well answere for mine vnckle Riuers and my brother heere, that they bee innocent of any such matter. Wea my Liege, quoth

quoth the duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealing in these matters farre from the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lorde Richard and Sir Thomas Vaughan knight in the kinges presence, and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they toke againe further Counsell: And there they sent a waile from the king whome it pleased them, and set new seruants about him, such as liked better them then him: at which dealing he wept, and was nothing content, but it booted not. And at dinner, the duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his owne table to the Lorde Riuer, praying him to be of good chere, all should be well enough: and he thanked the duke, and praised the messenger to beare it to his nephew the L. Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was strange, but himselfe had bene all his daies in the therewith, and therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable curtesie of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Riuer and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North country, into diuers places to prison, and afterwarde all to Pontefract, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

The death of
and others.

In this wise the duke of Gloucester toke vpon himselfe the order and gouernance of the young king, whome with much honoꝝ and humble reuerence hee conueied vppward toward the citie. But anone the tidings of this matter came hastily to the Quene a little before the midnight following, and that in the sorest wise, that the king her son was taken, her brother, her sonne, and other friends arrested, and sent no man wiff whither, to be done with, God wot what. With which tidings, the Quene in great fright and heauines betwailing her childes raigne, her friendes mischance, and her owne infortune, damming the time that euer she dissuaded the gathering of power about the king, gate her selfe in all the hast possible with her younger son and her daughters, out of the palace of Westminster, in which the then lay, into the sanctuarie, lodging her selfe and her company there in the abbots place.

The Quene
taken to sanctuarie.

Now came there one likewise not long after midnight from the lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbishop of Yorke then Chancelloꝝ of Englande, to his place not far from Westminster: And for that he shewed his seruants that he had tidings of so great importance, that his master gaue him in charge, not to forbear his rest, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admit this messenger vnto his bed side. Of whome he heard that these dukes were gone backe with the kings grace from Stony Stratford vnto Northampton: Not withstanding sir (quoth he) my Lord sendeth your Lordship word, that there is no feare, for he assureth you that all shall be well. I assure him, quoth the Archbishop, bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee so well as we haue seene it: and thereupon by and by after the messenger departed; he caused in all the haste all his seruants to be called vpp, and so with his owne household about him, and euerie man weaponed, he toke the great scale with him, and came yet before daie vnto the Quene. About whome he found much heauinesse, rumber, haile, and busines, carriage and conueiance of her stuffe into sanctuarie, chests, coffers, packs, fardels, trusted all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some comming for more, some breaking downe the wals to bring

bying in the next way, and some yet drewe to them to helpe to carry a wrong way.

The Quene her selfe sate alone alowe on the rushes all desolate and dismayed, whome the archbishop comforted in the best manner he could, shewing her that he trusted the matter was nothing so sore as she toke it for, and that he was put in good hope and out of feare by the message sent him from the lord Chamberlaine: Ah too woorth him (quoth she) for he is one of them that labourereth to destroy me and my blood.

Adam (quoth he) be ye of god there, for I assure you, if they crowne any other king than your sonne, whom they now haue with them, we shall on the morrow crowne his brother whom you haue here with you. And here is the great seale, which in like wise as that noble prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behoofe of your sonne, and therewith he betooke her the great seale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the day. By which time, he might in his chamber window see all the Thames full of boates of the duke of Glocesters seruants, watching that no man should go to sanctuary, nor none could passe vnsearched: Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as specially in the cite, the people diuersly diuining vpon this dealing. And some lords, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauor of the Quene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundry companies, and went flockemeale in harness: and many also, for that they reckoned this demeanour attempted, not so specially against the other lords, as against the king himselfe in disturbance of his coronation. But then by and by the lordes assembled together, toward which meeting, the archbishop of Yorke fearing that it would be ascribed (as it was in dede) to his ouermuch lightnes, that he so sodainly had yelded by the great seale to the Quene, to whome the custodie thereof nothing pertained, without speciall commandement of the king, secretly sent for the seale againe, and brought it with him after the customeable maner. And at this meeting, the Lord Hastings, whose trust toward the king, no man doubted nor needed to doubt, perswaded the lords to beleue, that the duke of Gloucester was sure and safely saithfull to his prince, and that the lord Riuers and lord Richard, with the other knights, were for matters attempted by them against the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, put vnder arrest for their surety, not for the kings jeopardy: and that they were also in safeward, & there no longer should remaine than till the matter were, not by the dukes only, but also by all the other lords of the kings counsell indifferently examined, and by other discretions ordered, and either iudged or appeased.

But one thing he aduised them beware, that they iudged not the matter so far forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irking & prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings coronation, toward which the dukes were comming by, that they might peraduenture bying the matter so far out of ioint, that it should neuer be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should happen, as it were likely, to come to a fielde, though both parties were in all things equal, yet should the authoritie be be on that side where the king is himselfe. With these persuasions of the lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe belated, of part hee with the contrarie, these commotions were somewhat appeased, but specially by that, that the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were so neere, and came so shortly on with the king, in none other maner, with none other voice or semblance than to his coronation, causing the same to be blown about, that these lords and knightes which were taken, had contrived the destruction of the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, and of other the noble bloud of the realme, to the end that themselves would alone demeane and governe the king at their pleasure.

And for the colourable p[ro]ofe thereof, such of the dukes servants as rode with the carts of their stuffe that were taken (among which stuffe no marvel though some were harnesse, which at the breaking up of the household, must needs either be brought away, or cast away) they shewed unto the people all the waies as they went: No here bee the barrels of harnesse that these traitors had priuily conueied in their carriage to destroy the noble lords withall.

This deuice, albeit that it made the matter to wise men more unlikely, well perceiuing that the intenders of such a purpose would rather haue had their harnesse on their backs, than to haue bound them by in barrels; yet much part of the common people were therewith very wel satisfied, and said it were almes to hang them.

When the king approached neere to the city, Edmond Shaa Goldsmith then Mayor, with William White and John Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in scarlet, with 500. horse of the citizens in violet, receiued him reuerently at Barnsey, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the citie, which he entred the fourth day of May, the first and last yeere of his raigne.

The king was lodged in the Bishops palace, where was kept a great councell, and there was sworne to the king, the duke of Gloucester, the duke of Buckingham, and all the lords.

But the duke of Gloucester bare him in open sight so reuerently to the prince, with all semblance of lowlines, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, hee was suddenly fallen in so great trust, that at the councell next assembled, he was made the onely man, chose and thought most meete to be protector of the king and his realme, so that (were it destiny, or were it folly) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to keepe. At which councell also, the Archbishop of Yorke Chancellor of England, which had deliuered by the great seale to the Duke, was thereof greatly reprovued, and the seale taken from him, and deliuered to doctor Russell bishop of Lincolne, a wise man and a good, and of much experience, and one of the best learned men vndoubtedly that England had in his time. Diuers lords and knights were appointed unto diuers romes. The Lord Chamberlaine and some other kept still their offices that they had before.

Now all were it, so that the protector so sore thirsted for the finishing of that he had begun, that thought every day a yeere till it were atchieued, yet durst he no further attempt, as long as he had but halfe his pray in his hand: wel wist, that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if bring in the next way, and some yet drelve to them to helpe to carry a wrong way.

The Quene her selfe sate alone alowe on the rushes all desolate and distressed, whome the archbishop comforted in the best manner he could, shewing her that he trusted the matter was nothing so sore as she took it for, and that he was put in good hope and out of feare by the message sent him from the lord Chamberlaine: Ah too woorth him (quoth she) for he is one of them that labour to destroy me and my blood.

Adam (quoth he) be ye of god chere, for I assure you, if they crowne any other king than your sonne, whom they now haue with them, we shall on the morrow crowne his brother whom you haue here with you. And here is the great seale, which in like wise as that noble prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the use and behoofe of your sonne, and therewith he betoke her the great seale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the day. By which time, he might in his chamber window see all the Thames full of boates of the duke of Glocesters seruants, watching that no man should go to sanctuary, nor none could passe vnsearched: There was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as specially in the citie, the people diuersly diuining vpon this dealing. But the duke of Gloucester bare him in open sight so reuerently to the prince, with all semblance of loialties, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, hee was suddenly fallen in so great trust, that at the councell next assembled, he was made the onely man, chose and thought most mete to be protector of the king and his realme, so that (were it destiny, or were it folly) the lambe was be taken to the wolfe to keepe. Divers lords and knights were appointed vnto diuers roles. The Lorde Chamberlaine and some other kept still their offices that they had before.

be either remained in sanctuary, or should happilie be hostile conueied to his farther libertie. Wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords at the councell, he proposed vnto them, that it was a hainous deed of the Queene, and proceeding of great malice toward the kings Councellers, that the should keepe in Sanctuary the kings brother from him, whose spectall pleasure and comforte were to haue his brother with him. And that by her done to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and marmure of the people: as though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, that by the assent of the nobles of the land, were appointed as the kings next friends, to the tuition of his owne rotall person. The prosperitie whereof standeth (quoth he) not all in keeping from enemies, or ill bland, but partlie also in recreation, and moderate pleasure, which he cannot in his tender yongth take in the companie of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be neither far vnder, nor far aboue his age, nay the lesse of estate conuenient to accompanie his noble maiestie, therefore, with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if anie man thinke this consideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the king) let him consider, that sometime without small things, greater cannot stand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the dishonour both of the kings highnes, and of all vs that bene about his grace, to haue it run in euerie mans mouth, not in this Realme onelie, but also in other lands (as euill words walke far) that the kings brother should be faine to keepe sanctuary. For euery man will weene, that no man will so do for nought. And such euill opinion once fastened in mens harts, hard it is to wass out, and many grow to more griefe then any man can here diuine: wherefore me thinketh it were not too fit to send vnto the Queene for the redress of this matter, some honorable trustie man, such as both tendereth the kings weale, and the honor of his councell, and is also in fauour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth me more meete, then our reuerende father heere present, my Lorde Cardinall, who may in this matter do most good of anie man, if it please him to take the paine, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse for the kings sake and ours, and wealthe of the yong duke himselte, the kings most honorable brother, and after my soueraigne Lorde himselte, my most dære nephew, considered that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and obloquie now going, and the hurts auoided that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quiet growe to all the realme. And if she be percase so obstinate, and so precisely set vpon her owne will, that neither his wise & faithfull aduertisement can not moue her, nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduise, by the kings authoritie, fetch him out of that prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall companie he shall be so well cherished, & so honorably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor and her reproch perceiue, that it was only malice, stowardnes, or folly that caused her to keepe him there: this is my mind in this matter for this time, except anie of your Lordshippes anie thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods grace so wed my selfe to mine owne will, but that I shall be ready to chaunge it vpon your better aduises.

When the protector had said, all the Councell affirmed, that the motion was good and reasonable, and so the king and the Duke his brother, honorable, and a thing that should cease great murmur in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishoppe of Poike, whome they all agreed also to bee thereto most conuenient, toke vpon him to moue her, and therein to doo his bittermost deuoir. Howbeit, if she could be in no wise intreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he and such other as were of the spiritualty present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted to take him out against her will. For it woulde bee a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yeres bene kept, which both kings and popes so good had granted, so manie had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then 500. yeres agoe by S. Peter in his own person in spirit accompanied with great multitude of angels by night so specially hallowed, and dedicate to God (for the prouise wherof, they haue yet in the abbey, Saint Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer to vnderout a king, that durst that sacred place violate, or so holie a bishop, that durst it presume to consecrate. And therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Poike) god forbid that any man should for any thing earthly enterpryse to breake the immunitie and liberty of the sacred sanctuarie, that hath bene the safegard of so many a good mans life. And I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace, we shall not neede it. But for any manner need, I would not we should doo it. I trust that she shall be with reason contented, and all thinges in good maner obtained. And if it happeth that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it so far forth do my best, that ye shall all well perceiue, that no lacke of my deuoir, but the mothers dread and womanish feare, shall be the let. Womanish feare, naie womanish frowardnes (quoth the D. of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, she well knoweth she needeth no such thing to feare, either for her son or for hir selfe. For as for hir, here is no man that will bee at war with women. Would God som of the men of hir kin were women too, and then should all be some in rest. Howbeit there is none of hir kinne the lesse loued, for that they be hir kin, but for their owne euill deseruing. And natheles, if wee loued neither hir nor hir kin, yet were there no cause to thinke that we should hate the Kings noble brother, to whose grace we our selues be of kin: whose honour, if shee as much desired, as our dishonour, & as much regard toke to his wealth, as to her owne will, she would bee as loth to suffer him from the King as anie of vs bee. For if she haue wit (as would God she had as good will as she hath) she would wit the reckoning of her selfe no wiser, then she thinketh some that bee heere, of whose faithfull mind she nothing doubteth, but verily beleueth and knoweth, that they would be as loy of his harme, as hir selfe, & yet would haue him from her, if she bide there: and we al (I thinke) content, that both be with hir, if she come thence, and bide in such place, where they may with their honour be.

Now then, if she refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counsaile of them, whose wisdom she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is eather to perceiue, that frowardnes letteth her, and not feare. But go to, suppose that the feare (as who may let her to feare her owne shadowe) the more the feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in her hands. For if she cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt: then will she feare, that he shall be fetcht thence. For she will sone thinke, that if men were set (which god forbid) vpon so great a mischief, the Sanctuarie would little let them: which good men might (as me thinketh) without sinne, somewhat lesse regard than they doe.

Now then, if she doubt, leaue he might be fetcht from her, is it not likelie enough that she shall send him some where out of the Realme? Merely, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but she now as sore mindeth it, as we the let therof. And if she might happen to bring that to passe, (as it were no great matter, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that we were a wise sort of Counsaillours about a king, that let his brother be cast awaie vnder our noses. And therefore, I ensure you faithfully for my mind, I will rather manure her minde, fetch him awaie, than leaue him there, till her forwardnesse and sonde feare conuic him awaie. And yet will I breake no Sanctuarie therefore. For verely, with the priuiledges of that place and other like haue bene of long continued, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in god faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should bee about to make them.

Yet will I not saie naie, but that it is a deed of pittie, that such men as the sea, or their euill debtours haue brought in pouertie, should haue some place of libertie, to keepe their bodie out of the daunger of their cruell creditors.

And also, if the crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question while either part taketh other as traitors, I will well there be some places of refuge for both.

But as for theues, of which these places be full, and which neuer fall from the crasse, after they once fall thereto, it is pittie the Sanctuarie should serue them: And much more, manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murder were wilfull. And where it is othertwise, there neede wee not the Sanctuaries that God appointed in the olde lawe. For if either necessitie, his owne defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the king of pittie maie.

Then loke me now how few Sanctuarie men there be, whom anie sauourable necessitie compelled to go thither: and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull vnchastitnesse hath brought to naught.

What a rabble of theues, murderers, and malicious baynous traitors, and that in two places specially: The one at the elbow of the citie, the tother in the verie bowels. I dare well answere it, wepe the god that they doe, with the hurt that cometh of them, and ye shall finde it much better to lacke both, than haue both. And this I saie, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue bene, that I feare me ener they will be, while men be afraid to set the their hands to the mendment, as though God and S. Peter were the patrons of vngratious liuing.

How vnchristes riot, and run in debt, vpon the boldnes of these places, yea, and rich men run thither with paye mens goods, there they builde, there they spend, and bid their creditours go whistle them.

Spens wiues run thither with their husbands plate, and saie, they dare not abide with their husbands for beating.

Thieues bring thither their stolen goods, and there liue thereon.

There deuise they newe robberies, nightly they steale out, they robbe, and reane, and kill, and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onely a safegard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more. Howbeit, much of this mischiefe, if wise men would set their handes to it, might be amended, with great thanks of God, and no breach of the priuiledge.

The residue, sith so long ago I wot neare what pope, and what prince more pitous than politike, hath granted it, and other men since, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it, let vs take a paine therewith, and let it a gods name stande in force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetchng forth of this noble man, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuarie man.

A Sanctuarie serueth alway to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but also of lawfull hurt, for against vnlawfull harmes, neuer pope nor king intended to priuiledge any one place, for that priuiledge hath euerie place: knoweth any man, any place wherein it is lawfull one man to do another wrong?

That no man vnlawfully take hurt, that libertie, the king, the law, and beerie nature, forbidde in euerie place, and maketh to that regarde, for euerie man euerie place a Sanctuarie.

But where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth he the tuition of some speciall priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessitie, this noble Prince is farre, whose loue to his king, nature and kinned proueth, whose innocencie to all the worlde, his tender youth proueth, and so Sanctuarie, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor also none can haue.

Men come not to Sanctuarie, as they come to Baptisme, to require it by their Godfathers, he must aske it himselfe, that must haue it, and reason, sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine, neede to require it: what will then hath ponder babe: which and if he had discretion to require it, if neede were, I dare say would now be right angrie with them that kepe him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of priuiledge, to be somewhat more homely with them that be there Sanctuarie men indeede.

For if one go to Sanctuarie with another mans goods, why should not the king leauing his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goods, euen without the Sanctuarie: for neither king nor pope can giue any place such a priuiledge,

the feare (as who may let her to feare her owne shadowe) the more the feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in her hands. For if she cast fuch fond doubts, that she feare his hurt: then will she feare, that he shall be fetcht thence. For she will fone thinke, that if men were fet (which god forbid) vpon fo great a mifchiefe, the Sanctuarie would little let them: which god might (as me thinketh) without sinne, somewhat leffe regard than they doe.

Now then, if she doubt, leaft he might be fetcht from her, is it not likelie ynough that she shall fend him fome where out of the Realme: Writly, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but she now as foze mindeth it, as we the let therof. And if she might happen to bring that to paffe, (as if were no great matter, we letting her alone) all the worlde would fay, that we were a wife sort of Counsaillours about a king, that let his brother be cast awaie vnder our noses. And therefore, I ensure you faithfully for my mind, I will rather maugre her minde, fetch him awaie, than leaue him there, till her frowardnesse and fonde feare conueie him awaie. And yet will I breake no Sanctuarie therefore. For verely, fith the priuiledges of that place and other like haue bene of long continued, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in god faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should bee about to make them.

Yet will I not faie naie, but that it is a deepe of pittie, that fuch men as the sea, or their euill debtours haue brought in pouertie, should haue fome place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of the daunger of their cruell creditors.

For if one go to Sanctuarie with another mans goods, why should not the king leauing his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goods, euen within the Sanctuarie: for neither king nor pope can giue any place such a priuiledge,

that it shall discharge a man of his debts, being able to paie: and with that, diuers of the Cleargie that were present, whether they saide it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed plainly, that by the law of God, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuarie man should be deliuered in paiement of his debts, and stollen goods to the owner, and onely libertie reserued him to get his living with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you saie verie truth, and what if a mans wife will take Sanctuarie, because shee list to run from her husband: I woulde wene if shee coulde alleadge none other cause, hee maie lawfullie without anie displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that (saith he) will bide there, then if a childe will take Sanctuarie, because he feareth to go to Schoole, his master must let him alone. And as simple as that sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case than in that: for therein, though it bee a childish feare, yet is there, at the least wise, some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary men, but I neuer heard earst of Sanctuarie children. And therefore, as for the conclusion of my minde, who so may haue deserued to haue it, if they thinke it for their suertie, let them keepe it. But he can be no Sanctuarie man, that neither hath wisdom to desire it, nor malice to deserue it, whose life or libertie, can by no lawfull processe stande in leoparchie. And hee that taketh one out of Sanctuarie to doe him good, I saie plainly, that he breaketh no Sanctuarie.

When the Duke had done, the tempozall men whole, and a good part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt eathly ment toward the yong babe, condescended in effect, that if he were not deliuered he should be fetched: Howbeit, they thought it all best, in the auoiding of all maner of rumor, that the L. Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the counsell came vnto the star chamber at Westminster, and the L. cardinall leauing the Protector with the counsell in the starre chamber, departed into the Sanctuarie to the Quene, with diuers other lordes with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that she should by presence of so manie perceiue that this errand was not one mans minde: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter, to trust ante one man alone, or else, that if she finally were determined to keepe him, some of that companie, had happely secret instruction incontinent, maugre her minde, to take him, and to leaue her no respite to conuey him, which she was likely to mind after this matter bzoken to her, if her time would in any wise serue her.

When the quene, and these lordes were come togither in presence, the lord Cardinall shewed vnto her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole counsell, that her keeping of the kings brother in that place, was the thing, which highly sounded, not onely to the great rumor of the people: the ir obloquie, but also to the importable grieve and displeasure of the kings royall State. to whose grace it were as singular comfort to haue his naturall brother in companie, as it was their both dishonor, and all theirs and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuarie, as though the one brother stood in danger & perill of the other. And he shewed her, that the counsell therefore had sent him unto her, to requyre her the deliuey of him, that he might be brought unto the kings presence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there should he be demeaned, according to his estate, & she in this doing should both do great good to the realm, pleasure to the counsell, and profit to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresse, and ouer that (which he wist well she specially tended) not only great comfort and honoꝝ to the king, but also to the yong duke himselte, whose both great wealth it were to be togither, as wel for many greater causes, as also for their both disport, and recreation: which thing, the Lord esteemed no sleight, though it seeme light, well pondering, that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, noꝝ any stranger, for the conseruation of their both ages and estates, so metely in that point for anie of them, as either of them for other.

Protector.

answere.

My Lord (quoth the queene) I say not naie, but that it were very conuenient, that this gentleman whom yee requyre were in company of the king his brother: and in good faith, me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet a while, to bee in the custodie of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but specially the yonger, which besides his infancie, that also needeth god looking to, hath a while bene so sore diseased, bered with sicknes, and is so newly rather a little amended, than well recovered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping, but my selfe onely, considering that there is (as physicians saie) and as we also finde, double the perill in the reciduation, that was in the first sickenes, with which disease, Nature being sore laboured, sore wearied and weakened, wareth the lesse able to beare out and sustaine a new surfeit. And albeit there might be found either that would happily do their best unto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, than I that so long haue kept him: or is more tenderly like to cherish him, than his owne mother that bare him. No man denieth, good Phadame (qd. the cardinall) but that your grace were of all folke most necessary about your children: and so would all the counsell not onely be content, but glad that yee were, if it might stande with your pleasure, to be in such place as might stand with their honour. But if you do appoint your selfe to tarrie here, then thinke they it more conuenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the king honourably at his libertie to the comfort of them both, than here as a Sanctuarie man, to their both dishonour and obloquie, sith there is not alwaie so great necessitie to haue the child to be with the mother: but that occasion maie sometime be such, that it should be more expedient to keepe him elswhere, which in this well appeareth, that at such time as your dearest sonne the Prince, and now he King, should for his honour, and good order of the countrey, keepe himselfe in Wales, far out of your companie: your grace was well content therewith your selfe. Not verie well content, quoth the queene: And yet the case is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now sick: In which case, I maruell greatly, that my lorde protector is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the child in his sicknesse miscarrie by nature, yet might bee runne into slander and suspicion of fraude.

And where they call it a thing so soze against my child's honour, and theirs also, that hee bydyeth in this place: it is all their honours there to suffer him byde, where no man doubteth he shall be best kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intende not to come forth, & iopardie my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in suretie with me, than I were there in iopardy with them. Why madam (quoth another lord) knowe you any thing why they should be in iopardy? Say verily sir, quoth she, no: why they should be in prison neither, as they now be. But it is I trowe, no great maruell though I feare, lest those that haue not letted to put them in durance, without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause. The cardinall made a countenance to the other lord, that he should harpe no more upon that string, and then said he to the Quene, that he nothing doubted, but that those Lords of her honorable kinne, which as yet remained under arrest, should upon the matter examined doe well enough: and as towarde her noble person, neither was, neyther could be anie manner iopardie. Whereby should I trust that (quoth the Quene) in that I am guiltles? as though they were guiltie, in that I am with their eninies better loued than they: When they hate them for my sake, in that I am so neere of kin to the king: and how far they be off, if that would helpe, as God send grace it hurt not, & therfore as for me, I purpose not as yet, to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my sonne, I mind that hee shall be where I am, till I see further: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedie, without anie substantiall cause to haue him: This maketh mee much the more searder to deliuer him. Truelie madame, quoth he, and the searder that you be to deliuer him, the searder berte other men to suffer you to keepe him, least your causelesse feare might cause you farther to conuey him: and many be there that think he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deserue it, and the refoze, they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if ye finally refuse to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will. So much dread hath my Lord his vncke, for the tender loue hee beareth him, least your grace should hap to send him away.

The Quene.

A sir (quoth the Quene) hath the protector so tender zeale, that he feareth no thing but least hee should escape him: Thinketh hee that I would sende him hence, which neither is in the plight to send out, and in what place could I reckon him sure, if he be not sure in the Sanctuarie: Whereof was there neuer yrant yet so diuclish that durst presume to breake. And I trust, God is as strong now to withstand his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my son can deserue no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forsooth he hath found a goodly glose, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, maie not saue an innocent. But he is in no iopardie, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Troth the protector, I pray god he maie proue a protector, troweth he that I perceiue not wherunto his painted processe draweth? it is not honorable that the Duke here: it were comfortabell for them both, that he were with his brother, because the king lacketh a plaiesfellow to be ye sure. I praise God sende them both better plaiesfellows than him, that maketh so high a matter upon such a rising trifling pretext: as though there could none bee found to plaie with the king, but if his brother that hath no luste to plaie for sickness, come out of Sanctuarie, out of his safegarde to plaie with him. As though Princes as yong as they bee, coulde not plaie but with their pères, or children coulde not plaie but with their kinned, with whome for the moze part they agré much worse than with strangers. But the child cannot require the priuiledge: who told him so? He shall heare him aske it, and he will. Howbeit this is a gale matter, suppose he could not aske it, suppose he would not aske it, suppose hee would aske to go out, if I saie hee shall not: if I aske the priuiledge but for my selfe, I saie hee that against my will taketh him out, breaketh the Sanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my person onelic, or for my goods too? Pee maie not hence take my Horse from me, and maie you take my child from me? He also is my ward: for as my learned counsell sheweth me, sith hee hath nothing by descent holden by knights seruice, the law maketh his mother his guardian. Then may no man I suppose take my warde from mee out of Sanctuarie, without the breach of Sanctuarie. And if my priuiledge could not serue him, no; he aske it for himself, yet sith the law committeth to me the custody of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a guardian only for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods serue.

¶ And if examples be sufficient to obtaine priuiledge for my childe, I neede not far to seeke. For in this place in which now wee be (and which is now in question, whether my child maie take benefit of it) mine other son (now king) was bozne, and kept in his cradle, and preserved to a more prosperous fortune, which I praye God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuarie. For when my Lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his kingdome, I fled hither, being great with child, and here I bare the prince. And when my Lord my husbande returned safe againe, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the prince vnto his father, when hee first tooke him in his armes. And I praye God that my sons palace may bee as great safegarde vnto him now raigning, as this place was sometime to the kings enemy. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, sith, &c. * Wherefore here intend I to keepe him, since mans law serueth the guardian to keepe the infant. The law of nature willes the mother keepe the child, Gods law priuiledgeth the Sanctuarie, and the Sanctuarie my son, sith I feare to put him in the protectors hands that hath his brother alreadie, and were (if both failed) inheritor to the crowne. The cause of my feare hath no man to doo to examine: And yet feare I no farther than the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euerie man the custodie of the m, by whose death hee may inherit lesse land than a kingdome. I can no moze, but whosoever he be that breaketh this holy sanctuarie, I pray God shortly send him need of sanctuarie, when he may not come to it: For taken out of sanctuarie would I not my moztall enemy were.

The Lorde Cardinall percelusing that the Queene wared euer the longer the further off, and also that she beganne to kinde and chafe, and speake moze biting wordes against the protector, and such as he neither belaued, and was also loath to heare; he said to her for a finall conclusion, that he would no longer dispute the matter, but if she were content to deliuer the duke to him, and to the other Lords present, he durst lay his own body and soule both in pledge, not only for his surety, but also for his estate. And if she would giue them a resolute answer to the contrary, he would forthwith depart threewithall, and shift who so would with this businesse afterwards, for hee neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which she thought that he and all other also saue herselfe lacked either witt or truethy. What, if they were so dull that they could nothing perceiue what the protector intended; true th, if they shoulde procure her son to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they shoulde perceiue towarde the child any euill intended.

The Quene with these wordes stood a good while in a great studie: And forasmuch as he seemed y<sup>e</sup> cardinall readier to depart then some of the remnant, and the protector himselfe readie at hand, so that she verilie thought she could not keepe him there, but that he shoulde incontinent bee taken thence; and to conueie him else where, neither hadde shee time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appoynted, all thinges vnready, this messenger came on her so sodaynelie, nothing lesse looking for, than to haue him fetcht out of Sanctuarie, which shee thoughte to bee now be sette in such places about, that hee could not bee conueyed out vntaken; and partelie (as shee thought) it mighte fortune, her feare to bee false, so well shee wisse it was either needlesse, or bootlesse: wherefore, if shee shoulde needes goe from him, shee deemed it best to deliuer him. And ouer that, of the Cardinals sayth shee nothing doubted, nor of some other Lords neither, whome shee there sawe. Which as shee fearedd leasse they might bee deceyued; so was shee well assured they woulde not bee corrupted: then thought shee it shoulde yet make them the more warilie to looke to him, and the more circumspectlie to see to his suretie, if shee with her owne handes betooke him to them of trust. And at the last shee tooke the yong Duke by the hand, and said vnto the Lordes: My Lordes (quoth shee) and all my Lords, I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspitious to mistruste your truthe: of which thing I purpose to make you such a prooffe, as if eyther of both lacked in you, might turne both vnto great sorrow, the realme to much harme, and you to great reproch. For so, here is (quoth shee) this gentleman, whome I doubt not but I could here keepe safe, if I would, whatsoeuer any man saie: & I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it lay in their owne bodie, they woulde let it out. Wee haue also experience that the desire of a Kingdome knoweth no kindred: The Brother hath bene the Brothers bane: and may the nephewes bee sure of their vncle: Each of these children is the others defence while they bee asunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others bodie. Keepe one safe and both bee sure, and nothing for them both more perillous, than to bee both in one place. For what wise merchant aduentureth all his goods in one Shippe? All this notwithstanding, heere I deliuer him, and his Brother in him, to keepe, into your handes, of whome

I shall aske them both afore God and the worlde. Faythfull yee be, that tooke I well, and I knowe well yee bee wisse. Power and strength to keepe him if you like, neither lacke yee of your selfe, nor can lacke helpe in this case: And if yee cannot els where, then may you leaue him here. But onlie one thing I beseech you, for the trust which his father put in you euer, and for the trust I put in you now, that as far as yee thinke that I feare too much, be you well ware that you feare not as farre too little. And therewithall shee said vnto the child, farewell mine owne swaete sonne, God sende you good keeping: let mee kisse yee yet once ere you goe, for God knoweth when wee shall kisse together againe: And therewith shee kissed him, and blessed him, turned her backe and wept, and went her waie, leauing the childe weeping as faine. When the lord Cardinall and those other Lords with him had receiued this yong duke, they brought him into the Starre Chamber, where the Protector tooke him in his Armes and kissed him, with these wordes: Goe welcome my Lorde, euen withall my verte Heart: And hee sayde in that of likelyhoode as hee thought. Thereupon forthwith they broughte him vnto the King his Brother, into the Bishoppes Palace at Paules, and from thence through the city honourable into the Towre, out of the which after that date they neuer came abroad.

Dissimulation.

¶ When the Protector had both the children in his handes, he opened himselfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, and also chieflie to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that manie thought that this duke was prouide to all the protectors counsell, euen from the beginning, and some of the protectors friends said, that the duke was the first mouer of the protector to this matter, sending a priuy messenger vnto him, straight after King Edwards death. But other againe which knew better the subtil wit of the protector, denie that hee euer opened his enterprize to the duke, vntill hee had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when hee had imprisoned the quenes kindred, and gotten both his sons into his owne handes, then hee opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whome he thought meete for the matter, and specially to the duke, who being won to his purpose, hee thought his strength more then halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the duke by subtil folks, and such as were their craftes masters in handling of such wicked deuises: who declared vnto him that the yong King was offended with him for his kindreds sake, & if he were euer able he would reuenge them: who would prick him forward thereunto if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment): or else if they were put to death, without doubt the yong King would be carefull for their deaths, whose imprisonment was grievous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke should nothing auaille, for there was no way left to redde his offence by benefits, but he should sooner destroy himselfe then saue the king, who with his brother and his kindreds he saw in such places imprisoned, as the protector might with a becke destroy them all: and that it were no doubt but hee would do it indeede, if there were anie newe enterprize attempted. And that it was likelie, that as the Protector had prouided priue garde for himselfe, so had hee spialles for the Duke, and traynes to catch him, if hee

This that is here betwene this marke ¶ at this marke ¶ was not written by him in English, but is translated out of this historie which he wrote in Latin.

should be against him, and that peradventure from them, whom he least suspected. For the state of things and the dispositions of men were then such, that a man could not well tell whom he might trust, or whom he might feare.*

These things and such like, being beaten into the dukes mind, brought him to that point, that where he had repented <sup>h</sup> way that he had entred, yet would he go forth in the same, and since he had once begunne, he would stoutly goe through. And therfore to this wicked enterprise which he belæued could not be voided, he bent himselfe, and went through and determined, that since the common mischief could not be amended, he would turne it as much as hee might to his owne commoditie.

When it was agreed, that the Protector should haue the Dukes asde to make him king, and that the Protector's only lawfull sonne should martie the dukes daughter, and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earldome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in king Edwards time: Besides these requests of the Duke, the protector of his owne mind promised him a great quantitie of the kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwene themselves, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the yong king as they would haue it seeme: And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceiuing of their dystes other where, the Lordes being sent for from all parts of the realme, came thicke to the solemnity: But the Protector, and the duke after that, that they had sent the lord Cardinall, the archbishop of Yorke then lord Chancelor, the bish. of Ely, the L. Stanley, and the L. Hastings then lord Chamberlaine, with many other noble men* to commune and deuise about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in another place contriuing the contrarie, and to make the protector king. To which Councell, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they were secret: yet began there here and there about, some manner of muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neuer wist what they feared, nor therfore, were it that before such great things mens harts of a secret instinct of nature misglue them, as the sea without wind swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest: or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiuing, filled many men with suspicion, though hee shewed fewe men what he knewe. Howbeit, somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to mize on the matter, though the councell were close. For by little and little, all folke withdrew from the tower, and drew to Crosbies in Bishops gate stræte, where the protector kept his household. The protector had the resort, the king in manner desolate.

While some for their businesse made suite to them that had the doing, some were by their friends secretly warned, that it might happily turne them to no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the protector's appointment, which remoued also diuers of the princes olde seruants from him, and set them about him.

Thus manye thinges comming together partly by chance, partly of purpose, caused at length not common people onely, that wound with the winde, but wise men also, and some lordes eke to marke the matter, and mize thereon, so farre forth, that the Lord Stanley that was after earle of Darby, wisely mistrusted it, and saide vnto the Lord Hastings, that he much mistrusted these two seuerall Councells. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in þe one place, little wot we where of they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can there bee thing once moued, that shoulde sound a misse toward me, but it shoulde be in mine eares ere it were well out of their mouthes.

This meant he by Catesby, which was of his nere secret counsell, and whom Catesby. he verie familiarly vled, and in his most weightie matters put no man in so speciall trust, reckoning himselfe to no man so lief, sith he well wist there was no man so much to him beholden as was this Catesby, which was a man wel learned in the lawes of this land, and by the speciall fauor of the L. Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, & much rule bare he in all the countie of Leicester, where the lord Chamberlains power chiefly lay. But sorely great pittie was it, that he had not had either more truth or lesse wit: for his dissimulation only, kept all that mischiese by. In whom if the lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the lord Stanley and he had departed with diuers other lordes, and broken all the daunce, for many ill signes that he saw, which he now construes al to the best. So surely thought he, that there could be no harme toward him in that counsell intended where Catesby was.

And of trust the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham made verie good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings, and kept him much in companie: And undoubtedly the protector loued him well, and loth was to haue lost him, sauing for feare least his life shoulde haue quailed their purpose. For which cause hee moued Catesby to proue with some wordes cast out a far off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the Lord Hastings vnto their part: But Catesby whether he assaied him, or assaied him not, reported vnto them, that he founde him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible wordes, that he durst no further bryake.

And of trust the lord Chamberlaine of very trust shewed vnto Catesby the distrust that other began to haue in the matter: And therefore he fearing least their motion might with the Lord Hastings minish his credence, wherunto onely all the matter leaned, procured the protector hastily to ridde him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obtaine much of the rule that the lord Hastings bare in his countrey: the onely desire whereof was the allectue that induced him to be partner and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Whereupon some asser, that is to wit, on the fridate the thirtenth date of June, many lordes assembled in the towre, and there sate in counsell, deuising the honorable solemnities of the kings coronation, of which the time appointed then so nere approached, that the pageants and subtilties were in making daie and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed therefore, that after ward was cast away.

These Lordes so sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came came in amongst them first about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteous-ly, and excusing himselfe that he had bene from them so long, saying merilie, that he had bene a sleeper that day.

And after a little talking with them, he said unto the bisshope of Ely: My Lord, you haue very good strawberies at your garden in Holborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of them. Gladly my lord (quoth he) would God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that. And therewith in all the haste he sent his seruant for a messe of strawberies.

The Protector set the Lordes fast in communing, and thereupon praying them to spare him for a little while, departed thence: And sone after one houre, betwene 10. and 11. he returned into the chamber among them all, changed with a wonderfull sower angrie countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lips, and so sate him downe in his place, all the lordes much dismayed and sore maruelling of this maner of suddenn change, and what thing should him aile. Then, when he had sitten still a while, thus he began: What were they worthe to haue that compasse and imagine the destruction of me, being so nere of blood unto the king, and protector of his royal person and his realme? At this question, all the lordes sate sore astonied, musing much by whom this question should bee meant, of which euery man wist himselfe cleare.

Then the lord Chamberlaine, as he that for the loue betwene them thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said, that they were worthe to be punished as hainous traitors, whatsoener they were: And all the other affirmed the same. That is (quoth he) ponder sozeresse my brothers wife, and other with her, meaning y<sup>e</sup> quene. At these words many of the other lordes were greatly abashed that fauored her. But the L. Hallings was in his mind better content that it was moued by her, than by any other whom he loued better: albeit his hart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he was of the taking of her kinred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to bee beheaded at Pontfract this selfesame day, in which he was not ware that it was by other deuised, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the protector, Ye shall all see in what wise that sozeresse, and that other witch of her counsell Shores wife with their affinity, haue by their sozerie and witchcraft wasted my body: And therewith he plucked by his doublet sleeve to his elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a werissh withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other. And thereupon euery mans minde sore misgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarrell: For they well wist, that the Quene was too wise to go about any such folly: And also if she would, yet would she of all folke least make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all women she most hated, as that concubine whom the king her husband had most loued: And also, no man was there present but well knew y<sup>e</sup> his arme was euer such since his birth. Nay the lesse the lord Chamberlaine (which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, on whom he somewhat doted in the kings life, sauing (as it is saide) hee that while forbare her of reuerence toward the king, or else of a certaine kind of felicity to his friend) answered and said : Certainly my lord, if they haue so heinously done, they be worthy heinous punishment.

What (quoth the protector) thou seruest me I weene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy bodie traitor : and therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fist vpon the bord a great rap. At which token giuen, one cried treason without the chamber: Therewith a doze clapped, and in come there rushing men in harnesse, as many as the chamber might holde. And anone the protector said to the lord Hastings, I arrest thee traitor: What me my lord (quoth he?) yea thee traitor, quoth the protector. And another let fly at the lord Stanley, which shynke at the stroke, and fell vnder the table, or else his head had bene cleft to the teeth: for as shortly as he shynke, yet came the blood about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in diuers chambers, except the lord Chamberlaine, whom the protector had spee'd and shynke him apace, for by S. Paul (quoth he) I will not to dinnor till I see thy head off.

The lord Stanley wounded.

It booted him not to aske why, but heauilie toke a priest at auenture, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered, the protector made so much haste to dinner, which he might not go to, till this were done, for sauing of his oth. So was he brought forth into the græne beside the chappell within the tower, and his head laide dowlne vpon a long log of timber, and there stricken off, and afterward his body with the head entered at Windsor, beside the body of king Edward.

A marvellous case is it to heare either the warnings of that he should haue voided, or the tokens of that he could not void, for the selfe night next before his death, the L. Stanley sent a trustie secret messenger vnto him at midnight in all the haste, requiring him to rise and ride away with him, for he was disposed utterly no longer to bide, he had so fearfull a dreame, in which him thought, that a Boare with his tusks so rased them both by the heads, that the blood ran about both their shoulders. And for as much as the protector gaue the Boare for his cognisance, this dreame made so fearfull an impression in his hart, that he was thoroughly determined no longer to tarrie, but had his horse readie, if the L. Hastings would go with him to ride yet so far the same night, that they should be out of danger ere day. Ha good Lord (quoth the lord Hastings to this messenger) leaneeth my lord thy master so much to such trifles, & hath such faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasieeth, or doe rise in the nightes rest by reason of his daie thoughts: Tell him it is plaine witchcraft to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of thinges to come, why thinke he not that we might be as likely to make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought backe (as friends saile sicke) for then had the Boare a cause likely to race vs with his tuskes, as folke that fledde for some fallshood: wherefore either is there no perill, nor none there is in dedde; or if any be, it is rather in going than biding. And if we should needes cost fall in perill one way or other, yet had I leiser that men should see that it were by other mens fallshood, than thinke it were either by our owne fault, or saint heart: And therefore go to thy master man and commend me to him, and pray him to be mercie, and haue haue no feare: for I ensure him I am as sure of the man that he tooke of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send grace Sir, quoth the messenger, and went his waie.

Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the towre the same morning in which hee was beheaded, his horse twise or thise stumbled with him, almost to the falling: which thing albeit each man wot well daily happeneth to them to whome no such mischance is toward, yet hath it bene of an olde kite and Cuckome obserued as a token of tentimes notable sojerging some great misfortune.

Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious scoone.

The same morning ere he was vp, came a knight vnto him as it were of curtesie, to accompany him to the council, but of truth sent by the protector to haste him thitherwards, with whom he was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, and now of great authority.

This knight when it happened the Lord Chamberlaine by the waie to steele his horse, and commune a while with a priest whom he met in the Tower street, brake his tale, and said merrilie to him, what my Lorde, I praye you come on, whereto talke you so long with that priest, you haue no need of a priest yet: and therewith he laughed vpon him, as though hee would say, ye shall haue sone. But so little wist the other what he meant, and so little mistrusted, that he was neuer merrier, nor neuer so full of god hope in his life, which selfe thing is often seene a signe of change. But I shall rather let any thing passe me, than the vaine surety of mans mind so nere his death.

Vpon the very towre wharfe, so nere the place where his head was stroke off soon after, there met he with one Hastings a puruant of his owne name: and of their meeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before to meet in like manner together in the same place. At which other time the Lorde Chamberlaine had bene accused vnto king Edward by the Lorde Rivers the Duenes brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, but it lasted not long, farre fallen into the kings indignation, and stood in great feare of himselfe: And for as much as he nowe met this puruant in the same place that so perardie so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof, with whome hee had before talked thereof in the same place, while hee was therein. And therefore hee saide: Ah Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee heere once with an heauie heart? Yea my Lorde quoth he, that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no good, nor you no harme thereby. Thou wouldest say so, quoth he, if thou knewest as much as I know, which few know else as yet, and mo shall shortly. What meant he by the Lords of the Duenes kindred that were taken before, and should that daie be beheaded at Pontfract: which he well wist, but nothing ware that the Archbong ouer his owne head. In faith man, quoth hee, I was neuer so sozie, nor neuer stood in so great dread in my life, as I did when thou and I met here: And so how the world is turned, now stand mine enemies in the danger, as thou maist hap to heare moze hereafter, and I neuer in my life so merrie, nor euer in so great suretie.

God God, the blindnes of our mortal nature, when he most feared, he was in god suretie: when he reckoned himselfe surest he lost his life, and that within two howers after.

Thus ended this honourable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authority with his prince, of living somewhat dissolute, plaine, and open to his enemy, and secret to his friends, easie to beguile, as he that of good hart and courage fore studied no perils: a loving man, and passing well beloved: very faithfull and trustie enough, trusting too much. Now shew the same of this Loydes death swiftlie through the citie, and so forth farther about like a wind in every mans eare.

of the Loyd Hastings.

But the protector immediatlie after dinner, intending to set some colour upon the matter, sent in all haste for manie substantiall men out of the Citie into the tower: And at their comming, himselfe with the duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old ill faring Briganders, such as no man should wene that they would vouchsafe to haue put upon their backs, except that some sudden necessitie had constrained them.

And then the protector shewed them, that the lord chamberlaine and other of his conspract had contrived to haue suddenlie destroyed him and the Duke, there the same daie in the Councell. And what they intended further was as yet not well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge before. At the clocke the same forenone, which sudden feare droue them to put on for their defence such harnesse as came next to hand. And so had God holpen them, that the mischief turned upon them that would haue done it. And this he required them to report.

Euerie man answered him saie, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of troth no man beleued. Yet for the further appealing of the peoples mind, he sent immediately after dinner in all haste, an Herault of arms, with a proclamation to bee made through the Citie in the kings name, containing that the Loyd Hastings with diuers other of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same daie, to haue slaine the Loyde protector and the duke of Buckingham, sitting in the Councell, and after to haue taken vpon them to rule the King and the Realme, at their pleasure, and thereby to pill and spoile whom they liste vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that proclamation, deuised to the slaunder of the Loyd Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counsellor to the kings father, inciting him to manie thinges highlie redounding to the minishing of his honour, and to the vniuersall hurt of his Realme by his euill compaignie, sinister procuring, and vngracious ensample, as well in manie other thinges, as in the vicious living and inordinate abuse of his bodie, both with manie other, and also especiallie with Shores wife which was one also of his most secrete Counsell of this heinous treason, with whom he late nightlie, and namelie, the night last past next before his death, so that it was the lesse maruell, if vngracious living brought him to an vnhappie ending, which he was now put vnto, by the most breake commaundment of the Kinges highnesse, and of his honourable and faithfull Councell, both for his demerites, being so openly taken in his falsly conceived treason, also least the delaying of his execution might haue encouraged other mischievous persons partners of his owne conspiracie, to gather and assemble themselves together, in making some great commotion for his deliuerance: whose hope being now by his well deserued death politickely repressed, all the Realme should by Gods grace rest in god quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two howers after that hee was beheaded, and it was so curiously indited, and so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, that euery childe might well perceiue that it was prepared before. For all the time betwene his death and the proclaiming coulde scant haue sufficed vnto the bare writing alone, all had it bene but in paper, and scribled forth in haste at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was scholemaster of Paules, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnes of the time with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him: Here is a gaie godlie cast, foule cast awaie for haste: and a marchant answered him, that it was written by prophesie. Now then by and by as it were for anger, not for couetise, the protector sent into the house of Shores wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled her of all that euer she had, aboue the value of two or three thousand marke, & sent her bodie to prison: And when he had a while laid vnto her (for the manner sake) that she went about to bewitch him, and that shee was of counsell with the Lord Chamberlaine to despoile him: in conclusion, when that no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then he laid heinously to her charge, that thing that herselfe coulde not denie, that all the worlde wist was true, and that notwithstanding euery man laughed at, to heare it then so suddenly, so highly taken, that she was naught of her bodie.

The Sherifes of London, William Albrie & John Bathew set Shores wife out of hir house, by commandement of the protector, & led her thoroughout the city of London to the Tower, where she answered certaine points laid to her charge, and from thence she was committed to Ludgate, there to remain prisoner, &c.

And for this cause (as a good content prince, cleane and faultlesse of himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for amendment of mens manners) he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the crosse in procession vpon a sundae with a taper in her hand: In which shee went in countenance and pace demure so womanlike, and albeit shee were out of all arate saue her kirtle onely, yet went she so faire and lowly, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comely rudd in her cheekes (of which shee before had most misse) that hir great shame wanne hir much praise, among those that were more amorous of hir body, than curious of hir soule. And many good folke also that hated hir living, and glad were to see sin corrected: yet pitied the more hir penance, than reioiced therein, when they considered that the protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

The Description of Shores wife.

This woman was borne in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought vp, and verie well married, sauing somewhat too soone, her husbande an honest citizen, young and godly, and of good substance: But for as much as they were coupled ere she were well ripe, she not very feruently loued, for whom the neuer longed, which was happily the thing that the more easily made hir incline vnto the kings appetite, when he required her. Notwithstanding the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparell, ease, pleasure, and other wanton wealth, was able some to pierce a soft tender hart.

But

But when the king had abused her, anone hir husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his god, not presuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her by to him altogether.

When the king died the Lord Chamberlaine took her, which in the kings daies, albeit he was soze enamoured vpon hir, yet he forbore her, either for reverence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulness: proper she was and faire, nothing in her bodie that you woulde haue changed, but if you woulde haue wished her somewhat higher.

Thus saie they that knewe hir in her youth, albeit some that now see hir (for yet she liueth) deeme hir neuer to haue bene well visaged, whose iudgement seemeth me somewhat like, as though men should gesse the beautie of one long before departed, by her scalpe taken out of the charnell house: for now is she old, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riuel skin & hard bone. And yet being euen such: who so well aduise hir visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled would make it a faire face: yet belited not men so much in her beautie as in her pleasant behauior. For a proper wit had she, & could both read well and write, merry in companie, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without discretion.

The king would say that he had three Concubines, which in three diuers properties diuer she excelled. One the merriest, another the wisest, the third the hottest harlot in his realme, as one whome no man coulde get out of the Church lightly to any place, but it were to his bed. The other two were somewhat greater personages, & notwithstanding of their humilitie content to be nameles, and to forebeare the praise of those properties. But the merriest was this Shores wife, in whome the king therefore took speciall pleasure. For manie hee had, but her beloued, whose fauor to sake the troth (for sin it were to belie the diuell) she neuer abused to anie mans hurt, but to manie a mans comfort and reliefe, where the king took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind: where men were out of fauour, she would bring them in his grace. For manie that had highly offended shee obtayned pardon: Of great forfeitures shee gat men remission: And finally, in manie weighty suites shee stood many men in great need, either for none or verie small rewarde, and those rather gave then rich: either for that she was contente with the deede it selfe well done, or for that shee belited to bee sued vnto, and to shewe what shee was able to dooe with the king, or for that wanton Women and wealthe bee not alwayes contentous.

I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too sleighte a thing to bee written of, and set among the remembraunces of great matters: which they shall speciallie thinke, that happilie shall esteeme hir onle by that they now see her. But mee seemeth the chauce so much the more woorthie to bee remembred, in howe much shee is nowe in the more beggerlie condition, unfriended and worne out of acquayntaunce, after good substance, after as greate fauour with the Prince, after as greate suite and seeking to with all those that those daies had businesse to speede, as manie other men were in their times, which be

Sir Richard
Ratcliffe.

So he was it so deuised by the Protector and his counsaile, that the selfe daie in which the Lorde Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same houre, was there (not without his assent) beheaded at Pontefraite, the forerremembred Lordes and knightes that were taken from the king at Northampton and from Stratforde. Which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe knight, whose seruice the Protector specially vsed in that counsell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had been long secret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a shrewd wit, short and rude in speech, rough and boysterous of behauiour, bolde in mischiefe, as farre from pittie as from all feare of God.

The lord Riuers and other beheaded.

This knight bringing them out of the prison to the scaffold, and shewing to the people about that they were traitors, not suffering them to declare and speake their innocencie, least their words might haue inclined men to pittie them, and to hate the Protector and his part: caused them hastily without iudgement, processe, or maner of order, to be beheaded, & without other earthly guilt, but onely that they were good men, true to the king, and true to the queene.

So he when the lord Chamberlaine and these other lordes and knightes were thus beheaded and rid out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men mused what the matter meant, while the lordes of the Realme were about him out of their owne strengthes, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whome to trust, ere euer they should haue space to dispute and digest the matter and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the crowne, ere men coulde haue time to deuise any way to resist.

But nowe was all the studie by what meane this matter being of it selfe so heynous, might be first broken to the people, in such wise that it might be well taken.

To this Counsell they took diuers, such as they thought meetely to be trusted, likely to be induced to that part, and able to stand them in steede either by power or policie.

Edmond Shaa
maior of London.

Among whome they made of Counsaile Edmond Shaa knight then maior of London, which vpon trust of his owne advancement, where of he was of a proud hart highly desirous, should frame the city to their appetite. Of spirituell men they took such as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience.

Dorset Shaa,
Friar Pinke.

Among these had they Iohn Shaa Clarke, brother to the maior, and Friar Pinke, prouinciall of the Augustine Friars, both doctors of Divinitie, both great great preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatly esteemed among the people: but after that neuer. Of these two the one had a sermon in praise of the protector before the coronation, the other after, both so full of tedious flattery, that no mans eares could abide them.

Pinke in his sermon so lost his voice, that hee was faine to leaue off and come downe in the midst. Doctor Shaa by his sermon lost his honestie, and sone after his life, for verie shame of the worlde, into which he durst neuer after come abroad. But the siter forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Whoebeit some doubt and many thinke, that Pinke was not of counsaile of the matter before the coronation, but after the common maner, fell to flattery after: namely sith his sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at Saint Marie Hospitall at the Easter after. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counsaile in the beginning, so farre forth, that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a sermon at Pauls Crosse, in which hee should by the authoritie of his preaching, incline the people to the Protectors ghostly purpose.

But now was all the labour and studie, in the deuise of some conuenient pretext, for which the people should be content to depose the Prince, and accept the protector for king. In which diuers things they deuised. But the chiefe thing and the weight of all that inuention rested in this, that they should alleadge Bastardie, either in king Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that he should seme disabled to inherite the crowne, by the Duke of Yorke, and the Prince by him.

To lay bastardie in king Edward sounded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors owne mother, which was mother to them both: for in that point coulde be none other colour but to pretend that his owne mother was an aduoutrisse, which notwithstanding, to further this purpose he letted not: but nay the lesse, he would that point should be lesse and more sauourable handled, not euen fullie plaine and directlie, but that the matter should be touched aslope craftilie, as though men spared in that point to speake all the troth, for feare of his displeasure.

But the other point concerning the bastardy that they deuised to surmise in King Edwards children, that would he should be openly declared, and enforced to the vttermost. The colour and pretext thereof, cannot be well percesued, but if we first reparate you some things long before done about king Edwards marriage.

After that H. Edward the 4 had deposed H. Henry the first, and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determining himselfe to marry, as it was requisite both for himselfe and for the realme, he sent ouer in ambassade the earle of Warwike, with other noble men in his companie vnto Spaine, to intreate and conclude a marriage betwene King Edward and the kings daughter of Spaine. In which thing the Earle of Warwike found the parties so towarde and willing, that he speedily according to his instructions without anye difficultie, brought the matter to very good conclusion.

Dame Elizabeth
birth.

So we happened it, that in the meane season there came to make suite by petition to the king dame Elizabeth Grey, which was after his Quene, at that time a widow, bozne of noble blood, speciallie by her mother, which was Dutchesse of Bedford ere she married the Lord Woodville her father. Notobest this dame Elizabeth her selfe, beeing in seruice with Quene Margaret wife vnto king Henry the first, was married vnto one Iohn Grey an esquire, whom king Henry made knight, vpon the field that he had on Barnet heath by S. Albons against king Edward. And little while enioied he that knight-hood, for he was at the same field slaine.

After which done, and the earle of Marwike being in his ambassade about the afore remembred marriage, this poore Ladie made humble suite vnto the king, that shee might bee restoyed vnto such small landes as her late husband had giuen her in iointure. Whome when the king behelde, and heard her speake, as she was both faire and of a goodlie fauor, moderate of stature, well made, and verie wise: he not onelie pittied her, but also waied enamoured of her: and taking her after secretlie aside, beganne to enter in talking more familiarlie. Whose appetite when shee perceiued, shee vertuouslie denied him. But that did the so wiselie, and with so good manner, and wordes so well set, that she rather kindled his desire than quenched it.

And finally, after manie a meeting, much wooing, and many great promises, she well espied the kings affection toward her so greatly increased, that she durst somewhat the more boldlie saie her mind, as to him whose heart she perceiued more seruientlie set, than to fall off for a word.

And in conclusion, she shewed him playne, that as shee wiske her selfe too simple to bee his wife, so thought shee her selfe too good to bee his Concubine. The king much maruelling at her constancie, as he that had not bene wont else where to bee so stiffelie sayde naie, so much esteemed her continencie, and chastitie, that hee sette her vertue in steade of possession and riches, and thus taking counsaile of his desire, determined in all possible haste to marrie her.

ther.

And after hee was thus appointed, and had betwene them twaine ensured her: then asked hee counsaile of his other friends, and that in such manner, as they might then perceiue, it booted not greatlie to saie naie. Notwithstanding the Dutches of Borke his mother was so sore moued therewith, that she dissuaded the marriage as much as she possibly might, alleading that it was his honour, profite, and suretie also, to marrie in a noble pogenie out of his Realme, whereupon depended great strength to his Estate, by the affinity and great possibilitie of encrease of his possession. And that hee coude not wel otherwise do, standing that he earle of Marwike had so far moued already, which were not likely to take it wel, if all his voyage were in such wise frustrated and his appointments deluded. And she saide also, that it was not princelie to marrie his owne subiect, no great occasion leading thereunto, no possessions, or other commodity depending thereupon, but only as it were a rich man that woulde marrie his maide, onlie for a little wanton dottage vpon his person. In which marriage many mo commend the maidens fortune than the masters wisdome.

wisdom. And yet therein shee saide there was more honestie than honour in this marriage: for as much as there is betwene a merchant and his owne malde so great difference, as betwene the king and this Widow. In whose person, albeit there was nothing to be misliked, yet was there (shee saide) nothing so excellent but that it might be found in diuers other that were more matelie (quoth she) for your estate, and maidens also, whereas the onelic Widowhead of Elizabeth Grey, though she were in all other things conuenient for you, should yet suffice, as me seemeth, to refraine you from her marriage, sith it is an vnfitting thing, and a verie blemish and high disparagement to the sacred maiestie of a prince, that ought as nigh to approach priest-hood in cleanness as he doth in dignity, to be defouled with bigamie in his first marriage.

The king then his mother had saide, made her aunswere, part in earnest, part in plaie merrilie, as hee that wiske himselfe out of her rule. And albeit, hee woulde gladlie that shee should take it well, yet was at a point in his owne minde, tooke shee it well or other wise. Howbeit somewhat to satisfie her, he said, that albeit marriage being a spirituall thing, ought rather to be made for the respect of God, where his grace enclineth the parties to loue together, as he trusted it was in his, than for the regard of any temporall aduantage: yet notwithstanding, him seemed that this marriage euen worlde considered, was not vnprofitable. For he reckoned the amitie of no earthlie nation so necessarie for him, as the friendship of his owne, which he thought likelie to brare him so much the more heartie fauour, in that he disdayned not to marrie with one of his owne land. And yet if outward alliance were thought so requisite, he woulde finde the meanes to enter thereunto, much better by other of his kin, where all the parties coulde be contented, than to marrie himselfe whome hee should happilie neuer loue, and for the possibilitie of more possessions, leese the fruite and pleasure of this that he had already. For small pleasure taketh a man in all that euer he hath beside, if he be twined against his appetite. And I doubt not (quoth he) but there be as ye say other, that be in euery point comparable with hir: and therefore I let not them that like them to wed them: for more is it reason, that it mislike any man, that I marrie where it liketh mee. And I am sure that my Cousin of Warwike neyther loueth mee so little, to grudge at that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in chosse of a wife, rather bee ruled by his eie, than by mine owne: as though I were a ward that were bound to marrie by the appointment of a guardian. I would not be a king with that condition, to forebeare mine owne libertie in choyse of mine owne marriage.

As for possibilitie of more inheritance by new affinitie in strange lands, is oft the occasion of more trouble than profite: and we haue already title by that meanes, to so much as sufficeth to get and keepe well in one mans daies. That she is a widow and hath already children, by gods blessed lady I am a bachelor and haue some two, and so each of vs hath a prowe that neither of vs is like to be barrain. And therefore (madam) I pray you be content, I trust in God she shall bring forth a young prince that shall please you. And as for the Bigamie, let the Bishop hardlie laie it in my waite when I come to take orders: For

Lucie.

The dutches with these wordes nothing appeased, and seeing the king so set thereon, that she could not pull him backe, so highly she disdained it, that vnder pretext of her dutie to godward, she deuised to disturb this marriage, and rather to helpe that he should marrie one dame Elizabeth Lucie, whom the king had also not long before gotten with childe. Wherefore the kings mother openly objected against his marriage, as it were in discharge of her conscience, that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucie, and her husband before God. By reason of which wordes, such obstacle was made in the matter, that either the bishops durst not, or the king would not proceede to the solemnization of this wedding, till these same were clarely purged, and the troth well and openly testified. Whereupon dame Elizabeth Lucie was sent for.

And albeit that she was by the kings mother and manie other put in good comfort, to assure that she was ensured vnto the king: yet when she was solemnly swozne to saie the troth, she confessed that they were neuer ensured. Whobest she said his grace spake so louing wordes vnto her, that she verily hoped he would haue married her. And that if it had not been for such kind wordes, she would neuer haue shewed such kindnes to him, to let him so kindly get her with childe.

The kings marriage.

This examination solemnelie taken, when it was clarely perceiued that there was none impediment: the k. with great feast and honorable solemnity, married dame Elizabeth Grey, and her crowned quene that was his enemies wife, and manie time had prayed full heartily for his losse, in which God loued her better than to grant her her boone.

But when the earle of Warlike vnderstood of this marriage, he toke it so highly that his ambassage was deluded, that for verie anger and disoaine, he at his returning assembled a great puissance against the king, and came so fast vpon him or he could be able to resist, that he was faine to vould the realme, and fle into Holland for succor, where he remained for the space of two yers, leauing his new wife in Westminster in Sanctuary, where she was deliuered of Edward the Prince, of whom we before haue spoken. In which meane time the earle of Warlike toke out of prison, & set vp again H. Henry the first, which was before by H. Edward deposed, and that much what by the power of the earle of Warlike which was a wise man, and a couragious warrior, and of such strength, that for his lands, his alliance, and fauor with all people, that he made kings, and put downe kings almost at his pleasure, and not impossible to haue attained it himselfe, if hee had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king. But nothing lasteth alway: for in conclusion H. Edward returned, and with much lesse number than he had at Barnet on the Casserday field, slew the erle of Warlike, with many other great estates of that partie, and so stably attained the crowne againe, that he peaceably enjoyed it vntill his dying daie: and in such plight left it, that it could not be lost, but by the discord of his very friends, or falsehood of his fained friends. I haue rehearsed this businesse about this marriage some what the more at length, because because it might thereby the better appeare vpon how slipper a ground the protector builded his coloz, by which he pretended king Edwards children to be bastards: But that inuention simple as it was, it liked them to whom it sufficed to haue somewhat to saie, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger profe than themselves list to make.

Now then (as I began to shew you) it was by the protector and his counsel concluded, that this Doctor Shaa should in a Sermon at Pauls croffe signify to the people, that neither king Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, were lawfullie begotten, nor were not the verie children of the duke of Yorke, but begotten vnlawfullie by other persons, by aduoutrie of the dutchesse their mother. And that also dame Elizabeth Lucy was verilie the wife of king Edward, and so the prince and all his children bastards, that were begotten vpon the Queene. According to this deuise doctor Shaa the Sondaye after, at Pauls Croffe in a great audience (as alwaie assembled greates number to his preaching) he took for his theme Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas. That is to saie: Bastard slips shall neuer take deepe roote.

Doctor Shaa's
sermon on sun. day the 19 of June.

Thereupon when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretly insundeth in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parentes were for the more part vnhappie which were gotten in base, and speciallie in aduoutrie, of which though some by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge inherited for the season other mens lands, yet God alwaie so prouideth, that it continueth not in their bloode long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors bee restored and the Bastarde slippe pulled vp ere it can bee rooted deepe. And when he had laide for the profe and confirmation of this sentence certaine examples taken out of the olde Testament, and other puncient Histories, then beganne he to descende into the praife of the R. H. R. Richard late Duke of Yorke, calling him Father to the lord protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whome it was after the death of King Henry the first entailed by authoritie of Parliament. Then shewed hee that his verie right heire of his bodie lawfullie begotten was onlie the Lord protector: For he declared then, that King Edward was neuer lawfullie married vnto the Queene, but was before God husband vnto dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither king Edward himselfe, nor the duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the houshold, were reckoned verie surely for the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their fauors more resembled other knowne men than him. From whose vertuous conditions he saide also that king Edward was far off. But the Lord protector he said, the verie noble prince, the speciall paterne of knightly prowes, as well in al princely behaviour, as in the lineaments and fauor of his visage, represented the very face of the noble duke his father. This is quoth he, the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his visage, the very sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenes of that noble duke.

Now was it before deuised, that in the speaking of these wordes, the Profectoꝝ shoulde haue come in among the people to the Sermon warde, to the end that those meeting with his presence, might haue bene taken among the hearers, as though the holie Ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, and shoulde haue moued the people euen there to crye, king Richard, king Richard, that it might haue bene after sayde, that hee was speciallie chosen by God, and in maner by myracle. But this deuise quailed, eyther by the Protector's negligence, or the Preachers ouermuch diligence. For while the Protector founde by the wate tarrying, least hee shoulde prevent those wordes, and the Doctor fearing that hee shoulde come ere his Sermon coulde come to these wordes, hastned his matter thereto, who was come to them, and passe them, and entred into other matters ere the Protector came. Whome when hee behelde comming, hee sodaynelie left the matter with which hee was in hande, and without anie deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, beganne to repeate those wordes agayne: This is the verie Noble Prince, the speciall paterne of knightlie pꝛotectors, which as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineamentes and fauour of his visage, representeth the verie face of the noble duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenaunce, the verie printe of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenes of the noble duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, went thꝛough the people into the place where the doctors commonly stand in the vpper story, where hee stode to hearken the Sermon. But the people were so far from crying king Richard, that they stood as they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull Sermon.

Preacher.

After which once ended, the Preacher gat him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight like an Owle. And when hee once asked one that had bene his old friend, what the people talked of him, all were it that his owne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strooke him to the hart, that within few daies after he withered and consumed a waie.

The 21. of June.

Then on the Tuesdaie following this sermon, there came into the Guildhall in London the duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuers Lordes and knightes, more than happilie knew the message that they brought. And there in the East ende of the hall, where the Maior keepeth the Hustings, the maior & all the Aldermen being assembled about him, all the commons of the citie gathered before them: after silence commanded vpon great pain in the protectoꝝs name, the duke stood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature maruellously well spoken) he said vnto the people with a cleare and a loud voice in this maner of wise.

The Duke of Buckingham's
Oration.

Friends, for the zeale and heartie fauor that I receiue from you, wee bee come to breake vnto you, of a matter right great and weightie, and no lesse weightie than pleasing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: not to no part of the realme moze profitable, than to you the Citizens of this noble Citie. For wher that

that thing that we wot well ye haue long time lacked, and soze longed for, that ye would haue giuen gre at god for, that yee woulde haue gone farre to fetch, that thing we be come hither to bring you without your labour, paine, cost, aduenture or leopardie. What thing is that? Certes the suretie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your Wives and your Daughters, the safegarde of your goods: of all which thinges in time past ye stood ener moze in doubt. For who was there of you all, that would reckon himselfe lord of his owne goods among so many greins and traps as were set therfore, among so much pilling and polling, among so manie farces and tallages, of which there was neuer end, and ofentimes no need: or if anie were, it rather grew of riot, and unreasonable wast, than anie necessarie or honozable charge? So that there was daile pilled from god men and honest great substance of goods to be lashed out among vnchristis, so farre forth that sickenes sufficed not, nor anie vsmall manner of knowne Taxes: but vnder an easie name of beneuolence and good will, the Commissioners so much of euerie man tooke, as no man could with his god will haue giuen: as though that name of beneuolence, had signified that euery man should pay not what himselfe of his owne god will list to grant, but what the king of his god will list to take. Which neuer asked little, but euery thing was haunsted above the measure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ransoms, small trespasses into misprision, misprision into treason. Whereof I think no man looketh that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, that was for a word spoken in haste cruelly beheaded, by the misconstruing of the lawes of this realme for the princes pleasure; with no lesse honour to Marcam then chiefe Justice, that left his office rather than he would assent to that iudgement, than to the dishonesty of those that either for feare or flattery gaue that iudgement. What Cooke your owne woorthipfull neyghbor, alderman and maior of this noble citie, who is of you either so negligent that he knoweth not, or so forgetfull that he remembreth not, or so hard harted that he pittieeth not that woorthipful mans losse? What speake we of losse? his vtter spoile and vnderferued destruction, onelie for that it happened those to fauor him whome the prince fauoured not. We need not I suppose to rehearse of these anie mo by name, sith there bee (I doubt not) manie heere present, that either in themselves, or in their nigh friends haue knowne as well their goods as their persons, greatlie indangered, either by fained quarrelles, or small matters agreede with heynous names. And also there was no crime so greate, of which there coulde lacke a pretext. For sith the king preuenting the time of his inheritance attayned the Crowne by battell: it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to haue been of kindred or alliance, nere familiaritie, or longer acquaintance with anie of those that were at anie time the enemies, which was at one time & other, moze than halfe the realme. Thus were neither your goods in surety, & yet they brought your bodies in leopardey, beside the common aduenture of open war, which albeit that it is ener the will & occasion of much mischiefe, yet it is neuer so mischecious as where any people fall at distance among themselves, nor in none earthly nation, so deadly & so pestilent, as when it hapneth among vs: & among vs neuer so long continued dissention, no; so manie battalles in that season, no; so cruell and so deadlie foughten, as was in that kings daies that dead is, God forgue it his soule. In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the garlande, keeping it, lesing, and winning againe, it hath cost moze English blood, than hath twice the winning of France. In which inward warre among our selues, hath bene so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this Realme, that scarcely the halfe remaineth, to the great enfeebing of this noble land, beside many a good towne ransacked and spoiled by them, that haue bene going to the felde or comming from thence: And peace long after not much surer then warre. So that no time was there, in which rich men for their money, and great men for their landes, or some other for some feare, or some displeasure were not out of perill. For whome trusted he that mistrusted his owne brother? whome spared he that killed his owne brother? or who coulde perfitly loue him, if his owne brother coulde not? What manner of folke hee most fauoured we shall for his hono; spare to speake of, howbeit, this wot you well all, that whoso was best, bare alwaie least rule, and moze sute was in his daies vnto Shores wife, a vile and an abhominable strumpet, than to all the lordes in Englande, except vnto those that made her their protecto;: which simple woman was well named and honest, till the king for his wanton lulk and sinfull affection bereft her from her husbände, a right honest substantiall yong man among you. And in that point, which in god faith I am sozie to speake of, sauing that it is in baine to kepe in counsel that thing that all men know, the kings greedy appetite was insatiable, and euery where ouer all the realme intolerable: for no woman was there any where, yong or olde, rich or poze, whom he set his eye vpon, in whom he any thing liked, either person or fauor, speech, pace, or countenance, but without any feare of God, or respect of his honour, mormore or grudge of the world, he would importunely pursue his appetite, and haue her, to the great destruction of many a good woman, and great dolor to their husbands and their other friends, which being honest people of themselves, so much regard the cleannesse of their house, the chastity of their wiues and their chyllozen, that them were leauer to lese all that they haue beside, than to haue such a villany done them. And all were it that with this and other importable dealings, the realme was in euerie part annoied: yet specially ye here the citizens of this noble city, as wel for that amongst you is most plenty of all such thinges as minisster matter to such injuries, as for that you were nearest at hand, sith that nere heereabout was commonly his most abidding. And yet be ye the people whom he had as singular cause well and kindly to intreat, as any part of his realme, not only for that the prince by this noble city, as his especiall chamber, & the speciall well renowned city of his realm, much honozable fame receiueth among all other nations: but also for that ye, not without your great cost, and sundry perils and iopardies in all his wars, bare euen your speciall fauor to his part, which your kinde mindes bozne vnto the house of Bozke, sith he hath nothing wo;thily acquited, there is of that house that now by Gods grace better shall, which thing to shewe you, is the whole summe and effect of this our present errand. It shall not, I wot well, need that

I rehearse to you againe that yee haue already heard, of him that can better tel it, & of whom I am sure ye will better beleue it: and reason is that it so be. I am not so prouid to looke therefore, that yee should reckon my wordes of as great authoritie as the preachers of the word of God, namely, a man so cunning and so wise, that no man better wotteth what he should saie, and thereto so good and vertuous, that he would not saie the thing which he wist hee should not saie, in the pulpet, namely, into the which no honest man commeth to lie, which honourable Preacher yee well remember substantiallly declared vnto you at Paules Crosse, on Sundae last passed, the right and title, that the most excellent Prince Richard Duke of Gloucester, now Protector of this realme hath vnto the crowne and kingdome of the same. For as the worshipfull man groundly made open vnto you, the children of king Edward the 4. were neuer lawfully begotten, for as much as the king (leaving his very wise dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfully married vnto the Quene their mother, whose blood, fanning that he set his voluptuous pleasure before his honor, was full vnmistakably matched with his, and the mingling of whose bloods together, hath bene the effusion of great part of the noble blood of this realme. Whereby it may well seeme the marriage not well made, of which there is so much mischief growne: For lacke of which lawfull accomplishing, and also of other things which the saide worshipfull doctor rather signified than fullie explained, and which things shall not be spoken for mee, as the thing wherein enerie man forbeareth to say that he knoweth in auoiding displeasure of my noble Lorde Protector, bearing, as nature requireth, a fullall reuerence to the Dutchesse his mother, for these causes I saie before remembred, that is to wit, for lacke of other issue lawfully comming of the late noble prince Richard Duke of Yorke, to whose roiall blood the crowne of England and of France, is by the high authoritie of parliament entailed, the right and title of the same, is by the iust course of inheritance according to the common lawes of this lande, deuoluted and commen vnto the most excellent Prince the Lord Protector, as to the verie lawfully begotten sonne of the foreremembred noble Duke of Yorke. Which thing well considered, and the great knightly prouesse pondered, with manifold vertues which in his noble person singularly abound, the nobles and commons also of this realme, and specially of the north part, not willing anye bastard blood to haue the rule of the Land, nor the abuses before in the same used anye longer to continue, haue condescended and fully determined to make humble petition to the most puissant prince the lord protector, that it may like his grace at our humble request, to take vpon him the guiding and gouernance of this realme, to the wealth and encrease of the same, according to his very right and iust title. Which thing I wote it well, he will be loath to take vpon him, as he whose wisdom well perceiue the labour and studie both of minde and bodie, that shall come therewith, to whomsoener so will occupie the roome, as I dare saie he will, if he take it. Which roome I warne you well is no offices office: And that the great wise man well perceived when he said: Va regno cuius rex puer est: Woe is that realme that hath a childe to their king. Therefore so much the more cause haue wee to thanke God,

God, that this noble personage which is so righteously intituled thereunto, is of so sad age, and thereunto so great wisdoms ioyned with so great experience, which albeit he will be loath (as I haue said) to take it vpon him, yet shal he to our petition in that behalfe the more graciously incline, if yee the worthy shippfall citizens of this the chiefe city of this realme, ioine with vs the nobles in our said request. Which for your owne weale we doubt not but ye will: and naye lesse I heartily praye you so to do, whereby you shall do great profit to all this realme beside, in choosing the m so good a king, and vnto your selfe spectall commoditie, to whom his Maiesty shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauor, in how much he shall perceiue you the more proue and beneuolently minded toward his election. Wherein deare friends that minde you haue, we require you plainly to shew vs.

When the Duke had said, and looked that the people whom he hoped that the Maior had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cried King Richard, King Richard, all was hysht and mute, and not one word answered thereunto: wherwith the duke was maruellously abashed, & taking the maior nearer to him, with other that were about him prouise to that matter, said vnto them softly, what meaneth this, that this people bee so still? Sir (quoth the Maior) percase they perceiue you not well. That shall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe.

And by and by somewhat louder he rehearsed them the same matter againe in other order and other words so wel and ornately, and naye lesse so evidently and plaine, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comely, and so conuenient, that euerie man much maruelled that heard him, and thought that they neuer had in their liues heard so euill a tale so well tolde.

But were it for wonder or feare, or that each lookt that other should speake first; not one word was there answered of all the people that stode before, but all was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning amongst them, by which they might seme to commune what was best to doe. When the Maior saw this, he with other partners of that Councell dyde about the Duke, and said that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken vnto, but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the citie, and happily to him they will answer. With that the Recorder called Fitz William, a sad man and an honest, which was so new come into that office, that he neuer had spoken to the people before, & loath was with that matter to begin; notwithstanding, therunto commanded by the Maior, made rehearfall to the Commons of that the duke had twice rehearsed to them himselfe. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euerie thing as the Dukes wordes, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which alway after one, stood as they had bene men amased. Whereupon the Duke rowned vnto the Maior and said: this is a maruellous obstinate silence, and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with these wordes: Deare friendes, we come to moue you to that thing which peradventure we not so greatly needed, but that the Lords of this realme, and the Commons of other parties might haue sufficed: sauing that we such loue beare you, and so much set by you, that we would not not gladdie doe without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weale and honor, which as it seemeth, either you see not, or wey not. Wherefore we require you give us answer one or other whether you be minded as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue this Noble Prince now Lord Protector to be your King or not.

At these wordes the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither lowde nor distinct, but as it were the sounde of a swarme of Bees, till at the last in the neather ende of the Hall, a bolshment of the Dukes seruants and Pashefields, and other longing to the Protector, with some pzentifes and laddes that thrust into the Hall among the pzease, began sodainly at mens backs to crie out as lowde as their throates would giue, King Richard, King Richard, and thre to by their caps in token of ioy. And they that stode before cast backe their heads maruelling therat, but nothing they saide.

And when the Duke and the Pasor saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly crie, and a ioyfull to heare, euery man with one voice, no man saying nay. Wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) since that we perceiue it is all your whole mindes to haue this Noble man for your King, wherof we shall make to his grace so effectuall report, that we doubt not but it shall rebound vnto your great weale and commoditie: we require you that ye to morrow go with vs, and we with you vnto his noble grace, to make our humble request vnto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lordes came doونه, and the compaignie dissolved and departed, the more part all sad, some with glad semblance that were not verie merrie, and some of those that came thither with the Duke not able to dissemble their sorowe, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart burst out of their eyes.

Then on the morrow after, the Pasor with all the Aldermen and chiefe commons of the Citie in their best maner apparelled, assembling themselves together, resorted vnto Baynards Castle, where the Protector laie. To which place repayed also according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers Noble men with him, beside many knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke sent worde vnto the Lord Protector of the being thereof a great and honorable compaignie, to moue a great matter vnto his grace.

Whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but first he knew some part of their errand, as though he doubted, and partly distrustful the coming of a number vnto him so sodainly, without any warning or knowledge whether they came for good or harme. When the Duke had shewed this vnto the Pasor and other, that they might thereby see howe little the Protector looked for this matter, they sent vnto him by the messenger such louing message againe, and therewith so humbly besought him to vouchsafe, that they might resort to his presence, to propose their intent, of which they would vnto none other person part disclose, that at the last he came forth of his Chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stode aboue in a Gallerie

ouer them, where they might see him, and speake to him, as though he would not yet come too nere them, till hee wist what they meant. And thereupon the duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his grace the intente of their comming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be bold to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they meante as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. Then the protector (as hee was verie gentle of himselfe, and also longed soze to wit what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verilie trusting for the good mind that hee bare them all, none of them anie thing would intende vnto him warde, wherewith he ought to be grieued.

When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wared hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereunto, as ye before haue heard, & finally to beseech his grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnes and zeale vnto the realme now with his ele of pittie, to behold the long continued distresse and decay of the same, and to set his grations hands to redresse an amendment thereof, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realm, according to his right and title lawfullie descended vnto him, and to the laude of God, profite of the land, and vnto his grace so much the more honor, and lesse pain, in that that neuer prince reigned vpon any people, that were so glad to liue vnder his obediace, as the people of this realme vnder his.

When the Protector had hearde the proposition, he looked verie strange like thereat, and answered: That albeit it were that he partly knewe the thinges by them alledged to bee true, yet such entire loue hee bare vnto king Edward and his children, that so much more hee regarded his honor in other realmes about, than the Crowne of anie one, of which hee was neuer desirous, that hee coulde not finde in his heart in this point to encline to their desire. For in all other nations where the truth were not well knowne, it shoulde peraduenture bee thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and druse, to depose the Prince, and take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee woulde not haue his honour stayned for anie Crowne, in which he had euer perceyued much more labour and payne than pleasure to him that woulde so vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it: Notwithstanding he not onlie pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and heartie fauor they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the prince, vnder whome hee was, and would bee content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as shoulde like the king to vse him, he woulde do his vttermost deuoir to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little while of his Protectorship (the praise giuen to God) well begun. In that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrary, and of nowe intended to be, were nowe partly by good policy, partly more by gods speciall prouidence, than mans prouision repelled.

Upon

Upon this answer giuen, the duke by the Protector's licence, a little rowned, as well with other noble men about him, as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that vpon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloude vnto the protector, that for a final conclusion, by the realme it was appoynted King Edwards line should not anie longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, that it was now no suretie to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weale vniuersall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto. If he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, which they would be loath to heare, then must they needs seeke, and should not faile to find some other noble man that would.

These wordes much moued the Protector, which else as euerie man made wit, would neuer of likelihood haue enclined thereunto. But when he sawe there was none other waie, but that either he must take it, or else he and his both go from it, he said vnto the lords and commons: Sith we perceiue well that all the realme is so set, thereof we be very sorie that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwards line to gouerne them, whome no man earthly can gouerne against thei wil, and we well also perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as verie right heire lawfullie begotten of the bodie of our most deare father Richard late D. of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles & commons of this realme, which we of all titles possible take for the most effectuell: We bee content and agree fauorably to encline to your petition and request, and according to the same, here we take vpon vs the Royall Estate, preeminence and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires to rule, gouerne, & defend: the other by gods grace, and your god helpe, to get againe and subdue, & establish for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

him to be king.

With this there was a great shoute, crying, king Richard, king Richard. And then the Lordes went vp to the king (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuerlie of the matter, euerie man as his fantasie gaue him. But much they talked and marvelled of the maner of this dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so straunge, as though neyther had euer communed with other thereof before, when that the selfes wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but he perceiued wel enough, that all the matter was made betwene them. Whomebeit some excused that agayne, and saide all must be done in god order: and men must sometime for the manners sake, not be knowne what they know: for at the consecration of a bishop, euery man wotteth well by the paying for his bulls, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else: and yet must he be twise asked whether he will be bishop or no, and he must twise say nay, and at the thirde time take it, as compelled thereunto by his own wil. And in a stage plaie the people know right wel, that he that plaieth the Solodain, is percase a solter,

ouer them, where they might see him, and speake to him, as though he would not yet come too nere them, till hee wist what they meant. And thereupon the duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his grace the intente of their comming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be bold to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they meante as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. When the protector (as hee was verie gentle of himselfe, and also longed soze to wit what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verilie trusting for the good mind that hee bare them all, none of them anie thing woulde intende vnto him warde, wherewith he ought to be grieved.

When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wared hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereunto, as ye before haue heard, & finally to beseech his grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnes and zeale vnto the realme now with his ele of pittie, to behold the long continued distresse and decay of the same, and to set his grations hands to redresse an amendement thereof, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realm, according to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the lande of God, profite of the land, and vnto his grace so much the moze honor, and lesse pain, in that that neuer pzince raigned vpon any people, that were so glad to liue vnder his obeisance, as the people of this realme vnder his.

When the Protector had hearde the proposition, he looked verie strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were that he partly knewe the thinges by them alledged to bee true, yet such entire loue hee bare vnto king Edward and his children, that so much moze hee regarded his honor in other realmes about, than the Crowne of anie one, of which hee was neuer desirous, that hee coulde not finde in his heart in this point to encline to their desire. For in all other nations where the truth were not well knowne, it shoulde peradventure bee thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and drile, to depose the Prince, and take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee woulde not haue his honour stayned for anie Crowne, in which he had euer perceyued much moze labour and payne than pleasure to him that woulde so vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it: Notwithstanding hee not onely pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and heartie fauor they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the pzince, vnder whome hee was, and would bee content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as shoulde like the king to vse him, he would do his vtter most deuoure to set the Realme in good state, which was alreadye in this little while of his Protectorship (the praise giuen to God) well begun. In that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrary, and of newe intended to be, were now partly by good policy, partly moze by gods speciall prouidence, than mans prouision repelled.

Upon this answer given, the duke by the Protector's licence, a little retourned, as well with other noble men about him, as with the Mayor and Recorder of London. And after that upon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloude vnto the protector, that for a final conclusion, by the realme it was appoynted King Edwards line should not anie longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, that it was now no suretie to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weale binuersall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto. If he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, which they would be loath to heare, then must they needs seeke, and should not faile to find some other noble man that would.

These wordes much moued the Protector, which else as euerie man made wit, would neuer of likelihood haue enclined thereunto. But when he sawe there was none other waie, but that either he must take it, or else he and his both go from it, he said vnto the lords and commons: Sith we perceiue well that all the realme is so set, whereof we be very sozry that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwards line to gouerne them, whome no man earthly can gouerne against thei willes, and we well also perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as verie right heire lawfullie begotten of the bodie of our most deare father Richard late D. of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles & commons of this realme, which we of all titles possible take for the most effectual: we bee content and agree fauorably to encline to your petition and request, and according to the same, here we take vpon vs the Royall Estate, preeminence and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires to rule, gouerne, & defend: the other by gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, & establish for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

him to be king.

With this there was a great shoute, crying, king Richard, king Richard. And then the Lordes went vp to the king (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuerslie of the matter, euerie man as his fantasie gaue him. But much they talked and marvelled of the maner of this dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so straunge, as though neyther had euer communed with other thereof before, when that thei selues wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but he perceiued wel enough, that all the matter was made betwene them. Wholoe it some excused that againe, and saide all must be done in good order: and men must sometime for the manners sake, not be a knowne what they know: for at the consecration of a bishop, euery man wotteth well by the paying for his bulls, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else: and yet must he bee twisse asked whether he wil be bishop or no, and he must twisse say nay, and at the thirde time take it, as compelled thereunto by his own wil. And in a stage plaie the people know right wel, that he that plaieeth the Sowdaine, is percase a soldier.

yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he standeth in his maiestie, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head, and worthe, for marring of the play: And so they said, that these matters be kings games, as it were stage plaies, and for the more part, played vpon scaffolds: in which poore men be but the lookers on. And they that wisse be, will meddle no further; for they that sometime step by, and play with them, when they can not plate their partes, they disorder the play, and do themselves no good.

The next daie, the protector with a great traine, went to Westminster hall, and there when he had placed himselfe in the court of the kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take vpon him the crolen in that place there, where the king himselfe sitteth and ministreth the lawe, because he considered, that it was the chiefest duty of a king to minister the lawes. Then with as pleasant an oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him, the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in conclusion, all kind of men, but especially the lawyers of this realme. And finally, to the intent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his deceitfull cleuement might get him the goodwill of the people, when he had declared the discommoditie of discord, and the commodities of concord and unitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his minde all enmities, and that he there did openly pardon all offences committed against him. And to the intent that he might shew a proufe thereof, he commanded that one Fogge, whom he had long deadly hated, should be brought then before him, who being brought out of the sanctuarie (for thither had he fled for feare of him) in the sight of the people, he toke him by the hand: which thing the common people reioyced at, and praised, but wisse men toke it for a vanitie. In his returne homeward, whom sooner he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe guiltie, is in a manner detested to a seruile flatterie.

King Richard, to be sure of all enemies, had sent for out of the north five thousand men to bee at his coronation, vnder the leading of Robert of Ridisdale, these being but meanelly apparelled, and woorse harneised, mustered in Finsberrie field.

On the fourth of Iuly, hee came to the Tower by water with his wife, and on the fifth day he created T. lord Howard duke of Norffolke, sir T. his sonne earle of Surrey, William lord Berkeley earle of Nottingham, Francis lord Louel, vicount Louel and the kings chamberlaine: the lord Stanley was deliuered out of ward, and made steward of the kings householde. Also the archbishop of Yorke was deliuered, liuered, but Morton Bishop of Ely was committed to the Duke of Buckingham to be kept in warde, who sent him to his mannor of Brecknocke in Wales, there to be kept. The same night the king made knights of the Bath to the number of seuentene.

On the sixt of Iuly he rode through the Citie of London toward Westminster with great pompe: and on the morrow being the seuenth, he with his wife queene Anne were crowned.

When he had begunne his raigne in Iuly, after this mockish election, then was he crowned the first, or rather the seuenth day of the same moneth. And that solemnitie was furnished for the most part, with the selfe same prouision that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew.*

After this were taken for rebels against the king Robert Ruffe sergeant of London, William Daui pardoner of Hounslow, John Smith groome of king Edwards stirrop, and Stephen Ireland wardrober in the Tower, with many other, that they should haue sent writings into the parts of Britaine to the earles of Richmond and of Penbrooke, and the other lords: and how they were purposed to haue set fire on diuers partes of London, which fire, whilest men had beene stanching, they would haue stolen out of the Tower, the prince Edward, and his brother the duke of Yorke, &c. Robert Ruffe, William Daui, John Smith, and Stephen Ireland, were at Westminster iudged to death, and from thence drawne to the Tower hill, and there beheaded, and their heads were set on London bridge.

How fell there mischiefes thicke. And as the thing euill gotten is neuer wel kept, through all the time of his raigne neuer ceased there cruell death and slaughter, till his owne destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and the most righteous, that is to wit, his owne, so began hee with the most piteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murder of his innocent nephews, the yong king and his tender brother, whose death and finall infortune hath naytheles commen so far in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroyed or no. Not for that onely that Perkin Werbecke by mante folkes malice, and moe folkes folly, so long space abusing the world, was aswell with princes as the poorer people, reputed and taken for the yonger of these two, but for that also that all things were in late daies so courtly demeaned, one thing pretended, and another meant, that there was nothing so plaine and openly proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspected, as manie well counterfeited ietwels make the true mistrusted. Whombeit concerning the opinion, with the occasions mouing either partie, we shal haue place moze at large to intreat, if we hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memorie K. Henry the 7. or percase that historie of Perkin in any compendious procelle by it selfe. But in the meane time for this present matter, I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after euery waie that I haue heard, but by such men, and by such meanes, as me thinketh it were hard but it should be true.

he rode to fulfill the thing which he before had intended. And soasmuch as his minde gaue him, that his nephewes liuing, men woulde not reckon that hee coulde haue right to the Realme, he thought therefore without delaie to ridde them, as though the killing of his kinsmen coulde amend his cause, and make him a kindlie king. Whereupon hee sent one John Greene, whome hee specially trusted, vnto sir Robert Brakenbury Constable of the tower, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert should in any wise put the two children to death. This John Greene did his errand vnto Brakenburie, knœling before our Ladie in the Tower, who plainelic answered, that hee woulde neuer put them to death to by the refoze: with which answer John Greene returning, recounted the same to king Richard at Warwicke yet in his wate. Where-with he tooke such displeasure and thought, that the same night he said vnto a secret page of his: Ah whome shall a man trust? Those that I haue brought by my selfe, those that I had trusted would most surelie serue me, euen those faile me, and at my commandement will do nothing for mee. Sir (quoth his page) there lieth one on your pallet without, that I dare well saie, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse, meaning this by Sir James Tirell, which was a man of right goodlie personage, and for natures giftes woorthie to haue serued a much better prince, if hee had well serued GOD, and by grace obtayned as much trueth and good will as hee had strength and wit. The man had an high heart, and soze longed bywarde, not rising yet so fast as he had hoped, being hindered & kept vnder by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, which longing for no moe partners of the Princes fauor, & namelie not for him, whose pride the y wisse would bear no peere, kept him by secret drifts out of al secret tract, which thing this page well had marked and knowne: wherefore this occasion offered, of vertie spectall friendship he toke his time to put him for ward, and by such wise to do him good, that all the enimies he had, except the diuell, could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this pages wordes king Richard arose (for this communication had hee sitting at the draught, a conuenient Carpet for such a counsell) and came out into a pallet chamber, on which hee found in bed Sir James and Sir Thomas Tirels, of person like, and brethren of blode, but nothing of kinne in conditions. Then saide the king merrille to them, what sirs, bee ye in bed so soone? And calling by Sir James, brake to him secretlie his mind in this mischeuous matter: in which he found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morowe hee sent him to Brakenburie with a letter, by which hee was commanded to deliuer Sir James all the keyes of the tower for one night, to the end hee might there accomplish the kinges pleasure, in such thinges as he had giuen him commandement. After which letter deliuered, and the keyes receyued, Sir James appointed the night next ensuing to destroye them, deuising before and preparing the meanes. The Prince as soone as the protector left the name, and toke himselfe as king, had it shewed vnto him, that he shoulde not raigne, but his vncke shoulde haue the Crowne. At which wordes the prince soze abashed, began to sigh and said: Alas, I would my vncke would let me haue my life yet, though I leese my kingdome. Then he that told him the tale, vsed him with good words, and put him in the best comfort he could. But forthwith was the prince and his brother both shut vp, and all other remoued from them, onlie one called Black Will, or William Slaughter except, set to serue them and see them sure. After which time the prince neuer tied his points, nor aught thought of himselfe, but with that yong babe his Brother, lingred with thought and heavines, till this traitterous death deliuered them of that wretchednes: for sir James Tyrell deuised that they should be murdered in their beddes. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forrest, one of the soure that kept them, a fellowe fleshed in murder before time. To him he ioined one Iohn Dighton his owne house-keeper, a bigge, broad, square, strong knaue.

Then all the other being remooued from them, this Miles Forrest, and Iohn Dighton, about midnight (the selie children lying in their beds) came into the Chamber, and sodainly lapped them vp among the clothes, so to bewrapped them and intangled them, keeping down by force the feather bed and pillowes hard vnto their mouths, that within a while, smothered and stifled, their breath failing, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the ioses of heauen, leaving to the tormentors their bodie dead in the bed. Which after that the wretches perceiued, first by the strugling with the paines of death, and after long lying still, to be thoroughlie dead, they laid their bodie naked out vpon the bed, and fetched sir James to see them, which vpon the sight of them, caused those murderers to burie them at the staire foot, metelie deepe in the grounde, vnder a great heape of stones.

Then rode sir James in great haste to R. Richard, and shewed him all the manner of the murder, who gaue him great thanks, and (as some say) there made him knight. But hee allowed not as I haue hearde, the burying in so vile a corner, saying, that he would haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kings sonnes. To the honorable courage of a king. Whereupon they saie, that a priest of S. Robert Brakenbury toke vp the bodie againe, and secretly entered them in such place, as by the occasion of his death, which one-lie knew it, could neuer since come to light. Merie troth it is, and well known, that at such time as Sir James Tyrell was in the Tower for treason committed against the most famous Prince King Henrie the seventh, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confessed the murder in manner aboue written, but whether the bodie were remooued, they coulde nothing tell. And thus, as I haue learned of them that much knew, and little cause had to lie, were these two noble Princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most rofall blood, brought vp in great wealth, likelie long to liue, raigne, and rule in the realm, by traitterous tyranny taken, depriued of their estate, shortly shut vp in prison, and puslie slain and murdered, their bodie cast God wot where, by the cruel ambition of their vnratral vncle and his dispiteous tormentors. Which thinges on euerie part well pondered, God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neyther in what vnfortunat standeth this worldelie weale, or what mischiefe worketh the proude enterprise of an hie heart, or finally, what wretched ende ensueth such dispiteous crueltie. For first to beginne with the ministers, Miles Forrest at Saint Martins pœcemale rotted atwaie : Dighton indeede yet walketh on aliuie in god possibilitie to be hanged ere he die: but sir James Tyrell died at the Tower hill beheaded for treason: King Richard himselfe, as yee shall hereafter heare, slaine in the field, hacked and helued of his enemies hands, carried on horsebacke dead, his haire in despite tozme and tugged like a Curre Dogge: and the mischief that he toke was within lesse than thye pœres of the mischief that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his chamberlaine, that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his mind. He neuer thought himselfe sure: where he went abroad, his eien whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer vpon his dagger, his countenance & manner like one alwaies ready to strike againe; he toke ill rest a nights, lay long waking and musing, soze wearied with Care & Watch, rather slumbered than slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, so dainelie sometime start vp, leapt out of his bed, and ran about the chamber, so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impressiõ and stomy remembrance of his abhominable deede.

Now had he outward no long time in rest: for hereupon, sone after began the conspiracy, or rather, god confederation betwene the Duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him.

The occasion whereupon the king and the duke fell out, is of diuers folke diuers wise pretended.

This Duke (as I haue for certaine bene enformed) as sone as the Duke of Gloucester, vpon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, and there had solemne funerall seruice for king Edward, sent thither in the most secret wise he could, one Persall his trustie seruant, who came to Iohn Ward, a chamberler of like secret trust with the duke of Gloucester, desiring, that in the most close and couert maner, he might be admitted to the presence and speech of his master. And the duke of Gloucester aduertised of his desire, caused him in the dead of the night, after all other folks auoided, to be brought vnto him in his secret chamber, where Persall after his masters recommendation, shewed him, that he had secretly sent to shew him in his new world, he woulde take such part as he woulde, and waite vpon him with a thousand god fellows, if nede were. The Messenger sent backe with thanks, and some secrete instruction of the protectors mind: yet met him againe with farther from the duke his master, within fewe dayes after at Nottingham: whither the Protector from Yorke, with many gentlemen of the north country, to the number of six hundred horses, was come on his way to London ward, and after secret meeting and communication had, if sone departed. Whereupon at Northampton, the duke met with the Protector himselfe with 300. horses, and from thence still continued with him partner of all his deuises, till that after his Coronation they departed, as it seemed very great friends at Gloucester: from whence, as sone as the duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely, the occasion of their variaunce is of diuers men diuerſlie reported. Some haue ſaid (I heard ſaie) that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other thinges, requiſted of the protector the Duke of Hertfordes Lands, to the which he pretended himſelfe ſuſt inheritor. And for as much as the title which hee claymed by inheritance, was ſome what enterlaced with the Title to the crowne, by the line of king Henry before deſpiued, the protector conceiued ſuch indignation, that he reſected the dukes requiſt with many ſpitefull and minatory wordes, which ſo wounded his hart with hatred and miſtruſt, that he neuer after could endure to looke aright on king Richard, but euer feared his owne life, ſo far forth, that when the protector rode through London toward his coronation, he ſained himſelfe ſick, becauſe he would not ride with him. And the other taking it in euil part, ſent him word to riſe, & come ride, or he would make him be carried: whereupon he rode on with euil will, and that notwithſtanding on the morrow, roſe from the feaſt, ſaining himſelfe ſick, and king Richard ſaid it was done in hatred and deſpight of him. And they ſaid, that euer after continually each of the miſued in ſuch hatred and diſtruſt of other, that the Duke verilie looked to haue bene murdered at Gloceſter. From which maſtheles, he in faire maner departed. But ſurely ſome right ſecret at that day denie this: and manie right wiſe men thinke it unlikelye (the deepe diſſembling nature of both thoſe men conſidered, and what neede in that græne world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the duke ſtood, if he fell once in ſuſpition of the tyzant) that eyther the Protector would giue the duke occaſion of diſpleaſure or the duke the protector occaſion of miſtruſt. And verily men thinke that if king Richard had anie ſuch opinion conceiued, hee would neuer haue ſuffered him to eſcape his hands. Very troth it is, the duke was an high minded man, and euill could beare the Glozie of another, ſo that I haue heard of ſome that ſaie they ſaue it, that the duke at ſuch time as the Crowne was firſt ſet vpon the protectorſ head, his eie could not abide the ſight thereof, but wypped his head another waie. But men ſay, that he was of troth not well at eaſe, and that both to king Richard well known, and not ill taken, nor any demand of the dukes vncourteouſly reſected, but hee both with great giſtes and high beheſts, in moſt louing and truſtie maner, departed at Gloceſter. But ſone after his comming home to Breckenocke, hauing there in cuſtodie by the commiſſionment of king Richard doctor Morton Biſhop of Ely, who (as ye before heard) was taken in the counſell at the tower, wared with him familiar: whoſe wiſedome abuſed his pride to his owne deliuerance and the dukes deſtruction. The biſhop was a man of great naturall wit, verie well learned, and honorable in behauiour, lacking no wiſe waies to winne fauor. Hee had bene faſt vpon the part of H. Henry, while that part was in wealt, and nay theles left it not, nor ſo looke it in too, but fled the realme with the queene and the prince, while king Edward had the king in priſon, neuer came home, but to the field: After which loſt, and that part utterly ſubdued, the other, for his faſt faith and wiſedome, not onelie was content to receyue him, but alſo towed him to come, and had him from thence ſooth both in ſecret truſt, and verie ſpeciall fauour, which hee nothing deceyued. For hee being (as ye haue heard) after king Edwards death first taken by the tyrant, for his trueness to the king, found the meane to set this Duke in his topp, ioined gentlemen together in aide of king Henric, deuising first the marriage betwene him and king Edwards daughter, by which his faith, hee declared the good service to both his masters at once, with infinit benefite to the Realme, by the Continuation of these two bloods in one, whose severall titles had long vniquieted the Lande, hee fled the realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, til the noble prince king Henry the 7. gat him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterburie and Chancelloz of England, wherunto the Pope ioined the honoz of Cardinall. Thus liuing manie daies in as much honour as one man might well wish, ended them so godlie, that his death with Gods mercie well changed his life.

This man therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate prowe, as well of prosperitie as aduers fortune, had gotten by great experience the vertie mother and mistresse of wisdome, a deepe insight in politike worldlie drifts. Whereby, perceiuing now this duke glad to commune with him, fedde him with faire wordes, and manie pleasant praisses. And perceiuing by the procelle of the fr communication, the Dukes pyde, nolwe and then balke out a little bread of enuie, toward the glozie of the king, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out if the matter were well handled: hee craftilie sought the waies to prycke him forward, taking alwaies the occasion of his comming, and so keeping him selfe so close within his boundes, that hee rather seemed to followe him, than to leade him. For, when the Duke first beganne to praise and boaste the king, and shewe howe much profite the realme shoulde take by his ratgne: My Lorde Morton answered: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lie, for if I would sweare the contrarie, your Lordship would not I woen beleue, but that if the world would haue gone as I would haue wished, king Henries son had had the crowne, & not king Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, & king Edward to raign, I was neuer so mad that I would with a dead man strue against the quicke. So was I to B. Edward a faithfull chaplaine, and glad would haue bin that his child had succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret iudgement of God haue otherwise promised, I purpose not to spurne against a prycke, no; labor to set vp that god pulchly downe. And as for the late Protector and now king. And euen there hee left, saying, that he had alreadie meddled too much with the world, and would from that daie meddle with his booke and his beades, and no further. Then longed the duke soze to heare what he would haue said, because he ended with the king, and there so sodainelie stopped, and exhorted him so familiarlie betwene them twaine, to bee bold to say what soeuer he thought, whereof hee faithfullie promised, there shoulde neuer come hurt, and peradventure more good than he would weene, and that him selfe intended to vse his faithfull secrete aduise and counsel, which he said was the onelie cause for which he procured of the king to haue him in his custody, where hee might reckon him selfe at home, and else had hee bene put in the hands of them with whome he shoulde not haue founde the like fauour. The Byshop right humbly thanked him, and saide: In god faith saith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault, forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the partie meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I thinke on Aelopes tale, that when the Lion had proclaymed, that on payne of death, there shoulde none horned beaſt abide in that wood: one that had in his forehead a bunch of fleſh, fled awaie a great pace. The fore that saw him run so fast, asked him whether hee made all that haſte: And hee answered, in sayth I neither wot, nor recke, so I were once hence, because of this proclamation made of horned beaſts. What ſole? quoth the fore, thou maieſt abide well y'nough, the Lion meant not by thee, for it is none horne that is in thine heade. No marrie (quoth he) that wot I well enough: but what and he call it an horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrilie at the tale, and said, My lord, I warant you, neither the Lion nor the Boare shall pick anie matter at anie thing heere spoken, for it shall neuer come to their eares. In good ſaith Sir, said the Biſhop, if it did, the thing that I was about to ſaie, taken as well (as afoze God I meant) it could deſerue but thanks: and yet taken as I wene it woulde, might happen to turne me to little good, and you to leſſer. When longed the duke yet much more to wiſt what it was: whereupon the biſhop ſaid, In good ſaith my L. as for the late protector, ſith hee is now king in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title, but for the weale of this realme, whereof his grace hath now the gouernance, and whereof I am my ſelfe one poore member, I was about to wiſh, that to thoſe good abilities whereof hee hath alreadye right manie, little needing my prayſe, it might yet haue pleaſed God for the better ſtoze, to haue giuen him ſome of ſuch other excellent vertues mete for the rule of a realme, as our Lord hath planted in the perſon of your grace: and there left againe.

The Duke ſomewhat maruelling at his ſodaine paſſes, ſaid: My Lord, I note your often breatching and ſodaine ſtopping in your communication, ſo that to my intelligence, your words neither come to anie direct or perfect ſentence in conſequence, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now toward the king, or what affection you beare toward me. For the comparison of good qualittes aſcribed to vs both, maketh mee not a little to muſe, thinking that you haue ſome other priuy imagination imprinted in your hart which you bee abaſhed to diſcloſe, and eſpeciallye to mee, which on my honour do aſſure you to be as ſecret in this caſe as the deafe and dumbe perſon to the ſinger, or the tree to the hunter. The Biſhop being ſomewhat bolde, conſidering the dukes promiſe, but moſt of all animated, because hee knew the duke deſirous to be magnified, & alſo he perſeuered the inward hatred which he bare toward king Richard, hee opened his ſtomacke to the bottome, and ſaid: My ſingular good Lord, ſith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces cuſtody, I may rather call it a libertie, than a ſtraight impriſonment, in auoiding of ſolennes & mother of all vices, in reading bookes & ancient pamphlets I haue found this ſentence written, That no man is borne free and at libertie of himſelfe onely: for one part of dutie hee oweth to his parents, another part to his friends and kinſfolkes: but the natie countrie, in the which hee firſt tasted this pleasant and flattering world, demandeth a debt not to bee forgotten. Which saying causeth me to consider in what case this Realme my native country now standeth, and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued: what gouernor we now haue, and what ruler we might haue: for I plainelie perceiue (the realme being in this case) must needs decaye, and bee brought to confusion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your seruent zeale and ardent loue toward your naturall country, and in like maner the loue of your country toward you, the great learning, pregnant witte, and eloquence, which so much doth abound in your person, I must needs thinke this realme fortunate which hath such a prince in soze, méte and apt to be gouernour. But on the other side, when I call to memorie the good qualittes of the late Protector, and now called king, so violated by tyrannie, so altered by vsurped authoritie, so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that hee is neither méte to be king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme méet to be gouerned by such a tyrant. Was not his first enterprize to obtaine the crowne begun by the murder of diuers noble personages? Did he not secondarily procede against his owne naturall mother, declaring hir openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing? declaring furthermore his two brethren and two nephewes to be bastards, and to be borne in adulterie? yet not contented, after he had obtained the garland, he caused the two poze innocents his nephewes committed to him, to be shamefullie murdered, the blood of which little babes daylie crie to God from the earth for vengeance: what suretie shall be in this realme to anie person, either for life or goods vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blode, and then the lesse, the losse of other? But now to conclude what I meane toward your noble person, I say and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your native countrey, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countreyemen from the bondage of such a tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the crowne of this realme, then I aduise you by the faith that you owe to God, to deuise some way how this realm may be brought to some conuenient regiment, vnder some good gouernor. When the bishop had ended his saying, the duke sighed, and spake not of a greate while, so that night they communed no more. The next day the Duke sent for the bishop, to whom he saide, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you be a sure friend, a trusty counsellor, and a very louer of your country. And sith at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secretes of your heart, touching the new vsurper of the crowne, and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare vnto you my priuate intentes and secret cogitations: and to beginne, when king Edward was deceased, I then beganne to studie, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme shoulde bee gouerned. I perswaded with my selfe to take parte with the Duke of Gloucestre, whome I thought to bee as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without insurie,

and so by my meanes hee was made Protector both of the king and Realme, which authoritie being once gotten, hee neuer ceased praille to require mee and other Lordes, as well spirituall as temporall, that hee might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient king: which thing, when he sawe me some what sicke at, he then brought in Instruments, autentike Doctors, proctors & notaries of the law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying H. Edwards Children to bee Bastardes: which depositions then I thought to bee as true, as now I know them to be faigned. When the said depositions were before vs read and diligentlie heard, hee stode by bare headed saying: Well my Lordes, euen as I and you woulde, that my nephewes shoulde haue no wrong: so I praye you do me nothing but right, for these witnessses and sayinges of famous Doctors be true: for I am onelie the vndubitate heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, adindged to be the very heire to the crown of this realme by authoritie of parliament. Which thinges so by learned men for verity to vs declared, caused me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and soueraign lord: so againe by my aid he of a protector was made a king: but when he was once crowned king, and in full possession of the realme, he cast away his old conditions. For when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the earle of Herefords lands, which his brother king Edw. wrongfully detained from me, and also required to haue the office of the high Constableness of Englande, as diuers of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long descent continued: in this my first suit, he did not only first delay me, and after ward deny me, but gaue me such unkind words, as though I had neuer furthered him, all which I suffered patiently: but when I was informed of the death of the two yong innocents, O Lord my hart inwardlie grudged, in so much that I abhorred the sight of him. I toke my leaue of the court, & returned to Brecknock to you, but in the iourney as I returned I had diuers imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall vnckle. First I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the crown, now was the way made plain, and occasion giuen. For I sawe he was disdained of the Lordes temporall, and accursed of the Lordes spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betweene Worcester & Bridgenorth, I encountred with the ladie Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wiffe to the Lord Stanley, which is the very daughter and sole heire to John duke of Somerset my grandfatheres elder brother: so that the and her sonne the earle of Richmond, be both betwene me and the gate, to enter into the maiestie of the crown: and getting of the crown: and when we had a little communed concerning her son, and were departed, I then began to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take vpon me, by the election of the nobility & communalty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in the wauering ambiguitie, I considered first, the office, duntle, and paine of a king, which I thinke I thinke that no mortall man can iustly and truly obserue, except he be elected by God as king Dauid was: but further I remembred, that if I once toke on me the gouernance of the realme, the daughters of king Edward and their allies, being both for his sake much beloued, & also for the great injury done to them much pittied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of mee. Semblably my cousin the Earle of Richmond his aybes and kinsfolke, will surely attempt either to bite or pierce me on the other side, so that my life and Rule shoulde euer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or deposition. And if the sayde two Linages of Yorke and Lancaster shoulde ioyne in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherefore I haue clârely determined vterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the crown: for as I told you, the countesse of Richmond in my returne from the newe named king, meeting me in the high wate, prayed mee first for kindred sake, secondlie for the loue I bare to my grandfather duke Humfrey, which was sworn brother to her father, to moue the king to be good to her son Henry earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into Englande, and if it were his pleasure so to do, she promised that the earle her son should marry one of king Edwardes daughters at the appoyntment of the king, without anie thing demanded for the saide espousalles, but onelie the kings fauor, which request I some ouerpasse and departed, but after in my lodging I called to me more moze of that matter I am bent, that the earle of Richmond heire of the House of Lancaster, shall take to Wife Ladie Elizabeth eldest Daughter to king Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster maie be vnite in one: when the duke had said, the Bishop Morton, which fauored euer his house of Lancaster was wonderous ioifull, for all his imagination tended to this effect, and least the Dukes courage shoulde swage, or his mind alter, hee sayde to the Duke: My Lorde of Buckingham, sith by GODS prouision, and your incomparable wisdom, this noble conjunction is first moued, it is necessarie to consider what persons we shall first make priuy of this politike conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) wee will beginne with my ladie of Richmond the earles mother, which knoweth where he is in Bytaine: sith you will beginne that wate (sayde the Byshoppe) I haue an old friende with the Countesse, called Reynolde Bray, for whome I shall send if it bee your pleasure: so the Byshop wrote for him to come to Breckenocke: who straight came backe with the messenger, where the duke and the byshop declared what they had deuised for the preferment of the earle of Richmond son to his Ladie and mistress: willing her first to compasse howe to obtaine the good will of Quene Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter, and after secretlie to sende to hir son in Bytaine, to declare what high honor was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the Lady Elizabeth as soone as hee was king of the realme. Reinold Bray with a glad hart returned to the countesse his Lady. When Bray was gone, the Byshop tolde the Duke, that if hee were in his Isle of Ely, he could make many friendes to further their enterpryse. The duke knew this to be true, but yet loath to lose the companie of such a counseller, gaue the bishop faire words, saying, he shoulde shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the bishop ere the dukes company were assembled, secretlie disguised, in a night departed, and came to Ely, where he found money and friendes, and so sayled into Flaunders, where hee did the Earle of Richmond good seruice. When Reinold Bray had declared his message to the countesse, countesse, no maruell if she were glad, wherefore she deuised a meanes how to breake this matter to Quene Elizabeth then being in Sanctuary at Westminster, and hauing in her family a certaine Welchman called Lewes learned in physicke, now hauing opportunitie to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come that her son should be ioined in marriage with lady Elizabeth daughter and heire to H. Edward: and that king Richard should out of all honour and estate be dejected: and required him to go to Quene Elizabeth, not as a messenger, but as one that came friendly to visite her, and as time and place should serue, to make her priuie of this deuice. This physician with good diligence repaired to the Quene, and when he saw time conuenient, he said vnto her: Madam, although my imagination be very simple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am so bolde to vtter vnto you a secret conceit that I haue compassed in my braine. When I remember the great losse that you haue sustained by the death of your louing husband, and the great sorrow that you haue suffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no lesse do than daillie studie how to bring your hart to comfort, and also to reuenge the quarrell of you & your children on that cruell tyrant H. Richard. And first consider what battel and what mischief hath risen by the dissention betwene the two houses of Yorke and Lancaster, which two families if they maie bee ioyned in one, I doubt not but that your line shall be againe restored to your great ioy and comfort. You know Madame, that of the house of Lancaster the earle of Richmond is next of blood, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heires: If yee could inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the earle of Richmond in matrimonie, no doubt but the vsurper should be shortly deposed, and your heire againe to her right restored. When the Quene had heard this friendly motion, she instantly besought him that as he had bene the first inuenter of so good an enterpryse, that now he would not desist to follow the same, requiring him farther, that he would resorte to the countesse of Richmond mother to the earle Henry, and to declare to her on the quenes behalfe, that all the friends of king Edward her husband should assise and take part with the earle of Richmond his son, so that he would take an oth, that after the kingdome obtained, to espouse the lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. Master Lewes so sped his busines, that he made a small end of this busines betwene the two mothers: so the lady Margaret countesse of Richmond brought to a good hope of the preferment of her son, made Reinold Bray chiefe solicitor of this conspiracy, giuing him in charge secretly to inueigle such persons of nobility to ioin with her, and take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

This Reinold Bray within few daies brought to his lure, Sir Giles Daubene, Sir John Cheinie, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ram Esquires, and others. In the meane season the countesse of Richmond sent Christopher Vrs-wike into Britaine to the earle of Richmond, to declare to him all agreements betwene her and the Quene agreed: but she remembzing that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the first inuenters of this enterpryse, sent Hugh Conway esquire into Britaine with a great sum of mony to hir son, giuing him in charge charge to declare to the earle the great loue that the most part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, willing him not to neglect so good an occasion offered, but with all speed to settle his mind how to returne into England, giuing him counsell to take land in Wales. When the earle had received this topfall message, he brake to the duke of Britaine al his secrets, aduertising him that he was entred into a sure and stedfast hope to obtain the crowne of England, desiring him of helpe toward the atchieving of his enterprize, which the duke promised, and after performed. Whereupon the earle sent into England Hugh Conway, and Thomas Ram, to declare his comming shortly into England. In the meane season the chiefe of the conspiracy in England began many enterprises, which being neuer so p[ri]uily handled, yet knowledge thereof came to king Richard, & because he knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aide of this commination, he thought it most necessarie to pluck him from that part, whereupon he adressed his loving letters to the Duke, to exhort the Duke to come to the Court: but the Duke required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was not well. King Richard not content with this excuse, directed to the duke other letters with checking words, commanding him without delay to repaire to his presence. The Duke made to the messenger a determinate answer, that he would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared war against him, and by this means, Thomas marques Dorset came out of Sanduarte, gathered a great band of men in Dorsetshire, sir Edward Courtney and Peter his brother bishop of Excester raised another army in Deuonshire and Cornuall. In Kent sir Richard Guilford and other Gentlemen raised a companie.

But king Richard in the meane time had gotten together a great strength, with whome he removed from London toward Salisbury, to the intent he might set on the Dukes armie, the king was scarce two daies iourney from Salisbury, when the duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wilde Welchmen, which in the ende forsooke him. The Duke with his power marched through the forest of Deane, intending to haue passed the riuer of Seuerne at Gloucester, and there to haue ioyned in armie with the Courtneies, and other Western men, which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great leopordie. But before he could attaine to Seuerne side, by force of continuall raine the riuer rose so high, that it ouerflowed all the countrey adioining, which rage of water lasted ten daies: by which inundacie the passages were so closed, that neither the Duke could come ouer Seuerne to his complices, nor they to him: during which time the Welchmen lingering idle and without money or victuall, suddenly scaled and departed. The Duke thus left almost alone, was of necessitie compelled to flie, and conceied himselfe into the house of Humfrey Banister his seruant beside Shrewsbury, whom he had tenderly brought vp, which when it was known to his adherents, euerie man shifted for himselfe and fled. And some of them sayled into Brytaine, among the which were Peter Courtney Bishop of Excester, and sir Edward Courtney his brother, Thomas marques Dorset, John lord de Wils, sir John Bouchier, sir Edmond Woodville brother to quene Elizabeth, sir Robert Willoughby,

This Banister after he had betrayed his master, his sonne and heire wayed mad, and died in a boares ste, his eldest daughter was suddenly stricken with a folle leperie, his second son marvellously deformed of his limbs and made lame, his yonger son in a small puddle was drowned, and he himselve being of extream age arraigned and found guiltie of a murder, and by his cleargie saued. And as for his thousand pound, k. Richard gaue him not one farthing, saying, that he which would be untrue to so good a master, would be false to all other.

The duke after he had confessed all the whole conspiracie vpon the second of Nouember without arraignment or iudgement, was at Salisbury beheaded. At the same time that the duke of Buckingham was by in the west countrey, there were manie by in Kent, to wit, Sir George Browne, Sir Iohn Gifford and his sonne, Foge, Scot, and Hants, after Clifford, Bonting yeoman of the crowne, with manie other, to the number of five thousand: these made a fray at Gauesend in the faire, where Bonting slewe master Mowbray, with diuers other, but when they heard that the duke of Buckingham was dead they were faine to flee to saue themselves.

Whilste these things were thus handled in England, Henry Earle of Richmond prepared an army of five thousand Britons, and fortie well furnished ships. When all thinges were prepared, and the daie of setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue of October, the whole armie hoysed vp sailes and toke the sea, but toward night the winde turned, and so huge a tempest arose, that the ships were disperfed asunder: some driven into Normandie, some againe into Britaine. In the morning after when the tempest was asswaged, the earle approached to the south part of England, at the mouth of the haue of Poie in Dorset, where he might see all the banks full of men of war, appointed to defend his arrivall, wherefore he gaue charge that no man should land, untill such time as the whole nauie were assembled, but after that he perceived none of his ships to appeare, he hoised vp anchors and away, where he arrived safe in Normandy, and returned by land into Britaine, where he was soon advertised that the duke of Buckingham had lost his head, and that the marques Dorset, and a great number of noble men in England had a little before inquired for him there.

In the meane season king Richard apprehended in diuers partes of this Realme certayne Gentlemen of the Earle of Richmonds faction, amongst whome Sir George Browne, Sir Roger Clifford, and foure other were put to death at London the thirde of December. Sir Thomas Semlegar, which had married Banister that betrayed his master, miserably plagued, let the like traitors to their masters looke for the like, or worse, to them and theirs, without speedie repentance.

The duke after he had confessed all the whole conspiracie vpon the second of November without arraignment or iudgement, was at Salisbury beheaded. At the same time that the duke of Buckingham was by in the west countrey, there were manie by in Kent, to wit, Sir George Browne, Sir John Gifford and his sonne, Foge, Scot, and Hants, after Clifforde, Bonting yeoman of the crowne, with manie other, to the number of five thousand: these made a fray at Chaufend in the faire, where Bonting slew master Mowbray, with diuers other, but when they heard that the duke of Buckingham was dead they were faine to flee to save themselves.

Duke of Buckingham beheaded.

Whiles these things were thus handled in England, Henry Earle of Richmond prepared an army of five thousand Britons, and fortie well furnished ships. When all things were prepared, and the daie of setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue of October, the whole armie hoysed by sailes and took the sea, but toward night the winde turned, and so huge a tempest arose, that the ships were dispersed asunder: some driuen into Normandie, some againe into Britaine. In the morning after when the tempest was asswaged, the earle approached to the south part of England, at the mouth of the haven of Poie in Dorset, where he might see all the banks full of men of war, appointed to defend his arriual, wherefore he gaue charge that no man should land, untill such time as the whole nauie were assembled, but after that he perceived none of his ships to appeare, he hoised vp anchors and away, where he arrived safe in Normandy, and returned by land into Britaine, where he was soon advertised that the duke of Buckingham had lost his head, and that the marques Dorset, and a great number of noble men in England had a little before inquired for him there.

In the meane season king Richard apprehended in diuers partes of this Realme certaine Gentlemen of the Earle of Richmonds faction, amongst whom Sir George Browne, Sir Roger Clifford, and foure other were put to death at London the third of December. Sir Thomas Semlegar, which had married married the Dutchesse of Excester the kings owne sister, and Tho. Ram, with diuers other were executed at Excester.

Fire at Leaden
hall in London.

The 30. of December was a great fire at Leaden hall in London, where through was burnt much housing, and all the stocks for guns and other like provision belonging to the city.

1484

After this king Richard called a Parliament, in the which he attainted the earle of Richmond, and all other persons, which were fled out of the realme for feare, or any other cause as enemies to him, and to the ir naturall country, and all their lands and goods was confiscate to the kings vse, and yet notwithstanding he laid on the people a great tax.

An. reg. 2.

In this trouble some season, nothing was more marvelled at than that the Lord Stanley had not bene taken, considering the working of the Ladie Margaret his wife mother to the earle of Richmond: but for as much as the enterprise of a woman was of him reputed of no regarde or estimation, and that the Lord Stanley her husband had purged himselfe to bee innocent of all attempts by her committed, it was giuen him in charge to keepe her in some secret place at home, without hauing anie seruant or companie, so that from thenceforth she should neuer send letter to her son, or to anie of his friends, by the which the king might be molested, which commandement was a while put in execution.

King Henry the first removed to Windso.

This yere king Richard began the high towne at Westminster, which remaineth yet unfinished. Also he caused the bodie of king Henry the first to be removed from Chertsey abbey in Surrey, and to be buried at Windso: on the twelfth of August.

Record Tower.

In these daies were chiefe rulers about the king, the Lord Louel, and two Gentlemen being named sir Richard Ratcliffe, and sir William Catesby, of the which persons was made a seditious rime, & fastned upon the crosse in cheape, and other places of the Citie, whereof the sentence was as followeth:

The Cat, the Rat, and Louel our dogge:

Rulen all England, vnder an hogge.

Which was to meane these three persons, ruled this land vnder the king, which bare a white Boare for his cognisance. For the deuters of this rime much search was made and sundry accused to their great charges. But finally two Gentlemen, Turburile, and Collingborne, were for that and other things laide to their charge, arrested and cast in prison, for whom shortly was holden at the Guildhall an Oyer determiner, where the two Gentlemen were arraigned, and that one of them called William Collingborne Esquire, confest of that crime and other, for the which he was drawne vnto the Tower hill, and there full cruelly put to death, as first hanged, and straight cut downe and ripped, and his bowels cast into the fire, the which torment was so speedily done, that when the butcher pulled out his heart, he spake and saide Iesus Iesus. This man was greatly moaned of the people, for his godly personage and fauor of visage, he had bene sometime, to wit the 15. of Edward the fourth, Sheriffe of Wilthire, and in the 17 Sheriffe of Somersetshire, and Dorsetshire.

Collingborne executed.

Record.

King Richard considering the amities concluded betwene princes are the cause cause that their realmes are fortified with a double power, that is to say, with their owne strength, and the aide of their friendes, practised a league with the king of Scots, which not long before had made diuers incursions and roades into the realme of England, and therefore sued to haue a truce or peace concluded. Wherefore commissioners were appointed, which met at Bottingham, and there in the end concluded for thre yeeres on certaine articles, 15. in number. This peace thus concluded, King Richard now doubting his owne people, was continually bered with feare of the returne of the earle of Richmond and his complices: Wherefore, nothing was for his purpose more, than once againe with price and praier, to attempt the duke of Britaine, in whose territorie the earle then abode, to deliuer him into his hands: wherefore incontinent he sent certaine ambassadoys to the Duke of Britaine, which toke vpon them that king Richard should yerely paie and answer the duke of Britaine of all the reuenues, rents and profits of the lands and possessions, as well belonging to the earle of Richmond, as to any other noble or gentleman which then were in the earles companie, if he after that time would keepe them in continuall prison and restraine them from libertie. The Oratoys furnished with these and other instructions arriued in Britaine, but could not speake with the duke, by reason that he being weakned by a long and daile infirmitie, began to waie idle of his remembrance, for which cause Peter Landoyse his chiefe treasurer, ruled all things at his pleasure, vnto whom the English ambassadoys moued to him their message, offering to him the same rewardes and landes that they should haue offered the Duke. This Peter faithfully promised to accomplish king Richards request, so that he kept promise with him: but fortune was so fauourable to the publike weale of England, that this deadly compact toke none effect, for John Morton bishop of Ely sojourning then in Flanders, was of all this craftie deuise certified: wherefore he sent Christopher Vrsuicke, to declare to the Earle of Richmond all the deceit, giuing him charge in all haste possible with his companie to retire out of Britaine into France. When these newes came to the earle, he incontinent sent to Charles the French king, requiring that he and his might safely passe into France, which desire was granted, & the earle with the rest dispatched as priuile as mought be into France, no man suspecting their departure. After this, the Earle toke his iourney to Charles the French king, to whome after great thanks giuen, he disclosed the occasion of his accesse to his person. After that he required of him helpe and succor, to the intent he might returne to the nobilitie of his realm, of whom he was generally called to take vpon him the crowne: King Charles promised him aide, and bad him bee of good comfort, for he assured him that he would gladly shewe to him his bountifull liberalitie. Whiles the earle of Richmond thus attended on the French Court, John Vere Earle of Arford so perswaded James Blunt Captaine of Dames Castle, and sir John Forteskewe porter of the towne of Caleis, that he himselve was not onely set at libertie, but they also leauing their fruitfull offices condescended to go with him into France to the Earle of Richmond.

Truce with Scotland for three yeeres.

In the meane season R. Richard was credibly aduertised that promises

and othes the Earle and his confederates had made and swozne, and holwe by the Carles meanes, all the Englishmen were passed out of Bytaine into France. Wherefore being in maner desperate, (imagining how to infringe the Carles purpose by another meane, so that by the marriage of ladie Elizabeth his niece, he should pretende no claime to the crowne, there came to his minde a thing not only detestable, but much moze cruell to be put in execution, for he clereley determined to reconcile to his fauour his brothers wife Quene Elizabeth, and so by that meanes the Earle of Richmond, of the affinitie of his piece should be bitterly defrauded, and if no ingenious remedie could be other wise inuented, if it should happen Quene Anne his wife to depart out of this world, then he himselfe would rather take to wife his cousin and niece the ladie Elizabeth, than for lacke of that affinitie the whole realme should run to ruine. Wherefore he sent to the Quene being in Sanctuarie, diuers and often messengers which should excuse him of all things before against her attempted, and after should so largely promise promotions, not onely to her but to her son Thomas Marquesse Dorset, that they should bying her (if it were possible) into some wan hope. The messengers so perswaded the quene, that she began somewhat to relent, in so much that she faithfully promised to yeld her selfe to the kings will and pleasure. And so she first deliuered vnto king Richards hands her five daughters: Afterward she sent letters to the Marquesse her sonne being then at Paris with the Earle of Richmond, willing him in anie wise to repaire into England, where for him were prouided great honours, ascertaining him that all offences on both parties were forgiven and forgotten: After that king Richard had thus pleased the mutable minde of Quene Elizabeth, he caused all her daughters to be conueyed into his Palace with solemaue receiuing. Now nothing was contrary to his purpose, but that his mansion was not void of a wife: and first he abstained both from the bed and companie of his wife: after he complained to manie of the infortunate barrennesse of his wife. After this, he procured a common rumour to be published among the common people, that the Quene was dead. When the King heard tell that so horrible a rumoz of her death was sprung amongst the communalte, the soze suspected the worlde to be almost at an end with her, and not long after, to witte, the 16. of March, in the lent season, howsoeuer it fortunued, the quene departed out of this life, and was with due solemnitie buried at Westminister.

The King thus losed out of the bondes of Patrimonte, began to cast a fauour to lady Elizabeth his niece, making much suite to haue her ioined with him in lawfull Patrimonte: but because all men, and the maiden her selfe most of all detested this unlawfull copulation, he determined to deferre the matter till he were in a moze quiet case, for all this season he was oppressed with weightie affaires on euerie side, considering that daily part of the Nobilitie sayled into France, other prouillie fauoured the earle of Richmond, amongst the noble men whom he most suspected, these were the principall, Thomas lord Stanley, sir William Stanley his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and sixe hundred other, of whose purpose, though king Richard were ignorant, yet he gaue no remedence dence to arise one of them, and least of all to the Lorde Stanley, because he was joined in matrimonie with the Ladie Margaret mother to the Earle of Richmond, for when the Lorde Stanley would haue departed into his countrey, the king in no wise would suffer him to depart, before hee had left as in hostage in the court George Stanley Lorde Strange, his first begotten sonne and heire.

While king Richard was thus troubled, sodainly he heard newes that the Castle of Hames was deliuered into the hands of the Earle of Richmond, by the meanes of the Earle of Arford, and that not onely he, but also James Blunt, captaine of the castle, were fled into France to aide the Earle of Richmond.

Henry Earle of Richmond obtaining of king Charles a small crue of men, and borrowing certaine sums of money of him, and of diuers other his puate friends, he departed from the French Court, and came to the Citie of Roane. While he tarried there, making prouision at Harefleete, in the mouth of the Riuer of Seyne, for all things necessarie for his suite, tydings were brought to him, that king Richard being without children, and a widower, intended hostlie to marrie with Ladie Elizabeth, his brothers daughter, which newes he toke of no small moment, for this thing onely toke awaie from all his companions their hope to obtaine an happy enterprize, by reason whereof, he iudged that all his friends in England would shrinke from him, yet notwithstanding, earle Henric of Richmond, because he would no longer linger & wearie his friends, liuing betwene hope and feare, determined in all haste conuenient to set forward, and carried to his shippes armour, weapons, butt all, and all other ordinances expedient for warre, which being done, onely accompanied with two thousand men, and a small number of shippes, weyed by his Anchors, and in the halendes of August, he sayled from Harefleete with so prosperous a winde, that the seuenth day after he arrived in Wales in the evening, at a Port called Milford Hauen, and incontinent toke land, and came to a place called Dale, and at the sunne rising remoued to Hereford west, where he was receiued of the people with great ioy.

Henry Earle of Richmond landed at Milford Hauen.

From thence, he remoued to Cardigan twentie mile from Hereford west, whither came the Earle Richard Griffith with all his men and powder. After him the same daie came John Morgan with his men. When the Earle advanced forward, making no abode in anie place, and sodainly he was ascertained that sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas, were in harnesse before him, ready to encounter with his armie, and to stop their passage. Wherefore he first determined to set upon them, and either to destroy or take them into his fauour, and after with all his power to giue bat taile to king Richard. But to the intent his friends should knowe with what dexteritie he attempted his enterprize forward, he sent messengers with letters and instructions to the Lady Margaret his mother, to the Lord Stanley and his brother, to Talbot and to other, declaring to them, that he holpe with the aide of his friends, intended to passe ouer the Riuer of Seuerne at Shrewsbury, and so to passe directly to the Citie of London, requiring them as his speciall trust was in the hope of their fidelitie, fidelitie, that they would meete him by the way with all diligent preparation. When these messengers were departed, he marched forward towards Shrewsbury, and in his passage there met and saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodly band of Welshmen, which submitted himselfe wholie to his order and commandement. In the meane time the messengers laden with rewarde returned to him the same day that he entred into Shrewsburie, and made relation to him that his friends were readie in all points to do all things for him which they might doe. The earle Henrie continued his iourney and came to a little towne called Newport, and pitched his campe on a little hill adioyning, repassing himselfe there that night. In the euening of the same date came to him sir Gilbert Talbor, with the whole power of the young Earle of Shrewsburie, then being in ward, which were accounted two thousand men: and thus his power increasing he arrived at the towne of Stafforde, and there paused. To whom came sir William Stanley, accompanied with a fewe persons: After that the Earle departed from thence to Litchfelde, and lay without the walles in campe all that night. The next morning he entred the towne and was like a Prince received. A date or two before, the Lord Stanley hauing in his hand almost fife thousand men, lodged in the same towne, but hearing that the earle of Richmond was marching thitherward, gaue to him place, dislodging him and his, and repaired to a towne called Adzestone, there abiding the coming of the Earle: and this hee did to auoide all suspicion, being afrayde least if he should be saue openly to be a fauor or aider to the Earle his sonne in law before the date of battaile, that king Richard which yet did not utterly put in him mistrust, would put to some cruell death his sonne and heire apparant, George Lord Strange, whom king Richard had in hostage. King Richard at this season keeping his house in the Castle of Pottingham, was informed that the Earle of Richmond with such banished men as were fled out of England to him, were arrived in Wales, and that all things necessarie to his enterpryse were unpurueyed and verie weake, nothing meete to withstand the power of such as the king had appointed to resist him, yet notwithstanding hee sent to Iohn Duke of Norfolk, Henrie Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Surrey, and to other of his trustie friendes, willing them to muster and viewe all their seruants and tenants, and to elect the most courageous and active persons of the whole number, and with them to repaire to his presence with all speed. Also he wrote to Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him with his power to come to his army, and to bring with him his fellows in armes Thomas Bouchier, and sir Walter Hungerford, and diuers other knights and esquires, in whom he had no small suspicion. While he was thus ordyning his affaires, tidings came that the Earle of Richmond was passed Seuerne, and come to Shrewsbury without anie detriment or encombance. At which message he was sore moued, and cried out on them that contrarie to their othe had deceiued him. And in all haste sent out to viewe what waie his enemies kept and passed, it was declared to the king, that the Earle was incamped at the Towne of Litchfelde. Whereof, when he had perfect knowledge, he hauing continuall repaire of his subiects to him, he incontinently nently made his battailes to set forwarde towarde the waile, where his enemies as was to him reported, intended to passe, and keeping his arraie, hee with great pompe entred the Towne of Lyecester after the Sunne set. The earle of Richmond raised his campe from Lichfield to Tamworth, and in the mid-waie passing, there saluted him Syr Walter Hungerforde, & Syr Thomas Bourchier knights, and diuers others, which submitted themselves to his pleasure. Diuers other noble personages likewise resorted to him with all their power. There hapned in this progression to the earle of Richmond a straunge chance, for he was not a little afraide, because hee could not bee assured of his father in lawe Thomas Lord Stanley, which as yet inclined to neither partie, therfore the earle, accompanied with twenty light hoysenmen, lingering in his journey behinde his hoste, in the meane while the whole armie came before the towne of Tamworth, and when he for darkenesse could not perceiue the steps of them that passed on before, and had wandzed hither and thither seeking after his companie, he abode in a little Willage, about thre myles from his army, where he tarried all night. The next morning in the dawning, hee returned, and by good fortune came to his army, excusing himselfe, not to haue gone out of his waie by ignorance, but of purpose: this excuse made, he pryncially departed againe to the towne of Aderstone, where the Lord Stanley and Syr William his brother with their bands, were abiding: then the Earle came to his father in law, in a little Close, where he saluted him and sir William his brother, and after consulted how to giue battaile to king Richard, if hee woulde abide, whome they knew not to be farre off with an huge armie. In the evening of the same daie, Syr John Saueage, sir Brian Sanford, sir Simon Digby, and many other, leauing king Richard, turned and came to the earle of Richmond with an elect companie of men. In the meane season, king Richard marched to a place called Redmore moete for two battels to encounter, by a Willage called Bosworth, not far from Lyecester, and there hee pitched his helde, refreshed his armie, and toke his rest. The next daie after, king Richard being furnished with men, and all abilliments of warre, bringing all his men out of their campe into the plaine, ordered his forwarde in a maruellous length, in which he appointed both hoysenmen and footemen, and in the forefront he placed the Archers.

ouer this battell was capitaine John Duke of Norfolk, with whom was Th. earle of Surrey his son. After this long bantguard followed k. Richard with a strong company of approued men of tear, hauing hoysenmen for wings on both sides of his battell.

After that the earle of Richmond was returned from the communication with his friends, he with all diligence pitched his field toll by the campe of his enemies, and there hee lodged that night. In the morning betime, hee caused his men to put on their armour, and apparrell themselves to fight, and giue Battayle, and sent to the Lord Stanley, requirring him with his men to approach neere to his Armie, and to helpe to sette the Souldiors in arraie: hee answered, the Earle shoulde sette his owne men in good order, while hee woulde come to him in time conuenient. The Earle made his forwarde some what single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the front he placed the archers, of whome he made Captaine John Earle of Orford. To the right wing of the battaile he appointed sir Gilbert Talbot to be the leader. To the left wing he assigned sir Io. Saueage, and hee with the aide of the Lord Stanley, accompanied with the Earle of Penbroke, hauing a good companie of horse-men, and a small number of fote-men, for all his whole number exceeded not foue thousand men, beside the power of the Stanleyes, whereof three thousande were in the fiede vnder Sir William Stanley: The kings number was double so much, or more. When both these armies were thus ordered, and all men readie to set forward, king Richard called his chieftaines togither, perswading them to be valiaunt, &c. But his people were to him vnfaithfull in his end, as he was to his nephewes vntrue and vnnaturall in his beginning. When the Earle of Richmond knew that the king was so nere embattailed, he rode about his armie giuing comfortable words to all men, after the which he made to them a pittie oration perswading them to haue the victorie, for that they were to fight in a lust quarrell, he had scantily finished his saying, but the one armie espied the other, betwaine both armies there was a great marrish which the erle left on his right hand, and so doing he had the Sun at his backe, and in the face of his enemies. When the king saw the earles companie was passed the marrish, hee commanded with all haste to set vpon them, the terrible shotte on both sides passed, the armies toynded and came to hand strokes, at which encounter the lord Stanley toynded with the erle.

The earle of Orford in the meane season fearing least while his companie was fighting, they should bee compassed of the enemies, gaue commandement that no man should goe aboue tenne fote from the Standard, which commandement once knowne, they knitte themselves together and ceased a little from fighting: the enemies sodainly abashed at the matter and mistrusting some fraude, began also to pause. The Earle of Orford bringing all his band togither on the one part, set on his enemies freshlie: againe the aduersaries perceiuing that, placed their men slender and thinne before, and thicke and broad behind, beginning againe the battaile. While the two forewardes thus mortallie fought, king Richard was admonished that the Earle of Richmond accompanied with a small number of men of armes was not farre off; and as he approached to him, hee perfectly knewe his personage, and being inflamed with yre, he put his spurres to his horse and rode out of the side of the range of his battaile, leauing the hauntgards fighting, and with speare in whest ranne toward him. The Earle perceiued well the king furiously comming toward him, and because the whole hope of his wealth and purpose was to be determined by battaile, he gladly profered to encounter with him bodie to bodie and man to man: King Richard set on so sharpelie at the first brunt that he ouerthrew the earles standard, and slew sir William Brandon his standardbearer, and matched hand to hand with Sir John Cheiney, a man of great force and strength, which would haue resisted him, and the saide John was by him manfully ouerthrowne, and so he making open open passage by dint of sword as he went forwarde, the Earle of Richmond withstood his violence and kept him at the sword's point longer then his companions thought, which being almost in despair of victorie were sodainly recomforted by sir W. Stanley, which came to succour with 3000. tall men, at which berie instant, king Richards men were driven backe and fledde, and he himselfe manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies was slaine. In the meane season the Earle of Driford, with the aide of the Lord Stanley after no long fight discomfited the forwarde of king Richard, wherof a great number were slaine in the chase, but the greatest number that came to the field neuer gaue stroke. In this battaile died on king Richards part, about the number of 4000. men, and on the other side but ten persons, as sir Gilbert Talbot then wrote from the campe, and of the nobilitie were slaine John Duke of Suffolke, Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, sir William Coniers, sir Richard Claringdon, and Robert Brakenburie, lieutenant of the Tower, and not manie Gentlemen more: Sir William Caresby learned in the lawes of the Realme, and one of the chiefe Counsellours to the late king, with diuers other were two daies after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst them that ran awate were sir Frauncis Viscount Lovel, and Humfrey Stafford with Thomas Stafford his brother, which toke Sanctuary in S. Johns at Glocester. On the Earle of Richmonds part that was slaine, the principall was sir William Brandon his Standardbearer. This battaile was fought at Bosworth in Leicestershire, the 22. of August, in the yere of our Lord, 1485. the whole conflict indured little aboue two houres. When the earle had thus obtained the victorie, he rendred thanks to God, and after to his souldiers for their fidelity: then the people cried king Henry, king Henry. When the lord Stanley sawe the good will of the people, he toke the Crowne of king Richard, which was found amongst the spoile in the field, and set it on the earles head, as though he had bene elected king by the voice of the people.

king Richard
slaine.

King Henry at this time made knights, as followeth: sir Gilbert Talbot, sir John Mortimer, sir Rice ap Thomas, sir Robert Points, sir Humfrey Stanley, sir John Turbaruile, sir W. Willoughby, sir Hugh Perhall, sir R. Hegecombe, sir John Bikenyle, sir de Baron de Carow.

After this, the whole campe remoued to the towne of Leicester, where hee rested two daies. In the meane season, the dead corpes of king Richard was as shamefully carried to the towne of Leicester, as he gorgeously the day before with pompe departed out of the same towne: for his bodie was naked to the skinne, not so much as one clout about him, and was trussed behinde a Purfuant of armes, like a hogge or calfe, the head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and the legs on the other side, and all sprinkled with myze and blond, was brought to the Grey Friers Church within the Towne, and there homely buried, when he had reigned two yeres, two moneths and one day.

He founded a colledge at Wyndesore beyond Wyke, and another at London beside the Tower, in a chappell called our Ladie of Warking: he also en-dotwde the M<sup>a</sup>nes Colledge at Cambridge with five hundred markes of p<sup>e</sup>relie rent. He despoiled the great field of Wichewoode, betwene Woodstocke and Wyke, which king Edward the fourth had incorporated before to the forest, &c.

Henry Earle of Richmond.

An. reg. 1.

Parson of S.
Willelms
Dien.

Henrie the seventh, borne in Penbroke Castle, began his raigne the 22. of August, in the yere of our Lord God, 1485. He was a Prince of marvellous wisdom, policie, iustice, temperance, and grauitie, and notwithstanding manie and great occasions of trouble and warre, he kept his Realme in right good order, for the which he was greatly reuerenced of foreigne princes.

On the forenamed 22. of August, was a great fire in Bread-streets of London, in the which fire, was burnt the Parson of Saint Willelms, and one other man in the Parsonage there.

King Henry, before his departure from Leicester, sent sir Robert Willoughby knight to the Parson of Sherbinton in the countie of York, for Edward Plantagenet earle of Marwarke, son and heire to George Duke of Clarence, then being of the age of 15. yeres, and sent him by to the Tower of London, where he was put under sure custodie.

In the meane season the king remoued towards London, and when he had approached the citie, on the 27. of August, the Maior, Magistrates, and companies, all clothed in violet, met him at Shoreditch, and with great pompe conducted him through the citie to S. Pauls church, where he offered his three standards, one of S. George, the second a red Dragon, the third a dun Cow, after his prayers said and Te Deum sung, he departed to the bishops palace where he sojourned a few daies.

The sweating began the 21. of September, and continued till the ende of October: of the which sickness a wonderfull number died, and in London besides other, died Thomas Hall maior, in whose place was chosen William Stocker, who likewise deceased about seven daies after: in which space departed other foure Aldermen, Thomas Ham, Richard Rawson, Thomas Norland, and Iohn Stocker, and then was chosen maior Iohn Warde, who continued till the feast of Simon and Iude.

On the euen of Saint Simon and Iude, king Henry came from Henington unto Lambeth, and there dined with Thomas Bourchier Archbischoppe of Canterburie, Cardinall of S. Ciriack in Thermis. And after dinner with a goodly companie of the estates of this realme both spirituall & tempozall, from thence wet by land toward London, his nobles riding after the guise of France vpon small hackneies, two and two vpon a horse, and at London bridge end, the the Mayor of London with his brethren and the craftes, met and received the king, and the king proceeded to Grace-church corner, and so to the Tower. On the morrowe being the feast daie of Simon and Jude, king Henrie created Thomas lord Stanley Earle of Darby, Edward Courtney Earle of Denonshire, and Jasper earle of Penbrooke was created Duke of Bedford, all at one time in the tower of London. Banerets made at this creation, Sir Gilbert Talbot, sir Iohn Cheinie, sir William Stonar, sir W. Troutbeke, sir Iohn Mortimer, sir Richard Crosby, sir Iohn Fortescue, sir Edward Bedingsfield, sir Thomas Cokesey, sir James Baskerville, sir Humfrey Stanley, sir Richard de la Bere.

On the 30. of October king Henry was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Thomas Bouchier archbishop of Canterburie, and ordained a number of chosen archers, being strong and hardie persons, to give daillie attendance on his person, whome he named yeoman of the Garb.

The 7. of November began a parliament at Westminster, for the establishing of all things, in the which he caused to be proclaimed, that all men were pardoned of all offences, and should be restored to their lands and goods, which would submit themselves to his clemencie. After this he began to remember his especiall friends, of whom some he advanced to honour and dignitie, and some he enriched with possessions and goods: and to begin, the lord Chandew of Britaine, he made earle of Bath: sir Giles Daubeney was made lord Daubeney: sir Robert Willoughby lord Brooke: and Edward Stafford eldest sonne to Henry late duke of Buckingham, he restored to his dignitie & possessions: sir T. Molineux knight, baneret, he made Constable of Beaumarice, where shortly after he ended his life. The parliament being dissolved, the king redeemed the marques Dorset, and sir Iohn Bouchier, whom he had left as pledges at Paris, for money there before borrowed: and sent also into Flanders for Iohn Morton bishop of Ely.

The eighteenth day of January king Henry married the ladie Elizabeth eldest daughter to Edward the fourth, by which meanes the two families of Yorke and Lancaster, which had long borne at great dissension, were united and made one.

King Henrie sent the Lord Treasurer with master Bray and other, unto the lord Mayor of London, requiring him and the citizens of a prest of 6000. markes, wherefore the Mayor with his brethren and commons granted a prest of two thousand pound, which was lent of the companies, and not of the wardes, which prest was repaid againe in the yere next following, everie pennie.

In the moneth of September Quene Elizabeth was delivered of her first sonne named Arthur, at Winchester.

This yere deceased Thomas Bouchier archbishop of Canterburie, and was buried at Canterburie: Iohn Morton Bishop of Ely, a man of excellent wit, learning, and vertue, was translated, and succeeded him in the archbishopricke of Canterburie, and Iohn Alcock succeeded in the bishopricke of Ely.

Sir Richard Simon, a wily priest, came to Gerald earle of Asbare, and deputy of Ireland, and presented to him a lad his scholler named Lambert, whom he fained to be the sonne of George duke of Clarence lately escaped the tower of London. And the childe had learned of the priest such princely behaviour, that he lightly moued the earle, and many nobles of Ireland, tendering the blond royall of Richard Plantagenet and George his son, as also maligning the aduancement of the house of Lancaster in Henry the seventh, either to thinke or make the world weene, they thought verily this childe to be Edward earle of Marwike, the duke of Clarence lawfull son. And although is Henry more than halfe married their sport, in shewing the right earle thorough all the streets of London: yet the Lady Margaret dutchesse of Burgoyne sister to Edward the fourth, John de la Pole her nephew, the Lord Louel, sir Thomas Broughton knight, and other capitaines of this conspiracie, deuised to abuse the colour of this yong earles name, for preferring their purpose: whiche, if it came to god, they agreed to depose Lambert, and to erect the verie earle in dede, now prisoner in the tower: for whose quarrell, had they pretended to fight, they deemed it likely, he should haue been made away: wherefore it was blayed in Ireland, that the king, to mocke his subiectes, had schooled a boy to take vpon him the earle of Marwikes name, and had shewed him about in London, to blinde the eyes of simple folke, and to defeate the lawfull inheritor of the Duke of Clarence their countreiman and protector during his life, to whose linage they also deuised a title of the crowne.

In all the haste they assembled at Diuelin, and there in Christs church they crowned this Idoll, honozing him with titles imperiall, feasting and triumphing, rearing mightie thoutes and cries, carrying him thence to the kings castle vpon tall mens shoulders, that he might be seene and noted, as he was surely an honourable boy to looke vpon.

E. Hall:

In this meane time, the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louel, had gotten by the aid of Margaret, about 2000. Almains, with Martin Swart a German, and in martiall acts verie expert, to be their capitaine, and so sailing into Ireland, and at the cite of Diuelin caused yong Lambert to be proclaimed king of England, & so with a great multitude of Irishmen, of whom Thomas Gerardine was capitaine, they sayled into England with the new king, and landed at Frowdrey within a little of Lancaster, trusting there to be aided with money by sir Thomas Broughton, one of the chiefe of this conspiracie.

King Henry not sleeping in his matters, when he had gathered his host together, ouer the which the duke of Bedford, and the earle of Oxford were chiefe captaines, he went to Couentrie, where he being certified, that the earle of Lincolne was landed at Lancaster with his new king, he remoued to Nottingham, to whome shortly after came George Talbot earle of Shrewsbury, the lord Strange, sir John Cheney, with many other.

In this space the earle of Lincolne being entered into Northshire, directed his way to Newark vpon Trent, and at a little village called Stoke, three or foure miles from Newark, nigh to the king and his armie planted his campe.

The next date following, the king diuided his number into thre battalles, and after approached nigh the towne of Stoke, where both the armies toynd and fought egerly on both parts: but at the length the kings foreward set bp on the aduersaries with such a violence, that they slew many, and put the rest to flight. For there their chiefe captaines, the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louel, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martin Swart, and the lord Gerardine, (or after Campion, Morice Firz Thomas) captaine of the Irishmen, were slaine, and other aboue foure thousand. This battell was fought on the 16. of June: Lambert and the priest were both taken, to the no small grieve of Margaret Duchesse of Burgoigne.

Lambert, after that he had bene a turne-broch for a space in the kings kitchen, was at length made one of the kings falconers.

Now when the king had got the upper hande of his enemies (as yee haue heard) he remoued to Lincolne, and there carried thre daies, causing solemne processions to be made, in rendyng thanks to God for his fortunate victory. Then caused he execution to be don on such as were taken in the field, either at the battell, or in the chase. And shortly after he went into Dorsetyre, and there coasted the countrey, searching out such as had aided his enemies, whome hee punished, some by long imprisonment, some by large fines, and some by death. An. reg. 3.

About the midst of August the king came to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and from thence sent ambassadoys into Scotland, Richard Fox bishop of Winchester, Ser, and Richard Edgecomb knight, controller of his house, to conclude some peace, or truce with king James of Scotland. The English ambassadoys were honorably receiued, and entertained of the king, who gladly would haue concluded a perpetuall peace, but his people would not agree thereto: but in the end concluded vpon a truce for seuen yeeres. Truce with the Scots.

King Henric, after the ambassadoys were returned out of Scotland, came backe from Newcastle toward Dorke, and so to London: and in the waie being at Leicester, there came to him ambassadoys from Charles the French king, which declared both the recouerie of certaine towne out of the hands of Maximilian II. of Romans, which he had wrongfully detained from the crown of France befoze that time: and also that their master king Charles had now wars in hand against Francis duke of Brittain, because that he succoured and maintained the duke of Orleans and others that were rebels against him. Wherefoze his request was that for the olde familiaritie which had bene betwene them, he would now either assist and helpe him, or else stand as nenter betwixt them, neither helping or hurting the one or the other. The king answered the ambassadoys, that he would neither spare paine nor cost to set some reasonable stay betwixt them. And as the ambassadoys were returned home, the king sent his Chaplaine Christopher Vrsuicke ouer into France to king Charles, as well to shew, that he was glad of the victory which he had against Maximilian, as to declare what a tempestuous storme of euill rebellion himselfe had escaped, and overcome here in England. But the chiefe point of Vrsuikes errand consisted in this, that he should intimate to the French king, howe his maister king Henry offered himselfe as a mediatoꝝ betwixt him and the Duke of Bytaine, to make them friends, and if he perceiued the French king to giue eare thereunto, then he should go into Bytain to moue the duke there to bee contented, that some reasonable order might bee taken betwixt them.

Whilēt Vrsuikē was trauellling in this matter, king Henry for the accomplishing of the coronation of his wife Quēne Elizabeth, returned towarde London, and on the saturday next before the feast of All Saints he began his tourne with the Quēne from Warwike, and in his waie at S. Albons kept the feast of All Saints: and on the next morrow remoued to Barnet, where he rested: & on the next morrow as he was comming toward London, in Harney parke hee was met by the Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and principal commoners of the city of London, all on horsebacke, and in one lierie to attende vpon him, where he dubbed Sir Wil. Horne Mayor of London knight. And betwixt Iserdon and London, he dubbed sir John Perciuall alderman knight. Against the kings comming into London, the streets were grauelled, and the crosses in their lieries stood on both sides from Bishopsgate vnto Pauls church. The quēne with the kings mother, and many ladies stood in a house without Bishopsgate nere to the Spittle, and saue the king with his traine come toward the city: Who rode through the citie to Pauls church, whereinto he was receyued: Te Deum song for iote of his victorie, and then lodged in the Bishops palace. On the morrow he went in procession, and heard a sermon at Pauls crosse. On the next sūdate, the Quēne with her Ladies and other Estates, came from Greenwich to the tower of London, where she was receiued by the king: and on the 25. of Nouember she was crowned at Westminster with great solemnity. And shortly after king Henry deliuered lord T. marquis Dorset out of the tower, receiuing him again to his former fauor: because his truth had bene thourghly tried.

Christopher Vrsuikē hauing passed from the French king to the Duke of Bytaine, and backe againe to the French king, returned into England, and shewed vnto king Henry what he had done betwixt them.

Immediatlie after came the Lord Barnard Deaubeney a Scot borne, which in the French kings behalfe required king Henry to make some manner of end of those Bytish wars, what soeuer it were. King Henry therefore sent vnto France Iohn Abbot of Abingdon, Sir Richard Edgecombe knight, and the sayde Christopher Vrsuikē, with commission to giue some agreement betwixt the Frenchmen and the Bytons. These went first to the French king, and after to the Duke of Bytaine, with whome they coulde doe no good, and so signified to the king their master. Now in the meane time Edward lord Woodville uncle to the Quēne, sued to king Henry that he might haue a power of men appointed to him, with the which he would scale pꝛouille ouer without license or passport, so that euery man should thinke that hee were fledde the realme, without knowledge of the R. & although this request was outwardly denied, yet the L. Woodville withdrew himselfe into the Isle of Wight, where, as he was made ruler, he there gathered a crew of tall & hardy personages, to the the number of 400. & arrived in Brittain, where he joined himself with the Britons against the Frenchmen. The French k. advertised hereof, was not well pleased towards the k. of England, till k. H. by messengers excused himself to be guiltles, & then he was pacified. And so the English ambassadoys renewing the league & amity betwixt k. two k. for 12. moneths, returned into England.

The king of England forthwith called his high court of Parliament, in the which it was not onely determined, that the duke of Brittain shoulde be aided with power of men, but also there were diuers sums of money granted to the furnishing forth of the same. Parliament.

About the 27. day of July the duke of Brittaines army gaue battell to the French host nere to a towne called S. Albin, hauing apparelled 1700. of the Britons in coates with redde crosses after the English fashon, although they had but 400. English men with the lord Wooduile. The victorie in this battell fell to the French, so that almost all the English men were slaine with the lord Wooduile, besides 6000. Britons. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange were taken prisoners, which were there on the Britons part. The French men lost 1200. men, with their valiant Captaine an Italian, named James Galiot. The newes hereof being heard in England, caused king Henry to make haste in sending forth his army, and therefore was the lord Brooke with Sir Iohn Cheinie, Sir Iohn Middleton, Sir Raife Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Laton, and Sir Edmond Cornwall, sent ouer into Brittain with all conuenient speede, hauing with them 8000. men well appointed, and furnished in warlike sort to aide the duke of Brittain. These arrived in Brittain, and marched forward til they came nere to their enemies, where they pitched their field. But while this war was thus set forward, Francis duke of Brittain departed this life, and then the Rulers of that contry falling at dissention amongst themselves, tended not the defence of their country, so that the Englishmen perceiuing themselves to be danger, and being in the midst of Winter, they returned into Englands within five monethes after their first setting forth, so that finally the French king gat the upper hande of the Britons, and did toyne that Dutchie to his Realme of France. Lord Wooduile slaine.

We haue heard howe there was in the last Parliament money granted for the furnishing forth of the armie into Brittain, to witte, that euerie man shoulde bee taxed to paie the tenth penie of all landes and goods: which money the most of them that dwelled in the Bishoprick of Durham, and in the parts of Northshire refused utterly to paie, for that they thought themselves overcharged with the same. Wherefore such as were appoynted collectors, complained to Henry earle of Northumberland chiefe ruler of the north parts. The earle forthwith signified to the king all that matter, and the king not willing to pardon one penny, commaunded the earle to disresse, or other wise to leuy the money, as he shoulde thinke meetest. The rude people hearing of this answer from the king, by and by with great violence set vpon the earle, by the exciting of one named Iohn a Chamber, whome the earle with faire wordes sought to appease: but they alleaging all the fault to bee in him, as chiefe Authoꝝ of that tate, fare, furiously due him, and certaine of his household seruantes in a place called Cock-lodge by Thurstle, eightene miles from Dorke, on the 28. of A. pill. Then the northern men got them to armoz, assembling togither, chose them a capitaine called sir Iohn Egremond knight: and passing by the countreies, they published that they would bid the king battell, onelie in defence of their liberties. The king sent forth Thomas earle of Surrey, whom not long before he had deliuered out of the Towre, with a crewe of men, to chasten those rebels of the North, who skirmished with a company of the m, whome they discomfited, and toke sir I. a Chamber, the first beginner of this rebellion. Then the northern men came to the citie of Dorke, where they remained 3. or 4. daies, vnto the time they heard of the comming of the king, and then they fled out of Dorke, som one waie, som another: but diuers of them were taken and brought to the king, who caused them that were capitaines to be hanged and quartered. Iohn a Chamber was hanged at Dorke, vpon a gibbet set vpon a foure square paire of gallowes, and the other his complices were hanged on the gallowes round about him: but sir Iohn Egremond fled into Flanders to Margaret duches of Burgundy. After this the king returned to London, leaving the earle of Surrey to rule the countreie of the north, and appointed sir Rich. Tunstall to gather the subsidy to him due of the people.

James the third king of Scots was slain by his rebellious subjects, after they had vanquished him in battell.

About the same time, Adrian an Italian was sent Ambassadors from Pope Innocent the eight, into Scotland, there to haue taken by the variance betwixt the king and his people: But being arriued in England, he was informed that king James was slain, and therefore remained here certaine moneths, and soz that he was a man of excellent learning and humanitie, and commended by Iohn Morton Archbshop of Canterburie, the king made him first Bishop of Hereford, and shortly after, that being resigned, he was made bishop of Bath and Wells.

This yere came ambassadors from the French king, the Loydes Francis of Lutzenburge, Charles Maignanc, and Robert Gagwine, to haue concluded a peace with king Henry, and that the French king might dispose of the yong duches of Brytaine, as hee should thinke best: but thereto would not king Henry consent: notwithstanding at length it was agréde, that a forme of league should be drawn with conditions, whereupon the French ambassadors being dismissed, The earle of Dymonde, and Thomas Goldston prior of Christs church in Canterbury were appointed to follow into France for conclusion of y same league, but they returned without agréeing vpon anie league at al.

London.

King Henry determining no more with peaceable messages, but with open war to determine all controuersies betwixt him and the French king, called a parliament, and therein declared that he was iustly provoked to make war against the French men, and therefore desired them of their beneuolence of monie, and men toward the maintenance thereof. Euerie man allowed the cause to be iust, & promised his helping hand. The king commended them for their willing and faithfull hearts. And to the intent hee might spare the poorer sort,

King H. following his example, published that by their open gifts he woulde measure their beneuolent hearts: so that he who gaue most should be iudged to be his most louing friend; and he that gaue little to be esteemed according to his gift. By this meanes king Henry got innumerable great sums of money, with some grudge of the people, for the extremitie shewed by the commissioners in diuers places.

The citizens of London gaue toward this tourne 9682. pound, 17. s. and foure pence. Toward the which sum, manie Aldermen gaue 200. l. the peece, and some of the Commons 100. pounds: the rest was supplied by the poorer fozt.

Maximilian king of Romans intending to be reuenged on the Frenchmen, for the manie iniuries done to him, because he was not rich enough to maintaine the warre of himselfe, he sent his ambassadoz James Contibald, a man of great wisdom, to require the king of England to take his part against the French king, making diuers great offers on his owne behalfe, if it would please him so to do.

¶ Henry no lesse desirous than Maximilian to put the French king to trouble, and quickie to aid the Bixions in the extremitie of their busines, gladly consented to Maximilian, and promised to prepare an armie with all speed, and to passe the seas to inuade the French territories.

The 6. of Aprill the nobles of the realme, Hugh Clopton Mayor of London, his brethren the Aldermen, Sheriffes, and Compantes of the Citie in their liueries, assembled in the Cathedzall Church of S. Paul, where Doctor Morton Archbysop of Canterburie, Chancelloz of England, made to them an oration, declaring how the king of Spaine had won the greates and rich Citie and countrie of Granada from the Mozes: for soie whereof, Te Deum was song with great solemnitie.

In this season, Charles the French king receiued the lady Anne of Brittain, and with great solemnitie wedded her, hauing with her in dowrie the dutchie of Britaine. Thus was Maximilian in a great chafe toward the French king: Wherefore he sent vnto king Henrie, desiring him with all speede to passe the seas with his armie, that they might pursue the warre against their aduersaries with fire, sword, and blood. King Henry hearing this, and hauing no mistrust in the promise of Maximilian, with all speede leuied an army, and rigged his nauie: and when all things were readie, he sent his Almoner Christopher Vrsuicke, and sir Iohn Rifeley knight, vnto Maximilian, to certifie him that the king was in a readinesse, and would arrive at Calais, as soone as he should be aduertised, that Maximilian and his men were readie to ioine with him.

These ambassadoers comming into Flanders, perceiued that Maximilian was neither purued of men, money, armour, or anie other thing necessary for the setting forth of war, saue onely that his will was good, but his power was small.

Ann. reg. 8.

King Henrie being aduertised hercof, was sore disquieted in his minde: but taking counsaile, at length hee determined not to staie his pretended tourney, and therefore he so increased his number before he toke shippe, that hee with his owne power might be able to match with his aduersaries.

King Henry
sailed into France.

Then on the 9. of September, king Henry departed from Greenwich toward the sea-side, and on the first of October toke shipping at Sandwich, and the same date landed at Calais with a great armie. The 15. of October he departed toward Boloigne, the first night he lay at Sandringfield, the next night at Hogrison, where he met with the Earle of Orford chiefe Captaine of the foze-warde, then come from the beating downe of the Towne of Arde: with the earle of Orford came the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle of Denonshire, the earle of Suffolke, the earle of Essex, the lord Grey Codner, the L. Strange, the lord Powesse, the lord Hastings, the lord Audley, the lord Latimer, the baron of Dudley, and diuers knights and esquires: these laie that night at Hogrison, the next night both the wardes lay at Wainell, and the next night they came before Boloigne, and there laie at siege till the eight of Nouember, at the which time the lord Cordos chiefe Captaine vnder the French king, in his masters name required peace, which king Henry granted vpon conditions. This peace greatly displeased the English men, because they were ready prest to haue set on their enemies, and brought into great hope to haue bene enriched by the spoile to haue fallen to their lots of their enemies goods, besides the glorious fame of renowned victorie: and namelie for that diuers of the Captaines, to set themselves and their bandes the more gorgeously forward, had borrowed large summes of money, and for the repayment had mortgaged their landes, &c. The king returned to Calais: there were not manie of the English armie lost at this siege of Boloigne, and fewe men of name

Now springing there vp a netwe found son to king Edward the fourth in this maner. The Dutchesse of Burgoigne espying a certaine yong man, of visage beautifull, of countenance demure, of wit subtill, called Perken Werbeke, this yong man traouailing manie Countries, could speake English, and diuers other languages: the Dutchesse glad to haue got so mete an instrument for her purpose, as one not vnlike to be taken, and reputed for the Duke of Bozke, sonne to her brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certaine space with her priuillie, and him with such diligence instructed, both of the secrets, and common affaires of the Realme of England, and of the linage, descent, and order of the house of Bozke, that like a good schooller, he could tell all that was taught him without any staggering or staie in his wordes: and besides that he kept such a Princely countenance, that all men in maner did firmly beleue, that he was extracted of that noble familie of the Duke of Bozke: when the Dutchesse saue her time, she sent this Perken first into Portugale, and so into Ireland, where shortly after his arrival, he entred so farre in credite with the people, that his wordes were taken to be true.

Perken Werbeke.

The French king aduertised hereof, sent into Ireland for Perken, who with all diligence sayled into France, and comming to the kings presence, was of him royally receiued, and had a gard assigned, whereof was gouernor the lord Congreshall, and to him being at Paris, resorted Sir George Neuell bassard, Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinson, and a hundreth Englishmen: but after that the peace was confirmed betwixt the two kings of England and of France, the French king dismissed Perken.

And so Perken returned to the ladie Margaret, who assigned him a garde, and called him the white Rose of England, the nobility of Flaunders did to him all reuerence.

In England the brute of him sore disquieted the people, insomuch that not onlie of the meaner sorte, but also of the Nobles beleued all that was of him reported, and manie passed ouer to him: and some of the Noble men conspired together, purposing to ayde the foresaide Perken. Wherefore they sent messengers to the Ladie Margaret, to knowe when Richard Duke of Bozke might come into England, to the intente they might bee in a readinesse to assist him, at his arrival. Sir Robert Clifford knight, and William Barley were sent into Flaunders, which discovered to the Dutchesse all the secret intent of the friendes of the netwe founde Duke. The Dutchesse gladdly receiued this message, and brought the messenger to the sight of Perken: who so well counterfeited the gesture, and maner of Richard Duke of Bozke, that Sir Robert Clifforde beleued that he was the second sonne of king Edward, and thereof wrote into England to his complices.

Werbeke.

The King perceiuing that this fable was not vanquished, sent certaine knights with competent bandes of Souldiours to keepe the sea coasts: he also sent into the Lowe countries certaine persons to learne the trueth of this forged Dukes progenie: where some of them comming to Lozney got knowledge that he was borne in that cite of base linage, and named Perken Werbeke. The king being aduertised hereof, sent sir Edward Poinings knight, and sir W. Warham doctor of the lawes vnto Philip archduke of Burgoigne, to signifye to him that the yong man being with the lady Margaret, had falsely vsurped the name of Richard duke of Yorke, long before murdered. The ambassadoys hauing done their message, were answered, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke would neither aid or assist Perken, nor his complices, in any cause or quarrell.

After the returne of the ambassadoys, the King sent certaine espials into Flanders, which should faine themselves to haue fled to the duke of Yorke, and thereby to search out the whole intent of the conspiracie.

Other were sent to intise sir Robert Clifford and William Barley to returne into Englande, promising to them pardon of all their offences, and high rewards, for obeying the kings request. They that were sent did so earnestly applye their busines, that they brought to passe all thinges at their owne desires, for they learned who were the chiefe conspiratours, and perswaded Sir Robert Clifforde to giue ouer that enterpryse. When the King had knowledge of the chiefe Captaynes of the conspiracie, hee caused them to bee apprehended. The chiefe were, Iohn Ratcliffe Lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Mountforte, Sir Thomas Twates knights, William Dawbeney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Chreslenor, and Thomas Astewooder: Simon Mountforde, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney were beheaded, the other had their pardons, the Lord Fitzwalter was conuicted to Caleis and layde in houlde, and after lost his head.

Flemmish merchants with their wares banished this land

King Henry taking displeasure with the king of Romaines, for that he had not kept touch with him against the French king, and partly displeased with the Flemmings, but spectallie with the Ladie Margaret, for keeping and setting forward Perken Werbeke, not onlie banished the Flemmings wares and merchandize out of his dominions, but also restrained all English merchants from their repaire and trafike, into any of the lands and territories of the king of Romaines, or of the archduke Philip son to the king of Romaines, causing the parte to bee kept at Caleis, of all English merchandizes and commodities: wherefore the said king and his son banished out of their lands and spgories, all English clothes, yerne, tynne, leade, and other commodities of this Realme.

Henry the kings second son was created duke of Yorke, on Alhalowne Euen, at which time were made knights the duke of Yorke, the Lord Harington, Lord Clifton, Lord Dacre of the South, Lord Waren, Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir I. King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where on the twelfth day hee made Ralph Aultry Mayor of London, and William Marton late Mayor, knights.

The Approule after the Epiphantie, King Henry went to the Tower of London, and there remained till such time, as Sir Robert Clifford was there presented, which was done for a policie, that if Sir Robert accused any of the Nobilitie, they might be called thither, without suspicion of any enill, and there attached, and laid fast: now at the coming of Sy: Robert Clifford to the kinges presence, he besought him of pardon, and obtained it, and therewith opened the manner of the conspiracie, and who were the ayders, fautors, and chiefe beginners of it. Amongst whom he accused Sir William Stanley, whom the king had made his chiefe Chamberlaine, and one of his priue Councell: but now the king caused him to be restrained from his libertie in his owne Chamber, within the Square Tower, and there appoynted him by his priue Councell to be examined, where he wiselie agreed to all thinges layde to his charge, if hee were therein faultie & culpable. The report is, that this was his offence, when communication was had betwene him and the forementioned Sy: Robert Clifford, as concerning Perken, Sir William Stanley saide, that if he certaielie knewe that the yong man was the vndoubted sonne and heire of King Edward the fourth, hee woulde neuer fight nor beare armour against him, wherefore he was charged that he bare no heartie good will toward King Henry. The king hauing thus an hole in his coat, doubted first what he should do with him, for loath he was to lose the fauor of his brother the earle of Darby: but arraigned he was at Westminster and adiudged to die, according to which sentence, he was brought to the Tower hill on the sixteenth daie of Februarie, and there beheaded. This Sy: William Stanley was the chiefe and principall helper of King Henry to the Crowne at Bosworth fildes, against King Richard: Hee was a man of greate power in his Countrey, and also of greate wealth, insomuch, as the common fame ran, there was in his castle of Holte, found in readie coine and plate, to the value of fortie thousand markes or more, and his land and fees extended to thre thousand pounds by yere.

The King perceiuing that this fable was not banquished, sent certaine knights with competent bandes of Souldiours to keepe the sea coast: he also sent into the Lowe countries certaine persons to learne the truth of this forged Dukes progenie: where some of them comming to Dozney got knowledge that he was bozne in that citie of base linage, and named Perken Werbeke. The king being aduertised hereof, sent sir Edward Poinings knight, and sir W. Warham doctoz of the lawes vnto Philip archduke of Burgoigne, to signifye to him that the yong man being with the lady Margarer, had falsely vsurped the name of Richard duke of Yorke, long before murdered. The ambassadozs hauing done their message, were answered, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke would neither aid oꝝ assist Perken, noꝝ his complices, in any cause oꝝ quarrell.

After the returne of the ambassadozs, the King sent certaine espials into Flanders, which should saue themselves to haue fled to the duke of Yorke, and thereby to search out the whole intent of the conspiracie.

Other were sent to intise sir Robert Clifford and William Barley to returne into Englande, promysing to them pardon of all their offences, and high rewards, for obeying the kings request. They that were sent did so earnestly applye their busines, that they brought to passe all thinges at their owne desires, for they learned who were the chiefe conspiratours, and perswaded Sir Robert Clifford to giue ouer that enterpryse. When the King had knowledge of the chiefe Captaynes of the conspiracie, hee caused them to bee apprehended. The chiefe were, John Ratcliffe Lozde Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Mounteforte, Sir Thomas Twates knights, William Dawbeney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Chreslenor, and Thomas Astewoode: Simon Mounteforde, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney were beheaded, the other had their pardons, the Lord Fitzwalter was conuicted to Caleis and layde in houlde, and after lost his head.

banished this land

King Henry taking displeasure with the king of Romaines, for that he had not kept touch with him against the French king, and partlie displeased with the Flemmings, but spectallie with the Ladie Margarer, for keeping and setting forward Perken Werbeke, not onlie banished the Flemmings wares and merchandize out of his dominions, but also restrained all English merchants from their repaire and trafike, into any of the lands and territories of the king of Romaines, oꝝ of the archduke Philip son to the king of Romaines, causing the parte to bee kept at Caleis, of all English merchandizes and commodities: wherefore the said king and his son banished out of their lands and sygnories, all English clothes, yearne, tynne, leade, and other commodities of this Realme.

Henry the kings second son was created duke of Yorke, on Alhalotwne Couen, at which time were made knights the duke of Yorke, the Lozde Harington, Lord Clifton, Lord Dacre of the South, Lord Waren, Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir I. Arundell, Sir Walter Griffith, Sir Gerueyes Clifton, Sir Robert Harcourt, Sir Edwarde Traforde, Sir Henry Merney, Sir Robert Newbrough, Sir Raulph Ryder, Sir I. King Henry kept his Christmas at Westminster, where on the twelſe day hee made Ralph Aulſry Maſor of London, and William Marton late Maſor, Knights.

The Morrow after the Epiphanie, King Henry went to the Tower of London, and there remained till ſuch time, as Sir Robert Clifford was there preſented, which was done for a policie, that if Sir Robert accused anie of the Nobilitie, they mought be called thither, without ſuſpition of anie euill, and there attached, and laid faſt: now at the coming of Sy: Robert Clifford to the kinges preſence, he beſought him of pardon, and obtained it, and therewith opened the manner of the conſpiracie, and who were the ayders, ſanctos, and chiefe beginners of it. Amongſt whome he accused ſir William Stanley, whome the king had made his chiefe Chamberlaine, and one of his priuate Councell: but nowe the king cauſed him to bee reſtrained from his libertie in his owne Chamber, within the Square Tower, and there appoynted him by his priuate Councell to be examined, where he wiſſelie agreed to all thinges layde to his charge, if hee were therein faultie & culpable. The report is, that this was his offence, when communication was had betwene him and the ſoementioned Sy: Robert Clifford, as concerning Perken, Sir William Stanley ſaide, that if he certaiuelie knewe that the yong man was the vndoubted ſonne and heire of King Edward the fourth, hee woulde neuer fight nor beare armour againſt him, wherefore he was charged that he bare no heartie good will to ward King Henry. The king hauing thus an hole in his coat, doubted firſt what he ſhoulde do wiſh him, for loath he was to loſe the fauor of his brother the earle of Darby: but arraigned he was at Westminster and adiudged to die, according to which ſentence, he was brought to the Tower hill on the ſixteenth date of Februarye, and there beheaded. This Sy: William Stanley was the chiefe and principall helper of King Henry to the Crowne at Boſworth Fielde, againſt King Richard: Hee was a man of greate power in his Countrey, and alſo of greate wealth, inſomuch, as the common ſame ran, there was in his caſtle of Holte, found in readie coine and plate, to the value of ſortie thouſand markes or more, and his land and ſees extended to thre thouſand pounds by yere.

He lodged in the Tower.

Sir W. Stanley beheaded.

The 22. of Februarye were arraigned in Guildhall at London foure perſons, to witte, Thomas Bagnall, Iohn Scot, Iohn Herthe, and Iohn Kenington, the which were Sanctuary men of Saint Martin le grand in London, and lately before taken thence, for forging ſeditious libels, to the ſlander of the king, and ſome of his Councell: for the which thre of them were adiudged to die, and the fourth named Bagnall, pleaded to bee reſtored to ſanctuary: by reaſon whereof he was reſtored to the Tower till the next terme, and on the 26. of Februarye, the other thre wiſh a Flemming, and Robert Bikle a yecoman of the Crown, were all ſue executed at Tyborne.

Giles Lorde Dawbeney was made the kinges chiefe Chamberlaine.

The King ſent into Irelande, Sy: Henry Deane, late abbot of Lanthome, whome

whome he made Chancelloz of that Ile, and Sir Edward Poinings knight, with an armie of men, whereof when the fauozers of Perken heard, they straight fled to the woods and marishes. Sye Edward Poinings with his whole Armie marched against the wild Irish, because the other being culpable were fled to them for succour: but when hee sawe himselfe and his power, not able to followe his enemies in the woods, marishes and mountaines, he was constrained to recule backe, soze disquieted agaynst Geralde Earle of Kyldare, being then the Kinges Deputie, whome hee suspected to bee the cause that hee hadde no succours sent him, and therefore sodaynelie hee caused the Earle to bee appzehended, and as a Prisoner bzought him into Englande, which Earle so cleared himselfe of all thinges layde to his charge, that he was dismissed and sent into Ireland agayne, there to bee deputie and Lieutenant as before.

King Henrie beeing nowe in some better suretie of his Estate, tooke his Progresse into Lancasthyze about the five and twentieth of June, there to bee merrie with his wpothet the Countesse of Darbie, which then laie at Latham.

Perken Werbeke bene arraigned in Kent.

Perken Werbeke being in fflanders, and hoping at length to obtayne the Crowne of England, gathered a power of all nations, some banqueroutes, some theeves, and such as desired to live by rapine, and being thus furnished, he tooke such shippes as his friendes had prouided for him, and then departing from fflaunders, arrived at Deale in Kent, on the thirde of Julie: he put som of his men to lande, to signifie his arrivall with such a power, that the victoyp must nedes incline to his part. The Kentishmen vnderstanding that Perken had none with him to account of, but straingers bozne, and base people, like faithfull subiectes determined to fall vpon those that were thus nowe come to Lande, and also to trye if they might allare the whole fflumber out of their Shippes, so to glue them Watfayle. But Perken woulde not sette one foot out of his Shippe, till he sawe all thinges sure: yet he permitted some of his Souldiours to go on lande, which beeing trained forth a prettie wale from their Shippes, and seeing they coulde haue no comfort of the Countrey, they withdreyue againe to their Shippes: at which withdreyuing, the Maior of Sandwich, with certayne commons of the Countrey bikered with the residue that were vpon lande, and tooke aloue of them 169. persons, among the which were five Captaines, Mountfort, Corbet, White Belt, Quintyn, and Genine. And on the twelfth of Julie Sye Iohn Pechy Sheriffe of Kent, bzought vnto London Bzidge those 169. persons, where the Sheriffes of London, Nicholas Alwine and Iohn Warner receiued and conueied them, railed in robes like hoyses in a cart, vnto the tower of London, and to Petugate, and thortlie after to the number of 150. were hanged about the sea coasts in Kent, Essex,

In this season deceased Cicilie dutchesse of Yorke, mother to king Edward the fourth, in her castle of Barkhamsted, and was buried at Fordinghay by her husband.

King Henry being in his progresse north, sent sir Richard Guilford to commend the fidelitie and manhood of the Kentishmen, and also to render to them most hartie thanks for the same: he also caused order to be taken for the erecting of bekenings or beacons, and watching of them.

Perken Werbeke sayled into Ireland, trusting there to augment his number: but perceiving that the hope of victorie consisted not in naked people without furniture or armor, he toke the sea againe at Corse, and sayled into Scotland, where comming to the presence of King James, hee forged such a painted processe, that the king of Scots began to haue Perken in great honor, and caused him to be called Duke of Yorke, and to perswade the world that he was so indeede, he caused the ladie Katherine daughter to Alexander Earle of Huntley, his nigh kinsman to be espoused to him.

Perken Werbeke went into Ireland.

And shortly after in companie of this Perken, he entered into Englande with a puissant armie, and caused proclamation to be made to spare all those that would submit themselves vnto Richard Duke of Yorke, and here-with they began to war in most cruell maner, with slaughter of men, burning of towines, and committing detestable enormities, so that all the Countrey of Northumberland, was by them in maner wasted and destroyed. At length when the souldiers were laden with pray, perceiving that no succour came out of England vnto the new Duke, they withdrew backe into Scotlande, enriched with prayes and booties.

When King Henrie was truelie certified that the Scottis King was returned home, he staide all the preparations made at that time to goe against him: but yet meaning to be reuenged of the wrongs done to him by king James and his people, hee first called a Parliament, and in that assembly declared the cause of the instant warre, and how necessarie it should be for to haue the warre pursued against those enemies that had begunne it: to which motion all the Nobilitie wholie agreed, and a subsidie was granted.

King Henry prepared a mightie armie to invade Scotland, and ordeined for chiefeaine, the lord Dawbency: but as this army was foreward towarde Scotlande, the same was stayed and called backe againe, by reason of a new commotion begun by the Cornishmen, for the payment of the subsidie granted at the last Parliament. Of these people the heads were called Thomas Flamoke, a Gentleman learned in the lawe, and Michaell Ioseph a blacke smith or horse-farrier of Bodmin, men of stout stomackes. They layde the fault of this eraction vnto Iohn Morton archbishop of Canterburie, and to sir

Reginald Bray, because they were chiefe of the kinges Councell. Flamoke and Ioseph exhorted the common people to put on harnels, and to followe thm in the quarrell, promising not to hurt anie creature, but onelie to see thm punished that procured such exactions to be laide on the people, without anie reasonable cause: so these capitaines assembled a great number of people together, then praising their hardines, when all thinges were ready for their iourney, set forthwarde with their armie, and came to Taunton, where they slew the pro- nosts of Parin, which was one of the commissioners of the subsidie, and from thence came to Wells, so intending to go to London, where the king then sojourned. When the king was aduertised of these doings, he was somewhat astonished, he reuoked the lord Daubeney which was going against the Scots, and increased his army. The nobles came to London with as manie men of war as they could put in a readines, to aide the king against his rebelles, if neede should be. In the mean time James Twichet L. Audley, being confederat with the rebels of Cornwall, joined with them, being come to Wells, and tooke by on him, as their chiefe Captaine and leader: from Wells they went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, & so into Kent, where they hoped to haue had great aid, but they were deceiued: for the earle of Kent, George L. Burgeuenny, John Brooke, L. Cobham, sir Edward Poinings, sir Ric. Guilford, sir T. Bourchier, John Peche, William Scot, and a great number of people were ready to defend the countrey, which thing maruellouslie dissuaded the Cornish men, so that manie of them fled from their companie. The Capitaines brought their people to black-heath, and there ordered their battels, either ready to fight with the king, if he would assaile them, or else to assault the citie of London. The king sent John Earle of Arfordre, Henry Bouchier earle of Essex, Edmonde de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rife ap Thomas, and Sir Humfrey Stanley, noble warriours, with a great companie of Archers, and horsemen, to encounter the hill on either side, to the intent that all by-waies being stopped, all hope of flight shoulde bee taken from them: and incontinentlie, hee himselfe beeing furnished with a greate Armie, sette forthwarde out of the Citie, encamped himselfe in Saint Georges felde, where he lodged that night, and on the next morning sent the Lord Dawbeney with a great company to set upon them earlie in the morning, which first gat the byrdsge of Dartford strand, while the earles set on them on euery side, the lord Daubeney came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting, on the 22. of Iune, the Cornish men were ouercome: but first they tooke the Lord Daubeney prisoner, but let him go at libertie, without hurt or detriment. There were slain of the rebels about thre hundred, and taken of them about fiftene hundred. There was giuen to them that tooke them their gods: amongst thm the blacke Smith and other their Captaynes were put to death. And when this battayle was ended, the king wanted of all his number but thre hundred men, which were slayne.

The Lord Audley was drawn from Newgate to the Tower-hill in a coat of his own armes, painted upon paper, reuerfed and all to one, and there was beheaded on the 28. of Iune. Flamoke and Ioseph the blacke Smith were drawn,

In the moneth of July h. Henry sent an army into Scotland, vnder the guiding of the earle of Surrey, and the lord Newill, which made sharp war vpon the Scots: but by the labor of Peter Helias sent from the king of Spaine, a truce was concluded betwixt the two kings of England and of Scotland, with condition that Iames king of Scots shoulde conuey Perken Werbeke out of his realme and signories.

About the same time king Henry receiued the ambassadoys that were sent to him from the French king. Also the Lord of Camphere, and other oratoys of Philip Archduke of Austria, and Duke of Burgoyne, came to him for the conclusion of amitie, and to haue the English Merchantes to resort again into their Countrey, which request he granted. And so did the English men resort againe into the Archdukes dominions, and were receiued (saith Hall) into Andwerpe with Generall procession, so glad was that towne of their returne.

Perken Werbek being willed by the king of Scots to depart out of the Scottish dominions, sailed with his wife and familie into Ireland, where while hee remained hee had knowledge from the Cornishmen, that they were ready to renew the war againe. Whereupon he hauing with him fowze small ships, and not aboue an hundred and twentie men, sailed into Cornewall, and there landed at Whitesande Baie on the 7 of September, from whence he went to Bodmyn, there hee gathered to him aboue thre thousande persons. Then Perken made proclamations in name of King Richard the fourth, as son to king Edward the fourth. And by the aduise of his thre Counsellors, Iohn Heron Mercer, a Banquerout, Richard Skelton Tayler, and Iohn Askeley Scrivener, determined first of all to assaile the winning of Excester, and so hasting thither, he laid siege to it: The citizens perceiuing themselves to be in danger, let certaine messengers downe by cordes ouer the wall, that mought certifie the king: And herewith caused faggots to be brought and laid to the inward part of their gates, and set them all on fire, to the intent to keepe their enimies from entring in, and their Citizens from flying out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches & rampiers to defend their enimies in stead of gates. Perken set by Ladders to scale the walles: but the Citizens, with helpe of such as were come forth of the countrey to their aid, so valiantly defended the walles, that they slue aboue 200. of Perkins souldiours at that assault. The king halled forth with his Hoste, and sent the Lord Dawbeney with certaine bands of Light horsemen to aduertise all men of his coming.

But in the meane season Edward Courtney earle of Denonshire, and William his sonne, accompanied with sir Edmond Carew, sir T. Trenchard, sir William Courtney, sir Tho Fulford, sir I. Haliwell, sir I. Crokar, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgcombe, W. Snaure, came into the citie of Excester to helpe the citizens, so that the earle was hurt in the arme with an arrow, and so were many of his men, but fewe slaine. When Perken sawe he could not winne the citie of Excester, he went from thence to Taunton, and there mustering his men, he perceiued them to be minished, he began to mistrust the remnant: in deede when the people that followed him in hope that no small number of the nobilitie would ioyne with him, sawe no such matter come to passe, they stale awaie from him. When the king heard that Perken was gone to Taunton, he followed after him with all speede, and by the way there came to him Edward Duke of Buckingham, and a great companie of noble men. But as sone as Perken was informed that the king was at hand, he with a 60. horsemen fled from Taunton to a sanctuary at Betwdeley beside Southampton. King Henry sent the lord Dawbeney with 500. horsemen after Perken to apprehend him, so that many of his captaines were taken. Also uers horsemen rode to Saint Michaels mount, and there toke the lady Gorden wife to Perken, and brought her to the king. At whose beauty and amiable countenance the king much marvelled, and sent her to London to the Quene. The common people submitted themselves to the kings mercie.

After this the king rode to Excester, and there executed diuers Cornish men: he also caused the sanctuary wherein Perken was inclosed, to be introwned with bands of light horsemen, to watch that Perken shoulde not escape, wherefore Perken vpon promise of pardon committed himselfe to the king, and then the king returned to London.

Thomas Langton bishop of Winchester deceased, & was buried at Winchester: he gave to Denbroke hall in Cambridge, a cup of silver over gilt, which I have seene, with this inscription: Thomas Langton Winton. episcopus, aula Penbrochia olim socius, dedit hanc tassiam coopertam eidem aula 1497. qui alienavit anathema sit, 67. ounces. Richard Fox sometime Bishop of Exeter, after of Durham, was translated to Winchester. Henry Deane sometime Bishop of Lanthorne, then Bishop of Salisbury, was now translated to the archbishopricke of Canterbury. Richard Redman succeeded in the bishopricke of Ely, and Ric. Nien in the bishopricke of Norwich: Th. Savage first bishop of Rochester then of London, was now translated to the see of Exeter.

Langton bishop of Winchester.

The lord Denham treasurer of England deceased, and on the 30. of January was buried in the Greyfriars church at London, on the south side of the quire.

Denham deceased.

This yere when the K. had finished much of his new building at his manor of Shene, & again furnished and repaired that before was perished with fire, in the 13. yere of his reigne, so much as in the time of that hideous fire, many notable and rich jewels, and other things of superabundant value, were perished, by the violence thereof, it pleased him to command it should be called his manor of Richmond, and not otherwise. The King also this yere builded anew Bainards castle in London, and repaired his manor of Greenwich.

Richmond and Bainards castle newly builded.

In the moneth of May the K. kept a roiall turney and iusts in the tower of London, of his lords, knights, and other.

About this time Edmond de la Pole earle of Suffolke, son to John Duke of Suffolke, and Ladie Elizabeth sister to King Edward the fourth, was indicted of murder, for slaying a meane person in his rage and furie (as it was saide) and he was perswaded to confesse, but was pardoned by the king, yet because he was brought to the bar afore the kings bench, and arraigned (which he took as a great blame to his honor) shortly after he fled into Flanders, unto the lady Margaret his aunt. Scuer theles (saith Hal) he returned again, and excused himselfe to the king, so that he was thought to be guiltles of any crime. But after this earle, with his brother Richard fled againe into Flanders. Which departure of the Earle soe vexed the king, who doubted of some new trouble to ensue thereof.

An. reg. 17.

In this meane time the lady Katherin of Spaine was sent by her father K. Ferdinando, with a puissant navy of ships into England, where she arrived in the haven of Plimmouth, the 2. of October.

Lady Katherin arrived in England.

The 9. of November prince Arthur with a goodlie companie came through Fleetstreet of London to S. Pauls, and so to the wardrobe by the Black friers, and there was lodged. And the same date came the Ladie Katherine, prince unto Lambeth, where the with hir ladies was lodged, in the archbishops Anne of Canterburie: and vpon the Fridaie next following about two of the clock at afternoone, the said ladie p<sup>r</sup>inces accompanied with many lordes and ladies, in most sumptuous manner apparrelled, came riding from Lambeth into Southwarke, and so to London brydge, where was ordeined a colliche pageant of S. Katherine and Saint Vrsula, with many virgins; from thence the rode to Grace Strate, where was ordeined a second pageant, from thence to the conduit in Coynhill, where was another pageant. The great conduit in cheape ran with Calcoine wine, and was furnished with musick. Against Soperlane end was the fourth pageant. At the Standard in cheape was ordeined the fift pageant. At Pauls gate was the 6. pageant: by the which the p<sup>r</sup>inceesse rode throught Pauls church-yard vnto the bishop of Londons palace, where she and hir people were lodged.

The pale in Pauls church.

Now within the church of S. Paul, to wit, from the west gate of it vnto the uppermost grasse or step at the going in of the quier, was made a pale of timber and boards to go vpon, from the saide west dore vnto the forenamed grasse, of the height of 6 foot from the ground, or more: and foreaneust the place where the commissaries court is kept within the said church, was ordeined a standing like vnto a mountain, with steps on euery side, which was couered ouer with red wulsted, and in likewise was all the railles: against which mountaine vpon the north side, within the foresaide place of the commissaries court was ordeined a standing for the king, and such other as liked him to haue: & on the south side almost, for against the kings standing was ordeined a scaffold, wherupon stood the spaior and his brethren.

Prince Arthur married.

Then vpon the 14. of Nouember being Sundae, vpon the aboue named mountaine, was p<sup>r</sup>ince Arthur about the age of 15. yeres, and the lady Katherine about the age of 18 yeres, both clad in white sattine, married by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by 19. bishops and abbots mitered. And the 13. the queene, the kings mother, stood in the place afozenamed, where they hearde and beheld the solemnization: which being finished, the said archbishop and bishops toke their way from the mountaine, vpon the saide pale couered vnder foot with blew rey-cloth vnto the quier, & so to the high altar, whom followed the sponse and spouses, the lady Cicile sister to the queene bearing hir traine, after hir followed 100. ladies & gentlewomen, in right costly apparel, then the spaior in a gowne of crimson velvet, and his brethren in scarlet, with the sword borne before the maior, & sate in the quier the masse while, the archbish. of Poike sate in the deanes place, and offred as chiefe, and after him the D. of Buckingham, &c. Wonderful it was to behold the riches of apparell woine that daie, with the possant chaines of gold: of which, two were specially noted, to wit, sir T. Brandon knight, master of the kings horse, which that day ware a chain valued at 1400. pound: and the other William de Riuers esquire, master of the hawks, whose chain was valued at a thousand pound: many mo were of 200. 300. and so forth, these were not noted for the length, but for the greatnesse of the linkes. Also the duke of Buckingham ware a gotone wrought of p<sup>r</sup>eele woike, and set vpon cloth of tissue, furred with sables, the which Gotone was valued valued at 1500. l. Sir Nicholas Vause knight, wore a gown of purple beluet, pight with pées of gold so thicke and masse, that it was valued in golde, besides the silke and fur, a thousand pounce: which chaines and garments were valued by goldsmithes of best skill, and them that wrought them. The masse being finished, the princeesse was led by Henry duke of Yorke, and a Legate of Spain, by the foresaid pace into the palace, going before her men of honor, to the number of 160. with gentlemen and other. There came vnto the Maior Sir Richard Crofts steward of the Princes house, which brought him and his brethren the aldermen into the greates hall, and at a table vpon the west side of the hall, caused them to bee set to dinner, where honorable were they serued with 12. dishes to a messe at the first course, 15. the second course, and 18. dishes the third course. In this hall was a cupbord of fine staves height, being triangular, the which was set with plate valued 1200. l. the which was neuer mooued at that day: & in the vtter chamber where the princeesse dined, was a cupbord of gold plate, garnished with stone and pearle, valued about 20000. pound. The Tuesday following, the king and queene being all this season at Barnards castle, came vnto Powles, and heard there masse, and then accompanied with manie nobles, went into the palace, and there dined with the princeesse. This date Sir Nicholas Vause wore a collar of Esses which weied, as the goldsmithes that made it reported, 800. pounce of nobles: And the same date at afternoon, the saide prince was conuited with many Lords and Ladies vnto Powles church, where the said estates took their barges, and were rowed to Westminster, vpon whome the maior attended, with the Aldermen and fellowship in barges, garnished with banners and other deuises, musick, &c. Thus much for that marriage.

The 25. of January at Pauls crosse was declared the assurance of James King of Scots, and of the lady Margaret eldest daughter to King Henry of England, in reioicing whereof Te Deum was sung, and benefices made through the city, and at 12. of the benefices were set 12. hogsheds of Gasconne wine, to be drunk of all men felie.

James king of Scots assured to lady Margaret daughter to King Henry the 7.

There was apprehended Willard Courtney son to the earle of Denonshire, which had married the lady Katherine daughter to Sir Ed. the 4. and William de la Pole brother to the earle of Suffolke, Sir James Tyrell, Sir John Windham, &c. when the earle of Suffolke before died (as ye haue heard) understood that wait was laid for him in Flanders, he worried about Germany and Fraunce, to purchase succor, if by any meanes he might, but in the end, he submitted himselfe vnder the protection of Philip archduke of Austria, which was to his own destruction, as proued after.

When King Henry had settled things to his contentment and pleasure, there sodainelie happened to him a lamentable chance, for in the beginning of the moneth of Aprill, there died that noble and vertuous prince Arthur the Kings eldest sonne, vnder the age of 16. yeres, in his castle of Ludlowe, and with greates funerall obsequie was buried in the Cathedral Church of Worcester.

Prince Arthur deceased.

On the 2. of May were arraigned in Gaillhall at London, Sir James Tyrell knight, lieutenant of Caimes castle, Sir John Windham knight, Welborne

Then brought out of the new found Islands.

This yere were brought unto the king thre men taken in the new found Islands by Sebastian Gabato, before named, in anno 1498. these men were clothed in beastes skins, and eate raw flesh, but spake such a language as no man could underst and them, of the which thre men, two of them were scene in the kings court at Westminster two yeres after, clothed like English men, and could not be discerned from English men.

This yere the chappell of our Ladie, aboute the east end of the high altar of Westminster church, with also a tauern nere adioynning called the white rose, were taken downe: in the which place or plot of ground, on the 24. of January, the first stone of our Lady chappell was laid by the hands of Ioh. Islip abbot of the same monastery, sir Reginald Bray knight of the Carter, Doctor Barons master of the Scholes, doctor Wall chaplaine to the king, master Hugh Oldham chaplaine to the countesse of Derby and Richmond the kings mother, sir Ed. Stanhope knight, and diuers other. Upon the which stone was ingraven the day and yere, &c. The charges in building this chappell (as I haue bene informed) amounted to the summe of 14000. pounds. The same king Henry made a ship, named the great Barrie, which shippe with the furniture cost him as much.

Queene Elizabeth deceased.

King Henry and Queene Elizabeth lying within the tower of London, the queene was brought a bed of a faire daughter on Candlemas day, which was there christened by the name of Katherine: and on the 11. day of that moneth the said queene deceased, and was buried at Westminster, whose daughter lived not long after.

The 18. of February Henry duke of Yorke the kings only son was created prince of Wales, earle of Chester, and of Flint at Westminster.

The 16. of February Henry Deane archbishop of Canterbury died at Lambeth, when he had late archbishop nigh two yeres, and was buried in Christs church at Canterburie: Wil. Warham Bishop of London was translated to Canterbury.

On the 25. of June at the bishop of Salisburies place in Fleetstreet, was the noble prince Henry, the 2. son of king Henry the 7. assured in matrimonie to the lady Katherine, late the wife of that excellent prince Arthur.

The 5. of August deceased sir Reginald Bray knight, treasurer of the kings wars, and was buried at Windsoze in the new chappell there, whereof he had been a great builder.

On the 4. of December deceased the lord Strange, eldest son to the earle of Derby at his place in London, beneath Paules chaine, now called Cartar place, and was buried within the parish church of S. James at Carlisle-hithe. Ann. reg. 19.

The 25. of January began a parliament at Westminster, of the which was chosen speaker for the commons master Edmond Dudley. Parliament.

A new coine was by parliament appointed, that is to say, groat and halfe groat, which bare but halfe faces: the same time also was coined a groat, which was in value 12. d. but of those were but few coined. 1504 New coins.

This yere allome, which many yeres before had bene sold for 6 s. an hundred, and lower, arose to 5. nobles an hundred, and after to 4. markes, &c. Allume deere. Ann. reg. 20.

About Christmasse, the more part of the prisoners of the Bartholmey in Southwarke brake out, and manie of them being shortly after taken, were put to execution, specially those which had laine for felony or treason: among the which, two of them being sea rowers were hanged on a tree in the Chamis, a little from Wapping in the Walse, and hung there long after. 1505 Prisoners of the Bartholmey brake out.

This yere on S. Georges euen or 21. of Aprill, king Henry with an honorable compante of knights of the order of the Garter, all in their habits, rode through the city from the Towler of London unto Paules church, and there heard euen song, his chappell being there, and having rule of the quere, and after euen song the king and those knights rode unto Bainsards castle, & there lodged that night: and upon the morrowe in the same habits came againe to the said church of S. Paul, and went on procession, and after the diuine seruice and offering being done, returned. S. Georges day the king rode to Paules.

The 25. of Aprill a coiner for making of false money was dratone from the Towler unto Tiborne, and there hanged.

About Midsummer Pope Julius the 2. sent to the K. a cap of maintenance, and a sword, as to a defender of the church, the which cap and sword were received with many and great ceremonies, which I ouerpass. A cap of maintenance. Ann. reg. 21.

The 5. of January in the night, the kings chamber was fired at Richmond, the which might not be quenched, till many curtaines, carpets, rich beds, and much other staffe was consumed. 1506 Richmond on fire.

Through great tempest of winde bring at the south west, which began the 15. of January, & continued till the 26. of the same, Philip king of Castile and his wife were weather driven, and landed at Falmouth in England, as they were passing on the 16. of Januarie out of Flanders toward Spaine, who were honorably received by the earle of Arundel at the kings appointment with 300. horses, all by torch light. This tempest was strange to many men, because the violence thereof had blowne downe the eagle of brasse from the spire of Paules church in London, and in the falling, the same eagle brake and battered the blacke eagle which hung for a signe in Paules churchyard, that time being but low houses, where now is the schole of Paules. The king of Castile landed in England. Francis Guicciar. Weathercocke of Paules blowne downe.

Edmond dela Pole earle of Suffolke being sent (according to promise made to king Henry) out of the county of Philip king of Castile, through Flanders was brought to Calets on the 16. of March, and so ouer into England & landed at Dover on the 24. of March, conueied by sir Henry Wyat knight, and sir Earle of Suffolke sent to the Towes.

Gallerie at Richmond.

In the beginning of the moneth of July, a gallerie newe builded at Richmond, wherein the king and the Prince his sonne had walked not one houre before, it fell sodainlie downe about midnight, but no chistian man perished thereby.

Ann. reg. 22.

The 21. of August the weather-cocke of Paules being of copper, ouer gilt, in weight 40. pounds, in length 4. fote, in breadth 3. fote and a halfe, was set vpon the spire of Paules steeple.

King Henry sickened.

This yere the king began to be diseased of a certaine infirmittie, which threue euery yere, but especially in the spring time, sore bered him.

Also the sweating sickness, which (as ye haue heard) in the first yere of this kings raigne first afflicted the people of the realme, now assailed them again, hotobit, by the remedy found at the beginning of it, nothing the like number died thereof, now this second time, as did the first.

This yere in the Lent season, the king deliuered manie prisoners out of sundry prisons, in somuch, that as many as lay in Ludgate, and both Counters for 40. shillings and vnder, he redeemed and deliuered: and ouer that he redeemed many that lay for ten pound, and other larger sums as was said.

The kings promoters.

But true it is, that this yere or rather somewhat soner, sprang much sorrow through the land, for by meane of gracelesse persons, which named the mselues the kings Promoters, many forgotten statutes, made hundreds of yeres passed, were nowe quickened, and sharpe called vpon, to the great vniquietnesse of many the kings subiects, aswell the rich as the other that had competent substance. And albeit that other yeres before passed, since the time of sir William Caples trouble, which was in the 10. yere of this kings raigne, many times were called to sundry reckonings, and were faine to seeke their ends to their charge: yet now, since Empson and Dudley were set in authority, many mo in number were called before the m, for many surmised causes, of the which none escaped without paying of fines. And if it were such a matter, as some would abide the trial of the law, then had they false Juroys so fixed vnto them, that they were well assured that they would not passe against their wils, for all was done in the kings name, and yet the most profit came to other mens coffers.

Thomas Sauage archbishop of Yorke deceased at his castle of Calwod, his body was buried at yorke, his hart at Hacklefield in Cheshire where he was borne, in a chappel by him founded, which he minded to haue made a colledge: he was not elected after the ancient custome, but by nomination of the k. and saue: of the Pope Alexander. This Th. was daily employed about temporall matters at the kings pleasure, he vsed hunting, and bestowed much cost in repairing and new building at his castle of Calwod, and his manors of Scroby, he maintained manie tall yeomen in his house, and was neuer installed, but after a secret maner at Yorke, and by his deputy at Beuerlake, he was the first that brake the custome of solemn feasting at their installing at Yorke, Norwich, defaced by fire.

This yere amongst manie other was sir W. Caple againe newly troubled, for things don in time of his being mai<sup>or</sup> of London, wher of the report was, for that false money came to his sight, and hee did not due correction vpon the partie that to him was accused to be the coiner of it: but were this the cause or other, truth it is, that in great trouble he was for it, and finally, for he woulde fall to no agrement, he was by Derby, Simson, and other of their companie, which as then the whole Iurie of them, were fallie bounde to the girdles of Empson and Dudley, that as they woulde, the verdit alwaies passed, and so was he by them indicted, and after by Dudley at the kings commandement put in prison, and so continued long time, and at length, for so much as he woulde not agree to paie to the king 2000. l. was by the forenamed Dudley commanded to the towler, where hee laie till it was nere Whitsonside after, before which time king Henry was deceased, and then was he deliuered free. Also Thomas Knesworth late Mai<sup>or</sup> of London, with both his Sheriffs, after great veration and imprisonment, being accused that they had misused the charge of their offices, were deliuered for great sums of money, as it was said, 1400. l. Christopher Hawis mercer and alberman of London, had bin so long veret by the said promoters, that it shortned his life by thought taking. Sir Laurence Ailmer late Mai<sup>or</sup> of London, and his two Sheriffes were put to their fine of 1000. ponde to the king: but Sir Laurence after great trouble susteined at the handes of Empson, was committed to prison, and continued prisoner till the said Empson was himselfe sent to the Towler. This yere was finished the goodlie Hospitall of the Sauoy nere unto Charing crosse, which was a notable foundation for the poore, don by king Henry the 7. unto the which he purchased and gaue Landes for the relieving of 100. poore people. This house was first named Sauoy place, by Peter earle of Sauoy the first builder thereof, brother to Boniface archb. of Canterbury about the 29. yere of king Henry the 3. who made the said Peter earle of Richmond. This house belonged since to the Dukes of Lancaster, and at this time being in the kings handes, was conuerted to an hospitall, retaining the first name of Sauoy. It Henry builded 3. houses of Franciscan friars, which were called Obseruantes, at Richmond, Græntwich, and Newmarke, and 3. other of the same family of Franciscan friars, called Couentualles, at Canterburie, Newcastle, and Southampton.

King Henry the eight.

Ann. reg. 1.

Henrie the eight, borne at Granetolsch, second sonne to king Henry the seventh, about the age of eightene yeres beganne his raigne by the decease of his father, on the two and twentieth of Aprill: but was proclaimed on the foure and twentieth, in anno Christi 1509. and the same daie in the after none hee was conueyed to the Tower of London, where hee lodged for a season. Of personage he was tall and mightie, in wit and memorie excellent, of such malefile and humanity as was comely in such a prince. By the aduise of his grandmother Margaret countesse of Richmond and Derby, diuers graue personages were elected to bee of his priuate counsell, whose names were William Warham Archibishop of Canterburie and Chancelor of England, Richard Foxe bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey and treasurer of England, George Talborearle of Shrewsbury & lord steward of the kings household, Charles Sommerfet Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Thomas Louel, Sir Henry Wyat, docto<sup>r</sup> T. Ruthall, sir Edward Poinings. These graue counsellors, fearing least such abundance of riches & wealth as the king was now possessed of, might moue his yong yeres vnto riotous forgetting of himselfe, gate him to be present with them whe they sate in counsel, so to acquaint him with matters pertaining to the politike government of the realme, with the which at the first he could not well endure to be much troubled, being rather inclined to follow such pleasant pastimes as his youthfull yeres did more delight in.

On the same 24. day of Aprill, the lord Henry Stafford brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was arrested and committed to the Tower: and doctor Russell was nominated bishop of Durham.

The five and twentieth of Aprill was proclaimed the kings consent to the generall pardon granted by his father, and that himselfe was contented to forgive all such persons as had bin vbered for any cause, so that it touched not felony or treason: and ouer that, in the same proclamation was comprised, that all vagabonds and sturdy beggers should auoid the city of London, and resorte vnto such countries as they were bozne in, vpon paine appointed. Also proclamation was made, that if any man could proue himselfe to be depriued of his goods wrongfully by the late commissioners of the forfeitures, hee should present his plaint to the king, who was ready to satisfie every one of all injuries sustained. After which publication many such as had bene constrained, either by right or wrong to pay any thing for forfeitures of lawes or customes by them transgressed, flocked to the court, and there declared their griefes: the counsell heard every mans complaint, and such as were found to haue payde any thing without plaine proue of iust cause, such order was taken that they had their money again: but the complainants came in so thicke, that the commissioners and other that had dealt in the forfeitures perceiuing that it was hard, and almost impossible to satisfie them all, refused to heare any further complaints or suites for restitution, but thought it best to commit those to prison, by whom the complainants pretended themselves to haue been wronged, and the reuon was sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dudley esquire, by a polittike meane brought into the tower, where they were accused of treason, and so remained there prisoners, there by to quiet mens minds, that made such suite to haue their money againe restored. And shortly after were manie of their promoters (for so they termed the miselues) called to a reckoning, and cast into sundry prisons, as Page, Michell, Canby, Henry Toft, Smith, and sundrie others, but Baptist Grimald the most cruell wretch of them all, went to Westminster, and there registred himselfe a sanctuary man.

appointed to wait on the k.

The king ordained fiftie Gentlemen to be speares, euerie of them to haue an Archer, a Demilance, and a Cistrall, and euerie speare to haue thre great Horses to be attendant on his person, of the which Bando the earle of Essex was Lieutenant, and Sir Iohn Pechie Captaine, which ordinance continued not long, the charges was so great: for there were none of them, but they and their Horses were apparelled and trapped in cloth of golde, silver, and Goldsmithes worke.

Dudley arraigned and condemned.

The seventeenth of July Edmond Dudley was arraigned in the Guildhall of London, where he was condemned, and had iudgement to be drawn, hanged and quartered, and committed to the Tower againe, where he lay long after, inasmuch, that the same went the Queene had purchased his pardon, but that was not so, as after shall appeare. And like as in this while to the comfort of the kings subiects many things were ordered, as general pardons for all fordone offences, treason, felony, and debt by specialties, and a few other excepted: so in like manner, to the disturbance of all the forenamed Promoters, was manie and diuers meanes sought and found to bere and trouble them right wilsellie, that before had bereed manie a true man wrongfullie: by meanes whereof, they were daily taken in diuers counties of England, and brought to the Tower and other prisons, where they remained long. In the which time manie opprobrious rimmes in despite of them were made, whereof I haue scene some, especiallie one against Sir Richard Empson, made by Cornish of the kinges chappell, at the request of the earle of Kent, forsomuch, as the saide Empson had deceiued him of a part of his Lande, and in finisier waies had so informed the king of him, that he was long holden under, and put to great hinderance. But (saith mine Authour) what cause soeuer moued the saide Earle and other at that time, let no man thinke, that for any cause hee hath remembred it, saue onelie, that wise men make, by the sobaine rising and falling of these men, be well ware howe they goude them, when they be put in greate authoritie, and especiallie such as this man was, the which which suddenly rose from pouertie (as being the sonne of a sheue-maker, in Worcester) into inestimable authoritie and riches. And such other as were of his affinitie, especially Dudley, that at the time of his fall had in possession of lands and fees, with offices, to the yereley value of 800. pound, and in readie coine 20000. pound, ouer many moe riches, as iewels, plate, and rich stuffe of household, the which was shortly gathered, for not thirteene yeres before hee was by laboz of friends brought into the office of vndersherifswike of London, where he continued with fauour of the citizens, by the space of sixe yeres or moze, after which season he sold his office, and byew him to the kings court, where shortly after he grew in such fauour, that he was chosen speaker of the parliament, in the ninetenth yere of king Henry the tenth, and some after the kings president, by reason of which office, he had such authoritie, that the chiefe lordes of England were glad to be in his fauour, and were faine to sue to him for many vrgent causes, wherupon the lordes and all men, as they durst, had him in disoaine, which was his ouerthrow in the end. Thus much for example may suffice.

On the 29. of Iuly was arraigned in the guildhall of London one Smith for a promoter, and with him were inquired of by inquests, H. Toft, Page, Canby, &c. but for that they laide for themselves, they were seruingmen, and did but as they were commaded, they were all reppriued to such prisons as they came from, where they remained long after.

In the moneth of October sir Richard Empson was conueted into Northhamptonshire, and there arraigned, and lastly deemed to be dyatone, hanged, and quartered, and then was brought againe to the Tower.

Empson ar-

This yere li. Henry kept his Christmas at Richmond with great rosaltie.

The 21. of January began a parliament, whereof sir Thomas Ingleby was chosen speaker: in the which parliament, Sir Richard Empson, and Edmond Dudley were attainted of high treason.

This yere came ambassadoys not onely from the king of Arragon and Castile, but also from the kings of France, Denmarke, Scotland, and other princes, which were highly welcomed, and royally entertained. And on the 20. of April a peace was proclaimed betwixt England and France, during the lines of king Henry the 8. of England, and Lewis the French king.

On Midsummer eue at night, king Henry came priuily into Westcheape of London, being clothed in one of the coates of his guard: and on S. Peters night the king and quene came rosally riding to the signe of the kings head in Cheape, there beheld the watch of the citie, which watch was set out with diuers godly shewes, as had bene accustomed.

King Henry riding on his progresse for his disport, there was brought be-and Dudley, wherefore he sent commandement to the constable of the tower, charging him that they should shortly after be put to execution. Whereupon the sheriffes of London were sent for, and commanded by a speciall writ to see the said execution performed and done. And they upon that went to the tower and receiued them on the 17. of August, and from thence brought them vnto the scaffold on the tower hill, where their heads were stricken off: which being done, the bodie of Empton was buried in the white friers church, and the body of Dudley in the blacke friers church. This Edmond Dudley in the time of his imprisonment in the tower compiled one notable booke, which he intitled, the Tree of common wealth, dedicated vnto King Henry the eight, but neuer came to his hand. A copie whereof faste written (reseruing the originall to my selfe) I gaue vnto the honourable Lord Robert earle of Leicester, about the yere 1562. At whose request and earnest perswasion I then first collected my lummary of the Chronicles of England, and dedicated the same, with the continuation and encrease thereof, from time to time, to my great charges, to his honoz, in reward whereof I alwaies receiued his hartly thanks, with commendations, and not other wise, what seuer hath bene reported by mine aduersary T. Archers sent against the Moyses.

In the month of febr. came ambassadors from the K. of Aragon & Castile, to require an aid of 1500. archers to be sent to the same king, hauing at that time war with the Moyses, enemies to the christian faith: the king granted their request, and because the lord Thomas Darcy a knight of the gartar made humble suite to the king to be generall of that crue, the king granted his desire: there were appointed to go with him, the lord Anthony Grey, brother to the marques Dorset, Hen. Guilford, Weste, Browne, and William Sidley Esquires of the kings house, sir Rob. Constable, sir Roger Hastings, and sir Ralph Elderton, with diuers other gentlemen to be captaines.

Ann. reg. 3.

They departed out of Wlmmouth hauen with 4. ships royall, and on the first of June arriued at Cales in south Spaine, where they were honourably receiued by a bishop. and other of the kings counsell: but an abstinence of war being taken, the L. Darcy and the rest were required to returne home againe, money was sent to pay the soldiers their wages, for their conduction againe into England, with diuers gifts giuen to the Lord Darcy and the other gentlemen, and after returned into England.

Archers sent to aide the ladie Margaret dutches of Sauoy.

During the time that the L. Darcy was in Spaine, the lady Margaret dutches of Sauoy, & daughter to Maximilian the emperoz, and gouernoz of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, and other the low countries, appertaining to Charles the yong prince of Castile, sent in the end of May to the K. of England, requiring to haue 1500. archers to aide her against the D. of Gelders, which soze troubled the countries aforesaid: the king granting her request, appointed sir Edw. Poinings knight of the gartar, and controulour of his house, a valiant captaine, to be lieutenant and leader of the said 1500. archers, which accompanied with his sonne in lawe the Lord Clinton, sir Mathew Browne, sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Wetherall, and Shirley Esquires, with other other gentlemen and yeomen to the foresaide number: they toke their ships besides Sandwich the eighteenth of July, and landed at Armetw on the nineteenth, from whence they were conducted to Barrolo, &c. whither the lady Regent came to welcome them, on the tenen and twentieth of July they departed to Kollyndale, and on the last of July they came to Bulduke, and the next daie the whole army of Almaine, Flemings and other appertaining to the said lady, met with our Englishmen without Bulduke, where they set forth in order, the lady Regent being there present, which toke her leaue of all the Captaines, and departed to Bulduke. The army to the number of 10000. beside the 1500. Englishmen, passed forthward, and the 10. of August came before a little Castle, standing on the higher side of the maze, called Bismnoiss, belonging to the ballard of Gelderland.

The same night Thomas Hart, chiefe governour of the English ordinance, made his approach, and in the morning made battery, so that the assault thereupon being giuen, the fortresse was won, and the captaine with 80. and odd men were slaine, and xix. taken, of the which xi. were hanged.

John Morton captain of an hundred English men, and one Guyet an esquire of Burgoigne, crying, S. George, were the first that entred, at which assault there was but one English man slaine.

On the 14. of August, the armie feried over the river of Maze into Gelderland, the next daie they came to a little Towne called Ayske, the people were fled, but there was a little castle, raised and cast downe: upon the next daie they bent the saide Towne of Ayske, and all the countrey about it, and came at the last to a towne called Stranule being verie strong, double diked, and walled, within it were 360. good men of war besides the inhabitants. At the first they shewed good countenance of defence, but when they saw their enemies approach nere vnto them with rampiers and trenches, they yielded by composition, so that the souldiers might depart, but y<sup>e</sup> townesmen rested prisoners, at the will of the Prince of Castile. And so on S. Bartholmews day, the admirall of Flanders, and sir Edward Poynings entred the towne with great triumph.

The 26. of August the army came before Menlow and sent an Herault called Archoys to summon the towne: but they within would not heare, and yet they shot guns at him. Sir Edward Poynings, at this siege had ordinance pertaining to him. Henry as followeth, Serpentine the xii. signes: Armes of England, the Antelope, the Greyhound, the Dragon, the Griffon, the Snake, the Hermasbe, the Tisse, the Poze, the Cocatrice, the Slange, the Unicorne, the Panter, the Hart, the Hinde, the Aleuaut, the Falcon, the Marlion, Of Coctenes, the Bozke, the Somerset, the Richmond, the March, the Normandy, the Rose, the Cales, in all 36. pieces. The army remoued vnto the north side of Menlow, and part went over the water, & made trenches to the water, and so besieged the towne, but for all they could do without, they within kept one gate open. At length the English captaines perceiving that they lay there in vaine, considering the strength of the towne, and also how the army was not of number sufficient to i. uiron the same on each side, wrote to the king, who willed them with all speede to returne, and so they did. Sir Edward Poynings went to the Court of Burgoyne, where he was receiued right honourably of the young Prince of Castile and of his Aunt the lady Margaret. Iohn Norton, Iohn Fogge, Iohn Scot, and Thomas Lynde were made knights by the Prince. And the lady Margaret, seeing the souldiers coates to be worne, and foule with lying on the ground, gaue to euery yeoman a coate of wollen cloth coloured white and greene, red and yealow, the white and greene for the king of Englands liuerie, the redde and yealow for the Duke of Burgoynes liuerie, and these foure colours were medled together, this shee did to her great commendation: after that sir Edward Poynings had bin highly feasted, he returned with his crew into England, and had not lost fully one hundred persons.

Andrew Barton a Scottish pyrate, ouercome.

King Henry being at Leicester, heard tydings, that one Andrew Barton a Scottish man, and pyrate of the sea, seeing that the king of Scots had warre with the Portugales, robbed euery nation, and stopped the kings streams that no merchant almost could passe, and when he toke Englishmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portugales goods, and thus he robbed at euery hauens mouth. The king displeased herewith, sent sir Edw. Howard lord admirall of England, the lord Thomas Howard son and heire to the earle of Surrey, and Iohn Hopton to the sea, which made ready two ships, and taking sea, by chance of weather were seuered. The lord Howard lying in the Downs, perceluing wher Andrew was making to ward Scotland, and so fast the said lord chased him, that he ouertoke him, so there was a sore battell betwixt them, Andrew neuer blew his whistle to incourage his men: but at length the lord Howard and the Englishmen did so valiantly, that by cleane strength they entred the maine decke. The Scots fought sore on the hatches: but in conclusion Andrew was taken, and so sore wounded, that he died there, the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ship called the Lion. All this while was the lord admirall in chase of the barke of Scotland called Jenny Perwin, which was wont to saile with the Lion in company, and he with other did so much, that he laid them aboard, and though the Scots manfully defended themselves, yet at length the English men entred the barke, slew many, and toke all the residue. Thus were these two ships taken and brought to Blackwall, the second of August. The Scots taken prisoners were sent to London, where they were kept as prisoners, in the Archbishop of Pokes place, now called White hall, and after sent into Scotland.

About this season the French king made sharpe warre against Pope Iuly: wherefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he should leaue off to bere the pope in such wise being his friend and confederate: but when the French king seemed little to regard that request, the king sent him worde, to deliuer to him his inheritance, both of the dutchy of Normandie and Guien, and the counties of Aniois & Paen, and also of his crowne of France, or else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose: but notwithstanding the French king pursued his wars in Italy: whereupon the king of England toynd in league with Maximilian the Emperour, and and Ferdinando king of Spaine, and with diuers other princes, resolved by the aduice of his counsell, to make war on the French king and his countries, and made preparation both by sea and land, setting forth shippes to the sea for safeguard of his merchants.

Parliament.

King Henry kept his Christmasse at Greenwich, with great and plentifull cheere. The 4. of Februarie began the Parliament at Westminster, upon the which daie, the king and his lordes spirituall and temporall, with manie of the common house being present in the Parliament chamber, the archbishop of Canterbury then Chancelloz of England, made a famous and clearkly proposition, grounded on this Text, Iustitia & pax osculate sunt, whereupon hee stood well a large houre and an halfe, declaring howe iustice shoulde bee ministered, and peace shoulde be nourished, and by what meanes iustice was put by, & peace turned into war. The which hee approued by examples of the olde and new testament in right sufficient wise, to his great commendation, & singular comfort of the hearers. On the next morrow began the conuocation in Pauls church: and on the next daie sir Robert Sheffield knight, and sometime recorder of London, was chosen speaker of the Parliament, and on the next morrowe being the 8. of Februarie, before the king and lordes hee made his proposition, excusing himselfe, and beseeching the king (as the maner is) to be dismissed of that office, for the which proposition he was well allowed and admitted. On the same day the k. dubbed sir Henry Guilford and sir Charles Brandon knights. In this parliament was granted two sixteenes of the temporallty, and of the clergy two dismes or tenths. During which parliament, a yeoman of the crowne named Newbolt, due within the palace of Westminster a seruant of Pascer Willoughby, for the which fact, the king commanded to be set by a paire of gallowes in the same place where the said seruant lost his life: and upon the same, the said Newbolt was hanged, and remained on the gallowes by the space of two daies.

The king of Arragon hauing warre with the French king, wrote to king Henry of England to send ouer an army into Biscay, and so to invade France on that side, for the recovery first of his dutchy of Guien, and hee woulde ayde them with ordnance, hoysmen, beasts and carriages, with other necessaries appertaining to the same.

Ann. reg. 4.
R. H. sent an army into Biscay against the French.

The k. of England and his Councell putting their affiance in this promise of king Ferdinando prepared a noble army al of footmen, and smial artillery, appointed L. Th. Grey marques Dorset to be chiefe conductor of the same. Whereouer king Henry daily studying to set forward the war which hee had begun against the French k. caused sir Edmond Howard admittall, with all diligence to make ready diuers goodly shippes, as the Soueraigne and others, to the number of 18. besides smaller vessels, and therewith hauing in his company Syz Weston Brown, Griffith Duo, Edward Cobham, T. Windham, T. Lucy, William Perton, Henry Shirborne, Stephen Bull, George Witwage, John Hopton, William Gunstone, Thomas Draper, Edmonde Cooke, John Burdet, and diuers other, he took the sea, and scouring the same about the mist of May he came before Portsmouth. About the same time the L. marques Dorset, & other noble men appointed for the journey to Biscay, as the Lord Howard son and heire to the earle of Surrey, the L. Brook, the L. Willoughby, the L. Ferrers, the L. Iohn, the L. Anthony, the L. Leonard Grey, all three brethren to the marques, sir Griffith ap Rice, sir Maurice Burkley, sir W. Sands, the baron of Warford, sir Richard Cornwall brother to the said baron, W. Husie, Jo Molton, W. Kingstone esquires, sir Henry Willoughby, and diuers other, with the number of 10000. soldiers, amongst the which were 500. Almains, all clad in white, vnder the leading of a Fleming named Gwint, came to Southampton, & there mustered their bands. The 16. of May they were shipped in Spanish vessels, and landed in Biscay, where they were bidden welcome, but had no such aide sent to them as was promised, whereby they lost the doing of some great exploit against the French men on the frontiers of Gascoigne: after the army had laine 30. daies in the campe, there came from the king of Arragon messengers to desire the marques and his people to take patience for a while, and they should see that such preparation should be made for the furnishing of their enterprise. In the meane time the English men for the most part, were victualled with garlike, and dranke hote wines, and ate hote fruits, which procured their blood to boile in their bodies, whereby they fell sicke, and died more than 800. persons: in the end many promises being made by the king of Spaine, and none performed, the English men embarked, and landed in England in the moneth of December. The king of Spaine seemed to be sore discontented with their departure, affirming that if they had tarried till the next spring, he would in their companie haue invaded France.

The Regent of England, a ship, burned.

About the moneth of August the nauies of England and France meeting at Britaine bay, fought a cruell battell, in the which the Regent or soueraigne of England, and a carike of Brest in France, being grappled together, were burned, and their captains with their men all drowned: the English capitaine was sir Thomas Kneuer, who had with him sir Iohn Carew, and 700. men. In the French carike was sir Pierce Morgan, with nine hundred men, were all burnt or drowned.

Great Harrys

King Henry hearing of the losse of the Regent, caused a great ship to be made, such a one, as the like had neuer bene sene in England, and named it, Henry grace de Dieu.

Parliament at Westminster.

In the moneth of November the king called his high court of parliament, in the which it was concluded, that the king himselfe in person with an army royall should invade France, whereupon notice thereof being giuen to such as should attend, they made their purueance with all diligence that might be. In this parliament was granted to the king two sixtens, and foure demies, and had money, of euery duke ten markes, an earle five pound, a lord foure pound, a knight foure markes, and euery man valued at 800. pound in goods to paie foure markes, and so after that rate, till him that was valued at fortye shillings paid twelue pence, and euery man that toke fortye shillings wages twelae pence, and euery man and woman of 15. yeres or upward foure pence.

The king kept his Christmas at Greenwich with great solemnity, dauncing, disguisings, and mummeries in most princely maner.

After Candlemas, the king created sir Charles Brandon, Viscount Lisle.

In the moneth of March was the kings Parie of ships rosall, and other set forth to the number of 42. beside balengiers, vnder the conduct of the L. Admirall, accompanied with sir Walter Deuereux, L. Ferrers, sir Wolstan Brown, sir Edw. Ichingham, sir Anthony Poinis, sir Iohn Wallope, sir Thomas Windham, sir Steuen Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney, esquires, and diuers other balliant captaines.

These made saile into Britaine, and came to Barthram bay, where they lay at anchor for a time, at length minding to enter the hauen of Brest on the 25. of Aprill, the L. admirall with a pike of the enemye, was throlwen ouerboard, and so drowned, al the other escaped very hardly away, for if they had tarried the tide had failed them, and then al had bin lost. The L. Ferrers and the other captaines sorrowfull of this chance, returned into England. King Henry being sorry for the losse of his admirall, called to him T. Howard eldest brother to the late admirall, and son and heire apparant to the earle of Surrey, whom he made admirall, willing him to reuenge his brothers death. The lord Howard humbly thanked his grace of the trust that he put in him, and so immediately went to the sea, and scoured the same, that no French man durst shew himselfe on the coast of England.

On May euen Edmond de la Pole earle of Suffolke was beheaded on the tower hill, his brother Richard de la Pole, called the white Rose, was afterward slaine before the citie of Waite, in anno 1524.

King Henry hauing all his prouisions ready for the warre, and meaning in person to passe the sea, appointed George Talbot earle of Shrewsburie, high steward of his household, to be capteine generall of his foreward, and in his companie were appointed to go Thom. Stanley earle of Darby, lord Docwray prior of S. Johns, sir Robert Rarelife lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Cobham, sir Rice ap Thomas, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Richard Sacheueell, sir Iohn Digby, sir Iohn Askew, sir Lewes Bagot, sir Thomas Cornwall, and many other knights and esquires, and souldiers to the number of 8000. men, these passed the sea, and came to Caleis about the midd of May. Charles Somerset L. Herbert chamberlaine to the king, in the end of that moneth followed with 6000. men, and so forth.

King Henry hauing sent ouer a great and puissant army into France to besiege the citie of Turwiz, himselfe accompanied with manie noble men, and sixe hundred archers of his garde, all in white gabberdines, toke his shippe at Dover on the last of June in the morning. When the king was shipped and made saile, all his army followed, to the number of foure hundred shippes, and the winde was so, that they were brought the same night into Caleis hauen.

On the next morrow, being the first of Iuly, Thomas L. Howard, admirall of England, landed at Whitland bay, and entred, spoiled, and bent the town, and returned to his ships.

The 21. of July, the king passed out of the towne of Caleis in goodly array of battell, and toke the field, & notwithstanding that the foreward of the kings great army were before Turwine, yet the king of his owne battell made 3. battels: the lord Lisle marshall of the host, was capitaine of the foreward, and vnder him 3000. men: sir Richard Carew with 300. men, was the right hand wing to the foreward, & the lord Darcie with 300. men, wing on the left hand. The scourers and fore-riders of this battell, were the Northumberland men on light geldings. The earle of Essex was lieutenant generall of the speares, and sir Iohn Pechy was vice-gouernor of the horsemen. Before the king went 800. Almains all in a plumpe: after them came the standard with the red dragon, next the banner of our Ladie, & next of the Trinitie, vnder the which were all the kings household. Then went the banner of the armes of England, borne by sir Iohn Gifford, vnder which banner was the king himselfe, with diuers noble men, and other, to the number of three thousand men. The Duke of Buckingham with sixe hundred men, was on the kings left hand. On the right hand was sir Edward Poynings with other sixe hundred men, equall with the Almains. The lord of Burgainie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand: sir William Compton with the retinue of the Bishop of Winchester Fox, and master Thomas Wolsey, afterward cardinal, of eight hundred, was in maner of a reereward: Sir Anthony Oughtred and sir Iohn Neuill with the kings speares that followed, were foure hundred, and so the whole army was eleuen thousand and three hundred men. The master of the ordinance set forth the kings artillerie, as faulcons, singes, bombardes, powder, stones, bowes, arrowes, and such other things necessary for the field, the whole number of the carriages were 13. hundred, the leaders and drivers of the same were nineteen hundred men. The king lay the first night betwixt Calkwell and Freidon: the next night before the Castle of Guisnes at Becard: the next night he lay beside Arde a good way without the English pale, and when he was a little beyond Dernome, there came a great host of Frenchmen, that purposed to haue set vpon him: but the king with his host kept their ground, and shotte their great ordinance, wherewith the aray of the French men was broken.

The 4. of August, the king in good order of battell came before the citie of Turwine, and planted his siege in warlike wise.

The 11. date of August, Maximilian the Emperour came to king Henrie, who was receiued with great triumph betwene Aire and the campe. The Emperour and his retinue were in blacke, as mourners for the Emperesse lately deceased.

The Emperour and all his seruants were retained with the king of England in wages by the day, euery person according to his degree, and the Emperour as the kings souldier wore a crosse of S. George with a rose, and so he and all his traine came to the kings campe the 13. of August, and there was receiued with great magnificence.

The 23. of August, the towne of Turwine was giuen ouer vnto the king of England, with condition, that all men in the towne might safely passe with horse and harnesse: and so on the 24. of August there came out of the towne 4000. men of war and mo well appointed, whereof 600. were wel hoysed, their standards borne before them.

Turwine yel-ded to king
Henry.

The 26. of August, the king remoued to Singate, and there it was agreed, that the walles, gates, bulwarkes, and towres of Turwine should be defaced, razed, and cast downe: of which conclusion, the Emperour sent word to S. Omers and to Aire, which being sious of that tidings, sent thither pioners, and so they and the English pioners brake downe the walles, gates, and towres, and filled the ditch, and fired the towne, except the cathedrall church and the palace, and all the ordinance was by the king sent to Aire to bee kept to his vse.

Turwine razed
and burnt.

After this it was concluded, that the king in person should laie his siege to the citie of Turney, wherefore he set forward three goodly battels: the first was conducted by the Earle of Shrewsburie: the second battell led the king himselfe, with whom was the Emperour: the reterward was conducted by the lord Harbert, and so the first night they lay in campe beside Aire.

The 14. of September, the king and his army came to Beatewin, and on the morrowe passed forward, and came to a strait where was a forde, which with great difficultie they passed: and the next day they passed a bridge called Mount Anandieu, &c.

The one and twentieth day of September the king remoued his campe toward Turney, and lodged within three miles of the Citie, the which night came to him the Emperour and the Dallsgrau: the people about Turney were with their goods fledde to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of inhabitants the citie was well replenished.

Henry besieged Turney.

The king came in aray of battell before Turney, planted his ordinance rounde about the citie, diuers trenches were cast, and rampiers made, so that no Citizens coulde issue out, nor no aide come to them. Whereupon at length, to wit, on the nine and twentieth of September the citie was yielded.

Turney yielded to H. Henry.

Then the king appointed the lord Lisle, the lord Burgeyny, and the lord Willoughby to take possession, which with five thousand men entred the Citie, and toke the market place and the wals, and then master Thomas Wolsey the kings almoner called before him all the citizens, and swore them to the king of England: the number of which citizens were fourescore thousand.

On the 2. day of October the king entred the citie of Turney, and there ordained sir Edward Poinings, knight of the order of the Carter, to be his lieutenant, with capitaines, horsemen, archers, and artillery conuenient: he made his almoner Thomas Wolsey bishop of Turney, and then returned to Caleis, and sailed from thence to Douer on the 24. of October: from whence he rode post to Richmond, where the Quene lay.

Scots besieged Norham.

In this meane time, James K. of Scots assembled the whole power of Scotland, wherewith he approached to the borders, and comming to Norham castle, laid siege thereunto, and after he had beaten this castle with his ordinance, by the space of five daies, the same was deliuered vpp into his hands.

And hee (sayeth Paulus Ionius) made the same to bee layde leuell with the grounde, and from thence marched (wasting with fire and sword) to besiege the strong towne of Bertwike.

Now had the earle of Surrey, Lieutenant of the north, in absence of king Henry, giuen order to assemble a power of 26000. men, and comming to Alnwick, carried thence till the whole number of his people were come: amongst other, his son the lord admirall with 5000. souldiers and men of war, which had bin at sea, came to his father, whereof he greatly reioiced. The earle appointed his battels, with wings, and horsemen necessary: first of the foreward was ordained captain the L. Howard admirall, with the L. Clifford, the L. Coniers, the L. Latimer, the L. Scrope, the lord Ogle, the lord Lumley, sir Nicholas Appleyard, master of the ordinance, sir Stephen Bull, sir Henry Sherborne, sir William Sidney, sir Edward Echingham, sir William Bulmere, with the power of the Bp. shoppe of Durham, s<sup>rs</sup> William Gascoigne, sir Christopher Warde, sir Iohn Eueringham, sir Th. Metham, sir Walter Griffith, &c. Of the wing on the right hand of the foreward was captaine, s<sup>r</sup> Edmond Howard, knight marshall of the hoste, and with him Brian Tonstall, Raife Brearton, Iohn Laurence, Richard Bold Esquires, s<sup>rs</sup> Iohn Bothe, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Butler knights, and other. Of the wing on the left hande was Captaine, s<sup>r</sup> Marmaduke Constable with his sonnes, s<sup>rs</sup> William Percy, and of Lancashire, a thousande men. Of the Rereward was Captaine the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Scrope of Bolton, s<sup>r</sup> Philippe Tilney, s<sup>r</sup> George Darcie, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Barkeley, s<sup>r</sup> Iohn Rockife, s<sup>r</sup> Christopher Pickering, Richard Tempest, s<sup>r</sup> Iohn Stanley, &c. Nowe the Earle of Surrey was informed that king James laye imbattayled vpon a great Mountaine, called Flodon, a place of such strength, as was impossible for the Englishmen to come nere them, he sent Rouge Crosse pursuant to the king of Scots, to shew him, that where he had contrary to his oth and league, invaded this his brothers realme, and done greates hurt, in casting downe castles, towres, and houses, burning and destroying the same, &c. The said earle would be ready to try the rightwisenes of the cause with the king in battel, by friday next comming, if he of his noble courage would giue him tarrying and abode. Rouge Crosse went and did his message to James king of Scots, as he was appointed: And hereupon king James sent to the earle an herault named Ilay, who deliuered to the earle a letter written by the kings secretarie, as follooweth.

K. James letter to E. earle of Surrey.

As to the causes alleadged of our comming into England, again our band and promise (as is alleadged) hereto we answer: Our brother was bound as far to vs as we were to him. And when we swore last before his ambassador, in presence of our counsel, we expessed specially by oth, that we would kepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else: we sweare our brother brake first to vs, & with his breake, we haue required diuers times him to amend: and lately latelie we warned our brother, as he did not vs or he brake, and this wee take for our quarrel, & with Gods grace shall defend the same, at your assured time, which with Gods grace we shall abide.

Right high and mightie Prince, so it is that latelie I sent vnto you Rouge Croisse pursuant at armes, and by him aduertised your grace, that I and other my soueraign lords subiects, were come to repesse & resist your invasions of this the kings my soueraigne Lordes realme, and for that intent I offered to giue you bat tell, on this halfe friday next coming: which my message, your grace toke pleasure to heare, as I am informed, and by your herault I lay, yee made answer, that ye were right iolious of my desire, and would not fayle to accomplish the same, and to abide me there, where yee were at the time of my message, so shewed vnto your grace. And albeit it hath pleased you to chaunge your said promise, and put your selfe into a grounde, more like a Fortresse or campe, than vpon any indifferent ground for bat tell to be tried, wherefore considering the day appointed is so nigh approaching, I desire you of your grace, that for the accomplishment of your honorable promise, you will dispose your selfe for your part, like as I shall do for mine, to be to morrow with your host in your side of the plain of Milfield, in like wise as I shall do for mine, and shall be with the subiects of my soueraigne lord on my side of the plaine of the sayd field, to giue you bat tell betwene twelue of the clock and 3. in the after none, vpon sufficient warning by you to be giuen by eight or nine of the clock in the morning by the said pursuant. And like as I and other noble men my companie, binde vs by our writing subscribed with our handes to keepe the same time, to the intent abovesaid: I may like your grace, by your honorable Letters subscribed with your hand, to bind your grace for the accomplishment of this our desire, trusting ye will dispatch our said pursuant immediatly: for the long delate of so honorable aourny, we thinke should sound to your dishonor. Written in the field in Moller Haugh the 7. day of September, at fixe of the clock in the after noon. Subscribed, Thomas Surrey, Thomas Howard, Thomas Dacre, Clifford, Henry Scrope, Ralfe Scrope, Richard Latimer, William Coniers, John Lumley, R. Ogle, W. Percie, E. Stanley, W. Molineux, Marmaduke Constable, William Gascoigne, W. Griffith, George Darcie, W. Bulmer, Thomas Strangwaies, &c.

Now the time of bat tell being come, the earle of Surrey divided his army into three battailes: vnto the vanguard whereof, the Lord Howard was capitaine, his brother sye Edmond Howard was ioined as a wing, the earle himselfe led the middle warde, and the rereward was guided by sye Edward Stanley. The Lord Dacres with a number of horsemen stood apart by himselfe to succour where neede should appeere to be. The Ordinance was placed in the front of these battels, and in places betwene, and in this order they marched forward.

In the meane time James king of Scottes beholding the behauiour of the Englishmen from the height of the hill, commanded his standards to be raised and spread, and euerie man to resort to his place, that they might forthwith encounter with their enemies: And without delay James putting his horse from him, all offer as well Nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, and all hope of succor taken awaite, they might be the more willing to shew their manhood: Then was the armie divided into 5. wards, to the intent that the battell wherein the king himselfe stood with his standard, might bee inclosed, as it were, with two winges: their ordinance was lodged in places most conuenient, though by reason they marched downe the hill, their shot did small damage to the Englishmen comming bytwards. And heere with Sy: Edmonde Howard with his wing was got by on the hill side, with whom the Lord Hume, and the two earles of Lincolne and Argyll encountered with such violence, that this Battayle of Scottes with speares on foote beate downe and broke that Wing of Englishmen in such wise, that Sir Edmond Howard was in manner left alone, and felled to the earth: but bastard Heron came to his rescue, or else hee had bene slayne. This Bastarde Heron brought with him a strong troupe of horsemen, which hee being of late banished both from England and Scotland, had cunninglie trained by in robberies. And on the other side, the Lord Dacres watching to ayde where neede shoulde happen, came in on the sides of the Scots, and gaue a charge on them with his horsemen, whereby Sy: Edmond Howard escaped to the English Wauntguard, which was ledde by his brother the Lord Howard, who being nowe also got aloft on the hill, pressed still forward to renew the battayle and to succour those whom hee sawe put to the worst, whereby they took courage vnto them and layde about. Herewith the Earle of Crawford, and Mountrose came with their battaile of speares, also on foote, and encountering with the sayde Lord Howard, after soze fight on both sides, both the sayde Earles were slayne, besides a great number of other, the whole battayle which they ledde, being put to flight, and chased out of the field. On the left hande, Sy: Edward Stanley, and with him Sy: William Molineux, Sy: Henry Kighile, and other of Lancashire, Cheshire, hauing begunne to encounter with the Scots on that side, forced them to come downe into a more open ground, and brought to that point, with such incessant shot of arrowes, that to auoide that sharpe storme, the Scottes were constrained to breake their arraie, and to fight one separate from another: which thing when Sy: Edward Stanley perceived, forthwith bringing about thre Bandes which hee had kept in store, he inuaded the open sides of his enemies, by a fresh onsette, and put them in sundre in such disorder, that they were not able any longer to abide the violence of the Englishmen, so that taking themselves to flight, and running downe the hill, they escaped to the wood: but the Earles of Argyll and Lennox were slayne in the same place. In the meane time the King, who a little before had toynd with the Earle of Surrey, perceyuing that the Winges of his Battayles were distressed, and that his enemies beganne to enclose him on each side, heere with rushing forth vpon his enemies, a newe battayle beganne to rise, for that battayle being well armed, passed little for the Arrowes of the Englishmen, inso much, that pearcing the earles Battayle, they entered well nere so farre within the same, that they were at a poynt to haue ouerthrownt his Standards. The king himselfe on foote, even in the foremost Ranke, fought fought right valiantly, encouraging his people, as well by example as by persuasions to do their best. Neither did the earle of Surrey faile in the dutie of a worthy Generall: but whilst the battell was thus foughten about the standards, with doubtfull chance of victorie, the Lord Howard and Sir Edward Stanley, hauing vanquished the enemies in either wing, returned to the middleward, and finding them there thus occupied, they sette on, in two severall parts, with great violence, and at the same time the lord Dacres came with his horsemen vpon the backs of the Scots, so that they being thus assailed behind and before, and on either side, were constrained to fight in a rounde compasse. King James as he beheld Sir Adam Forman his standard bearer beaten downe, thought surelie there was no waie for him but death: wherefore to deliuer himselfe from the reproch as was like to follow, he rushed forth into the chiefest prele of his enemies, and there fighting in most desperate maner, was beaten downe and slain, and a little beside him, there died with like courage diuers honorable prelates, as the archbishop of S. Andrewes, & two other bishops, besides two abbots, 12 earles, & 17 lords, besides knights and gentlemen: and about 8000. Scots slain, and almost so manie taken, saith Iouius. All their ordinance and stiffe was taken by the English.

Thus on the 9. of September, king James the fourth of that name, king of Scots was slaine at Bramstone vpon Piperd hill, and his armie discomfited by the earle of Surrey lieutenant to Henry the 8. king of Englande: There was taken prisoner Sir William Scot chancelor to the saide king, and Sir Iohn Forman his serleant porter, with diuers other. Also in maner all the Scottissh ensignes were taken, and 22. peeces of greate ordinance, amongst the which were seauen culuerings, verie faire peeces, whome the king for their likeness one vnto another, had named the seauen sisters. There was slaine and taken of our men about 1500. men (saith Hall) during the time of the fight, & in the night following, manie Englishmen lost their horses, and such stiffe as they left in their tents, by the robbers of Tindale, & Tuisdale: When the field was done, the earle gaue thanks to God, and made knightes to the number of 35. whose names I ouerpasse in this place. The body of the king of Scots was not found till the next daie, and then being found and knowne by the lord Dacres, there appered in the same diuers deadly wounds, his throat cut halfe asunder, his left hand in two places almost cut off, and manie other woundes, as well with arrowes, as other wise: his body was bowelled, rebowelled, and inclosed in lead, and so kept at Bartwike, till the kings pleasure were knowne. After that the earle of Surrey had taken order, and set the north in good quiet, he returned to the quene, with the dead bodie of the Scottissh king, which boodie inclosed in lead (as before is shewed) as I haue bene informed, was conueied to Shyne, a monasterie in Surrey, founded by king H. the 5. where it remained for a time, in what order I am not certaine, but since the dissolution of that house, to wit, in the raigne of king Ed. the 6. Henry Grey then duke of Suffolk, there keeping house, I haue bene shewed the same body (as was affirmed) so lapped in lead, throught into an old waste room, amongst old timber, stone, lead, and other rubble.

The kings letters to sir Will. Molineux, of Lancashire.

When King Henry was returned into England, from his conquest made in France, of the Cities of Tirtwin, and Turney, he forgate not the good service of those that hadde becne with the Earle of Surrey, at the Battayle of Bramstone, wherefore hee wrote to them his louing letters, with such thanks and fauourable wordes, that euerie man thought himselfe well rewarded. The tenure of his letter was this. Trustie and welbeloued we greete you well, and vnderstand aswell by the report of our right trustie cosen and counsailler the Duke of Posfolke, as otherwise, what acceptable seruice you amongst other latelie did vnto vs, by your valiant towardnesse in the assisting of our said cosen against our great enemye, the late king of Scottes: and howe conragiouse you as a verie heartie louing seruaunt, acquitted your selfe, for the ouerthowe of the sayde late king, and distressing of his malice and powler to our greate honour, and the aduancing of your no little fame and prayse, for which wee haue good cause to fauour and thanke you, and so wee full heartylie doe. And assured maie you bee, that wee shall in such effectfull wise remember your sayde seruice in ante your reasonable pursutes, as you shall haue cause to thinke the sawe right well emploted, to your comfort, and weale hereafter. Given vnder our signet, at our Castell of Windsoze, the 27. of Nouember. To our trustie and welbeloued, William Molineux Knight.

Great pestilence.

This yere was a death of the pestilence in England, especiallie about London, so that in one house, to wit, the Spinories without Ald-gate, there died of nuns professed, to the number of 27. besides other that were Late people, and seruants in that house.

Will. Smith bish. of Lincolne deceased.

About the Feast of the Natinitie of our Ladie, deceased William Smith bish. of Lincolne, hee founded Brasenose Colledge in Orford, and before that being bishop of L. schfield, he ordeined an hospitall there, for a masser, 2. priests, 10. poore men: he set there also a scholemaster, and an vther to teach grammar to poore mens childzen, in a schole by him created. In Henry the 7. gaue vnto it an old hospitall called Donhall in Wirhall, in Chesser shire, with the lands, &c. Also at Farnwooke where the said Smith and his parents had originall, he bestowed ten pounde the yere for ever, to one that shoulde teach a Grammar Schole.

States created

On the day of the Purification of our Ladie, in the archbishops palace at Lambeth, the king created the earle of Surrey Duke of Posfolke, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and otherwise rewarded him: hee likewise the same day created sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle (for to say William Brandon, that bare king Henry the 7. standard at Bosworth field, and was there slaine) duke of Suffolke, and sir Thomas Lord Howard high Admirall, earle of Surrey, say Charles Somerset, Lord Harbert his chiefe Chamberlaine, earle of Worcester, and not long after he made say Edward Stanley lord Mounteagle.

An. reg. 6.

In the moneth of March following, T. Wolsey the Ex. almoner, and bishop of Turney was consecrated bishop of Lincolne.

In the moneth of May, the B. & the D. of Suffolke were challengers at the tilt,

The 19. of Maie, was receyued into London a Cap of maintenance, and a Sworde, sent from Pope Iuly the seconde, with a greate companie of noble men and Gentlemen, which Cappe and Sworde was presented to the King on the next Sondaye, with a greate solemnitie in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul. Frenchmen landed with their Gallies and foists on the borders of Suffer in the night season, and came to Bighthamstede and bent it, taking such goods as they there found, but in the morning they were constrained to fle. Cap of maintenance.
French bent Bighthamstede in Suffer.

The lord Admirall sent Syr Iohn Wallope to the sea, with diuers Shippes, which sayling to the coasts of Normandy, landed there, and bent 21. villages and towne, with diuers Ships in the haven of Traport, Staples, and other places. Sir Iohn Wallope bent Traport.

In the moneth of Maie Syr Thomas Louell tooke the seas, and landed at Caleis with 400. men of warre: also Syr Iohn Pechy, the lord Burgaueny, the lord Clinton, the lord Cobham, Syr Richarde Lewes, Syr Iohn Rainsforth, Syr William Scot, Syr Iohn Scot his sonne, Syr Edward Gilford, Syr Henry Gilford, Syr Iohn Norton, Syr Iohn Fogge, Syr Matthewe Browne, and Syr James Dorelt, with diuers Esquiers and Gentlemen, and men of warre, to the number of 5000. The Lord Burgaueny being chiefe leader. These were sent ouer to strengthen the Towne of Caleis, and other Fortresses within the Englishe Pale, for doubt of ante todayne attempt to bee made by the Frenchmen. Richard Turpin.

The French King percepuing what losses hee had sustayned by the warres agaynst Englande, and doubting least one euill lucke shoulde still followe another, determined to make suite for peace, and first agreeing with the pope Leo, desired him to bee a meane for the procuring of some agremente betwixt him and the King of Englande. Whereupon the Popes letters, the French King by an Herault at Arms sent to the King of Englande, requiring of him a safe Conduet for his ambassadoys, which shoulde come to intreat for a peace to bee concluded betwixt them and their Realmes. Upon graunt thereof attayned, the French King sent a Commission with the President of Roane, and others, to entreate of peace. And because they vnderstoode that the marriage was broken betwene the prince of Castile and the lady Marie, they desired that the sayde Ladie might bee ioyned in marriage with the French King, offering a greate Dowrie, and suretie for the same, so much was offered, that the King moued by his Counsaile consented vpon condition, that if the French King dyed, then shee shoulde, if it stode with her pleasure, returne into Englande with her Dowrie and Kitchens. After that they were accorded vpon the peace, and that the French King shoulde marrie this yong ladie, &c. And then was the peace proclaymed on the thirteenth of August, &c. Peace with France proclaimed.

In the moneth of September the ladie Marie was conueyed to Douer, by the King her Brother, and the Queene: and on the second daie of October, she was was shipped, and such as were appointed to giue their attendance on her, as the duke of Norfolk, the Marques Dorset, the bishop of Durham, the earle of Surrey, the Lord de la Ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Mounteagle, the foure brethren of the saide Marques, Sir Maurice Barkley, Sir Iohn Pechy, s<sup>r</sup> William Sands, sir Thomas Bullen, sir Iohn Car, and manie other knights, esquires, gentlemen, and Ladies. They set out from Douer with fouretene greate Shippes, and had not sailed past a quarter of their volage in the sea, but that the winde rose, and seuered the shippes, diuising some of them to Caleis, some into Flaunders, and her shippe and thre other, with greate difficultie, was brought to Boloigne, not without greate leopardy at the entring of the Hauen, for the galler ranne the shippe harde on shoze, but the Boates were readie, and receiued the Ladie out of the shippe, and s<sup>r</sup> Christopher Garnish stode in the water, and tooke her in his armes, and so bare her to land, where the Duke of Gandosme, and a Cardinall, with manie other greate Estates, receiued her with greate honour. In this volage king Henries greate shippe with foure tops, called the Lubek, was broken and lost, a little from Sangate west toward Caleis: there was in her at that time almost siue hundred men, souldiours and mariners, whereof moze than foure hundred were lost, for there escaped not one hundred of that companie. From Boloigne the Ladie Mary was conuied vnto Abuille, and there entered the eight of October, and on the next morrowe, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the French king and the saide ladie, with all honour and royaltie: When the feast was ended, the English Lordes returned with greate rewardes into Englande: Before whose departure from Abuille, the Dolphine of France, Francis duke of Calois caused solemnne Iusses to bee proclaimed, to be kept at Paris, in the moneth of Nouember next ensuing: the saide Dolphine with his nine aders, to aunsweare all commers, beeing Gentlemen of name and armes. When this proclamation was proclaimed in Englande, the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, and his foure brethren, the Lord Clinton, s<sup>r</sup> Edward Neuell, s<sup>r</sup> William Sidney, s<sup>r</sup> Giles Caple, Thomas Cheyney and other, got licence of the king to go ouer to this challenge, and thereupon preparing themselves for the purpose, departed toward France, the 20. of October they landed at Caleis, all in great Coates and Hoddes, because they woulde not be known. The twentieth sixe of October s<sup>r</sup> Henry Guilford landed at Caleis, with two seriesantes at armes, and twentie yeomen of the Crowne and kinges guard, these went to the citie of Paris, with tenne or twelue goble Horses to bee at the Iusses, at the Coronation of the Quene: they came all to Paris about the latter ende of October. The Dolphine desired the duke of Suffolke, and the Lord Marques Dorset, to bee two of his immediate aydes, which thereto glablie assented. On the first of Nouember beeing sundae, the Quene was Crowned with great solemnitie, in the Monasterie of Dones: and on the next daie she was receiued into Paris, with all honour that might bee deuised. On the seauenth of Nouember beganne the Iusses, which continued by the space of thre daies, in the which were aunsweared thre hundred siue men of armes, and euerie man ranne siue courses with shape Spears. This yere died at Rome the archbishop of Dozke and cardinall, called doctor Banbridge, which was the kinges ambassador there, and was poisoned by an Italian, one of his owne householde chaplaines, he was thre honorable buried. And king Henry gaue the saide Archbshopricke to Thomas Wolsey then Bishop of Lincolne, who shortly after gatte to bee cardinall and Lorde Chancellor.

On Petwéers euend died the French K. Lewes the 12. after he had bin married to the lady Mary of England the terme of 82. daies. The K. of England being thereof aduertised, caused a solemne obsequie to bee kept for him in St. Pauls church of London, with a costly hearse, at the which obsequy manie nobles were present. When the K. sent a letter to comfort the Quene his sister, requiring to know her pleasure, whether she would continue still in France, or returne into England. And when hee was aduertised of her minde, which was to returne into England, the Duke of Suffolke, s<sup>r</sup> Richard Wingfield deputie of Caleis, and doctor West, with a goodly band of gentlemen, and yemen all in blacke, were sent into France, and comming to Paris, were well entertained of Francis the new French K. to whome they declared the effect of their commission, which was to receiue the Q. Dowager, according to the covenants. The counsell of France by the kings appointment, assigned forth hir dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the Q. deliuered to the duke, who behaued himselfe so towards her, that he obtained hir good will, to be hir husband. It was thought, that when the K. created him duke of Suffolke, he perceiued his sisters good will toward the said duke, and that hee ment then to haue bestowed hir on him, but that a better offer came in the way, but howsoeuer it was, now hee was hir loue, so as by her consent, hee wrote to the K. hir brother, meekelie beseeching him of pardon in his request, which was humbly to desire him of his good will and contentation. The K. after some tute, agreed that the duke should bring hir into England vnmarrid, and at his returne to marry her in England: but for doubt of change, he married her secretly at Paris, as was said.

The 9. of Aprill a new peace was concluded between the K. of England and Francis the new king of France.

Duke of Suffolke married the lady Marie the kings sister.

After that the Duke of Suffolke had receiued the French Quene with his Dowrie appointed, and all her apparell, iewels, and household stuffe deliuered, they tooke leaue of the new French king, and so passing through France, came to Caleis on the 25. of Aprill, where they were honorably receiued, from whence on the 2. of Maie, they sailed ouer into England, and the same night landed at Douer. And on the 13. of May, they were solemnely married at Grænewich.

Castle of Turwy builded.

This yere in the moneth of May, were sent out of England, 1200. masons and carpenters, and 300. laborers to the city of Courney, to build a castle there to chastice the city if it chanced to rebel, and thereby to diminish the garrison that shyn late there to the kings great charge.

In the moneth of September H. after his returne from progresse in the west, being at his maner of Shing, T. Wolsey comming thither to him, there was brought to him a letter from Rome to aduertise him, that he was elected cardinall, which he seemed to mislike of, but the K. would to take it vpon him, and from thenceforth called him my L. cardinall.

Parliament at Westminster.

In the moneth of Nouember, the king assembled a Parliament at Westminster, especiallie for order in apparell. In the end of which parliament, doctor Warham archbishop of Canterbury, and then L. Chancelloz, gaue vp into the kings hands his office of chancelloz, and deliuered to him the great scale, which scale incontinentlie the K. deliuered vnto the L. cardinall, and so made him chancelloz. And here I thinke good to set downe for example to posteritie, some part of the proceedings of this so oft named Tho. Wolsey archbishop, his ascending vnto honoris estate, and so daie falling again from the same, as I haue bene informed by persons of good credite.

Truth it is, this Cardinall Wolsey was an honest poore mans son of Ipswich, in the countie of Suffolke, and there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned: wherefore by the meanes of his parents, or of his good friends and masters, hee was conueyed to the Vniuersitie of Oxford, where hee shortly prospered so in learning, as himselfe reported, as he was made Bachelor of Art, when he passed not 15. yeres of age, and was called most commonly through the Vniuersity the boy Bachelor. Thus prospering in learning, hee was made fellowe of Maudelin colledge, and afterward appointed to be scholemaster of Maudelin Schoole, at which time, the L. Marques Dorset had 3. of his sonnes there at Schoole, committing vnto him as well their education, as their instruction. It pleased the said L. Marques against a Christmas season to send as well for the scholemaster, as for his children home to his house for their recreation, in that pleasant and honorable feast. When being there, the lord their father perceiuing them to be right well employed in learning for their time, hee hauing a benefice in his gift being at that time void, gaue the same to the scholemaster in rewarde of his diligence, at his departure after Christmas to the Vniuersity, and hauing the presentation thereof repaired to the Ordinary for his institution or induction, being furnished of all his ordinarie instruments, made speed to the benefice to take therof possession, and being there for that intent, one sir Amias Poulet knight dwelling thereabout, took an occasion of displeasure against him, upon that ground I know not, but sit by your leave he was so bold to set the schoolmaster by the side, during his pleasure, which after was neither forgotten nor forgotten: for when the schoolmaster mounted the dignity to be chancelor of England, he was not oblivious of his old displeasure cruckle ministered unto him by M. Pouler: but sent for him, and after many sharp words, enjoined him to attend untill he were dismissed, & not to depart out of London without licence obtained, so that he continued there within the middle temple the space of 5. or 6. yeeres, who lay then in the gatehouse next the street, which he redified verie sumptuously, garnishing the same all ouer his side with the cardinals armes, with his hat, cognisances, and other deuises in so glorious a sort, that he thought thereby to haue appeased his old displeasure. Now may this bee a good example and president, to men in authoritie (which will sometime waxe their will without witte) to remember in their authoritie, howe authoritie maie decaye. And whome they doe punish of will, more then of iustice, maie after be aduanced to high honor and dignities in the Common Weales, and they bascd as lowe: who will then seeke the meanes to bee reuenged of such wrongs, which they suffered before? Who would haue thought then when sir Amias Powlet punished this pooze scholler, the schoolmaster that euer he should haue mounted to so high dignitie, as to bee Chancellor of England, considering his basenes in euerie degree? These be wonderfull works of God and fortune. Therefore I would wish all men in authoritie and dignitie to know and feare God in all their triumphes and glozie, considering in all their doings, that authorities be not permanent, but maie slide and vanish, as Princes pleasures alter and chaunge. When as all liuing things must of verie ne-cessitie paie the due debt of nature, which no earthlie creature canne resist, it chaunced the sayde Lord Marques to departe out of this present life, after whose death, this schoolmaster then considering with himselfe, to bee but a simple beneficed man, and to haue left his fellowship in the Colledge (for I vnderstand, if a fellowe of that house be once promoted to a benefice, hee shall by the rules of the same be dismissed of his fellowshippe) and perceiving himselfe also to be destitute of his singular good Lorde, and also of his fellowship, which was much of his reliefe, thought not long to bee vnprovided of some other helpe, or Mastrship to defende him from all such stormes, as hee light-lie was vered with, and in his travell thereabout, hee fell in acquaintance with one sir Iohn Naphant, a very graue and ancient knight, who had a greate rōme in Caleis vnder King Henry the 7. this knight he serued, and behaued himselfe so discretely, that hee obtayned the especiall fauour of his master, insomuch, that hee committed all the charge of his office vnto his Chaplaine, and as I vnderstand, the office was the Treasureship of Caleis, who was in consideration of his greates age discharged of his rōme, and returned agayne into England, intending to liue more in quiet, and through his instant laboz and good fauour, his Chaplaine was promoted to be the kinges chaplaine, and when he had once cast anchor in the port of promotion, howe he wrought, I shal somewhat declare. He hauing there a iust occasion to be in the sight of the king daily, by reason he attended and said masse before him in his closet, and that being done, he spent not the daie forth in idlenesse, but would attende vpon those whom he thought to beare most rule in the counsell, and to be most in fauour with the king, the which at that time was docto<sup>r</sup> Fox, bishop of Winchester, Secretarie, and lord of the priuie seale: And also sir Tho. Louell knight, a verie sage counsellor, a wittie man, being master of the Wardes, and constable of the towre: these ancient and graue counsellors in proceesse of time perceiued this chaplaine to haue a verie fine wit, and thought him a mate person to be preferred to wittie affaires: It chanced at a certaine season that the king had an vrgent occasion to send an ambassado<sup>r</sup> vnto the Emperour Maximilian, who lay at that present in the low countrey of Flaunders, not far from Caleis. The bishop of Winchester and sir Thomas Louell, whome the king most esteemed as chiefe of his Counsell, the king counselling and debating with them vpon this ambassage, saw they had a conuenient occasion to preferre the kings chaplaine, whose wit, eloquence, and learning they highlie commended vnto the king: the king giuing eare vnto them, & being a prince of an excellent iudgement and modestie, commanded them to bring his chaplaine, whome they so much commended, before his presence, with whom he fell in communication of great matters, and perceiuing his wit to be verie fine, thought him sufficient to be put in trust with this ambassage, commanding him thereupon to prepare himselfe to this iourney. And for his deperche to repaite to his grace and his Counsell, of whom he should receiue his commission and instructions, by meanes whereof he had then a due occasion to repaite from time to time into the kings presence, who perceiued him more and more to be a verie wise man, and of a good intendment. And hauing his deperch, toke his leaue of the king at Richmond about none, and so came to London about foure of the clocke, where the barge of Graues-end was ready to launch forth, both with a prosperous tide and winde, without anie abode he entered the barge, and so passed forth with such happie speede, that he arrived at Graues-ende within little more than thre houres, where he tarried no longer than his post horses were prouiding, and then travelled so speedily, that he came to Dover the next morning, whereas the passengers were ready vnder saile to Caleis, into the which passenger without tarrying he entered, and sayled forth with them, that long before none he arrived at Caleis, and hauing post horses in a readinesse, departed from thence without tarrying: and he made such hastie speede, that he was that night with the Emperour. And he hauing vnderstanding of the coming of the K. of Englandes ambassado<sup>r</sup>, would in no wise delaie the time, but sent for him incontinent, his affection to king Henry the seuenth was such, that he was glad when hee had anie occasion to shewe him pleasure. The ambassado<sup>r</sup> disclosed the whole summe of his ambassage vnto the Emperour, of whom he required speedie expedition: the which was granted him by the emperour, so that the next day he was clerely dispatched, with all the kings requests fully accomplished and granted. At which time he made no longer delay, but toke post horses that night, and rode toward Caleis, conducted thither with such persons as the emperour had appointed, and at the opening of the gates of Caleis he came thither,

where the passengers were as readie to returne into England, as they were before at his journey forward, inso much, that hee arrived at Dover by ten or eleven of the clock before noone, and having post horses in a readines, came to the court at Richmond the same night, where hee taking some rest untill the morning, repaired to the king at his first comming from his bed-chamber to his closet to masse, whome when the king saw, he checked him, for that he was not on his journey: Sir (quoth he) if it maie please your highnes, I haue already beene with the emperoz, and dispatched your affaires, I trust to your graces contentation, & with that presented him his letters of credence from the emperoz. The king heeing in a greate confuse and wonder of his speedie returne and proceedings, dissembled all his wonder and imagination in that matter, and demanded of him, whether hee encountred not his Pursuant the which he sent unto him, supposing him not to be scantlie out of London, with letters concerning a verie necessarie matter neglected in their consultation, the which the king much desired to haue dispatched amongst the other matters of ambassage: Yes so; soth (quoth the chaplaine) I met with him yesterday by the wate, and having no understanding by your graces letters of your pleasure, haue notwithstanding beene so bolde vpon mine discretion (perceiving that matter to be verie necessarie in that behalfe) to dispatch the same: and so;asmuch as I haue exceeded your graces commission, I most humbly requyre your graces remission & pardon: & king relotcing inwardlie not a little, said: Wee doe not onelie pardon you thereof, but also giue you our Princelie thanks, both for the proceeding therein, & also for your good and speedie exploit, commanding him so; that time to take his rest, and repaire againe after Dinner, for the further relation of his ambassage. The king then went to masse, and after a convenient time went to dinner. It is not to be doubted, but that this ambassador hath in all this time been with his great friends the bishop, and sir Tho. Louell, to whom he hath declared the effect of all his speed, no; yet that for they receiued thereof.

The ambassador when he saw time, repaired before the king and counsell, where he declared the effect of all his affaires so exactly, with such grauitie and eloquence, that all the counsell that heard him, commended him, esteeming his expedition to be almost beyond the capacittie of man. The k. gaue him at that time the deanery of Lincoln, which was at that time one of the worthiest promotions that he gaue vnder degree of a bishop; & thus from thence forward he grew more and more into estimation and authoritie, and after was promoted by the king to be his almoner.

Heere maie all men note the chaunces of fortune that followeth some, whome she intendeth to promote, and to some her fauour is cleane contrary, though they traueill neuer so much with all the possible diligence that they canne devise or imagine, whereof for my parte, I haue tasted the experience. Nowe ye shall vnderstande that all this tale that I haue declared of the good expedition of the kings ambassador, was reported by his owne mouth after his fall, lying at that time in the great parke of Richmond, vnto George Candlish his gentleman usher, taking then occasion vpon diuers communications to tell this iourney with all the circumstances, as I haue here before rehearsed.

When death, that fauouresh none estate, had taken king Henry the seuenth out of this present life, who for his wise doime was called the second Salomon, what practises and compasses were then vsed about king Henry the eight: and the great prouision made for the funerals of the one, and the costly deuises of the coronation of the other, I omit. After the finishing of these solemnities and costly triumphs, and that our naturall yong and lustie couragious prince king Henry the eight, entering into the flower of lustie youth, and taking vpon him the royall scepter and imperiall diademe of this realme, which at that time flourished in all abundance and riches, whereof the king was inestimably furnished, called then the golden woyle, such grace reigned then within this realme.

Howe the almoner hauing a head full of subtil wit, perceiuing a plaine paye to walke in toward his iourney to promotion, handled himselfe so polittely, that the sound the meanes to be made one of the kings counsell, and to grow in fauour and good estimation with the king, to whome the king gaue an house at Wyndesore in Fleetstreete, sometime sir Richard Empsons, where he kept house for his familie, and so daily attended vpon the king, and in his especiall fauour, who had great suite made vnto him, as counsellors in fauour most commonly haue. His sentences and wittie perswasions in the counsell chamber were alwayes so pitheie, that the counsell as occasion moued them, continually assigned him to be the expositor to the king in all their proceedings: in whome the king receiued such a leaning fantasie, and in respect all for that he was most earnest and readiest of all the counsell, to aduance the kings will and pleasure, hauing no respect to the cause: the king therfore perceiuing him to be a mete instrument for the accomplishment of his deuised pleasures, called him more nere vnto him, and esteemed him so highly, that all the other counsellors were put from the great fauour that they before were in: insomuch, that the king committed all his will vnto his disposition, which the almoner perceiuing, toke vpon him therefore to discharge the king of the waightie and trouble some businesse, perswading the king, that he shoulde not neede to spare anie time of his pleasure for anie businesse that shoulde happen in the counsell: and whereas the other counsellors would diuers times perswade the king to haue sometime recourse into the counsell chamber, there to heare what was done, the almoner would perswade him to the contrarie, which delighted him much: and thus the almoner ruled all that before had ruled him: such did his policie and wit bring to passe. Who was now in high fauour but master almoner? Who had all the saile but master almoner? And who ruled all vnder the king, but master almoner? Thus hee persecuted in fauour, untill at last in came presents, giftes, and rewardes so plentifully, that I dare saie he lacked nothing that might either please his fantasie, or enrich his cofers: fortune smiled so fauourably vpon him, but to what end she brought him, ye shall heare hereafter. Therefore let all men to whome fortune extendeth her grace, not trust to her subtil fauour, and pleasant promises, misses, vnder coloure whereof, shee carrieth venemous gall.

This almoner thus proceeding in fortunes blissfullnes, it chanced the wars betwene the realmes of England and France to be open, in so much, as the king being fully perswaded in his most roiall person, to invade his foraine enemies with a puissant army, therefore it was necessarie that this roiall enterpryse should be speedily prouided and furnished in euerie degree of things apte and convenient for the same, the expedition whereof, the king thought no mans wit so meete for policie and painfull trauell, as was his almoner, to whome therefore he committed his whole trust therein, and he being nothing scrupulous in anie thing that the king would commaund him to doe, although it seemed to other verie difficult, tooke vpon him the whole charge of all the busines, and brought all thinges to good passe in a decent order, as all manner of victuals, pponitions, and other necessities conuenient for so noble a boi-age and armie.

All things being by him perfected, the king advanced to his roiall enterpryse, passed the seas, and marched forward in good order of battell, vntill he came to the strong towne of Tournay, to the which he laid his siege, and assailed it verie strongly continually with such vehement assaults, that within short space it was yelded vnto his maiestie: vnto the which place, the Emperour Maximilian repaired vnto the king with a great army like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages, which is a rare thing, and but selddome seene, an emperour to fight vnder a kings banner.

Thus after the king had obtained this puissant fort, and taken the possession thereof, and set all things there in due order, for the defence and preservation thereof to his vse, he departed thence, and marched towarde the citie of Turney, and there laide his siege in like maner: to the which he gaue so fierce and sharpe assault, that they were constrained of fine force to render the towne vnto his victorious maiestie: at which time, the king gaue the almoner the bishopricke of the same sea towards his paines and diligence sustained in that tourney. And when the king had established all things agreeable to his will and pleasure, and furnished the same with noble captaines and men of warre for the safegarde of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him diuers noble personages of France being prisoners, as the duke of Longuile, and vicount Clarimont, with other, which were taken there in a skirmish. After whose returne, immediatly the sea of Lincolne fell void by the death of doctor Smith late bishop there: the which benefice his grace gaue to his almoner, late bishop of Turney elect, who was not negligent to take possession thereof, and made all the speede he could for his consecration: the solemnization whereof ended, he found the meanes that he gate the possession of all his predecessors goods into his hands. It was not long after that doctor Bambridge archbishop of Yorke died at Rome, being there the kings ambassadoz, vnto the which sea, the king immediately presented his late and new bishop of Lincolne: so that he had three bishopricks in his hands in one yeere giuen him: then prepared he for his translation from the sea of Lincolne vnto the sea of Yorke: after which solemnization done, he being then an archbishop Primas Anglia, thought himselfe sufficient to compare with Canterbury, and thereupon erected his crosse in the court, and euery other place, as well within the precinct and iurisdiction of Canterbury, as in any other place. And for as much as Canterbury claimeth a superiouritie ouer Poike, as ouer all other bishopricks within England, and for that cause claimeth as a knowledge of an ancient obedience of Poike, to abate the aduancing of his crosse, in presence of the crosse of Canterbury: notwithstanding, Poike nothing minding to desist from bearing thereof in maner as I said before, caused his crosse to bee aduanced, as well in the presence of Canterbury as elswhere: wherefore Canterbury being moued therewith, gaue vnto Poike a certaine checke for his presumption, by reason whereof, there engendered some grudge betwene Poike and Canterburie. Poike intending to prouide some such meanes, that he would be rather superiour in dignitie to Canterbury, than to be either obedient or equall to him: wherefore hee obtained to be made priest cardinall, and Legatus de Latere: vnto whom the Pope sent a cardinals hatte with certaine bulls for his authoritie in that behalfe: Yet you shall vnderstand, that the Pope sent him this woorthy hat of dignitie, as a ietwell of his honour and authoritie, the which was conueied in a verlets budget, who seemed to all men to be but a person of small estimation.

T. Wolsey
cardinall.

Wherefore Poike being aduertised of the basenesse of this messenger, and of the peoples opinion, thought it meete for his honoz, that this ietwell should not be conueied by so simple a person, and therefore caused him to be stopped by the way immediately after his arriuall in England, where he was newly furnished in all manner of apparell, with all kinde of costly filkes, which seemed decent for such an high ambassadoz: and that done, he was encountred vpon Black-heath, and there receiued with a great assembly of prelates, and lusty gallant gentlemen, and from thence conduced through London with great triumph. Then was great and speedy preparation made in Westminster Abbey, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the Bishops and Abbots about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was done in so solempne a wise, as had not bene scene the like, vnlesse it had bene at the coronation of a mightie prince or king. Obtaining this dignitie, he thought himselfe meete to beare authoritie among the temporall power, as among the spirituall iurisdiction: wherefore, remembzing as well the taunts sustained of Canterburie, as hauing a respect to the aduancement of worldly honour and promotion, found the meanes with the king, that he was made lord Chancellor of England, and Canterbury which was Chancellor dismissed, who had continued in that roome since long before the decess of Hen. the seventh. Nowe being in possession of the Chancelorship, and indued with the promotions of the archbishoppe, and cardinall De Latere, hauing power to correct Canterburie, and all other bishops & spirituall persons, to assemble his conuocation when he would assigne, he toke vpon him the correction of matters in all their iurisdictions, and visited all the spirituall houses, hauing in euery Diocesse all manner of spirituall ministers, as commissaries, scribes, apparitors, riors, and all other officers to furnish his courtes, and presented by preuent tion whom he pleased vnto all benefices throughout all this realme. And to the aduancing farther of his legantine iurisdiction, and honour, he had masters of his faculties, masters Ceremoniarum, and such other to the glorifying of his dignitie.

Then had he his two great crosses of siluer, the one of his Archbishoprike, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither soeuer he went or rode, by two of the tallest priestes that he could get within the realme. And to increase his gaines, he had also the bishopricke of Durham, and the Abbey of Saint Albans in Comendam. And after, when doctor Foxe Bishop of Winchester died, he surrendred Durham into the kings handes, and toke to him Winchester. Then had he in his hand (as it were in farme) the bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, forasmuch as the incumbents of them were strangers, and made their abode continually beyonde the seas in their owne countries, or else at Rome, from whence they were sent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, King Henry the seuenth gaue those bishopricks: and they being strangers, thought it moze mete for the assurance, to suffer the cardinall to haue their benefices for a conuenient summe of money paide them yearly where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the same, or to be yearly burdened with the conueiance of their reuenues vnto them: so that all the spirituall promotions and presentations of these bishopricks were fully in his disposition, to preferre whom he listed. He had also a great number daily attending vpon him, both of noble men and worthy gentlemen, with no small number of the tallest yeomen that he coulde get in all the realme, insomuch, that well was that noble man & gentleman, that could prefer a tall yeoman to his seruice. He shall vnderstand that he had in his hall continually three bords. kept with three severall principall officers, that is to saie, a steward which was alwaies a priest, a treasurer a knight, and a controller an esquire:
also a coferer being a doctor, three marshals, three yeomen others in the hall, besides two gromes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchen, two clerkes of the kitchen, a clerke controller, a sorueior of the dyessor, a clerke of the spi-serie, the which together kept also a continuall messe in the hall. Also in his hall kitchen he had of master cookes two, and of other cookes, labourers, and children of the kitchen, twelue persons: foure yeomen of the scullerie, and foure yeomen of the silver scullerie: two yeomen of the pastrie, with two other pastellers vnder the yeomen. Then in his private kitchen a master coke, who went daily in beluet or in sattin, with a chaine of golde, with two other yeomen and a grome: In the scalding house a yeoman and two gromes:
In the pantrie two persons: In the butterie two yeomen, two gromes, and two pages: And in the peltrie likewise: In the seller three yeomen and three pages: In his chaunderie two: In the washarie two: in the wardrobe of beds, the master of the wardrobe, and tenne other persons: In the launde-rie a yeoman, a grome, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueyors, and one grome: In the bake-house a yeoman and two gromes: In the wood-yarde a yeoman and a groom: In the barne one: In the Garden a yeoman and two grooms: Porters at the gate, two yeomen and two grooms: A yeoman of his barge, and a master of his horse: A Clarke of the stable, a yeoman of the same: the saddler, the farrier: a yeoman of his chariot: a sampter man: a yeoman of his stirrop: a muleter: sixteene grooms of his stable, euerie of them kept foure geldings: In the almshouse a yeoman and a groom: In his chappell he had a deane, a great diuine, and a man of excellent learning: a subdeane, a repeater of the quire: a Gospeller, a Psalter, of singing Psalms ten: a master of the Childzen: Seculars of the Chappell, singing men twelue: singing childzen ten, with one seruaunt to waite vpon the childzen: in the Newellerie a Yeoman and two Grooms, ouer and besides diuers retainers that came thither at principall feasts. For the furniture of his chappell, passeth my capacittie to declare, the number of costlie ornaments and richiewels that were to be occupied in the same continuallie: there hath bene seene in procession about the hall, 44. verie rich Coopes of one sute woone, besides the rich Crosse and candlesticks, and other ornaments to the furniture of the same. There had two crosse bearers, and two pillar-bearers in his great chamber: and in his priue chamber these persons: first the chiefe chamberlaine, and vicechamberlaine: of gentlemen vsiers, besides one in his priue chamber, he had twelue daily waiters: and of gentlemen waiters in his priue chamber he had six, and of lords nine or x. who had each of them ii. men allowed them to attende vpon them, except the Earle of Darbie, who had allowed fise men: then had hee of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and sewers both of the priue chamber and of the great chamber, with Gentlemen dailie waiters there, fortie persons: of yeomen vsiers 6. of grooms in his chamber 8. of yeomen in his chamber fise and fortie dailie: he had also almes men, sometime moze in number than other sometime.

There was attending on his boord of doctors and chaplaines, besides them of his chappell, sixteene dailie: a clarke of his closet: secretaries two: and two clerks of his signet, and foure counsellors learned in the law. And for as much as it was necessarie to haue diuers officers of the chauncerie to attende vpon him, that is to saie, the clarke of the crowne, a riding clarke, a clarke of the hamper, and a chaser of the war: then a clarke of the cheeke, as well vpon the Chaplaines, as of the yeomen of his chamber: he had also foure Footemen, which were garnished in rich running coats, when soeuer he rode in anie tourney: then had he an herault of armes, and a sergeant of armes, a Physition, an apothecarie, foure minstrels, a keeper of his tents, an armorer, an instructor of his wards, two yeomen of his wardrobe of his robes, and a keeper of his chamber continuallie in the court: he had also in his house the suruicior of Booke, and a clarke of the greene cloth. All these were dailie attending, doleue lying, & vp rising, & at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall boord for the Chamberers and Gentlemen officers, hauing with them a messe of the young Nobles, and another of Gentlemen: and besides all these, there was neuer an Officer, Gentleman, or wooothie person, but he was allowed in the house some 3. some 2. and all other one at the least, which grew to a great number of persons, persons. Thus far out of the Checkrol, besides other officers, seruants, retayners, and luters that most commonly dined in the hall.

After that hee was thus furnished, hee was sent twice in ambassage to the emperor Charles the first, for diuers vrgent causes touching the kunges Maiestie, it was thought, that so noble a prince (the cardinal) was most mete to be sent: wherefore, being readie to take vpon him the charge thereof, was furnished in all degrees and purposes, most like a great prince: for first he proceeded forth furnished like a cardinall, his gentlemen being very many in number, were clothed in liuery coates of crimsen veluet of the best, with chains of gold about their neckes, and his yeomen and meane officers in coates of fine scarlet, garded with black veluet a hand broad.

Thus furnished, he was twice sent into flanders to the emperor, then lying in Bruges, whome he did most highlie entertain, discharging all his charges and his mens. There was no house within the towne of Bruges, wherein any gentleman of the cardinals were lodged, or had recourse, but the owners were commanded by the emperors officers, that they, vpon pain of their liues should take no monie for any thing that the cardinals seruants did take of any kind of victuall, no although they were disposed to make anie costlie banquets: commanding furthermore their said hosts, to see that they lacked no such thinges as they honestly required for their honesty and pleasure. Also the emperors officers euery night went through the town from house to house, where as any English gentlemen did repast or lodged, and serued their liueries for all night, which was done in this maner. First, the officers brought into the house a cast of fine manchets, and of siluer two great pots with white wine, and sugar to the weight of a pound; white lightes and yellow lightes of wax; a boll of siluer with a goblet to drunk in, and euery night a staffe to torch. This was the order of the liueries euery night; and in the morning when the same officers came to fetch away their stuffe, then would they account with the hosts for the gentlemens cosses spent in the day before.

Thus the emperor entertained the cardinall and all his traine for the time of his ambassage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

Now of his order in going to Westminster Hall dalle in the terme; first ere he came out of his priuy chamber, he hearde seruice in his closet, and there satde his seruice with his Chaplaine; then going againe to his priue Chamber, he would demande, if his seruantes were in a readines, and had furnished his Chamber of Presence, and wayting Chamber, beeing thereof then aduertised, came out of his priue Chamber about eyght of the clocke, apparelled all in redde, that is to saie, his upper garment cyther of fyne Scarlet, or else fyne Crymsen Tassita, but most commonlie of fyne Crymsen Saten engrapned, his pillion of fyne Scarlet, with a necke sette in the inner side with blacke Veluet, and a Tippet of Sables about his necke, holding in his hand an Orange, thereof the substance within was taken out, and filled wyth agayne with the parte of a Spooonge, wherein was Vineger and other confections agaynst the Pestilent Ayres, the which hee moste commonlie helde:

peror Charles.

helde to his nose when he came among anie presse, or else that hee was pestered with manie sutoys: and before him was borne first the Broade Seale of England, and his Cardinals Hatte, by a Lorde, or some Gentleman of worship, right solemnelie: and as soone as he was once entered into his chamber of Presence, his two great Crosses were there attending to bee borne before him: then cryed the Gentlemen Ushers, going before him bare headed, and saide: In before my Lords and masters, on before, make waite for my lords grace. Thus went he downe through the hall with a Serieant at armes before him, bearing a greate Pace of siluer, and two gentlemen carrying two greate pillars of siluer, and when hee came at the Hall doze, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimson beluet, with a saddle of the same, and gilt stirrups.

Then was there attending vpon him, when hee was mounted, his two Crosse Bearers, and his Pillar bearers in like case, vpon great horses, trapped all in fine Scarlet. Then marched hee forwarde with a Traine of noble men and Gentlemen, hauing his footemen, foure in number about him, bearing each of them a gilt Polar in their hands: and thus passed hee forth, vntill he came to Westminster Hall doze, and there lighted, and went vp after this maner into the Chauncerie, or into the Star Chamber: howbeit, most commonlie hee woulde go into the Chauncerie, and stay a while at a Barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, & there commune sometime with the Judges, and sometime with other persons: and that doone, hee woulde repaire into the Chauncerie, and sitting there vntill eleuen of the clocke, hearing of suites, and determining of other matters, from thence hee woulde diuers times go into the Star Chamber as occasion serued. There he neither spared high ne lowe, but iudged euerie state according to his merits and desert. Hee vsed also euerie Sundae to resort to the Courte, then being for the moste parte of all the yeere at Grenewich, with his former triumphes, taking his Barge at his owne Stayes, furnished with yeomen, standing vpon the Bayles, and his Gentlemen beeing within about him, and landed agayne at the three Cranes in the Mintrie: and from thence hee rode vpon his Mule, with his Crosse, his Pillars, his Hatte and Broad seale carped afore him on Horse-backe through Chamis Streete, vntill he came to Billingsgate, and there tooke his Barge again, and so was rowed to Grenewich, where hee was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings house, as the Treasurer, Controller, and other, and so conueyed into the kings chamber: then the Court was woonderfullie furnished with Noble men and gentlemen: and after dinner among the Lordes, hauing some consultation with the King, or with the Councell, hee woulde depart homeward with the like triumph.

Thus in greate honour, tryumphe, and glorie, hee raygned a long season ruling all thinges within the Realme appertayning vnto the King. His house was alwaies resorted to with Noblemen and Gentlemen, feasting and banqueting Ambassadors diuers times, and all other right noble: and when it pleased the King for his recreation, to repaire to the Cardinals house, as he did diuers times in the yere: there wanted no preparations, or furniture: Banquets were set forth with maskes and mummeries, in so gorgeous a sort, and costly manner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no Dames or Damoisels, méte or apte to daunce with the maskers, or to garnish the place for the time: then was there all kinde of musick, and harmony, with fine voices both of men and children.

A maske and a banquet.

One time the king came suddenly thither in a maske with a dosen maskers all in garments like shephearbes, made of fine cloth of Golde, and Crimofin satten pained, and Cappes of the same, with Cypars of good visionie, their haire and beards, either of fine golde-wire silke, or blacke silke, hauing firebrakes torch-bearers, besides their drums, and other persons with visars, all clothed in satten of the same colour: and before his entering into the Hall, he came by water to the water gate, without ante noise, where were laid diuers chambers and guns charged with shot, and at his landing they were shot off, which made such a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder: It made all the Noblemen, Gentlemen, Ladies, and Gentlewomen, to muse what it should meane, comming so suddenly, they sitting quiet at a solempne banquet, vnder this sort: First yee shall vnderstande, that the Tables were set in the Chamber of Presence lust couered, and the Lorde Cardinall sitting vnder the cloth of Estate, there hauing all his seruice alone: and then was there set a Ladie with a Noble man, or a Gentleman and a Gentlewoman throughout all the Tables in the Chamber on the one side, which were made and toynd as it were but one Table, all which order and deuice was done by the Lorde Sandes then Lorde Chamberlaine to the king, and by sir Henry Guilford Comptroller of the kings Maiesties house. Then immediatlie after the great Chamberlaine, and the saide Comptroller, sent to loke what it shoulde meane, (as though they knewe nothing of the matter,) they looking out of the windowes into the Chamis, returned againe and shewed him, that it seemed they were Noblemen and straungers, arrived at his bridge, comming as Ambassadors from some forreine Prince: with that quoth the Cardinall, I desire you, because you can speake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to the Estates, and to condua them into this Chamber, where they shall see vs, and all these Noble Personages, being merrie at our Banquet, desiring them to sit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incontinent downe into the Hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie newe Torches, and conueyed them hysse into the Chamber, with such a noyse of Drummes and Flutes, as seldome had bene hearde the like. At their entering into the Chamber two and two together, they went direalie before the Cardinall where he sat, and saluted him reuerentlie, to whome the Lorde Chamberlaine for them saide: Sir, for as much as they be straungers, and can not speake English, they haue desired mee to declare vnto you, that they hauing vnderstanding of this your triumphant Banquet, there was assembled such a number of excellent Dames, they coulde doe no lesse vnder suppozte of your Grace, but to repayze hysse, to biewe

as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at Humme-chance, and then to daunce with them: and sir, they requite of your Grace licence to accomplish the said cause of their coming. To whom the Cardinal said, he was very well content they should so doe.

Then went the Maskers, and first saluted all the Dames, and returned to the most worthiest, and there opened their great cuppes of golde filled with crownes, and other pieces of golde, to whom they set certaine pieces of gold to caste at.

Thus perusing all the Ladies and gentlewomen, to some they losse, and of some they woun: and perusing after this maner all the ladies, they returned to the Cardinall with great reuerence, poling downe all their golde so left in their cup, which was about two hundred crownes: At all (quoth the Cardinall) and so cast the dice and wan them, where at was made a great noise and toy. Then quoth the lord cardinal to the lord Chamberlaine, I pray you (quoth he) that you would shew them, that me seemeth there should be a Nobleman amongst them, who is more meete to occupie this seate and place then I am, to whome I would most gladly surrender the same according to my dutie, if I knewe him. Then spake the lord Chamberlaine to them in French, and they rounding him in the eare, the lord Chamberlaine said to my Lord Cardinall: Sir (quoth hee) they confesse that among them there is such a noble personage, whom if your grace can appoint him out from the rest, he is content to disclose himselfe, and to accept your place: with that the cardinall taking good aduisement among them, at the last quoth he, me seemes the gentleman with the blacke beard should be euen hee: and with that he arose out of his chaire, and offered the same to the gentleman in the blacke beard, with his cap in his hand. The person to whom he offered the chaire was sir Edward Newill, a comely knight, that much more resembled the kings person in that maske than any other.

The king perceiuing the cardinall so deceiued, could not forbear laughing, but polled downe his visar and master Newills also, and dashed out such a pleasant countenance and chere, that all the noble estates there assembled perceiuing the king to be there among them, reioyced verie much. The cardinall likewise desired his Highnesse to take the place of Estate: to whom the king answered, that he woulde go first and shifte his apparell, and so departed into my lord Cardinals chamber, and there newe apparellled him: in which time, the dishes of the banquet were cleane taken vbye, and the Tables spread againe with newe cleane perfumed clothes, euery man and two man sitting still, untill the king with all his maskers came among them againe all newe apparellled: then the king tooke his seate vnder the cloth of Estate, commaunding euery person to sit still as they did before: In came a newe banquet before the king, and to all the rest throughout all the Tables, wherein were serued two hundred diuers dishes, of costly dainties and subtilties. Thus passed they forth the night with banquetting, dauncing, and other triumphes, to the great comfort of the king, and pleasant regarde of the Nobilitie there assembled. Thus passed this Cardinall his time from date to date, daie, and yere to yere, in such great wealth, soie, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his side the kings expectall fauour, untill fortune enuied his prosperous estate, as is to the world well knowne, and shall be partly touched hereafter.

Ladie Marie king Henries daughter was bozne at Greenwich on the 11. of februarye.

Ladie Mary the kings daughter bozne.

Margaret Quene of Scottes, king Henries eldest sister, who had after the death of her first husband (James king of Scots slaine at Bamsstone) married Archibald Douglas earle of Anguise, fled into England, for feare of the duke of Albany, that had taken her two sons, she lay at Harbottle, where shee was deliuered of a childe called Margaret. But shortly after Archibalde Douglas her husband went home againe into Scotlande without leaue taking: wherefore the king sent for her to London, where she was royally receiued and lodged at Baynards Castle, and there shee tarried a whole yere ere she returned.

The Quene of Scots fled into England.

The king for the honoz of his sister Margaret quene of Scots, on the 19. and 20. day of May, prepared and kept solemne Iusts, wherein the king himselfe, the duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Essex, and Nicholas Carew esquire, answered all commers.

This yere the Cardinall caused all those to be called to accompts, that had dealt with the kings money, and had the occupying thereof in the wars, or otherwise. This audit troubled manie, for some were found in arerages, and some saued themselves by policie, & surely he so punished persturie with open infamie, causing the offenders to weare papers, and so forth, that in his time it was lesse vsed then in long time before: he punished also lordes, knights, and men of all degrees, for riots, for bearing out wrongs, and for maintenance practised in their countries, whereby the poore men liued quietly, and no man durst vse bolstering, for feare of imprisonment. It was a strange matter to see, a man not trained by in the lawes, to sit in the seate of iudgment, to pronounce the law, being aided at the first by such as according to the ancient custome did sit as associates with him: but he would not sticke to determine sundrie causes, neither rightly decided, nor iudged by order of law: and againe such as were clere cases he would some time prohibite the same to passe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuersies, and punish such as came with vntrue surmises, afore the iudges themselves, which had receiued such surmises, and not well considered of the controuersies of the parties: he ordained by the kings commission, blurs vnder courts, to heare complaints by bill of poore men, that they might the soner come by iustice: so that wise men haue reported, neuer to haue scene this realme in better obedience, and quiet, then it was in the time of his authoritie and rule, ne iustice better ministered, with indifferencie.

Dealers with the kings money called to accompt.

Persturie and other vices punished.

Courts to heare complaints of the poore created.

The duke of Suffolke departed home into his Countrie, and also the duke of Suffolke followed shortly, for he hauing spent liberally in his iournies into France, as also in the solemnization of his marriage, and in house keeping, although he was married, borrowed great summes of money of the king, which he hoped hoped should haue bene forgiven him: but the cardinall had called him as all other to account.

Henry procured the Cardinal to war up on the French

In the moneth of October, Matthew bishop of Sion or Sitten, a cardinall of the Swisles, came into England from the emperor Maximilian: At the contemplation of which cardinall, the king lent to the emperor a great summe of money: but the greatest matter that moued the king to be so free to Maximilian, was because the same money should bee imploied on men of war against the French king, toward whom of late the k. had conceived a grudge. Whereupon was Richard Pace sent first into Germanie with a great sum of money to wage the Swislers, which vnder the conduct of the emperor Maximilian, invaded the dutchie of Millaine, but without anie great gayne returned from thence, leauing Millaine in the French mens hands at that time. And now for a newe reliefe was this Cardinall sent from Millaine, at whose instance mony was assigned to be deliuered, and certaine Genouaies undertooke the exchange, which made not payment at the day, although they had receiued it of the king.

1517
A greete drought in winter, and a great frost.

This yere was a great drought, for there fell no rain to be accounted of, from the beginning of September, till the moneth of May in the next yere, where through in some places, men were faine to drue their Cat tell 3. or 4. mile to water.

Also for a time the Thamis was frozen, that men with horse and carts might passe betwixt Westminster and Lambeth.

The number of strangers in London multiplied.

About this season, there grew a great hart-burning, and malicious grudge amongst the Englishmen of the city of London against strangers, and namely the artificers founde themselves sore grieved, for that such numbers of strangers were permitted to resort hither with their wares, and to exercise handie craftes, to the great hinderance and impouershing of the kings liege people: and this malice grew to such a point, that one Iohn Lincolne a Worker, busied himselfe so farre in the matter, that about Palmes Sundate or the first of Aprill, this eight yere of the kings raigne, he came to one docto Henrie Standish, with these words: Sir I vnderstande that you shall preach at the Spittle on mundate in Easter weeke, and so it is, that Englishmen, both merchants and other are vndone, by strangers, who haue more liberty in this land than they, which is against all reason, and also against the common weale of this Realme: I beseech you therefore to declare this in your Sermon, and in so doing, yee shall deserue greates thanks of my Lorde Mayor, and of all his Brethren, and herewith bee offered vnto the sayde Docto a Bill, containing the matter more at large: but Docto Standish (wiselie considering that there might more inconuenience rise thereof, than hee woulde wishe, if hee shoulde deale in such a sorte) both refused the Bill, and told Lincolne plainelie, that he ment not to meddle with anie such matter in his sermon. Whereupon the sayde Lincolne went vnto one docto Bell, a Chanon of the foresaide Spittle, that was appointed likewise to preach vpon Tuesday in Easter weeke, at the same Spittle, whom he perswaded to reade his sayde bill in the pulpet, which bill in effect containned the grēces that manie founde with strangers for

for taking the linings awaie from artificers, and the entercourse from merchants, the redresse whereof must come from the commons knitt in one: for as the hurt touched all men, so must all set to their helping hands: which letter he read, or the chiefest part thereof, comprehending much seditious matter, and then he began with this sentence, Colum, cali Domino, terram autem dedit filijs hominum, and vpon this text he entreated, how this land was giuen to Englishmen, and as birds defend their nestes, so ought Englishmen to cherish and maintaine themselves, & to hurt and grieue aliens for respect of their common wealth: and vpon this text, Pugna pro patria, he brought in how by Gods law it was lawfull to fight for their countrey: and thus he subtilly moued the people to rebell against strangers: by this sermon manie a light person tooke courage, and openlie spoke against strangers. And as vnhappie would, there had bene diuers cuill parts plaide of late by strangers, in and about the cite of London, which kindeled the peoples rancor the more furiously against them.

The 28. daie of Aprill, diuers yong men of the Citie picked quarrels to certaine strangers, as they passed by the streets, some they did strike, and buffeted, and some they threwe into the channell: wherefore the Maior sent some of the Englishmen to prison, as Stephen Studley Skinner, Stephenson, Betts and other. Then sodainlie rose a secret rumour, and no man coule tell how it beganne. that on Maie daie next, the Citie woulde late all the aliens, insomuch, that diuers strangers fledde out of the citie. This rumour came to the knowledge of the kings Counsell, whereupon the Lorde Cardinall sent for the Maior and other of the counsell of the Citie, giuing them to vnderstande what he had heard. The Maior, as one ignorant of the matter, tolde the Cardinall that he doubted not but so to gonerne the Citie, as peace should be obserued. The Cardinall willed him so to do, and to take good heed that if anie riotous attempt were intended, he should with good policie prevent it. The Maior comming from the Cardinals house about foure of the clocke in the afternone on Maie daie, sent for his brethren to the Guildhall, yet was it almost seauen of the clocke ere the assemblee was set. Vpon conference had of the matter, some thought it necessarie that a substantiall watch should be set of honest Citizens, which might withstand the euill doers, if they went about anie misrule: other were of contrarie opinion, but rather thought it best, that commaundement shoulde bee giuen to euerie man to shut in his doores, and to keepe his seruants within. Before eight of the clocke the Recorder was sent to the Cardinall, with these opinions, who hearing the same, allowed the latter. And when the Recorder and Sir Thomas More, late vndersheriffe of London, and noie of the kings counsell came to the Guildhall, halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there shewed the pleasure of the Kings Counsell: whereupon euerie Alderman sent to his warde, that no man should stir after nine of the clocke out of his house, but to keepe his doores shut, and his seruants within till nine of the clocke in the morning. After this commaundement giuen, in the evening, as sir Iohn Mundie Alderman came from his warde, and founde two young men in cheape playing at the bucklers, and a great many of young men looking on them (for the comendement was scarce published) he commanded them to leaue off, & for that one of the asked him why, he would haue sent him to the counter: but the pzentifes resisted the alderman, taking the young man from him, and cried pzentifes & clubs, then out at euery doze came clubs and other weapons, so that the alderman was faine to fite. Then moze people arose out of euery quarter, and forth came serningmen, watermen, courtiers and other, so that by 11. of the clocke there were in cheape, 6. or 700. and out of Paules churchyard came about 300. so out of all places they gathered, & brake by the counter, toke out the prisoners that had been thither committed by the Maior, for hurting of strangers. Also they went to Newgate, and toke out Studley and Petis, committed thither for the like cause: the Maior and Sheriffes were present, and made Proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeyed. Herewith being gathered in plumps, they ran through S. Nicholas Shambles, and at Saint Martins gate, there met with them sir Thomas More, and other, desiring them to go to their lodgings: and as they were thus entreating, & had almost perswaded the people to depart, they within S. Martins threw out stones and bats, so that they hurt diuers honest persons, that were with sir Thomas More, perswading the rebellious persons to cease: in so much as at length, one Nicholas Dennis a Serieant at armes, being there soze hurt, in a furie cried downe with them, and then all the misruled persons ran to the dozes and windowes of the houses within Saint Martins, and spoiled all that they found. After that they ranne into Cozne-hill, and so forth to an house east from Leaden Hall, called the Greene gate, where dwelt one Mewtas a Dickard or Frenchman, within whose house dwelled diuers Frenchmen, whom they likewise spoiled, and if they had founde Mewtas they would haue stricken off his head: some ran to Blanchapleton, and there brake by the strangers houses and spoiled them: they continued thus till thre of the clocke in the morning, at what time they began to withdraue: but by the way they were taken by the Maior and other, and sent to the Tower, Newgate, and Counters, to the number of 300. The Cardinal was aduertised by S. Tho. Parre, whom in all haste he sent to Richmond to informe the king, who incontinently sent to vnderstand the state of the city, and was truly informed. Sir Richard Cholmeley lieutenant of the tower during the time of this busines, shot off certayne pieces of ordinance against the citie, but did no great hurt. About fise of the clocke in the morning, the Carles of Shrewsbury, and Surrey, T. Dokwrey L. Maior of S. Johns, George Neuell L. Burgaueny, and other came to London, with such powers as they could make, so did the Innes of Court: but befoze they came the busines was done as ye haue heard. Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of Doctor Bell called to remembrance, and he sent to the Tower. A commission of Ope and determiner directed to the duke of Norfolk, and other lords, for punishment of this insurrection. The 2. of May the commissioners with the L. Maior, Aldermen, and Iustices went to the Guild-hall, where many of the offenders were imbeded, whereupon they were arraigned, and pleaded not gillie, had day giuen till the fourth fourth of May: on the which daie the L. Maior, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Surrey, and other came to sit in the Guild-hall. The Duke of Suffolke entered the Citie with 1300. men: the prisoners were brought through the strates tied in ropes, some men, some laods, but 13. or 14. yeres olde, to the number of 278. persons: that daie John Lincolne and diuers other were indicted. The next day 13. were adiudged to be hanged, halowe and quartered, for execution whereof, were set by 10. paire of gallowes in diuers places of the citie, as at Aldgate, Blanchapleton, Grace-strate, Leaden-hall, before either counters, at Newgate, S. Martins, at Aldersgate, & at Bishops gate, these gallowes were set on wheeles to be remoued from strate to strate, and from doze to doze, whercunto the prisoners were brought, and there executed. On the 7. of Maie was Lincolne, Shirwin, and two brethren called Bets, and diuers other adiudged to die. They were on herdels halowe to the standard in Cheape, and first was Lincolne executed, and as the other had the rope about their neckes, there came a commandement from the king to respite the execution, and then were the prisoners sent againe to prison, and the armed men sent out of London. For it is to be noted that three Quænes, to witte, Katherine Quæne of Englande, and by her meanes Marie the French Quæne, and Margaret Quæne of Scottes, the kings sisters, (then resident in Englande) long time on their knees before the king had begged their pardon, which by perswasion of the Cardinall Wolsey (without whose Counsell hee would doe nothing) the king graunted unto them.

Three quænes obtained pardon for the Londoners.

On the thirtenth of Maie, the king came to Westminster hall, and with him the Lorde Cardinall, the Dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewsbury, Essex, Wilshire, and Surrey, with many lordes, and other of the kings counsell, the Maior of London, Aldermen and other chiefe Citizens, were there in their best luteries by nine of the clocke in the morning: Then came in the prisoners, bound in ropes in a ranke one after another in their thirtes, and euerie one had a halter about his necke, being in number 400. men and 11. women. When they were thus come before the kings presence: the Cardinall laid fore to the Maior and Aldermen their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared how lustily they had deserued death. Then all the prisoners together cried to the king for mercie, and therewith the Lords besought his grace of pardon, at whose request the king pardoned them all. The generall pardon being pronounced, all the prisoners shouted at once, and cast their halters towards the roose of the hall. The prisoners dismissed, the gallowes were taken downe, and the Citizens tooke more hede to their seruants.

The 18. of Maie, Margaret Quæne of Scots departed from London towards Scotland, richly appointed and prepared of all things necessary for her estate through the kings great liberality. She entred into Scotland the 13. of June and was receiued at Berwik, by Archibald Dowglas earle of Angus her husband. In the moneth of June there were with the king diuers Ambassadors from seuerall partes: In honoꝛ of whom, & for their solace, he prepared costly suits, he himselfe and 12. other, taking vpon them to suit wth the duke of Suffolke, and 12. of his partakers: there were broken betwē the parties on both sides 508. speares.

Sweating sick-
nes.

About the feast of Lammas began the sweating sicknes, of the which many men died sodainly in the beginning the reof, and this plague continued till Michellmas, many died thereof in the court, as the lord Clinton, the lord Grey of Wilton, and many other knights and gentlemen, by reason of which contagious sicknes, Michellmas terme was adioyned. After this, to wit, in the winter was a greate death of pestilence, almost ouer all Englande in euerie towne more or lesse, wherefore the k. kept himselfe with small companie about him, willing to haue no resort to the court for feare of infection.

Cardinall
Campeius came into England.
Cardinall Colley made legate

In the moneth of July Laurence Campeius boyn in Boloigne la grace, commonly called cardinall Campeius legate de latere, from pope Leo the 10. to requite and exhort king H. to make war on the Turke.

At the request of the k. of England, and also of the French k. (which sought now to be receiued into friendship with the k. of England) pope Leo constituted cardinall Wolsey his legate in England, joining him in commission with the foresaid cardinall Campeius,

There was at the same time other legates sent into other parts of christendome, about the same matter, as into France, Spain, and Germany: but cardinall Campeius hearing that their suit tok no place in other parts, left off his suite about it, and returned to Rome.

After long suit made of the French king and his counsel, it was agreed, that the city of Tourney should be deliuered to the French k. he paying 600000. crownes for the city, to be paid in 12. yeeres, & 400000. crowns for the castle, the which the k. had builded, (which was not fully performed): and also he should pay 23. thousand pound Turnois, the which sometime the citizens of Tourney ought to the king of Englande, for their liberties and franchises. More the French king should be paie to the Cardinall of England 1000. marke of yere-ly pension, in recompence of his Bishopricke of Tourney. It was further agreede, that the young Dolphine sonne and heire to the French king, should be marrie wth the Ladie Marie king Henries Daughter of Englande, if they both so liked each other when they came to age. And then Charles Bewforde earle of Worcester, Lord Chamberlaine of England, with the bishop of Ely and other, were sent into France, to make deliuey of the said City of Tourney, which was done on the 10. of February. The captain sir Richard Terningham was discharged, and the French men suffered to enter, the Englishmen returned into England sore displeased, for thereby many a tall yeoman lacked liuing, the which would be not labour after their returne but fell to robbing, and led to life.

The 8. of March solemnne iustices were holden, the king himselfe and 8. young gentlemen, taking vpon them to answer the D. of Suffolke and 8. other conuymers with him,

This

This yeere H. Henry held his feast of S. George at Windsor, with as great solemnitie as it had bene the feast of a coronation, where were present all the knights of the order then within the realme.

Shortly after certaine gentlemen of the privy chamber, which through the kings lenity in bearing with their lewdness, forgetting themselves, and their duty towards his grace, in being so familiar with him, not having due respect to his estate and degree, were remoued, by order taken by the Councell, vnto whome the K. had giuen authoritie to vse their discretions in that behalfe, and then were foure sad and ancient knights put into the kings privy chamber, whose names were, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Richard Ierningham, sir Richard Weston, and sir Wil. Kingstone, and besides these diuers officers were changed in other places.

The French K. desirous to continue the friendship latelie begunne betwixt him & the K. of England, made means to the cardinal, that they might in some convenient place come to an enteruiew together, that he might haue farther knowledge of King Henry, and K. Henry likewise of him. The cardinal therefore breaking with the king of this matter, declaring how honorable, necessary, and conuenient it should be for him to gratifie his friend herein. And thus the K. conceiued an earnest desire to see the French K. and thereupon appointed to go ouer to Caleis, and so into the Marches of Guisnes, to meete with the French King. Then were sent vnto Guisnes, Sy. Nich. Vaux, Sir Edm. Belknap, Sy. Wil. Sands knights of the garter, commissioners to ouersce the making of a palace before the castle gate of Guisnes: these landed at Caleis on the 16. of March. There were also sent, the kings master mason, master carpenter, 300. masons, 500. carpenters, 100. joiners, besides many painters, glaziers, tailors, smithes, and other artificers, both out of England, and prouided in Flanders, in all to the number of more than 2000.

The said palace was begun on the 19. of March, for the which palace the timber was before bought in Holland, and was so long, for the most part, that the same was faine to be bound together and drawne after ships to Caleis, for no ship might receiue it. The other timber and boorde was conueied out of England. This palace was framed in diuers places, all the rofes whereof was couered within with canuas curiously painted and also the wals from the second plat downward: it was also glased with the best and clearest glasse that coulde be gotten, from the ouer plat vnto the second plat of the stone work, and round about were houses of office, as pantry, buttry, cellar, and other. And thus was there builded the goodliest Palace of timber, that euer was wrought in these westerly parts of the world.

The palace builded before
Guisnes castle.

Then was prouision made in England and in Flanders for victuall, wine, and all other things necessary for the furniture of feasts and banquetting.

Herewith were letters writtten to all such lords, ladies, gentlemen and gentlewomen, which should giue their attendance on the K. and Queene, which incessantly put themselves in a readines, after the most sumptuous sort. Also it was appointed that the king of England and the French king, in a campe betwene Arde and Guisnes, with 18. myles, shoulde in the moneth of June next ensuing abide all commers, being gentle men, at the tilt, at the tourney, and at barriers. Then came into England Orliance B. of armes in France, and made proclamation at the court, that the king of England and the French B. in campe betwene Arde and Guisnes with 18. aydes, in June next ensuing, should abide all commers, being gentlemen, at the tilt & tourney, and at barriers. And the like proclamation was made in the court of France, by Clarendius king of armes of England: also in the court of Burgoign, in Almain, and Italy. For the furnishing of those tusts there was devided a tilt, and all things necessarie for that enterpryse, in a goodly plaine betwene Guisnes and Arde. About the which was cast a great dike or trench, and a costly house or gallery for the kings and quenes, lords and ladies for to stand in and beholde the tusts and other things there done.

King Henry being informed, that his realme of Ireland was out of order, discharged the earle of Kildare of his office of deputy, and thereunto was appointed the earle of Surrey Tho. Howard lord admirall: wherefore the said earle in the beginning of Aprill, tooke leave of the king, and the duke of Dorset folke his father, and passed into Ireland with divers gentlemen, or such as had been of the garrison of Tourney, and had with him 100. preemin of the kings guard, and other to the number of 1000. men, and there he continued two yeeres and more, in which space he had many battels and skirmishes with the wilde Irish.

Appointed for the kings train
into France.

There were appointed to attend vpon the king ouer sea to Caleis, and so to Guisnes, Thomas Wolsey cardinall, 12. chaplaines, 50. gentlemen, 238 servants, 150. horses: the archbishop of Canterbury: the bishoppe of Durham lord priuy seale: the bishop of Ely: Chester, and Excester: the archbishop of Armacan: the Dukes of Buckingham and of Suffolke: the marques Dorset: the earles of Shrewsbury, Essex, Devonshire, Westmerland, Stafford, Kent, Wiltshire, Worcesterhire, Northumberland, Oxford and Kildare: besides, lordes, and knights, ladies, and gentlewomen in great number, whose names I haue set downe in my larger Chronicle.

The summe of these two bands were 128. for the English side. The king gaue to these two bands 1000. markes, to wit, 50. marke a piece.

King Henry with his traine remoued on the 21. of May, from his manoz of Oxenewich towards the Sea, first to Oteforde, then to Lades, then to Charing, and so on the 25. came to Canterbury intending there to keepe his Whitson tide.

On the next morrow, the emperoz Charles the first returning out of Spaine, arrived with his nante of ships at Withe in Kent, where he was saluted by the Vice-admirall of England, sir W. Fitz William, with fire of the kings great ships, which lay for the safegard of passengers betwixt Caleis and Douer, toward evening the Emperoz entred his boat, and comming toward land was met and receiued of the lord Cardinall. Thus landed Charles the Emperoz at Douer, under his cloth of estate of the blacke Eagle all first on rich cloth of gold, in whose company was the queene of Aragon, with diuers noble estates, and faire ladies of his countrey and bloud, which were receiued at the sea side, by the lord Legate Cardinall and other lords and gentlemen. The Emperoz so accompanied at ten of the clocke at night by torch light, was brought to the castle of Douer, where he rested, and there sir Edward Poynings warden of the fine ports, brought to the Emperoz the keyes of the Castle, who refused them, saying, he knew well that he was out of all danger, and as safe, as if he were at home in his owne realme. The same night about two of the clocke after midnight, the king came to Douer by torch light, and as sone as the emperoz heard of his comming, he arose, and mette with the king at the staire head, where either embraced other in armes, and there they talked together a long time, and alway the king had the Emperoz on his right hand, on the morrow which was Whitson daie, the king and the Emperoz with all the other estates rode vnto Canterbury, the sworde bozne by the earle of Darby, ryding betwene them both, by the kings commandement, and so these princes rode to Canterbury, and to Chyffs Church, where they were receiued with generall procession, by the Lordes Cardinall and other. The k. and the Emperoz went both vnder one canaple vnto Thom. Beckets house, where they made their prayers and oblations, and then went to the archbishops palace, where the Quene of England the emperors Aunt, met him going into the great chamber, of whom he was sofly receiued and welcomed. The Emperoz and the king took a little recreation, and then went to high masse, where they offered, first the Emperoz, and then the king, and so returned to their trauerses set a part, and after went to dinner, at which seruice the Emperours trumpets sounded and not the kings. On Mondae at nine of the clocke at night, was begun a banquet, which endured till the next morning at thre of the clocke, at the which banquet the Emperoz, the king and the Quene did wash togither, the Duke of Buckingham gining the water, the Duke of Suffolke holding the towell, next them did wash the L. Cardinall, the Quene of France, and the Quene of Aragon. At which banquet the Emperoz kept the estate, the king sitting on the left hand, next him the French Quene, and on the other side sate the Quene, the Cardinall, and the Quene of Aragon, which banquet was serued by the Emperors owne seruants. On Tuesday these estates departed out of Canterbury: The emperoz brought the quene his Aunt to horse backe to Douer ward. Then the Emperoz and the king kept company togither till they came to the Dolones, where they parted. The emperoz went to Sandwich, and so to his fleet, which were in number great ships with two tops the piece 44.

King Henry
tooke shipping toward Caleis.

The king went to Douer, where he rested that night: and on the thursdaie tooke shipping to Caleis, where he landed about 11. of the clocke, where he remained sixe daies, and with him the Quene and ladies, and many nobles of the realme. The number of persons on the king and quenes side were 4334. and of horses, 1637. besides the persons on the French Quenes and duke of Suffolke her husbands, and of the Cardinals.

On the fourth of June, the king with all his nobles, as well the Quene with her traine of Ladies as other, with the whole number of nobles removed from Caleis to Guisnes, into the most noble and royall lodging before sene, for it was a Palace made quadrant, and euerie quadrant was 328. fote long, which was in compasse 1312. fote about, set on stages with great cunning.

The 7. of June, the kings of England and France met at the campe betwene Guisnes and Arde, with both their swordes by alone and boine before them.

The tenth of June, the king of England dined with the French Quene in the towne of Arde: and the Fr. king dined the same day with the Quene of England, in the new Palace made before the Castle of Guisnes, which house was the most sumptuous and costly of riches that hath bene sene.

And after this, these two kings met euery daie after at campe, with diuers lords, and there lasted and turneyed 14. daies: and the two Quenes met at Guisnes and at Arde diuers times.

The 24. of June these two Kings and Quenes with their retinues, met at campe where the iusts were kept, and there they banqueted and daunced with maskings and disguisings, that the like had not bene lightly sene, almost all the night following, and then tooke their leaue and departed: and on the 25. of June, the king of England and the Quene, and all the court, removed from Guisnes to the towne of Caleis, where they rested.

On the tenth of July, the K. with a goodly compante rode to the towne of Graulin

Chauncin in Flaunders, and there met with Charles the Emperoz, and on the next morrow, the Emperoz, and the lady Margaret, the emperors Aunt Dutchesse of Sauoy, with many other great estates, came with the K. of England to the towne of Calais, whereby all the lords and states of England were displaced of their lodgings: and for solace against their comming, was builded a Banqueting house 800. fote compasse, like a Theatre, after a godly deuise, builded in such maner, as I thinke was neuer sene, with sixtene principals made of great masses, betwixt euery mass foure and twenty fote, and all the out sides closed with boord and canuas, within the which, and round about were raised scaffolds of thre stages high, for men and women to stand vpon: and in the midst of the same banqueting house was set vp a great pillar of timber made of 8. great masses, bound together with yron bandes for to holde them together, for it was 134. fote of length, and cost 6. l. 13. s. and 4. d. to set it vp right. The banqueting house was couered ouer with canuas, fastened with ropes & yron as fast as might be deuised. And within the said house was painted the Heauens, with stars, sunne, moone, and cloudes, with diuers other things made aboue ouer mens heads: and there were great Images of twickars couered with canuas painted, representing men of diuers strange nations, and diuers reasons were written by them of the countries that they were likened to be of, and the armes of those countries hanging by them. Also there was made as it were manie ships vnder saile, and windmills on the hills winding: especially there was on the one side set out all the armes of the kings of England, with the kings petigree: and on the other side, the Emperors armes and descent, and about the high pillar of timber in the midst was framed diuers stages, for organs and other instruments of musicke to be played, with men, and children, as well to play on them, as for to set forth their muscicall voices, & to haue made as it were, an heauenly noise. But when the Emperoz, the K. of England, & the other states should haue sit downe to their banquet, this house, and all things els in great abundance being prepared for furnishing thereof, it fortuned, that in the morning of the same day, the wind began to rise, and increasing till the euening, it then on a sodaine blew off all the canuas heauen with planets, &c. and blew out more than 1000. torches and other lights of ware prepared to haue giuen light to the banquet. The seates which were with great riches prepared for the emperoz and the king were dashed and lost. The same night the K. of England with 15. persons more richly apparelled in a maske, went to the Emperors lodging, and in the chamber of presence danced and reueled, and then he departed.

The twelfth of July, the Emperoz, and the lady Margaret supped with the king and queene of England, at the Erchequer, where the same night were 8. companies of maskers, and in euery company were 12. persons, all in gold, silver and beluet richly apparelled. The emperoz & king in this meane time, besides their pastimes, caused the charters before time concluded to be read, all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the Emperoz and the king of England, and the french K. were at full declared, to the which the french king had condescended: and for the more exemplifying of the same, hee sent

monſieur de Roch with letters of credence, to ſignify to the emperoz, that in the word of a prince he would obſerue and keepe all the ſame articles, for him, his realme, and ſubiects.

The 8. of July the emperoz Charles and the ladie Margaret, departed out of Calcis. The king gaue to the Emperoz a Baie Courſer, trapped with gold ſmitheſ worke, ſet with ſtones and pearle, in which place the Emperoz alighted from his horſe, and mounted vpon the ſaid courſer, wherein he tooke great delight, and tooke him vp with the ſpurreſ laſtillie, and ſo departed leauiſſie from Calcis, and rode to Grauelin. The king remayned at Calcis ſome few dayes, and then tooke ſhipping with the Queene and Nobility, and had faire winde to Douer, where hee arrived the ſame night with all his companie in ſafetie.

This yere H. kept his Chriſtmas at his manoz of Greenwich, with great roſaltie and open court, & on the 10. of February in his own perſon iuſted with all commers.

Order taken a-gainſt incloſures

About this time the king being moued by ſuch of his counſell as had regard to the common wealth of this Realme, conſidering howe for the ſpace of ſittie yeres paſt and more, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being giuen to graſſing of cattell, and keeping of ſhepe, to the great decay of huſbandrie and tillage, furniſhing the ground with beaſts, ſheep and deer, ſo incloſing the ſielos with hedges, pales, and ditches, as might ſtand moſt to their own priuat commodity: Wherefore the king cauſing ſuch good ſtatutes as had bene deuised and eſtabliſhed for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuiſed and called vpon, and alſo direacting forth his commiſſion vnto Juſtices of peace, and other ſuch magiſtrates, that preſentment ſhould be made of all ſuch incloſures, and decay of huſbandry as had chanced within the ſpace of 50. yeres befoze that preſent time. The Juſtices and other magiſtrates, according to their commiſſion executed their authority: and ſo commandement was giuen, that the decayed houſes ſhould be built againe, that the huſbandmen ſhould be placed eſſowes in the ſame, and that incloſed grounds ſhould be laiſde open, & ſoze puniſhment appointed againſt them that diſobeyed.

D. of Buckingham ham accused and arreſted.

In this meane time Edward Duke of Buckingham was accused of high treaſon, wherefore the king directed his letters to the ſaid duke, being at his manoz of Thornebury in Glouceſterſhire, that incontinently he ſhoulde come to his preſence, which commandement the duke obeyed, and came to London, where he was ſtraightwaies arreſted by ſir Henry Marney captain of the garb, and conueied to the toſter of London on the 16. of Aprill: befoze which time ſir Gilbert Parke the dukes Chancelloz was taken, which had confeſſed matter of high treaſon concerning the kings perſon. There was alſo attached one Nic. Hopkins a monk of the order of Carthuſians, being of Henton priory in Somerſetſhire, & Ide la Court the dukes confeſſor, and other, theſe were priſoners in the Towr.

Ann. reg. 13.

After the apprehenſion of the D. inquiſitions were taken in diuers ſhires of him, ſo that by the knights and gentlemen he was indicted of high treaſon for certaine wordes ſpoken by the ſaide duke at Blechingly in Surrey, to George Neull

Neuill L. Burgauey, and therewith was the same lord attached for concealment, and so like wise was the L. Montague, and both contrived to the Tower: and Sir Edward Neuill brother to the said L. of Burgauey was forbidden the kings presence,

Moreouer, in the Guild hall of London, before Sir John Bruge knight then Mayor of the same Citie, by an inquest, the said duke was indicted of diuers points of high treason, as by the same indictment (which I haue seen and read) it appeareth, inferring, that the said duke intending to exalt himselfe, and to usurpe the Crowne, the roiall power, and dignitie of the realme of England, and to depprue the king thereof, that hee the said duke might take vpon him the same against his allegiance, had the tenth day of March, in the second yere of the kings raigne, and at diuers times before, and after, imagined and compassed the kings death and destruction at London, and at Thornebury in the countie of Gloucester: and for the accomplishment of the wicked intent and purpose, the 24. of Aprill, in the 4. yere of the kings raigne, he sent one of his chaplaines called Iohn de la Court vnto the priory of Henton in Sommerfetshire, which was an house of Carthusian monkes, there to vnderstande of one Nich. Hopkins, a monke of the same house (who was vaineelie reputed by way of reuelation to haue foreknowledge of things to come) what should happen concerning this matter, which he had imagined: which monke, causing the sayd de la Court first to sweare vnto him, not to disclose his words to any maner of person, but only to the duke his master, therewith declared that his M<sup>ty</sup>. the said duke should haue all, willing him for the accomplishment of his purpose to seeke to win the fauor of the people. De la Court came back with this answer, and told it to the duke at Thornebury the morrowe after, being 25. of Aprill. And on the 22. of Iuly the same fourth yere, the duke sent the same de la Court with letters vnto the sayde Monke, to vnderstand of him further of such matters, and the Monke tolde to him agayne for answere, that the duke shoulde haue all: and being asked as wel now as before at the first time, how he knew this to be true, he said, by the grace of God, and with this answere de la Court now also returning declared the same vnto the Duke on the 24. of Iuly at Thornebury aforesaid. Moreouer, the said duke sent the same de la Court agayne vnto the said monke with his letters the 26. of Aprill, in the 5. yere of the kings raigne, when the king was to take his iourney into France, requiring to vnderstand what should become of these warres, and whether the Scottish king should in the kings absence invade this realme or not. The monke among other things, for answere of these letters, sent the duke word that the king should haue no issue male. Againe the said duke the 20. day of Feb. in the 6. yere of the kings raigne, being at Thornebury, spake these wordes vnto Ralph Earle of Westmerland: Well, there are two dukes created in Englande, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham shoulde be next in blood to succede to the Crowne. After this the said duke on the 16. date of Aprill, in the said fift yere of the kings raigne, went in person vnto the Priory of Henton, and there hadde conference with the foresayde Monke Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that he should be king: whereunto the duke said, that if it chanced, he would shew himselfe a iust and right wise prince. The monke also tolde the Duke, that he knew this by relation, and willed him in anie wise to procure the loue of the Commons, the better to attayne his purposed intention. The Duke the same time gaue, and promised to giue yerelis vnto the sayde Priorie five pounde, therewith to buy a tunne of wyne: and further promised to giue vnto the sayde priorie in readie money twentie pounds, whereof tenne pounde he gaue in hand, towards the conuryng of water vnto the house by a conduit. And to the sayde monke Nicholas Hopkins, he gaue at that present in rewarde thre pounde, and at one other time fortie shillings, and at another time a marke, and at another time six shillings and eight pence. After this, on the twentieth daie of March, in the tenth yere of the kings raign, he came to the same priorie, and escones had conference with the said monke, to be more fully informed by him in the matters aboue specified, at what time the monke also told him, that he should be king, and the Duke in talke tolde the monke, that he had done verie well to binde his chaplaine John de la Court, vnder the seale of confession, to keepe secret such matters, for if the king should come to the knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction. Likewise, the twentieth daie of October, in the seauenth yere of the kinges raigne, and at diuers other times, as well before as after, the sayde Duke hadde sent his Chancelor Robert Gilbert, chaplaine vnto London, there to buie certayn clothes of gold, siluer, and beluets, euery time so much as amounted to the value of thre hundred pound, to the intent, that the sayde duke might bestow the same, as well vpon knyghtes, esquires, and gentlemen of the kinges house, and yeomen of his gard, as vpon other the kings subiectes, to win their fauors and friendships to assist him in his euill purpose: which clothes the sayde Gilbert did buie, and brought the same to the said duke, who the 20. day of January, in the sayde seauenth yere, and diuers other daies and yeres before and after, did distribute, and giue the same to certayn of the kings subiects, for the purpose before recited. Further more, the sayde Duke the tenth of Iulie, in the tenth yere of the kinges raigne, and diuers other daies and times, as well before as after, did constitute more severall and particular offices in his castles, honors, lordships and lantes than he was accustomed to haue, to the end they might be assistant to him vnder colour of offices, to bring his euill purpose to passe. Moreover, the same duke sent to the king the tenth daie of May, in the ninth yere of his raigne, for licence to retaine any of the kinges subiectes, whom if should please him, dwelling withyn the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Somersetshire: and also, that hee might at his pleasure conueie diuers armours, and habiliments for warre into Wales, to the intent to vse the same against the king, for the accomplishment of his naughtie purpose, which was to destroye the king, and to surpe the Royall gouernement and power to himselfe: which suite for licence to haue Retayners, and to conueie such armours and habiliments of Warre, the sayde Gilbert the twentieth daie of Maie, in the sayde ninth yere, and dyuers other dayes before and after at London, and East Greenwich did follow, laboring earnestlie, both to the king and counsell, for obtaining of the same. And the twentieth day of Iuly, in the said ninth yere, the

the saide Duke sent the sayde Gilbert vnto Henton aforesayde, to vnderstand of the aforesayde Spönke Nicholas Hopkins what hee hearde of him: and the Spönke sent him worde, that before Christmas next there shoulde be a change, and that the Duke shoulde haue the rule and gouernement of all Englande. And moreover, the twentieth daie of Februarie, in the eleuenth yeere of the kinges raigne, at Blechinglie in Surrey, the sayde duke sayd vnto the sayd Robert Gilbert his Chancelloz, that hee did expect and tarrie for a time more conuenient to attchieue his purpose, and that it might easilie bee doone, if the nobles of the realme would declare their mindes together: but some of the mistrusted and feared to shewe their mindes together, and that marred all. He said farther the same time vnto the saide Robert Gilbert, that what soeuer was doone by the kings father, was doone by wrong: and still the duke murmured against all that the king then presentlie raygning did. And further he sayde, that hee knewe himselfe to bee so wicked a sinner, that hee wanted Gods fauour, and therefore hee knewe, that what soeuer hee tooke in hand against the king, had the woofle successe. And furthermore, the sayde duke (to alienate the kinges subiectes mindes from duetifull obedience, towarde him and his heires, the twentieth daie of September, in the first yeere of his raigne) being then at London, repoized to Robert Gilbert, that he hadde a certayne writing, sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certain act of parliament, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Somerset, one of the kinges progenitoys was made legitimate. And further, that the saide duke meant to haue deliuered the same writing vnto king Henry the 7. but (said he) I would not that I had so doone for tenne thousande pounds. And furthermore, the same duke the fourth daie of Nouember, in the eleuenth yeere of the kinges raigne, at East Greenwich in the Countie of Kent, sayde vnto one Charles Kneuet esquire, after that the king had reprocued the duke for retaining William Bulmer knight into his seruice, that if he had perceiued that he shoulde haue bene committed to the towre, as he doubted he shoulde haue bene, hee would haue so wrought, that the principall doers the rein shoulde not haue had cause of great reioycing, for he would haue played the part, which his father intended to haue put in practise against R. Richard the 3. at Salisburie, who made earnest suite to haue come to the presence of the same king Richard, which suite if he might haue obtained, he hauing a knife secretlie about him, would haue thrust it into the body of king Ric. as he had made semblance to kneele downe before him: and in speaking these words, he maliciously laid his hand vpon his dagger, and said, that if hee were so euill bled, he would do his best to accomplish his pretended purpose, swearing to confirm his word, by the blood of our Lord.

And beside all this the same D. the 10. of May, in the 12. yer of the R. raign at London, in a place called the Rose, within the parish of S. Laurence Poulney in Cantwolkestreet ward, demanded of the said Charles Kneuet esquire what was the talke amongst the Londoners, concerning the kinges iourneie beyond the seas: and the saide Charles tolde him, that many stode in doubt of the iourney, least the Frenchmen meant some deceit towards the king: after vnto

the D. answered, it was to be feared least it would come to passe, according to the words of an holie monke, for there is (saith hee) a certaine Charter house monke, that diuers times hath sent to mee, willing me to sende vnto him my chancelloz, and I did send vnto him Iohn de la Court my chaplain, vnto whom he would not declare any thing, till de la Court had sworn vnto him to keepe all things secret, and to tell to no creature liuing that he should heare of him, except it were to mee, and the said monke tolde to de la Court, that neither the king nor his heires should prosper, and that I should indeuoze my selfe to purchase the good wills of the communalty of England, for I (the same take) and my blood should prosper and haue the rule of the realme of England. Then said Charles Kneuet, the monke may be deceiued through illusion of the deuill, and that it was euill to meddle with such matters. Well said the D. it cannot hurt me, and so the D. seemed to reioice in the monks words. And further, the same time the D. tolde the said Charles, that if the king had miscaried now in his last sickenes, he would haue chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of sir Tho. Louell knight, and of others: and also said, that he had rather die for it, than to be so bled as he had bene. Moreover, the 10. day of September in the saide 11. yere of this his reign, at Blechingly in the county of Surrey, walking in the gallery there with George Neuell knight, lord of Burgauney, the D. murmuring against the kings counsellors, and their gouernment, said vnto the saide George, that if the L. died, he would haue the rule of the realme in steite of whoe soeuer said the contrary, & withall said, that if the said L. of Burgauney would say, that the D. had spoken such words he would fight with him, & lay his sword vpon his pate, and this he bound with many great oths. These were the points and articles comprised in the indictment, and laid to his charge, wherof he was by the inquest found guilty.

D. of Buckingham arraigned.

On the 13. of May, the said D. was brought from the towre by water vnto Westminister hall, before the D. of Suffolke high steward of England, to accomplish the high of appeale of the pères or pères of the realm, and to discern and iudge the cause of the pères. There were also appointed to sit as pères and iudges vpon the D. of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorset, the earles of Worcester, Deuonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Orford, & Darby, the lords of S. Iohns, de la Ware, Fitz Waren, Willoughby, Brooke, Cobham, Herbert and Morley. There was made within the Hall at Westminister a scaffold for these lords, and a presence for the Judge, railed, and counter railed about, and barred with degrees. When the lords had taken their place, the D. was brought to the bar, and vpon his arraignment pleaded not guilty, and put himselfe vpon his pères. Then was the indictment read, which the D. denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alledged reasons to falsifie the indictment, verie pithilie. The kings attorney against the dukes reasons, alleged the examinations, confessions, and proofes of witnesses. The duke desired the witnesses might be brought forth: and then came before him Charles Kneuet, sir Gilbert Perk his chancelloz, Iohn de la Court his confessor, and Nicholas Hopkins the monke of Henton that had fed his humour with baine speeches: diuers pzelumptions & accusations were laid to him by Charles Kneuet, which he would haue couered. But the depositions being read, and the deponents deliuered prisoners to the officers of the tower, finally, he was found guiltie by his peeres, and hauing iudgment to suffer as in case of treason is vsed, was led again to his barge, and so conueied by water to the Temple staires, where he was set aland, and from thence by land through London to the tower with the areafore him, sir W. Sands hauing him by the right arme, and sir Nich. Vaux by the left arme. And on the 17. of May, being the friday before Whitunday, he was deliuered to the shirifs of London, who led him to the scaffold on the tower hill, about 11. of the clocke, and there he was beheaded, in the pcesence of sir Th. Louel and all the people, his body with the head was born by the sisters Augustines to their church, and there buried in the Chappell Church for the close. And now folloiweth the publication at the disgrading of the said Edw. late D. of Buckingham knight and companion of the most noble order of S. George, named the Gartar, which was read and published by Gartar king at Armes, at the feast of S. George in the quire of Windsoze Colledge, standing on the high pase at the dere, all the other officers of armes about him, there being also present the L. marques Dorset knight of the same order, then being the kings deputy for the feast, the earle of Essex, the earle of Wilshire, the earle of Kent, sir Th. Louel, and the L. Je Ware, knights of the said order, with other great audience assembled there on the 8. of June, the 13. yere of Henry the 8. the yere of Christ 1521.

D. of Buckingham beheaded.

D. of Buckingham disgraded.

We it knowne unto all men, that whereas Edward late Duke of Buckingham knight, and companion of the noble order of Saint George, named the Gartar, hath latelie done and committed high treason against the King our soueraigne lord, and soueraigne of the said order of the gartar, in compassing and imagining the destruction of the most noble person of our said soueraigne lord the King, contrarie to his othe and due allegiance, and for the which high treason the said Edward hath bene indicted, arraigned, convicted, and attainted, and for the which detestable offence and high treason, the said Edward hath deserued to be disgraded of the said noble order, and expelled out of the said company, and not wothy that his armes, ensignes, and hachmentes should remaine among other the noble ensignes of other noble, vertuous, and approued knights of the said noble order, nor haue the benefits of the said noble order: wherefore our said soueraigne lord the king, soueraigne of the said noble order of Saint George named the Gartar, by the aduise of the other knightes of the said noble order, for his said offences, and committing of the said high treason, willet and commandeth that the said Edward duke of Buckingham to bee disgraded of the said noble order, and his armes, Ensignes, and hachments clarelie expelled, and put from among the armes, ensignes, and hachmentes of the other noble knights of the said order, to the intent, that all other noble men thereby maye take ensample hereafter, not to commit any such heinous and detestable treason and offences, as God forbid they should:

Disgrading of a knight of the Gartar.

God saue the King.

It is to bee remembred, that Sommer set Herault was in the roode lost behind the hachments of the said duke Edward: and when Gartar spake these wordes, words, expelled and put from the armes, then the said Somerset violently cast downe into the quire, his creast, his banner, and sword. And when the publicacion was all done, the officers of armes, spurned the said hatchment with their fete, out of the quire into the body of the church, first the sword, & then the banner, and then was the creast spurned out of the said quire through the Church out at the west doore, and so to the bridge, where it was spurned over into the ditch. And thus was the said Edward late duke of Buckingham fully disgraced of the order of Saint George named the Cartar.

The duke of Buckingham had begun a great and sumptuous building of his manor of Thorneburie, but left the same unfinished. The foundation of a very spacious base court was there begun, and certaine gates and towers in it castle like. It was of a foure or five yardes high, and so remained, a token of a noble piece of worke purposed. He made a faire parke hard by the castle, and took much faire ground into it very fruitful of corne, now faire lands for courting. The inhabitants cursed the Duke for those lands so inclosed. There was afore D. Edwards time a parke at east Wood, a mile or more off: but D. Edw. at two times enlarged it to the compasse of six miles, not without many curses of the poore tenants.

War betwixt
the Emperour and the French
king.

In this meane while were the Emperour and the French king fallen at variance, so that the warre was renewed betwixt them. For the pacifying whereof Cardinall Wolsey, with the bishops of Ely and Durham were sent over, there went with them the earle of Worcester the lord chamberlaine, the lords S. Iohn Ferrers and Herbert, the primate of Armacane, sir Th. Bolleign, sir Iohn Pechy, sir Iohn Hussey, sir Richard Wingfield, sir Henry Gildford, and many other knights, esquires, and gentlemen, these arrived at Caleis on the second of August.

Cardinall Wolsey rode into Flanders, to the Emperour.

The same day came to Caleis ambassadoys from the emperour: and on the 4. of August came the chancelor of France, and the countie de Pallace with 400. horse, by which meanes there met at Caleis the lords of England (before named) of Burgoigne, Spaine, Flanders, and France, with the popes Mator, to make peace betwixt the Emperour and the Fr. king. Cardinall Wolsey would haue furthered a league betwixt the emperour, the K. of England, the K. of France, and the Pope, but the Popes ambassadoy wanted commission thereto, and therefore were letters sent to Rome, and the French men remained still at Caleis till answer came from thence.

The Cardinall Wolsey on the twelfth daie of August rode into Flanders, to speake with the Emperour, which as then laie in Bruges: a mile without Bruges the Emperour receiued him, and did to him as much hono<sup>r</sup> as could be deuised: the cheate was great which was made to the English men, and of euerie thing there was such plentie, that there was no want of things necessarie. The Cardinall, after he had sojourned in Burges by the space of 17. daies, and concluded diuers matters with the Emperour, and accomplished his commission, he took leaue of the Emperour, and the nine and twentieth day of August returned to Caleis, where the ambassadoys of France tarried his coming.

The first of September the Cardinall Chancelloz of England, the Chancelloz of France, and the Chancelloz of Burgoigne rode from Staple inne to our lady church in Caleis. The fourth of September the regent of Naples came to Caleis, to the great counsell there: and the 27. of September the Chancelloz of Hungarie came to the same counsell, but in fine nothing was concluded, but only that the fishermen of both princes might freely fish in the seas without disturbance, till the second day of February next. Thus, when no conclusion of agreement could be accorded, the cardinall sent to the Emperoz the lozde of S. Johns, and sir T. Bolleine knight, to aduertise him what was done.

During the continuance of the Cardinall at Caleis, all writs and patents were there by him sealed, and no shertiffes of shire chosen for lacke of his presence, having there with him the great seale, and full power in things, as if the king had bene there in person. After the returne of the English ambassadors from the Emperoz and French king, the cardinall returned into England about the latter end of November, he landed at Caleis, and from thence took his tourney to Blechingley, where the king welcomed him, and gave him thanks for his great paines.

King Henry wrote a booke against Luther in Germany, and therefore the Pope Leo the tenth, named him Defender of the faith. To the which booke Luther answered verie sharply, nothing sparing his authoritie or maiestie.

King Henry
wrote against Luther.

Pope Leo died this yere, whereupon doctor Pace Deane of Pauls was sent to Rome to make friends in the behalfe of Cardinall Wolsey, who was brought into a vaine hope, through the kings fauour and furtherance, to be elected Pope: but Adrian the first was chosen before doctor Pace could come to Rome, and so that suite was dashed. This Pace was a right worthy man, and one that gave in counsell faithfull aduise, learned he was also and endued with manie excellent god gifts of nature, courteous, pleasant, and delighting in musicke, highlie in the kings fauour, and well heard in matters of weight.

Doctor Pace
Dean of Pauls.

This yere was a great death in London and other places of the Realme: manie men of honoz and great worthip died, and amongst other doctor Fitz James bishop of London, in whose place was elected doctor Tunstall. Also a great death in London and other places, for wheate was solde for twenty shillings the quarter.

A great death, and death in England.

The earle of Surrey returned out of Ireland, and came to the court on the 25. of January, Many complaints to the king were made by the marchants of the Frenchmen which spoiled them by sea of their goods, for by reason the wars were open betwixt the emperoz and the French k. many ships of war were abroad on both parts, and now and then the English men fell into their hands, and were vsed as enemies. namely by the French men, whereof the French ambassadors promised restitution, but little was recovered. In the month of Januarie therefore, the king commanded all his ships to be rigged and made ready, which was done with all diligence.

Ships rigged
to the sea.

In this meane time grudges and displeasures still grew and increased be-twæne the king of England and the French king, till at length, the duke of Albany returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was covenanted by the league. The french king alledged, that he was not proue to his going thither, and wrote to the king, that the said duke was entred Scotland without his assent. Hereupon the king sent six ships to the sea well appointed, the admirall thereof was Christopher Coo, an expert sea man, his commission was to safegard the merchants, and other the kings subiects that were in danger to be grievously spoiled and robbed on the sea by the Frenchmen, Scots, and other rouers.

The 8. of febz. the lord Dacres warden of the marches, fore-aneest Scotland entred into Scotland, with 500. men, by the kings commandeiment, and there proclaimed that the Scots should come into the kings peace by the first of March following, or else to stand at their perils: the D. of Albany being then within five miles with a mighty power of Scots.

The eleventh of Februarie, the lord Burgauey was brought from the tower to Westminster, and there in the kings bench confessed his inditement of mispission.

The L. Montague was about the same time restored to the kings fauor.

This yere died the lord Brooke, sir Edward Poynings knight of the gartar, sir John Pechy, and sir Edward Belknappe, valiant capitaines.

A Scottish rouer called Duncan Camell, after long fight was taken on the sea by John Arundell esquire of Cornwall, who presented him to the king, and he committed him to the tower, where he remained a long season.

The 6. of March, the French L. commanded all Englishmens goods being in Burdeaur to be attached, and put vnder arrest, and retained not onely the money due to be paide, for the restitution of Tourney, but also withhelde the French Queenes dowry. The French ambassado; therefore was called afore the councell, and the cardinall laid sore to his charge, that contrary to his promise at all times made on the French kings behalfe, affirming, that he meant nothing but peace and amitie to be obserued in all points with the L. of England, yet now the English merchants had not onely their goods staied at Burdeaur, but also they and their factors were laide in prison in full breach of all peace and amitie afore time concluded. The ambassado; as well as he coulde excused his master, but in the end he was commanded to kepe his house, and the French hostages that were appointed here to remaine for the money to be paid for the deliury of Tourney, were committed to safe keeping: wherewith also all the French men in London were arrested, committed to prison, and put to their fines: but they were after ten daies set at libertie, vpon finding sureties to appeare before the maior, or else afore the councell at a certain day, and to pay the fine vpon them assessed, which fine the king pardoned to diuers of the poorer sort.

A generall proscription of the realme of England.

This yere betwæne Casser & Michalmas was made a generall proscription of all the realme of England by taking of musters, and otherwise in euery countrey, as may appeare by the charge sent to a chiefe Constable.

William Fitz Williams knight, Richard Fitz Lewes knight, Robert Norwich sergeant sergeant at the law, and Iohn Tirell esquire, commissioners assigned for our soveraigne lordz the king, to the baillie and chiefe constable of the halfe hundred of W. greeting, where afore this we the said William, Richard, Robert and I. Tirell, by our late precept to you directed, charged you the high constables of the same hundred, to give monition and charge to all constables of every hamlet, parish, and village within the said hundred, personally to appeare afore us the said commissioners on munday next comming, the last day of the moneth of March at Waltham holy crosse, and there to bring with them a certificate in writing of the names of all manner of men above the age of 16.

 yerres, dwelling within every towne, hamlet and village within the said hundred, and to do further as by the same precept more plainly doth appeare. We now escones in the behalfe of the king our soveraign lord, wil and command you, that you duely execute the said precept: and also that ye give knowledge, warning, and commandement to all manner of temporall men dwelling, inhabiting, or abiding within any towne, hamlet, parish, or village, within the same halfe hundred, personally to appeare before us the kings said commisi-oners at Waltham holie crosse aforesaid, the said munday next comming, furnished and apparelled in their best array for the warre, that is to say, with bowes, arrowes, bills, harnesse, or any other weapons, artillery, or harnesse for the war, which they or any of them have within the townes and hamlets of the said hundred and every of them. And that they also the said last day of this present moneth of March do certifie us in writing at Waltham holy crosse aforesaid, of all their names, and to whom they belong unto. Also who is lord of eue-ry towne or hamlet within the said hundred, and who be stewards. Item, who be parsons of the same townes, and what the benefices be worth by yere Also who be owners of euerie parcell of land within any towne, hamlet, parish, or village, within the said hundred, with the pcerly value of euerie mans land within the same townes, hamlets, parishes, and villages. And of euerie stocke and stockes of cattell, or other things that be occupied vpon any farme within the said townes, hamlets, and parishes, and who be owners of them Also what allants or strangers dwell in any towne, hamlet, or parish within the saide hundred, and where they were borne, and under whose dominion. Item, what occupation, myserie, or substance they be of. Item, the value and substance of euerie person being of 16. yerres and aboue, dwelling within your saide hundred, hamlets, and parishes, as well spirituall as temporall. Also what pensions goeth out of any lands there to any religious or spirituall men, and that ye faile not this to doe, as ye tender the kings pleasure, and will auoide the contrarie. At Brentwood, the 27. day of March in the 13. yere of the reign of King Henry the eight.

There were sent to the sea under the conduct of sir William Fitz Williams viceadmirall: 8. great ships well manned and furnished for the wars, and 7.
 other ships were sent toward Scotland, which entred the fforth, and profered to enter the Scottish ships that lay in the haucens, but the Scots ranne their ships alond, and the English men followed with boates, landed, and set the ships on fire, and at Lythe toke certaine prisoners, which they brought into England:

England: and still the kings great nanie kept the narrow seas: for then was neither peace betwixt England and France, nor open warre.

The king vnderstanding that the Emperoz would come to Caleis, so to passe into England, as he went toward Spaine, appointed the lord marques Dofset to go ouer to Caleis, there to receiue him, and likewise the lord cardinall was appointed to receiue him at Douer.

Cardinall
Wolsey rode toward Douer to receiue the Emperoz.

The 20. day of May, cardinall Wolsey rode through the city of London toward Douer, there to meete & receiue the emperoz, being accompanied with two earles, 36. knights, 100. gentlemen, eight bishops, ten abbots, thirtie chaplaines, all in beluet and sadden, and seuen hundred yeomen.

The Marques Dofset, with the Bpshopp of Chester, the lord de la Ware, and diuers other, at Caluelin receiued the emperoz in the name of the king of England on the five and twentie daie of Maie, and with all honor brought him to Caleis, where he was receiued with procession, and by the lord Barnes lieutenant of the towne, by the Mayor and merchants of the Staple, in the best manner that might be deuised. On the five and twentieth he took ship at Caleis, and landed at Douer, where the Cardinall with a great number of lordes, knights, and gentlemen of England, was readie to receiue him, and with all the honor that might be, brought him to the castle, where he was lodged.

The emperoz Charles came to London.

On the 28. of May, the king came to Douer, and there with great ioy the emperoz and he met, and saluted each other. On the thirtieth of May he rode from Douer to Canterburie, and so from thence by easie iournies they came to Greenwich, where the Quene receiued her nephew with all the ioy that might be. On the first of June, the king and emperoz with all their companie marched towards London, where the citie was prepared for their entrie, after the manner as is vsed at a coronation, so that nothing was neglected that might set forth the honor of the city, whereinto they were receiued by the mayor, aldermen, and commons: the crosse in Cheape was new gilt, and eleuen pageants were deuised on stages very faire and excellent to behold. The emperoz was lodged at the Blacke friers, and all his nobles in the new builded house of Bridewell.

On Whitfunday the eight of June the emperoz and the king rode to the church of S. Paul, and there heard masse, which was sung by the cardinall. The emperoz rode to diuers places, being feasted by the king, at Windsor they tarried a whole weeke, where on Corpus Christi day the emperoz wore his mantle of the garter, and sate in his stall. The same day both the princes receiued the sacrament, and took their corporall othes to keepe and obserue the league concluded betwixt them. On the morrowe after they departed from Windsor, and came to Winchester on the 22. of June.

The first of July, the emperors naue came before Hampton, containing 180. goodly ships. Then the Emperoz took leaue of the king, of whom he had many gifts and summes of money by waite of loane, and so the first of July he took ship, and made saile towards Spaine, where he arrived in safetie the tenth daie after.

During

During this time, the earle of Surrey lord admirall, bzent shippes in Britaine, and then returned: not long after, he passed ouer to Caleis, entred Picardie, and bzent diuers towncs and castels. He besieged Hesling, but because winter was neer, he raised his siege, and returned.

The D. of Albany in Scotland began to enter this land with a great army, but hearing that the earle of Shrewsbury was coming he toke a truce for six monethes.

In the beginning of this yere, Sultan Soliman Pac, called the great Turke, which was the 8. of the line of Ottoman the first that took upon him to be great capitaine or ruler, and to whome Sultan Solime his father had left the empires of Constantinople, Trebesond, Alexandry, and Babylon, with manie diuers kingdoms & realmes, which Sultan Soliman y<sup>e</sup> yer befoze had gotten y<sup>e</sup> towne of Belgrado, being the keye of Hungary, because he saw all the princes in Christendome now at discord, thought it most for his honor and profit to make war on the Isle of the Rhodes, and to take the same: which Isle had been kept by the space of 224. yeres, by the brethren or knights of the order of S. Iohn of Jerusalem. Diuers things moued him to take this enterprise, one was because this Isle stood so, that the religious of the same oftentimes tooke and destroyed his Shippes as they came with golde, and other riches from Egypt, Sire, and other east parts to Constantinople, so that by thym of that Isle he sustayned moze hurt than by all Christendome, because the sayde Isle stood in the very entrie toward Constantinople. Another motion was, because his father when he dyed, charged him to assaye to take the Rhodes, for to be reuenged of the shame that they had done to his grandfather Mahomet the greates Turke, which was with dishonour beaten from the siege of the Rhodes. But the greatest occasion of all was the exhortation of a great Counsellor of the Religion called Andrewe Amirall borne in Portugale, which knewe the whole estate, and in what case the Towne stood in. The cause why this Andrewe Amirall bare malice to his religion was, because after the death of Brother Fabrica de laretto Lord master of the fr religion, hee was not elected to that honor, but one Philip de Villiers de Lisle Adame of France was named to be Lord master, wherefore the sayde Andrewe prouoked the Turke to come to the Rhodes.

The great Turke seeing so great an occasion offered, and desiring honor, and also knowing the fortresse of the Rhodes to lacke munitions, for the brethren of the order were both of such wealth and pride, and also of such wicked life that they toke no heed of their vow and solemn profession, nor for to do the thing to come, and so their towne unfurnished was some surprised. The said Turke prouided for 300. sattle, in the which he conueied all his artillery, and other things necessarie. In the which army were 60000. miners and pioners prepared to dig and undermine, the rest of the army came by land to a place called Filico, which standeth so direalie against the Rhodes, that a fire male bee come from the one side to the other: from the which place the Turke sent letters to the aboue named Philip de Villiers lord master of the religion, signifying to him, that he would haue the saide Isle, for the great dammage that they had done to him and his people: and if they would yeld to him the said Ile, he promised on his faith, and by Mahomet his first prophet, they should haue no dammage nor hurt by him, and that they that would depart should go in safetie, and they that would tarry and serue him, should haue good wages: and if they refused this to doe, he sware that he would subuert the wals of their fortreffe, and destroy them all, and make them slaues, which letter was dated at Constantnople, the first day of June.

The Rhodes besieged by two hundred thou.
land Turkes.

The said lord master and his companie were greatly abashed of this letter, but yet like hardie gentlemen they intended to defend them, and made all the preparations that they could doe in so short space, and wrote to all Princes Christian of their distresse. But the Turke knowing the great division amongst the christian princes, so that they could send no succour to the Rhodes, sent 200000. Turkes, which arrived in the Ile of the Rhodes on Whitsommer day, which was the festiual day of the Rhodes in honor of S. Iohn Baptist, which sudden comming soe abashed the Rhodians, being but 600. knights, & 5000. other mate to beare armes: yet of noble courage and trusting in God, they determined to defend themselves against the enemies of God. And on the 23 of July the Turke arrived there in his owne person, which much encouraged his people: he bent his ordinance toward the towne, but did no great haringe, wherefore he caused all his pioners to cast earth one banke over another till till they came within a bow shot of the wals: and although that many of the pioners were slaine with ordinance of the towne, they neuer ceased till they had made a banke of earth higher by ten fote than the wall of the towne, and laid there their ordinance, so that no person durst stir on the wals or bulwarks. Thus with mounds of earth was the towne enuironed, and behind the mountaines lay the Basheaur and chieftaines of the Turke, which were euer readie to take their aduantage, and daily they shot into the towne, and beat downe houses and slew the people in the streets, for they vpon the mount might easily see into the towne: besides this, the Turke caused so many mines to be made in diuers places, that they within were not able to make countermines for lacke of people, inso much as women were set a worke, to dig and carry, by reason whereof a great part of the wals were ouerthrowen, and if they within had not made countermines, the towne had ben gotten within a short space. Also the Turke in the moneth of September gaue to the Rhodians 4. great assaults, but the Christians so valiantly defended them, that at every assault they lost ten thousand Turkes and more.

The great Turk seeing the losse of his men at the assaults, sent for Mostaffa Bashaw, and much blamed him, that he had perswaded him that he might haue taken the towne in 12. daies, or in a moneth at the most: wherefore in his furie he would haue put him to death: but in conclusion the Turke determined clearly to raise his siege, and to depart, and so had done, if that same night Sir Andrew Amiral, and a felle within the Rhodes had not written letters, and shot them out on quarels into the Turkes army: by which letters the Turke knew the necessitie of the towne, and feblenes of the people, which caused him to change his purpose: but this treason was espied, the traitors taken, and put put to terrible execution. The Turke caused so many mines to be made, that both bulwarkes, walls, and towres were ouerthrowen. And so on S. Andrewes euen he caused a great assault to be giuen: but yet the Christians so valiantly defended themselves, that they slew 3000. Turkes, and kept them from entering that day: but the citizens of the Rhodes after this assault came to the lord master, and praised him to haue compassion on them, the lord master comforted them with faire wordes: but by chance about the same time the great Turke sent a letter into the Rhodes, willing them to deliuer the towne, and they all should haue their liues and goods, and they that would tarry should remaine quiet. This letter being knowne, the people cried out on the lord master to take the offer, wherefore calling all his counsell, for diuers wants amongst them, they sent to the Turke two of the religion, for the assurance of his promise, who were well entertained, and had writings sealed of all things that they desired. As the which two knightes, Aymeck Basshaw sware, that there were slain at that siege 64000. Turkes, and 40000. dead of mortalitie & more. And on Christmas day, the great Turke himselfe entered into the Rhodes, and tooke possession thereof, and the lord master & all his religion, the first day of January tooke ship, and sailed to Candy, and so to Rome, and there declared his chance and aduenture. Thus was the towne and the Isle of the Rhodes taken by the great Turke, which was a great succour to all Christian men resorting to the east parts of the world, which chance was much lamented (but too late) throughout all Christendome, and much blame put in princes, because they sent no succour to them of the Isle.

The 20. of February, the labie Alice Hungerford a knights wife, for murdering her husband, was led from the tower of London to Holbozne, & there put in a cart with one of her servants, and so caried to Libozne, and both hanged: she was buried in the Gray Friers church at London.

Thomas Howard earle of Surrey burned 37. villages in London, disposed the countrey from the east marches to the west, and ouerthrew diuers holdes.

Thomas Ruthall Bishop of Durham being deceased, the king gaue that bishopricke vnto cardinall Wolsey, who resigned the bishopricke of Bath to doctor Iohn Clarke master of the Rolles. And sir Henry Marney that was vice chamberlaine, was made lord pylup seale, and shortly after he was created baron Marney at Richmond.

Doctor Blyth Bishop of Chester was attacked for treason, but he acquitted himselfe.

The 15. of Aprill began a parliament at the Blacke friers in London, and that day the king came into the Parliament chamber, and there sate in the seate roiall, and at his seate on the right side sate the cardinal of Porke, and the archbishop of Canterbury: and at the raile behind stood doctor Tunstall bishop of London, which made to the whole parliament an eloquent oration, declaring the office of a king. First he must be a man of iudgement, according to the saying of the Prophet Dauid, Deus iudicium tuum regi da. &c. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the saying of the prophet, Erudimini

qui iudicatis terram. According to which saying, he said that God had sent us a prince of great iudgement, of great learning, and great experience, which according to his princely duty forgot not to study to set forwards all thinges, which might be profitable to his people and realme, lest might be laide to his charge the saying of Seneca, Es rex, & non habes tempus esse rex? Art thou a king, and hast no time to be a king? Which is as much to say, as Art thou a king, and dost nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and seest the people haue an insufficient lawe? Art thou a king, and wilt not prouide remedie for the mischiefes of thy people? These things haue indeed caused the kings highnes to call this high court of parliament, both for remedie of mischiefes which be in the common law, as recoveries, foren vouchers, and corrupt trials; and for making and ordering of new statutes, which may be to the high aduancing of the common wealth: wherefore he willett the commons to repaire to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord Chancelor of the same, which should there of make report to the kings most noble grace, which should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented befoze his person.

Thom. Moore.

This was the cause of the parliament, he saide, but of these things no one word was spoken in the whole parliament, nor any good act made, except the grant of a great subsidie. The commons chose for their speaker Sir Thomas Moore knight, and presented him the saturday after in the parliament chamber. Where he according to the usage, disabled himselfe, both in wit, learning, and discretion, to speake befoze the king, and brought in for his purpose, how one Phormio desired Haniball to come to his reading, which the reto assented, and when Haniball was come, he began to reade De re militari, that is, of chivalrie: when Haniball perceiued him, he called him arrogant sole, because he would presume to teach him, which was master of chivalrie in the seates of warre: so the speaker saide, If he should speake befoze the king of learning, and ordering of the common-wealth, and such other like, the king being so well learned, and of such prudence and experience, might say to him as Haniball to Phormio: wherefore he desired his grace that the commons might chose another speaker. The Cardinall answered, that the king knewe his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his seruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most meetest man of all, and so he did admit him. Then sir Thomas Moore gaue to the king his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions: the one, if he should be sent from the commons to the king on message, and mislike their intent, that he might with the kings pleasure resort againe to the commons, for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reasoning, any man in the common house should speake more largely than of dutie they ought to doe, that all such offences should be pardoned, and that to be entred of record: which two petitions were granted, and thus began the parliament. And euen as there was much ado amongst them of the common house, about their agrément to the subsidie then required, so was there as hard hold for a while amongst them of the cleargie in the conuocation house, namely, namely, Richard Foxe bishop of Winchester, and Iohn Fisher bishop of Rochester held sore against it, but most of all sir Rowland Philips bicar of Crodonw, one of the canons of Paules a famous and notable preacher in those daies, spake most against that payment. But the cardinall taking him aside, so persuaded the matter with him, that he came no more into the house, willinglie absenting himselfe, thus he giuing ouer his hold, the other yielded, and so was granted the halfe of all their reuenues spirituall for one yeere, to be paid in 5. yeeres following. Now on the 29. of Aprill, the cardinall accompanied with diuers lords, as well spirituall as temporall, came into the common house, where he eloquently declared to the commons, how Francis the French king the first called the most Christian king, had oftentimes broken promise with the king of England, and his nephew Charles the Emperoz, that the king of his honor could no longer suffer. For first he declared that the meeting of the said two princes at Callesnes, the said French king was sworne to keepe all the articles contained in the league, sith the which time he hath made war on the emperors dominions, &c. he also hath withhelden his tribute, and other payments which he should pay to the K. of England, for redemption of Turney and Turwine, &c. Wherefore the king of necessitie was driuen to warre, which in no case could be maintained without great summes of mony, and he thought no lesse than 800000. pound, to be raised of the fifth part of euery mans goods and lands, that is to say, foure shillings of euery pound: for he said that the yeere following, the king and the emperoz should make such war in France as had not bene seene.

After that he had declared his matter at length, exhorting the commons to aide their prince in time of necessitie, hee departed out of the common house.

The morrow after, sir Thomas Moore declared all the cardinals oration againe to the commons, and enforced his demand, saying, that of dutie men ought not to deny to pay foure shillings of the pound. But for all that it was denied, and proued manifestly, that if the fifth part of substance of the realme were but 800000. and if men should pay to the king the fifth part of their goods in money or plate, it was proued that there was not so much money out of the kings hands in all the realme, for the fifth part of euery mans goods is not in money nor plate: for although fine men were well mounted, fine thousand were not so, the gentlemen of lands hath not the fifth part of the value in coine: the merchant that is rich in silke, wooll, tinne, cloth, and such like, hath not the fifth part in money, &c. And then consequentlie, if all the money were brought to the kings handes, then men must barter cloth for victuall, and bread for cheese, and so one thing for another. Then consider that after this valuation, the king hath had by the waie of loane two shillings of the pound, which is 400000. pound, and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, which amounteth in the whole to 12. hundred thousand pound, which first and last is five shillings of the pound, which is almost the third part of euery mans goods, which in coine cannot be had within the realme: for the parts thereof was alledged, that if there were in England but 15000. parishes, and euery parish shoulde giue 100. marks, that were but fiftē hundred thousand marks, which is but ten hundred thousand pound: and how many parishes be in Englande one with another, able to spare a hundred marks, out of citie and townes; and where it is written, that in England there be fortie thousand parish Churches, it was proued that there were not 13000. parishes. Then account, the whole summe cannot mount aboue ten hundred thousand pound, and the king demandeth 800000. and he after this valuation hath had 400000. pound, therefore it was thought the sum impossible to be leuied: and if all the coine were in the kings hand, howe shoulde men liue? Also the king had of the spirituell men the last yeere, foure shillings of the pound, &c. To conclude, after long debating, the Commons granted two shillings of the pound of cuerie mans goods and lands that were worth twentie pound, or might dispend 20. pounce by yeere, and so upward, and from fortie shillings to twentie pounce, twelue pence of the pound, and vnder forty shillings of cuerie head sixteen yeeres and upward, foure pence to be payde in two yeeres. This Parliament the 21. of May was adioined to Westminster among the blacke Hons, and ended in the kings Palace at Westminster the 14. of August, at 9 of the clocke in the night.

Christerne K. of Denmarke and his Quene, arriving at the Downes besides Dover the 15. of June, came to London on the 22. of June, and were lodged in the Bishop of Bathes place. The 5. of July, they returned againe to Caleis.

D. of Suffolke
entered France with a power.

In this season the king hauing put an army of men in a readines, caused the same to be transported ouer to Caleis, & appointed the duke of Suffolke to haue the leading thereof, and to make a sojney into France. The duke according to his commission came to Caleis on the 24. of August, and there abiding the army, caused all things to be prepared for the same, as victualles, munition, and such like. There were appointed to attend him in this sournay, the lord Mountacure, and his brother sir Arthur Poole, the lord Sands, the lord Barkley, the lord Powes, and the Baron of Curslon, and of knights, sir Richarde Wingfield Chancelor; of the dutchie of Lancaster, sir John Vere, sir Edward Neull, sir William Kingstone, sir Richarde Westone, sir Andrewe Windsor, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Anthony Wingfield, sir Edward Gilforde, sir Edward Greuile, sir Edwarde Chamberlaine, sir Thomas Lucy, sir Edwarde Digby, sir Adrian Foreescue, sir Richarde Cornwall, sir William Courtney, sir William Sidney, sir Henry Owen, and manie other. The whole armie consisted in 600. Dimillars, two hundred archers on horseback, 3000. archers on fote, and 5000. Billmen. To these also were adioined 1700. taken out of the garisons of Hames, Swines and Caleis, so that in al they were 10500. well armed and appointed for the warre, besides 2600. laboers and pioners. These set out of Caleis on the the 19. of September. The first enterprize that they attempted was the winning of Bell castle, which they beat downe, and sent the Frenchmen prisoners to Calets.

In this season was the duke of Bourbon high constable of France, revolted from the French king to the service of the emperor, and the king of England: for after it was knowne that this Duke hadde his minde alienated from the French king, sye John Russell (that was after earle of Bedford) was sent into France vnto the saide Duke, which in disguised apparell ordered himselfe so wiselie, that in couert manner hee came to the Duke, and so perswaded him, that hee continued in his former determination, and auoyded the Realme of France. The Duke of Suffolke remooued to Arde, and so into Picardie. At Corbieres a Village betweene Turwing and Saint Omers, there came to him the Lorde of Ilesston, and with him of Spantards, Almaines, Cleueners, and other, 3000 footemen, and 500. horsemen. The Duke being thus furnished with newe aide, marched forward, sending out diuers companies of his men to take towne, and fetch booties. The Frenchmen were so afrayd of the Englishmen, that they fled out of their houses, and left the Townes and Villages voyde. The Duke passed forth till he came to the Towne of Bray, in the which were 1600. men of warre, vnder the gouernance of Captayne Adrian.

Charles D. of Bourbon revolted from the French king.

The 20. of October the duke caused his ordinance to be brought asme it, the which is so well applyed in making batterie to the walles of the Towne, that the Towne was made assailable, and then the Englishmen and other made forward, got the ditches, and after entered vpon the Walles, and so into the towne, and so dauntlesse the French men fled, and thus was gotten þe Towne of Bray. The 21. of October, the army with their ordinance passed the Riuer, and came to a Towne called Knap, all the inhabitants were fled, but they had left good plentie of wine behind them. The duke sent to them of Roy, requiring to haue the towne deliuered to him, which they graunted to doe, because they had no garrison of souldiers to defend them: thither was sent sir Richard Cornwall, with 400. men, which receiued the towne, and kept it in good quiet, till the duke came thither.

The 25. of October, the duke remooued to a Village called L yphome, where the souldiers had greates pillage. The next daie they went to Daunker, and the 27. they came before the towne of Montbedier, in the which were 1000. footemen, and 500. horsemen: but after sir William Scuyington had made batterie foure houres, they within yeelded the Towne vnto the Duke. The duke remained in Montbedier till the last of October, and then remooued to Roy, there on Alhalotune daie the duke made knights, the Lorde Herbert, the lord Powes, Oliuer Manners, Arthur Poole, Richard Sands, Robert Ierningham, Robert Salisbury, Edmond Beningfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantill, George Warham, Edward Symmer. The next morrowe the Armie remooued to a place called Beals. The Souldiers being thus ledde from place to place, beganne to grudge, because of the winter season.

D. of Suffolke

The 6. of Nouemb. the whole army came to a village called Cleay, & there rested that night, on the morrow they came to a place called Benford: at this passage the Duke made Io Dudley, and Rob. Vireight knights.

The 8. of Nouember the duke remoued to Mount S. Martine, and the army remoued to Bermont, and there rested for a time. The Welshmen murmured that they might not return home: but there were to the number of 1000. persons under the leading of sir Iohn Wallope, which had little wages or none, and liued as aduenturers, & therefore were so called, and of some called Brokers, these by spoiling of towines, taking of prisoners, and other such practises, daily brought to the campe daily horses, victuals, cloth, and other necessaries, which stood them in great need.

Aduenturers & Brokers.

The 13. of Nouember the duke remoued to a place within 2. miles of Boggam castle, there the Welshmen set out great shouts and cried: home, home, & as fast the Brokers cried: hang, hang, whereof great busines was like to haue ensued: the Frenchmen yielded the castle of Boggam, and all the Artillerie, which was 76. peeces great and small. The duke brake vp his army and returned, and left at Valencenus all the great ordinance, and returned into England the 30 day of December.

Conspiracy at Couentry.

In December, at the city of Couentry, Francis Philip scholemaster to the kings Henrymen, Christopher Pickering clearke of the kings larder, and Anthony Manuile gentleman, intended to haue taken the kings treasure of his subsidie, as the collectors of the same came toward London, therewith to haue raised men, and to haue taken the Castle of Billingsworth, and then to haue made battell against the king, for the which they were drawn, hanged, & quartered at Tiborn the 11. of February: the other of their conspiracy were executed at Couentry.

Sir Th. Louell deceased.

The 25. of May, deceased sir Thomas Louell knight of the Cartar, at Endfield, and was buried at Halywell an house of Puns besides London, vnto the which house he had been a great benefactor, not only in building of a beautifull chappell wherein his bodie was interred, but in many other godlie buildings, and indowing the same with landes: And the same moneth deceased Thomas Loyde Howarde Duke of Norfolk, and was honourable buried at Lambeth.

A golden rose sent from Rome to Wall.

The first of September, doctor Thomas Haniball master of the rols, was refused into London as ambassado: from Clement the 7. Pope, which brought with him a Rose of Golde for a token to the king, which was presented to him at Windsor. This tree was forged of fyne gold, and wrought with Branches, leaues, and flowers, resembling roses, set in a pot of Golde, which potte had had three foot of antike fashion, of measure halfe a pint. In the hypermost rose was a faire saphire loupe pearced the bignes of an Acoyne. The tree was of height halfe an English yard, and in breadth a foot.

It chanced in the yere passed, as partly hath been touched, a grudge to break out betwixen the French king, and the duke of Bourbon, insomuch that the duke for the safegard of his life fled out of the French kinges dominions, whereof the Cardinall Wolley hauing intelligence, comprised in his heade, that if the king our soueraigne Lord could obtaine him to bee his generall in the war against the French king, and considering further that the Duke of Bourbon was fled vnto the Emperour to inuite him to a like purpose, wherefore he being this imagination in his head, thought it good to moue the king in the matter, and after the king was once aduertised hereof, and concealing the cardinals inuention, at last it came to a consultation among the counsell, so that it was concluded that an Ambassage shoulde be sent to the Emperour about the matter, with whome hee was, that the king and the Emperour shoulde ioine in those warres against the French king, and that the Duke of Bourbon shoulde be our kings Champion and Generall in the Fielde, who had a great number of good Souldiers, euer and besides the Emperours Armie, which was not small: and that the king shoulde paie vnto the Duke monthlie wages, both for himselfe and his retinue, insomuch, as Sir Iohn Russell late continuallie beyonde the seas in a secrete place, both to receiue moneie of the king, and to paie the same monthlie to the duke, so that the duke beganne the wars with the French king in his owne territorie and Dukedome, which the king had consisked in his owne hands, being not perfectlie knowne vnto the dukes enemies that he had aunc aide out of England, and thus he wrought the French king much displeasure, insomuch, as the French king was constrained to prepare a puissant armie, and in his owne person to resist the Dukes power, and with force the king droue him to take Daunt, a strong Towne in Italie, with his Hoste, for their securitie, whereas the king Encamped him wonderfullie strong, intending to enclose the duke that hee shoulde not issue forth, yet notwithstanding, the duke did many times issue forth and skirmished with the king.

Howe let vs retorne agayne to the Cardinall Wolsey, who seemed to bee todaynelie altered, and to bee more French than Emperall, howsoever it came to passe: but the French king lying in his Campe, sent secretlie into Englande a priuie person, a verie wittie man, to treat a peace betwixt the French king, and our king: this person was named Iohn Iokin, who was kept as secretlie as might bee, for hee was no French man borne, but an Italian, a man of no greate estimation in France, and for his subtill witte, elected to entreate of such Ambassage, as the French king had giuen him in commission. This Iokin was secretlie conueyed vnto Richmond, and there remained, vntill the Cardinall resorted thither vnto him, where after Easter terme ended, he kept the feast of Whitsonthe verie solemnlie, in which season the Cardinall caused diuers times this Iokin to dine with him. Thus continued this Iokin in Englande long after, vntill at the last, as it shoulde seeme, hee brought brought to passe the matter that he had in commission. After this, there was sent out immediatlie a restraint to Sir Iohn Russell, into those parts where he made his abiding beyond the seas, that he shoulde retaine that moneths traiges still in his handes, untill the kings pleasure were to him knowne, which shoulde haue beene payde to the duke of Burbon, being then with his retinue encamped within the Towne of Paup, for want thereof at his date, the D. and his men were sore dismaide, when they sawe there was not mony brought as it was wont to be: and being in so dangerous a case, and where Victuals began to bee scant and verie deere, they imagined many waies that shoulde bee the lette, some sayde this, and some sayde that, so that they mistrusted nothing lesse, then the verie cause thereof, inso much as at the last, that for want of victualles, and other necessities, the Souldiers and Captaynes beganne to grudge and mutter, and at last, for lacke of victuals were like all to perishe. The Souldiers beeing in this extremitie, came before their Captayne the Duke of Burbon, and sayde: Syr, wee must bee of verie force and necessity constrained to yelde vs vpp to our enemies, and better it were for vs so to doo, then to sterue lyke dogges. When the Duke sawe their extremitie he saide vnto them with weeping eyes: Syr, (quoth hee) yee are both valiaunt men, and of noble heartes, who haue serued mee heere right worthilie, and for your necessity (whereof I am participant) I doo not a little lament: but I shall desire you, as you are noble in hearte and courage, so to take patience for a day or twayne, and if succour come not then from the King of England, as I doubt nothing that hee will deceyue vs, I will well agree that wee shall all put our selues and our liues vnto the mercie of our Lorde, where with they were all agreeable. And tarrying the comming of the R. money, untill the terme of two dayes were passe: the Duke seeing no remedie, called his noble Captaynes and Souldiers before him, and weeping sayde: Oe noble men and Captaynes, I see no remedie in this necessity, but eyther wee must yelde vs vnto our enemies, or else famishe: and to yelde the Towne and our selues, I know not the mercie of our enemies, as for my part I passe not for their cruelties, for I knowe verie well that I shall suffer death most cruelle if I come into their hands: it is not for my selfe therefore that I doo lament, but it is for your sakes, it is for your liues, and safegarde of your persons, for so that yee might escape the daunger of our enemies hands, I would most gladlie suffer death, therefore good companions, and most noble Souldiers, I shall requite you all to consider the daungerous miserie and calamitie that wee stande in, to sell our liues most deere, rather than to bee murdered like beastes: if yee will bee agreeable, wee will take vpon vs this night to giue our enemies an assault, and by that meanes wee maie eyther escape, or else giue them an overthrowe, and thus it were better to die in the field lyke men, than liue prisoners in captiuitie and miserie, to the which they all agree: then (quoth the Duke) yee perceyue that our enemies Campe is stronge, and that there is noe waile to enter vpon them but one, and that is so planted with Ordnance and strength of men, that it is not possible to attayne to our enemies that waies to fight with them in Campe: And also no's of late you perceiue they haue hadde but small doubt of vs, insomuch, that they haue kept but verie slender watch, therefore my deuice shall bee thus: There shall issue out of the Towne about the deade of the night from vs a number of you that bee of the mosse deliuerest to assaulte their Campe, and they shall giue the assaulte right secretlie, euen directlie against the place of the entrie which is verie stronge and invincible, your fierce and balaunte assaulte shall bee to them of the Campe so doubtfull, that they will turne their strength of the entrie that lyeth ouer against your assaulte, to beate you from your purpose; then will I issue out of the Posterne, and come to the place of their strength the newelie turned, and there or they be aware will I enter, and fight with them in their Campe, and winne their Ordnance, which they haue newelie turned, and beate them with their owne peeces, and then maie you come and soine with me in the ffield. This deuice pleased them woonderfull well. Then prepared they all that daie for the purposed deuice, and kept them secret and close without any noyse, or shotte off peeces within the Towne, which gaue their Enemies the lesse feare of the assaulte: but at night went to their Tentes, and coloched quietlie, nothing mistrusting that after happened vnto them. When the time came that all men were at rest, the assaillantes issued out of the Towne, and there according to their appointmente, they gaue so cruell and fierce assault, that they in the Campe hadde as much to doe as was possible to resist them: and euen as the Duke declared before to his Souldiers, they within were compelled to turne their shotte that laie at the entrie, against they assaillantes. With that issued out the Duke, and with him about fiftene or sixtene thousande men, or more, secretlie in the night, his Enemies beeing not pye of his comming untill hee was entered the ffield, and at his entrie hee tooke all the Ordnance that laie there, and slewe the Gunners, then hee charged the peeces against his Enemies, and slewe them woonderfullie, hee cutte downe the Tentes and Pavilions, and murdered manie within them, ere they were ware of his comming, suspecting nothing lesse than his entrie, so that hee wanne the ffield or euer the King coulde arise to the rescue; insomuch, as the King was taken in his lodging by the Vice-roy of Naples or euer hee were harnessed, his tentes were robbed and spoyled which were woonderous rich, and in the spole and search of the Kings Coffers, the Duke of Burbon found the league vnder the great Seale of Englande newelie made betwene the King of Englande, and the French King, which once perceiued by him, beganne to smell the impediment of his monete which shoulde haue come vnto him from the King, hauing vpon due search intelligence that all the matter was deuised by the Cardinall of Englande. The Duke conceiued such an indignation hereupon against the Cardinall, that incontinentlie hee went to Rome, and there intended to sacke the towne, and to haue taken the Pope, where at the first assault of the walles, the Duke was the first man that was slayne: yet notwithstanding, his Captaynes continued their assaulte, and at the last wanne the towne, and the pope fled vnto Castle Saint Angell, where he continued long in calamitie. Cardinal Wolsuppressed pri-ories to build his colledges in Oxford and in Ipswich.

About such time as Cardinall Wolsey was determined to erect his newe colledges in Oxford and Ipswich, he obtained licence and authoritie of Pope Clement the 7. to suppress about the number of forty Monasteries of good fame, and bountifull hospitality, wherein the king bearing with al his doings, neither bishop, nor tempoꝛal lord in this realme durst say any word to the contrarye.

In the executing of this businesse, five persons were his chiefe instruments, who on a time made a demaund to the Prior and couent of the monasterie of Daintrie, for occupping of certayne of their groundes, but the Monkes refusing to satisfie their requestes, straightwaie they picked a quarrell against the house, and gaue information to the Cardinall against them, who taking a small occasion, commanded the house to be dissolved, and to be conuerted to his newe colledge, but of this irreligious robbrie done of no conscience, but to patch by pride, which priuate Wealth coulde not furnish, what punishment hath since ensued at Gods hande (saith mine Authoꝛ) partle our selues haue seene, for of those five persons, two fell at discorde betweene themselves, and the one newe the other, for the which, the Suruuiour was hanged: the thirde drowned himselfe in a Well: the fourth beeing well knowne, and valued woorth two hundred pounde, became in three yeeres so poore, that he begged till his dying date: and the fift called doctor Allane, beeing chiefe executor of these doings, was cruelly maimed in Irelande, euen at such time as hee was a bishop: the cardinall falling after into the Kings greivous displeasure, was depose, and died miserably: the colledges which he meant to haue made so glorious a building, came neuer to good effect: the one at Ipswich cleane pulled down, and the other in Oxford unfinished: and pope Clement himselfe by whose authoritie these houses were thrown down to the ground, was after inclosed in a dangerous siege within the castle of S. Angel in Rome by the emperials, the city of Rome was pittifullly sacked, and himselfe narrowly escaped with his life, as shal be shewed in anno 1527.

R. Hall.
Ambassadors to the emperor
Charles.

In the month of March, H. sent Cuthbert Tunstall bishop of London, and sir Ric. Wingfield chancelloꝛ of the dutchy, and knight of the garter, into Spain, to common with the emperor for causes, concerning the taking of the French li. and for wars to be made into France on euery side.

The first part of all mens goods demanded to aide the king in his wars.

The king being thus determined to make warres in France, and to passe the sea himselfe in person, his counsell considering that about al things, great treasure and plenty of mony must needs be provided, deuised strange commissions, and sent commissioners in euery shire, with priuy instructions how they should proceed in the sittings, & order the people to bring them to their purpose, which was, that the first part of euery mans substance, should be paid in money or plate to the king without delate, for the furniture of his warre: whereof followed followed such cursing, weeping, and exclamation against both king and counsel, that pittie it was to heare. And notwithstanding all that could bee saide by the Commissioners, to perswade the people to this contribution, the same woulde not bee graunted: but in excuse of their denfall, it was alledged that wyong was offered, and the ancient customes and lawes broken, which woulde not any man to be charged with such payments, except it were granted by the estates of the realme in parliament.

The like answer was made by them of the spiritualtie, of whome was demanded the fourth part of their goods.

Mounſier de Prace the emperours ambassadoz, whether offended for admitting of Iokin in the realme, as before ye haue heard, or for some other cause, on the ninth of Aprill departed out of England, not taking leaue of the king, cardinall, or rest of the counſel, and did so much, that he passed through France in Poſſe, and came to the emperoz before the Ambassadors of England came thither, and whether it was by his report, or otherwise, the accustomed fauor that the Emperour and his Counſell shewed to the English men beganne to decaie.

R. H. In danger of drowning.

The commissioners in al shires sitting for the leuy of the 6. part of all mens goods, as ye haue heard, the burthen was so græuous, that it was denied, and the commons in euery place were so moued, that it was like to haue growne to a rebellion: when this mischiefe was shewed to the R. he said, that he neuer knew of that demand, and therfore with great diligence hee sent his letters to the city of London, and to other places, in the which hee gently wrote, that hee woulde demand no ſum certain, but such as his louing ſubiects woulde grant to him of their good wils, toward the maintenance of his warrs. Wherefore the cardinall on the 26. of Aprill sent for the maioz of London, the aldermen, with moſt ſubſtantiall persons of the common counſell, and when they were come to Weſtminſter, he said: the king our ſoueraigne lord, moſt graciouſlie considereth the great loue, zeale, and obedience, which you bare vnto him, and where like louing ſubiects, without anye grudge, or gaine-ſaying of your louing his grace, ſhewing him both your good minds toward him, and alſo the charcontente to call in, and abrogate the ſame Commiſſion. And there hee by reason

reason of your own grants might haue demanded the said summe as a certe debt, yet he is content to release and pardon the same, and will nothing take of you but your beneuolence: wherefore take here with you the kings letter, and let it be read to the commons, and I doubt not but you will gladly do as louing subjects should do. The 28. of Aprill, in the common councell of the city was read the kings letter, according to the effect aboue rehearsed. Wherefore the citizens sent 4. aldermen, and 12. commoners to Hampton court, to giue thanks to the L. cardinall, which for busines as was said, could not speake with him, wherefore they returned not content. Then euery alderman assembled his warde, in their places accustomed, and gently moued them of a beneuolence to be granted to the king, the which they openlie denied, saying: That they had paid enough before, with many euill words. The 8. of May the cardinall againe sent for the maior and his brethren, which shewed him what they had done. Then said the cardinall, You haue no such commission to examine any man, I am your commissioner, I will examine you one by one my selfe: and then I shal know the god will that you beare to your prince, for I wil aske a beneuolence of you in his name. Then was it answered to the cardinall by a counsellor of the city, that by the law there might no such beneuolence be asked, nor men to examined, for it was contrary to the statute made the 1. yere of H. Richard the thirde. Also some persons comming before your grace, may for feare grant that, that all daies of their life they shall repent, and come to win your fauor will grant more than they be able to pay of their owne, and so run in other mens debts, so that by dreadfull gladnes, and fearefull boldnes, men shall not be masters of themselves, but as men dismayed, shal grant that, that their wiues and children shall sore reioy. The cardinall heard this saying verie patiently, and answered quietly: Sir, I marvel that you speake of Richard the thirde, which was an vsurper, and a murderer of his owne nephews: then of so euill a man, how can the acts be good, make no such allegations, his acts be not honorable? And it please your grace said the counsellor, although he did euill, yet in his time were many good acts made not by him only, but by the consent of the bodie of the whole realme, which is the parliament. Then Sir William Baily lord maior kneled downe, and besought his grace, that sith it was enacted by the common councell of London, that euery alderman should sit in his owne ward for a beneuolence to be granted, which he perceiued to be against the law, that the same act by the same common councell might be reuoked, and no otherwise. Well said the cardinall, I am content. But nowe will I enter into the kings commission: You maior, & you master aldermen, what will ye giue? My lord, saide the maior, I pray you pardon me, for if I should enter into anie grant, it might fortune to cost me my life: your life, said the cardinall, that is a maruellous word, for your good will towarde the king, will the citizens put you in leopards of your life, that were strange: for if they would that way, then must the king come with a strong power to them to oppresse, wherefore speake no more such words, and with that he studied a litle, and said: My lord maior, let you and your citizens, if you be grieved with any thing, in this demand, humbly and after a good fashion come to me, and I shall shall so intreat you, that you shall be content, and no displeasure arise, and so I pray you shew your neighbors: and so the maior for that date departed. The maior (saith Hall) did wisely not to assent to grant to any thing, for although he & the aldermen had assented, the common council would neuer haue assented. So on the next morrow it was declared to the common council, that their act that was made, that euerie alderman should sit for a beneuolence to bee granted, was against a statute law: whereupon the said act was annulled: and then was it declared, that euerie man should come to the cardinall, & to grant priuillie what he would, with the which saying the citizens were soye grieved: then the maior gently shewed them, how he durst warrant, that they shoulde be intreated gently, and exhorted them to go thither when they were sent for: which saying so offended them, that in their furie they would haue had Richard Gressham and John Hewster mercers, and Richard Gibson sergeant at armes and merchant tailor, banished out of the common council, and so without answer made what they would do, they departed home.

This demand though the realme was utterly denied, so that the commissioners could bying nothing to passe, and yet they assaied both by faire and foule meanes. For in Kent the lord Cobham was commissioner, and handled them roughly, and by reason one Ioh. Skudder answered him clubbishly, he sent him to the tower of London: for which doing the people muttered against the lord Cobham, and said expressly that they would paye no money, and then they began to account the loanes and subsidies granted, so that they reckoned the kings treasure innumerable: for they accounted that the king had taken of this realme twenty fiftiens sith the 14. yere of his raigne, and in this gradge they euill intreated sir Thomas Boleine at Maidstone.

Thomas Boleine at Maidstone in Kent.

In Essex the people would not assemble before the commissioners in no houses, but in open places. And in Huntingdon shire diuers resisted the commissioners, and would not suffer them to sit, which were apprehended and sent to the flæte. The duke of Suffolke sitting in commission about this subsidie or taske in Suffolke, perswaded by courteous meanes the rich clothiers to assent thereto: but when they came home, and went about to discharge and put from them their spinners, carders, fullers, weavers, and other artificers, which they kept in worke afore time, the people began to assemble in companies, whereof when the Duke was aduertised, he commanded the constables that euerie mans harnesse should bee taken from them: but when that was knowen, the rage of the people increased, railing openlie on the duke, and sir Robert Drurie, and threatened them to death, and the cardinall also: & here with there assembled together, after the maner of rebels, foure thousand men of Lanam, Sudberie, Hadley, and other towne there about, which put themselves in harnesse, and rang larams to increase their number. The Duke of Suffolke perceiving this, began to gather such power as hee could, but that was very slender: yet the bridges being broken, those rebels were letted of comming against the duke.

The duke of Suffolke treasurer of England raised a power in Suffolke, & came to the duke of Suffolke, he first sent to the people, to know their grieve.

They answered, that as they had some matters that grieved them, so had they will to spend their liues in the kings seruice as obedient subiects. Then the duke rode to them, and demanded what was the cause of their disquiet, and who was their captaine? Unto whom one John Greene a man of fiftie yeeres olde answered, that pouertie was both cause and captaine. For the rich clothiers spying of Lanam, and other had giuen ouer occupying, whereby they were put from their ordinarie worke, and liuing. The Duke with carterous words willed them to depart home, promising them, that he and the Duke of Suffolke would intreate the king for them, whereupon they became quiet, and returned, and in token of repentance, they came to Saint Edmundsbury in their shirts, and halters about their neckes desiring pardon: the two dukes toke a few of them to London, which after some imprisonment were pardoned and deliuered.

Great counsell called to Porke place by Westminster.

Then the king at Porke place, where the cardinall lay, called a great counsell, in the which he openlie protested, that his minde was neuer to aske any thing of the commons, which might sounde to the breach of his lawes, wherefore he willed to knowe by whose meanes the commissions were so straightly giuen forth, as to dem and the first part of euerie mans goods. The cardinall answered and said, that when it was moued in the counsell, how to leuie money to the kings vse, the kings counsell, and namely the Iudges said, that he might lawfully demand any summe by commission, and that by the consent of the whole counsell it was done, and toke God to witnes, that he neuer desired the hinderance of the commons, but like a true counsellor deuised how to enrich the king: and the spirituall men saie, that it standeth with Gods lawe, for Ioseph caused the K. of Egypt to take the fifth part of euerie mans goods: but because euerie man laith the burthen from him, I am content to take it on me, and to endure the fame and nosse of the people, for my god wil toward the king, and comfort of you my lords, and other the kings counsellors, but the eternall God knoweth all. Well said the king, some haue informed me, that my realme was neuer so rich, and that there should neuer trouble haue risen of that demand, and that men would pate at the first request, but now I finde all contrarie: then euerie man held his peace. Then the king said, I will no moze of this trouble, let letters be sent to all shires, that this matter made no moze be spoken of. I will pardon all that haue made deniall openlie or secretly: then all the lords kneeled downe, and hartlie thanked him. Then letters were sent, in the which were shewed, that the lords and the iudges, and other of the kings counsell, deuised that demand, and that the cardinall followed the minde of the whole counsell. And thus was the kings great journey into France staied for this time.

In this winter was a great death in the citie of London, so that the terme was adiourned, and the king kept his Christmas at Eltham with a small compante, wherefore it was called the still Christmas.

The cardinal about this time coming to the court at Eltham, took order for altering the Gate of the kings house, many officers and other servants were discharged, & put to pensions. In which number were 64. yeomen of the gerd, which before having 12. d. the day with cheke, were now allowed 6. d. the day, without cheke, and commanded to go home into the countries. He also made new officers in the house of the duke of Richmond, which was then newly begun. Also at that time he ordained a counsell, and established another household for the lady Mary, then being princeesse of the realme, so that all thing that was done, was done by him, for to him was the charge of all things committed. At this time the saide Cardinall gaue to the king the lease of the mannoz of Hampton court, which he had of the lease of the lord of S. Johns, and on which he had done great cost in building: In recompence whereof, the king licenced him to lie in his mannoz of Richmond at his pleasure, and so he lay there at certaine times.

On Shrouetuesday, there was holden solemne iusts at Grenewich, the king and 11. other on the one part: and the marques of Ercester with 11. other on the contrarie part. At these iusts by chance of shivering of a speare, sir Francis Brian lost one of his eyes.

The 11. of februarye, foure merchants of the Stilyard did pennance at Pauls crosse, and an Augustine frier called doctor Barnes bare a sagot: there was present the lord cardinall, with 11. bishops, Iohn Fisher bishop of Rochester made the sermon, which was against Martine Luther of Germanie, and his doctrine.

A truce was taken betwene England and France for a certaine space, and ambassadoys were sent into Denmarke, for restoring of the king: but the Danes would grant nothing thereunto, they did so deadly hate him for his crueltie.

The 28. of Aprill came to the court to Grenewich Mounfier Briond, president of Roane, and Iohn Iokin, which president before the king and his nobles made in the Lat in tong a solemne oration, the effect whereof was, how dreadfull the wars had bene betwene the realmes of England and France. He declared further of what power the king of England was, and what conquest he might haue made in France, the French king being prisoner, whereof he humbly thanked him of his pitie and compassion that he had on them in their necessitie, that he would consent to peace: To the which oration, sir Thomas

In the moneth of Maie, was proclamation made against all vnlawfull games, and commissions awarded into euerie shire, for the execution of the same, so that in all places, tables, dice, cardes, and boules were taken & burnt: but when young men were restrained of these games and pastimes, some fell to drinking, some to ferretting of other-mens contes, and scaling of Dares in parkes, and other vnthriftiness.

In this season the angell noble was the first part of an ounce Troye, so that five angels were iust an ounce, which was 40. s. sterling, and the angell was worth two ounces of siluer, so that five angels were worth 12. ounces, which was but 40. s. in siluer. By reason of the good weight, and low valuation of the English coine, merchants daily caried ouer great store, because the same was much inhaunsted there: so that to mate with this inconuenience (as it was said) proclamation was made in the moneth of September the first day, throughout England, that the angell should go for 7. shillings 4. pence, the ropall for 11. s. and the crowne for 4. s. 4. pence. And on the 5. of Nouember following againe by proclamation, the angell was enhansted to 7. s. 6. d. and so euerie ounce of of golde should be 45. s. and an ounce of siluer at 3. s. 9. d. in valew.

Ambassadors
into France.

King Henry sent Thomas Boleine Viscount Rochford, & sir Anthony Browne knight, ambassadors into France, which came to Paris to the bishop of Bathe that lay there for the king as legat, and then these thre went to the court, and saw the French king take the oth to keepe the league and amitie, concluded betwene him and the king of England.

Ambassadors to
the emperor.

Also king Henry sent sir Francis Points knight ambassador to Charles the emperor, and with him Clarentiux king at armes, to demand the one halfe of the treasure and ordinance which was taken at Paue, for so much as the war was made as well at the kings charge as at the Emperors. Also they were commanded to demand one of the French kings sons, which laie in hostage with the emperor, that is to wit, the Duke of Orleans to be deliuered to the king of England: and further that he should call backe his army out of Italie, and if so were that he refused these requests, then should they in the kings name denounce open war against him.

In this meane time Rome was taken by the emperials, & the pope brought into into captiuitie, as ye shall heare: Charles duke of Barbon, and the emperors army, which all the last winter liued in great pouertie, without clothes, victuals, or wages, so that they were in maner desperate, went towarde Parma and Bonony, belonging to the sea of Rome. The pope hearing this, sent messengers to the duke to redeme his townes, so that they should not be peyled. The duke asked 350000. duckats, for sauing of the popes lawre, and if they might haue so much money, they would depart to Naples: but when they saw they could not haue their demand, they turned toward Florence, whereof hearing the Romans they were glad, for they thought that the Florentines would hold good war with them, and then the Romans would glue the looking on: but the chance turned, as ye shall heare.

E. Hall.
The citie of Rome taken and sacked.

The duke of Barbon had thought to haue gone to Florence for this cause: there was a gentleman in Florence, called Peter de Saluato, which had a brother that serued the Emperors in his warres, which promised to deliuer the citie, for hee determined to cause the commons to rebell in the citie against the heads, and in the meane season the dukes companie should scale the walles: when this Peter knewe that the Emperors army was come to a place called le Chafe, within twelue miles of the citie, to bring his purpose to conclusion, he with such as he had trained to him, cried in the city, Libertate de populo, that is to say, libertie of the people: with which voice the people stirred, and came to the palace in great number, and there they toke the sixe lords of the counsell, which had the rule of the wealth of the citie, & slue one of them. The familie of Medices, which were the popes kindred, were at this time sore afraide. Thus this Peter de Saluato with the commons, gate that palace, and rane the common bell. In this season was in Florence a captaine of the French kings called Frederico de Bedfo, he had with him 300. men, and when he sawe this rebellion, he came to the commons and said: Sirs, if you continue in this case, your faire citie is like to be subuerted. for your enemies bee at hand: which notwithstanding that you beare some fauour to the emperors, as appeareth, yet their needinesse and pouertie is such, that without mercie they will rob, murder and slaie you, your wiues and children, and set fire on your beautiful city. This Captaine much staied the citizens, notwithstanding that 20. or more persons were slaine in the ruffle: yet they were well auoiced, and suddenlie entred into the city the duke of Urbine, which lay but 6. mile from Florence, and 18. mile from the emperors army, whom he had coasted: but he thought no aduantage to meddle. This Duke brought with him 5000. footemen, and 600. horsemen, and when he was entred the citie, a crie was made that all things were pardoned, so that euerie man departed home, and deliuered his weapon, and thus the city was appeased the 28. of Aprill. All this doing within was unknowen to the emperors army, and so for lacke of knowledge this enterprise was lost: which was happie for the Florentines. Soze displeased were the emperors captains when they knew of this chance, and how the duke of Urbine was entred into the city of Florence. And so shortly they departed, and came to the citie of Seines thirtie mile off, and there they lost their great ordinance, and toke counsell to go to Rome, notwithstanding the trace concluded betwixt the pope, and the vice Roy of Naples and Hugo de Moncada, and so much they travelled by night & day, that the 6. of May, with banners displayed they came before the Citie of Rome. The Romanes make Bulwarks, rampiers, and other defences, and laid ordinance on the wals, and shot at them fiercelie. The duke of Bourbon waping that it were not best to lie still and be slaine, considering that they were all naked people, and without great ordinance: determined to take the chaunce, and to give the assaulte, and so manfullie they approached the wals, betweene the Burgo novo and old Rome, but the Romans valiantlie defended them, with hand guns, pikes, stones, and other weapons, so that the enemies were faine to retire. The Romanes were glad, set many fair banners on their towers and bulwarks, which seeing the duke of Bourbon cried to a newe assault: then euerie man with a ladder mounted, and at the first encounter the Romans again put them a little back: which perceyuing the Duke, he cried, God and the empero: then euerie man set on manfullie, there was a sore fight, manie a man felled, but at the last the imperials gotte the wals: and betweene euerie assault fell a mist, so that they within could not see what part they without would assaile, which was profitable to the imperials. At the third assault were slaine three hundred Swichers of the Popes garde. In this last assault was the Duke of Bourbon stricken in the thigh with a Hand-gunne, of the which he shortly died, in a chappell of S. Syth, whither his Souldiours hadde brought him. And this chaunce notwithstanding, the army entred into Rome, and toke the popes palace. The same date that these three assaults were made, pope Clement passed little on the Emperors army, for he had accursed them on the Saturday before, and in his curse he called the Almaines Lutherans, and the Spaniards Durins or Heres. And when he was hearing of masse, so dauntlie the Almaines entered the church, and ouer his gard, and diuers other. He seeing that fled by a priuite way to the castle Angel: and al they that followed him that way and could not enter, were slaine. The cardinals and other prelates fled to the castle S. Angell ouer the bidge, where manie of the common people were ouerpressed, and drowned as they gaue waie to the cardinals, and other states that passed towarde the castle for succour. The cardinal of Senes, of Sefarine, of Toubertine, of Jacobace, and of the Ale, tarried so long, that they could not gette to the Castell for multitude of people: wherefore they were compelled to take another house, called the Palace of Saint George, where they kept themselves for a while, as secretlie as they might. You must vnderstand, that through the citie of Rome runneth a famous Riuer called Tiber, and on the other side of the riuer standeth the castle of S. Angell, or the Borough of S. Angell: and the other side is called Burgo novo. This bidge is called the bidge of Sirt, which lieth directly before the castle. At the end of this Bidge was a woonderous strong Bulwarke, well ordinance, and well manned. The imperials saw they coulde do nothing to the Pope, nor to the port of the citie but by the bidge, determined to assaile the Bulwarke: and so as men without feare came to the Bidge: and the Romanes so well defended them, that they slew almost foure thousand men. That seeing the Prince of Orange, and the Marques of Chasso, with all all spēde gaue assaulte, and notwithstanding that the Romanes shotte greates Ordnance, Hand-guns, Musrels, and all that might be shot, yet the emperors neuer thynke, but manly entred the bulwarke, and sue, and threw down out at the loupes at the Romans that they found, and after rased the bulwarke to the ground. The Pope in the castle Angell behelde this sight, and with him were thre and twentie Cardinals, of which one called the Cardinall Sancto- rum quatuor was layne, and with him were a thousand prelates and priestes, five hundred gentlemen, five hundred souldiers: wherefore immediatly the Captaines determined to laie siege to the castle S. Angell, least they within might issue out and turne them to damage; wherefore sodainely a siege was planted rounde about the castle: In the meane season, the souldiers fell to spoyle, neuer was Rome so pilled, neither of the Gothes nor Vandals, for the souldiers were not content with the spoile of the Citizens, but they robbed the Churches, brake vp the houses of close religious persons, and ouerthrewe the Cloisters, they spoiled virgins and rauished wiues: men were tormented if they had not to giue every new asker or demander: some were strangled, some were tormented by the priuy members, to cause them to confesse their treasure. This woodnes continued a great while, and some man might thinke, that when they had gotten so much, then they woulde cease and bee quiet, but that was not so, for they plaied continuallie at dice, some 500. some 10000. ducats at a cast: and hee that came to plaie laden with plate, went alwaie againe almost naked, and then fell to rising againe: Spanie of the Citizens which could not patientlie suffer that veration, drowned themselves in Tiber. The souldiers that laie at the siege daylie made iestes of the pope, sometime they had one riding like the pope, with a croce behind him, sometime he blessed, and sometime he cursed, and sometime they woulde with one voyce call him Antichrist. They went about to vndermine the castle, and to haue throwne it downe on his head, but the water that environeth the castle disappointed their purpose. In this season the Duke of Urbine with fifteene thousand men came to aide the Pope: but hearing that Rome was taken, he taried 60. mile from Rome til he heard other word. The Marques of Saluce, and Sir Fredericke de Bede with 15000. footmen, & 1000. horsemen, were at Vitarbe the 10. of May, where they hearing y the city of Rome was taken, also taried: y cardinal of Colume came with an army of Neopolitanes to helpe the emperors men: but when he sawe the crueltie of the souldiers, he did little to helpe them, but hated them much. The Byshopp of Rome was thus besieged till the eight of Iulie, at which date hee yielded himselfe, for necessitie and penurie of all thinges in the castle. And then he was restored to giue graces and grant buls, as he did before: but he taried still in the castle Saint Angell, and had a great number of Almains and Spaniards to keepe him: but the Spaniards bare most rule in the castle, for no man entred nor came out of the Castle, but by them. When the moneth of Iulie was come, coyne beganne to faile in Rome, and the pestilence began to waie strong, wherefore the greates armie remoued to a place called Marupa 40. mile from Rome, leaving behinde them such as kept the Pope. When they were departed, the Spaniards neuer were contented, till they they had gotten the Almains out of the castle of S. Angell, and so they had the whole custodie of the Pope. Thus Rome continued in peace till the month of September, that the armie came againe from Narula: for then the Almains sware, that they would set the Citie and all on fire, except the Pope would paie them their wages. The Pope sent to commune with them, two archbishops, two bishops, and two gentlemen, these six persons the Almains took as pledges, contrarie to the Popes meaning, and said they would keepe them there, till they were paid, and so put them in a strong Chamber, in the Palace of S. George: and euerie daie almost they would bring them forth openly, and scould with them, and threat to hang them if they were not paid, and so they kept them imprisoned in a Chamber, and watched them daie and night without the Chamber: and yet for all that, they gatte out at a chimney on S. Andrews euene, and were no more seene of them. The Almains were so wrode with this chaunce, that they came to the Prince of Orange their generall captaine, and demanded monie of him, in such rigorous maner, that he was faine secretly to flic to Skenes: and then for him they chose Captaine, the Marques of Gnasco, which gouerned them till Februarye, that hee brought them to Naples.

Pope Clement
deliuered.

In the meane space, by meanes of great armies prepared by the kinges of England, of France, and other, for the popes deliuerance, the Emperour sent letters to the pope, and excused himself, that he neither willed nor commanded such mischief to be don, and streightly commanded his Captaines to deliuer him. The prince of Orange and other captaines of the emperour, hearing his commandement, toke agrément with the pope and his cardinals, and so hee and twelue cardinals were bound to performe certain articles to the number of eleuen, and then he was deliuered out of the castle S. Angell, the 10. of December, and was conueied to Crupot, where after he had paid certain monie for the souldiers wages, he was put at full libertie, and the Emperours people departed from him, and from thence he removed to Ancona: the Emperours Captaines (fearing the French armie prepared) caused all the Souldiers to departe out of Rome in the beginning of Februarye, and so came into the realme of Naples, and fortified certaine towncs as they passed, and so came to a Towne called Troy, and there staid. This removing was to them profitable, for if they had taried at Rome, they had bene set on by the Italians on the one side, and the Frenchmen on the other side, that by euerie mans iudgment they shoulde all haue beene slayne or taken. Thus much for the sacking of Rome.

Ireland accused.

Also about this time, diuers complaints beeing made of Gerald Fitz Gerald earle of Elydare, late deputie of Irelande, that hee wilfullie winked at the Earle of Desmond, whom he should haue attached by the kings letters, that hee curried acquaintance, and affinitie with mere Irish Enemies, that he hanged, & hee tooke rashlie good subiectes, whom he misstrusted to leane to the Butlers friendship, wherefore Elydare was commanded to appeere, which hee did, leauing in his roome Fitz Gerald of Lelix, whom they shortly deppeyed, and choose the Baron of Delun, whom Oconner took prisoner,

and

and there the erle of Shro, to shew his habilitie of seruise brought to Diuelin an armie of Irishmen, hauing Captaines ouer them, Oconner, Omer, and O-carroll, and at S. Marie abbey was chosen deputie by the kinges counsell. In which office being himselfe (saue onelie in feates of armes) a simple Gentleman, he bare out his honor, and the charge of gouernment verie wisely, tho-rowe the singular wisdom of his Countesse, a Ladie of such port, that all Estates of the Realme crouched vnto her, so politike that nothing was thought substantiallie debated without her aduise, manlike and tall of stature, verie rich and bountifull, a bitter enimie, the onelie meane at those daies, whereby her husbands countrie was reclaimed from the stuttish and vncleane Irish custome, to English habite, bedding, house-keeping, and ciuilitie: but to these vertues was poked such a selfe-liking, and Maieestic about the tenure of a subiect, that for assurance therof she sticke not to abuse her husbands honor, against her brothers folle: notwithstanding I learne not that she practised his vndowing, which ensued, and was to her vndoubtedlie great heauines, as vpon whom both the blemish thereof, and the sustenance of that whole family depended after, but that she by indirect means coggeled hir brother out of credite to aduance her husband, the common voice and the thing it selfe speaketh. At this while abode the earle of Aylbare at the court, and with much adu found shift to be called before the lords to answer solemnly, they sate vpon him bluerly assented, and in especiall the cardinall L. Chancellor, disliked his cause, comforted his accusers, and enforced the articles objected, and what else sooner coulde be gathered thereof in these words.

I wotte well (my Lorde) that I am not the meekest man at this boorde to charge you with these treasons, because it hath pleased some of yor peltue fellows to report that I am a professed enimie to all nobilitie, and namely to the Geraldines: but seeing euerie coure boie can saie as much when hee is controlled, and seeing these points are so weightie, that they should not be dissembled of vs, & so apparant that they cannot be denied of you, I must haue leaue (notwithstanding your stale slander) to be the mouth of these honorable at this present, & to trump your treasons in your way, howsoever you take me. First ye remember how the lewde earle your kinsman, who passeth not whome hee serue, might he change his master, sent his confederates with letters of ere-dence to Francis the French k. and hauing but colde comfort there, to Charles the Emperour, profering the helpe of Montere and Connagh towarde the conquest of Irelande, if eyther of them woulde helpe to winne it from our king: howe manie letters, what Precepts, what messages, what thecates haue borne sent you to appzehende him, and yet not doone? Why so? forsooth I coulde not catch him: Maie, nate earle, forsooth, you woulde not watch him. If he be iustlie suspect, why are ye partiall in so great a charge? if not, why are you fearefull to haue him tried? ye sir it will be shorne and deposed to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you haue winked, wilfully thynned his sight, altered your course, warned his friends, stopped both eares and eyes against his detectors, and whensoever you took vpon you to hunt him out, then was he sure aforehand to be out of your walk: surely this iugling and false play little became either an honest man called to such honour, or a noble man put in such trust: had you lost but a cow or a carran of your owne, 200. kerneghes would haue come at your whistle to rescue the prais from the furthestmost edge of Ulster; all the Irish in Ireland must haue giuen you the wale: but in pursuing so needfull a matter as this was, mercifull God how nice, how dangerous, how waywarde haue you bene? One while he is from home, another time he keepeth home, sometimes fled, sometimes in the borders, where you dare not venture. I wis my lord, there be shewd bags in the borders, for the earle of Lyldare, to feare the earle, naie the king of Lyldare, for when you are disposed you raigne more like then rule in the land: where you are malicious the truest subjects stand for Irish enemies, where you are pleased the Irish enemies stand for dutifull subjects: harts, and hands, liues and lands, are all at your curtesie, who sawneth not thereon, he cannot rest within your smell, and your smell is so rancke, that you tract them at your pleasure: whilst the cardinall was speaking, the earle chased and changed colour, and sundry profers made to answer euerie sentence as it came, at last he brake out, and interrupted him thus.

The earle interrupted the cardinall.

My lord Chancellor, I beseech you pardon me, I am short witted, and you I perceiue intend a long tale; if you proceede in this order, halfe my purgation will be lost for lacke of carriage, I haue no Schoole trickes, nor Art of memorie, except you heare me while I remember your words, your second pceesse will hammer out the former.

The lordes associate, who for the most part tenderly loued him, and knew the Cardinals manner of taunts so lothsome, as wherewith they were tried manie yeeres ago, humbly besought his grace to charge him directly with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter, till it were examined thorowlie: that granted.

Lyldares reply to the cardinall.

It is good reason, quoth the earle, that your grace beare the mouth of this chamber, but my lord those mouths that put this tale into your mouth are be rie wide mouths, such as indeed haue gaped long for my wracke, and now at length for want of better stufte, are faine to fill their monthes with smoake: what my cosen Desmond hath compassed as I know not, so I beseech his naked hart, for holding out so long, if he can be taken by my engins that presently lie waite for him, then haue mine aduersaries betrayed their malice, and it is heape of belinous words that resemble a man of straw, that seemeth at a blissh to carrie some proposition, but when it is felt and poyssed, discouereth a vanitie, seruing onely to fraie crows. And I verily trust your honours will see the pfose, by the thing it selfe, within these foure daies: but go to, suppose he neuer be had, what is Kildare to blame for it more than my god brother of Deserie, who notwithstanding his high promises, hauing also the kings power, is not content to take egges for his money, and to bring him in at leisure? Can not the earle of Desmond shuff, but I must be of counsell? can not he be hid except I winke? if he be close, am I his mate? if he be strinded, am I a traitor? This is a doughtie kinde of accusation, which they bzge against me, wherem they are stabled and mired, at my first deniall: you would not see him, say they who made them so familiar with mine eye sight? or when was the earle in mine equines, or who stood by when I let him slippe, or where are the tokens of my willfull hoodwinke? But you sent him word to beware of you: who was the messenger, where are the letters? Convince my negatiue: see howe losely this idle reason hangeth, Desmond is not taken: well you are in fault, why? because you are: who proues it: no body? what coniectures: so it seemeth: to whom? to your enemies: who told it them: they will sweare it: what other ground? none: wil they sweare it my lords: why, then of like, if they know it, either they haue my hand to theis, or can bring forth the messenger, or were present at a conference, or proue to Desmonde, or some bodie betraied it to them, or the mesclues were my carriers, or vicegerents therein, which of these parts will they chuse, for I know them too well, to reckon my selfe conuict by their bare words, or headelesse hearfates, or frantike othes: my letter were sent read, were anie such writing extant, my seruants and friends are ready to be siffed, of my cosen of Desmond they maie lie lewdlie, since no man here can well contrarie them: touching my selfe, I neuer noted in them either so much wit, or so fast faith, that I would haue gaged vpon their silence, y life of a good hound, much lesse mine owne selfe. I doubt not, may it like your honors to appose them how they came to knowledge of these matters, which they are so ready to depose, but you shall find their twings cheined to another mans trencher, and as it were knights of the post suborned to saie, sweare, and spare the bittermost they can, as those that passe not what they saie, nor with what face they say it, so they say no truth: but of another thing it grieueth me, that your good grace, whome I take to be wise and sharpe, and who of your owne blessed disposition wissheth me well, should be so farre gone in crediting those corrupt informers, that abuse the ignorance of your state and countrey to my perill: little know you my Lord how necessarie it is, not onely for the gouernor, but also for euerie noble man in Ireland to hamper his vnciuill neighbors at discretion, wherein if they waited for procelle of law, and had not those liues and lands you speake of within their reach, they might hap to lose their owne liues and lands without lawe, you heare of a case, as it were in a dreame, and saie not the smart that bereth vs. In England there is not a miranc subiect that dare extend his hand to phillip a pce of the realme: In Ireland, except the M. haue cunning to his strength, and strength to saue his owne, and sufficient authority to rake thieues and barlets when they stir, he shall find them swarme so fast, that it will be too late to call for iustice: if you will haue our seruice take effect, you must not tie vs alwaies to these iudiciall proceedings, where with your realme thanked be God, is enured. As touching my kingdome my lord, I would you & I had exchanged kingdoms but for one moneth, I would trust to gather by more crums in that space, then twice the reuenues of my poore earledome: but you are well and warime, and so hold you, and vpbraide not me with such an obious farme: I sleepe on a cabben, when you lie softe in your bed of downe: I serue vnder the coape of heauen, when you are seru'd vnder a canopie: I drinke water out of my scull, when ye drinke wine out of golden cuppes: my courser is trained to the field, when your genet is taught to amble: when you are be-graced and be-loved, and crouched and knéled unto, then find I small grace with our Irish boydeters, except I cut them off by the knees.

The cardinall perceived that Ryldare was no babe, and rose in a fume from the councell table, committed the earle, deferred the matter, till more direct probations came out of Ireland.

After many meetings, and objections twittlie refelled, they pressed him soze with a traiterous errand sent by his daughter lady of Clane to al his byethren, to Oneale, Oconner, and their adherents, wherein he exhorted them to warre upon the earle of Desry then deputy, which they accomplished, making a wicked conspracte against the English of Irelande, and made a bloudie skirmish. Of this treason he was found guiltie, and repyled in the Tower a long time, the gentleman betooke himselfe to God, and the king, was heartilie loved of the Lieutenant, pittied in all the Court, and standing in so hard a case, altered little of his accustomed betwe, comforted other noble men Prisoners with him, dissembling his owne sorow. One night when the lieutenant, and he for his disport were playing at Honell groat, sodainelie commeth from the cardinall, a Mandatum to execute Ryldare on the morrowe. The earle marking the Lieutenantes deepe sigh in reading the bill, by S. Wilshe lieutenant quoth he, there is some mad game in that scrole: but fall out how it will, this throw is for a huddle: when the worst was told him, now I pray the (quoth he) doe no more but learne assuredlie, from the kinges owne mouth, whether his grace be witting there to or not: soze doubted the Lieutenant, to displease the cardinall, yet of very pure deuotion to his friend, he posseth to the king at midnight, and said his errand, for at all houres of day or night the lieutenant hath accesse to the pzince upon occasions. King Henry controlling the lawcines of the priest (for those were his termes) toke him his signet in token of countermaund, which when the cardinall had seene, he beganne to breathe out vnscalded words, which the lieutenant was loth to heare, and so hee left him fretting. And within few yeres after, Sir William Sceuington was sent our deputy, who brought with him the earle pardoned and rid from all his troubles. There arose about this time a bruite in London, that diuers great clerks had tolde the king that the marriage betwene him and the Ladie Katherine, sometime wife to his brother pzince Arthur, was not lawfull: whercupon the king should sue a denoize, and marrie the dutchesse of Alanson, sister to the French king, the towne of Calais this Sommer, and the repon Wicount Rochefort: he had brought with him the picture of the same Ladie: but the king being offended with the tales, sent for Syr Thomas Seymere Maor of London secretlie, and charged him to see that the people ceased from such talke. But whatsoeuer the commons talked, true it was, that the king hadde minde to depart from Quene Katherine his wife, aunt to the Emperour, and daughter to the king of Spaine, for that shee was before espoused to his brother, pzince Arthur late deceased, and that the Pope coulde not dispence with one woman to marrie with two brothers: but the king was letted by the Emperour and his Ministers, so that hee coulde not well bring the matter about without assistance of

of the French king. Upon which respect, he granted more than the French k. desired: that is, the 400000. crownes, which was one of the principall sums of the millions, which should be paid presently, he lent the same to the French k. to repay in 5. yeres: and the 600000. crownes forfeit by the emperor, he gaue to the French king: and the flower de luce, valued at 50000. crownes he gaue to his god son Henry D. of Orleans. And further with the said Mounſier de Langie, there was sent Sir Frauncis Brian then one of the Gentlemen of the kinges priue Chamber, as well with the obligations and acquittances, as also the said flower de luce, to be deliuered by the French k. when time should serue. And for the sayde Mounſier de Langie, was a Gentleman greatlie favored, as well in the Vniuersities of Italie and Germanie, as in the vniuersities of France, and Wother to the Cardinall Bellay then Bishop of Paris, hee was at that time trauelled withall to procure the opinions and iudgements of the Doctors and chiefe learned men, subscribed with their handes, and confirmed with their Seales of the chiefe vniuersities; as of Paris, Orleans, and other of France, and of Padua, Vienna, and Bolonia in Italy, declaring by the same, that the pope could not dispence with the said marriage, as being by gods law prohibited, which afterwarde was procured by the sayde Mounſier de Langy, travelling in person to euerie the said vniuersities with the king of Englands commission, who had the French kinges letters of singular commendations to the bittermost aid therein: what soeuer the commons talked, it was concluded by the k. and his counsell, that the cardinall should passe into France as his high ambassadoz, but for what cause, no person knew but the k. till his return. Gwichardine saith hee brought with him treasure amounting to 300000. crowns, both to furnish his expences, & to impart with the French k. by way of lone if need were. The cause of this voyage was saith G.C. this, certain great estates, and lords of the counſel bearing little good will to the cardinall, lying in waite to espy a conuenient time, and occasion to take the cardinall in a brake, thought it now were a necessary time to cause him to take vpon him the kinges commission to trauel beyond the sea in this matter, and by his wit to compasse a perfect peace among these great princes and potentates: and encouraging him thereto, alledged that it was more mete for his high wit, discretion, and authoritie, to bring so weightie a matter to passe, then any other within this realme. Their intent was none other, but if they might get him from the king out of the realme, then mought they sufficiently adventure to depaure him vnto the k. highnes, and so in his absence to bring him in displeasure with the king, or at the least to be of lesse estimation: Well that wil you more? this matter was so handled, & the cardinall was commanded to prepare himselfe to this iourney, which hee toke vpon him, but whether it were with his good will or no, I am not able wel to tel you: but that I know he made a short abode after the perfect resolution therof, but caused all thinges to be prepared onward towarde his iourneie: and euerie one of his seruantes were appoynted that should attende vpon him in the same. When all thinges were concluded, and for this noble ambassage provided and furnished, then was there no more to do, but auance forwards in the name of God.

App L. had with him such of the lords and bishops, and other two: thy persons, as were not of the counsell or conspiracy: to wit, the earle of Darby, the bishop of London L. p. in seal: sir Henry Giltford knight of the garter, controller of the kings house, the L. Sands knight of the garter: L. chamberlain of the h. house: doctor Tailor, App. of the rolls: sir T. Moore knight, chancelor of the dutchy of Lancaster: the bishop of Diuelin, the L. Mounteagle, the L. Harrenden, sir Ioh. Dudley knight, App. Ratclife, App. Willoughby, App. Parker, App. Sturton: vicounts and barons, sons and heires, sir Fra. Brian, sir Ed. Seimer, sir Rob. Gernigam, Doctor Stephen Gardener secretary, doctor Peter Vannes secretary: of the p. in chamber, master Hennege, master Arundell, master Kneuer, master Alford: Physicians, doctor Francis, doctor Smith: gentlemen vthers of the p. in chamber, App. Walgraue, App. Elles, sir Tho. Denis high chamberlaine, App. Sentclere Chicheamberlaine: gentlemen vthers, master Wentwoorth, master Hanford, master Pemercy, mast. Constable, App. Warren: of household, App. Cade steward, sir William Gascoigne treasurer, App. Goslike controller, master Broughton, master of the horse: doctor Allen, doctor Benet, doctor Duke beane of the Chappell, doctor Capon Almoner, the archdeacon of Canterbury, the archdeacon of Carlisle: s. y. Iohn Sent-Iohn, s. y. Richard Sandes knights, &c. in all to the number of 900. horses. Then marched he forward from his own house at Westminster, through London ouer London Bridge, hauing before him of Gentlemen a great number, three in a ranke in velvet coates, and the most of them greates chaines of Golde about their neckes, and all his Women followed him with Robemens, and Gentlemens seruants, all in Orange tawney coates, with the Cardinals Hatte, and a T. C. for Thomas Cardinall, embroidered vpon all the coates, as well of his owne seruants, as of all the rest of the gentlemens seruants: and his sumpter mules which were 20. or more, with all his cartage of carts, and other of his traine, were passed before. He rode like a cardinall very sumptuously on his mule, with his spare mule and spare horse trapped in crimson velvet vpon velvet, and stirrups gilt following him: and before him hee had his two great Crosses of silver, his two great Pillars of silver, the kings broad scale of England, and his cardinals hat, and a gentleman carrying his balence, otherwise called his cloakebag, which was made of fyne scarlet, altogether embroidered very richly with gold, hauing in it a cloak. Thus passed hee forth through London, and all the while euerie daie in his iourney hee was thus furnished, hauing his Harbengers in euery place before, which prepared lodging for his traine.

The first iourney that he made, was 2. miles beyond Wertsford in Kent, vnto sir T. Wilshires house, and the rest of his traine were lodged in Wertsforde, and in the country thereabouts. The next daie he marched to Rochester, where he was lodged in the Bishops palace, and the rest of his Traine in the Citie and in Strokode. The third daie he rode to Feuerham, and there was lodged in the Abbey, and his traine in the towne there, and some in the country thereabouts. The fourth daie hee rode to Canterburie, where hee encountered with the worshipfull of the towne and countrie, and lodged in the Bishopp of Chiche Church, and all his Traine in the Citie, where hee continued three dayes, in which season there was a great faire in the towne, by reason it was the feast of Thomas of Canterburie. At which date there was a solemne procession, wherein the cardinall then went apparelled in his legantine ornaments, with his hat on his head, who commanded the monks and the quere to sing the Letanie after this sort, Santa Maria, ora pro Papa nostro Clemente, the Cardinall kneeling at a stole before the quere dore all the while the monks and their quere stood in the body of the church singing the Letany: at which time the cardinall was seene to wepe bitterly, for heavines to see the pope in such calamitie and danger of the Lance-knights.

The 11. of Iulie the Cardinall arrived at Calais, who was received with all the officers and counsell of the Towne, the Mayor of the Towne, and the Mayor of the Staple in procession, and in the Lanterne Gate, he knéled and made his prayers: that done, they passed on before untill he came to S. Maries Church, from whence he repayed with a great number of Noblemen and gentlemen, being peeres of the towne, unto a place called the Checker, where he was lodged, and kept his house as long as he abode in the towne. When all his traine and carriage was landed, and euerie thing prepared for his journey, he called all his noblemen and gentlemen, being seruants unto him, into his private chamber, where they being all assembled before him he saide: I haue called you hither to the intent to declare unto you, that I consider the duety you beare me, and the good will that I seemblably beare to you, seeing your intendment to further the authoritie that I haue by commission, which your diligent seruice I will remember hereafter, and therefore I meane to declare the same directly to the king. Secondly, to shew you the nature of the French men. And thirdly, to instruct you howe and with what reuerence yee shall vse me for the honoz of the kings maiestie, and then to enforme you how yee shall entertaine and accompanie the French men when yee shall meete at any time.

The first point yee shall vnderstand, that the K. maiesty for certaine weightie affaires, of his graces hath for more advancement of his royall dignitie assigned me to be in this iourney his lieutenant, & that reuerence belongeth to the same I will tell you, for my part I must by vertue of my commission and lieutenantship assume and take vpon me to be esteemed in all honour and degrés of service, as to his highnesse presence is méte and due, and that by me nothing to be neglected, that to his royall estate is due and appertinent. And for my part yee shall see me, that I will not omit one toke thereof. Therefore because that yee shall not be ignorant of your duetie in this case, as one of the chiefe causes of this your assembly, willing you as you will haue my fauour, & also charge you in the kings name, that ye do not forget the same in time and place, but that every one of you doe obserue your duety vnto me accordingly, as ye will at your returne avoid the K. indignation, or obtaine & deserue his highnesse thanks, the which I will set forth, as each of you shall deserve. Now to the second point, the nature of the French men is such, that at the first meeting they will be as familiar with you as they had bene acquainted with you long before, & commune with you in their French tong, as though ye vnderstand euery word, therefore vse them in like maner, and be as familiar with them as they be with you. If they speake in their naturall tong, speake you again vnto them in the English tong: For, if you vnderstand not them, no more shall they vnderstand you: and speaking merilite to one of the gentlemen there, being a Welchman, said Rice (quoth he) speake you Welch to them: I doubt not but that thy speech shall bee more discourse to him, than his French shall be to thee.

And thus quoth he againe to them all, let all your entertainment and behauior be according to the order of all gentlenes and humilitie, that it may be reported after your departure from thence, that ye be gentlemen of right good behauior, and of much gentlenesse, and that ye are men, who knowe your duties to your Soueraigne Lozde, and to your Passer, esteeming much your great reuerence. Thus shall ye not onlie obtaine to your selues great commendation and praise for the same, but also aduance the honor of your prince and Countrie: Nowe go your waies, being admonished of all these pointes, and prepare your selues against to morrow, for then we intend (God willing) to set forward. The next morrow, being Mary Magdalens daie, all things being furnished, the Cardinall advanced out of Calais, with such a number of blacke velvet coates, as hath bene seldome scene with an ambassadoz, all the Speres of Calais and Guisnes, with all other Gentlemen besides his train, being garnished in blacke Velvet Coates and Chaines of gold. Thus passed hee forward with his Traine of Gentlemen before him three in a Rank, which by supposall endured three quarters of a mile or more in length, hauing his Crosses and all other his accustomed and glorious furniture carried before him, as I haue before rehearsed, except the Broade Seale, the which hee left in Calais with Docto: Taylour, then master of the Rolles, vntill his returne. Passing thus on his way, and being scantlie ridden a mile, it began to raine so vehemently, as lightly had not bene scene the like, which endured vntill they came to Boloigne, & ere they came to Sandingfield, the cardinall of Lozaine a goodlie yong gentleman, encountred the cardinall of Englande, and receiued him with great ioie and reuerence, and so passed forth with the Cardinall in communication vntill they came nigh vnto the saide Sandingfield, which was a place of Religion, standing betweene the English, French, and the emperors dominions, being a Newster, holding of neither of them. There awaited for him Le Countie Brian Captaine of Picardie, with a great number of Stradiates or Albenois, standing in arrais in a great peece of greene oates, all in harness vpon high horses, passing on with the cardinall in a wing vnto Boloigne, and so after through Picardie: for the Cardinall doubted somewhat the Emperoz, that he shoulde late some ambush to betraye him, for which cause the French king commanded them to attende vpon him for the assurance of his person. Thus rode he vntill he came within one English mile of Boloigne, where encountred him the worshipfull citizens of the Citie of Boloigne, hauing a learned man that made vnto him an oration in Latine, vnto the which the Cardinall semblable made answer: And that done, Monsieur de Bees Captaine of Boloigne with the retinue there of gentlemen, met with him on horsebacke, and then with all this assemblie he rode into the towne lighting at the abbey gate, and from thence conueied with procession into the abbey church there offered, then went hee into the Abbey to his lodging, and all his traine were lodged in the high and base townes. The next morning after, he rode to Mutterell Ser Lemere, where he was in like case encountered with the worshipfull of the towne all in one liuerie, hauing a learned man to make an Oration vnto him in latine, whom he answered also againe in latine. And as hee entred in at the gates, there was a canopie made readie of silke, embroidered with letters, and an hat euen as his men had on their Coates, and when that hee was lighted, his footemen hadde the same as a fess due to the office. Nowe was there made diuers Pageants for the soie of his comming, who was called in the French tong there, and in all other places through the realme where hee rode or came, Le cardinal pacifique. The next daie hee tooke his iourneie towarde Abuile, where hee was encountered with diuers gentlemen of the towne and countrie, and so receiued into the towne with pageantes, as hee rode thorow the towne, hauing a like canopie borne ouer him, but moze richer, and so brought to his lodging: in this towne he remained moze than eight daies, where resorted to him daile diuers of the French k. counsell, sitting with him in counsell euerie daie, and continuallie feasting him & other. When the time came of his departing out of the town, he rode to the castle beyond the water of Some, called le Chancel de picquy, adioining to the saide water vpon a Rocke, within which there was a Colledge of Priests, the situation whereof was much like to the castle of Windsore, and there hee was receiued with solemne procession, conueying him first into the Church, and after into the castle to his lodging. At this castle sometime vpon the bidge that goeth ouer this water of Some, k. Edw. the 4. met with the French king, as yee maye reade in our Chronicles: when my Lorde was settled in his lodging (saith mine autho:) I heard that the French k. shoulde come that daie into the towne of Amiens, which was not past six English miles from thence. And being desirous to see his coming thither, toke with me one or two of my k. gentlemen, and rode incontinentlie thither, as wel to furnish me of a conuenient lodging, as to see the k. And when we came thither, being but strangers, toke bp our inn at the signe of the angell, directlie against the West doze of the cathed:al church de nostra Dame. After we had dined there, and taried vntill 3. or 4. of the clock, erpeaing the k. comming, in came madam Regent the k. mother, riding in a very rich chariot, & with her therein was the D. of Barre her daughter, furnished with 100. or moze of ladies and gentlewomen following, euerie one riding vpon white palfreys: besides diuers and manie ladies, some in rich horseitters, and some in chariots, who lighted at the next doze with al this train of ladies and gentlewomen, besides her gard, which was not small in number.

Then within 2. houres after the king came in with a great shotte of guns, and diuers pageants made onelie for soie of his comming, hauing about his person and beside him, beside the wonderful number of noblemen and gentlemen, the great guards apparelled diuerlie: the first was of Switzers, and kings guard.

Burgonians with gunnes and pikes: the second was of French men, some with boies and arrowes, and some with billes: the third guard pour le corps was of tall Scottes, which were more comelier persons than all the rest. The French guard and the guard of the Scots had one lincerie, being apparellled with rich coates of white cloth guarded with a rich garde of silver bullions of an hundefull broad. The king came riding vpon a goodlie gennet, and alighted at the saide great Church, and so conueyed with procession into the Bishops palace, where he was lodged, and also his mother. The next morning I rode againe to Picardie, to attend vpon my Lorde, at which time of my resorte, my Lorde was readie to go to horsebacke toward Amiens, and passing on his waite, he was incountred with diuers noble personages, making vnto him diuers orations in latine, to whom he made answer extempore. Then was worde brought him, that the king was comming to encounter him, wherefore he had none other shift, but to light at an old chappell that stood hard by the hie waite, and there he new apparellled himselfe into rich apparell, and so mounted againe vpon a molle verie richlie trapped, with a fote cloth altogether of crimosin veluet vpon veluet, purled with gold, and fringed about with gold fringe verie costly: his stirrops of silver and gilt, the boies of the same, and the chokes of his mulcs bit were all gilt. And by that time that he was mounted againe, after this gorgeous sort, the king was come verie nere, within lesse than a quarter of an English mile, mustering vpon a hill, his guard standing in array vpon the top of the same hill, expecting my lordes comming, to whom my Lord made as much haste as he conueniently might, till he came within a paire of butts lengths, and there he staid. The king perceiving that, having two worthy yong gentlemen with him, the one called mounier Vadamont, and the other mounier de Guise, both brethren to the Cardinall of Lozaine, and to the D. of Lozaine: also being like apparellled, as the king was in purple veluet, lined with cloth of silver, their coates cut: The king caused mounier Vadamont to issue from him, and ride to my lord cardinall to know the cause of his tarrying: and this mounier being mounted vpon a faire great gennet, toke his race with his horse vntill he came euen to my Lord, and there caused his horse to come alofte twice or thrise, so nigh my Lordes molle, that he was in doubt of his horse, and with that he alighted, and doing humble reuerence, did his message to my Lorde, and that done he mounted againe, and made his horse to doe the like at his departing, as before he had done, and so repared againe vnto the king: and his answer ended to the king, the king auanced forwards. That seeing, my Lord did the like: and in the midway they met, embracing each other with amiable countenance and entertainment. Then dreyue into the place all noble men and gentlemen on both partes, with wonderfull chere made one to another, as though they had been of old acquaintance. The pcase was such and so thicke, that diuers had their legges hurt with horses. Then the kings officers cried, march, march, deuaunt ale deuaunt. Then the king and the Cardinall on his right hand rode forth towards Amiens, euerye English gentleman accompanied with another of France. The traine of these two princes endured two long long English miles, they were nobly receiued into the Towne of Amiens with shot of guns and collicke pageants, till the K. had brought the cardinall to his lodging, and then departed for that night, the king being lodged in the bishops palace. The next day after dinner the cardinall rode to the court to the king, at which time the king kept his bed: yet neuertheless, the Cardinall came into his bed chamber, where, on the one side of the bed sate the kings mother, and on the other side the Cardinall of Lozaine, accompanied with diuers other noble men of France, and after a short communication and drinking of a cuppe of wine with the kings mother, he departed to his owne lodging, accompanied with diuers gentlemen and noblemen, where they supped with him. Thus continued the Cardinall and the king in Amiens, the space of a fortnight and more, consulting and feasting eche other diuers times. In Amiens the king and my Lord heard masse, and both of them receiued the sacrament. And vpon our ladie date the assumption my Lord said masse before the Regent, and the Quene of Spauarre, and gaue them the sacrament. And there the king dyressed a number of sicke folkes. Then the K. and the Cardinall remoued to a city called Champain, which was more then 20. English miles from Amiens, they were both lodged in the great castle of the towne, where, of the Cardinall had the one halfe assigned him for his lodging, and the king the other halfe. And likewise they deuised a long Galerie betwene them, where was made in the midst a strong wall, with a window and a doore. The king and the Cardinall would manie times mate at the same window and talke: and diuers times they would goe into the other at the said doore. Then came there to my lord Cardinall the lord Chancelor of France, with all the kings counselliers, where they toke great paines daile in consultation, insomuch that the Cardinall of England fell out with the Chancelor of France, laying to his charge, that he went about to hinder the league which before his coming was concluded, insomuch, that Adam Regent her selfe and manie nobles of France, with much laboꝝ and travell could scarcely bring the cardinall to his former state of communication, he was in such a woꝝth against the Chancelor: by these meanes, he brought other things to passe, that before he coulde not attaine, which was more for feare than for anie affection to the matter, he had the heads of the counsel so vnder his girdle. The next morning after this conflict he rose earlie about foure of the clocke, and sate him downe to write letters, into England vnto the King, commanding one of his chaplaines to prepare him readie to saie masse, insomuch that the chaplaine stode in his vestures untill foure of the clocke in the afternone: all which season the Cardinall neuer rose to eate or drinke, nor to make water, but continually wrote letters with his owne hand, hauing all that time his nightcap and his kercheefe on his head, and about the houre of foure in the afternone hee made an end, commanding Christopher Gunner the kings seruant, without delaie to ride post into England with those letters, whom he dispatched a waie or euer he dranke, and then went to masse, and said his service with his chaplaine, and then went and walked in a garden the space of an houre and more, and said his euen song, and after went both to dinner and supper all at once, and after supper, making but tarrying, leant an houre, but that he went to bed and tooke his rest.

The next night after the cardinal made a great supper for madam Regent, for the Queene of Navarre and other great estates of Ladies and Noblewomen, and at the middest of the said banquet, the kings of France and of Navarre, came sodainely in vpon them vnlooked for, and tooke their place in the lowest part of the banquet. The supper and banquet being finished, the ladies and Gentlemen fell to dauncing, and so passed awaie the most of the night ere they departed. There was not only plenty of fine meats, but also much mirth & solace, aswel in mery communication, as with the noyse of my L. minstrels, who plaied there all that night so cunningly, that the king tooke therein great pleasure, insomuch that he desired my lord to lende them vnto him for the next night, and after supper their banquet finished, the ladies and gentlemen fell to dauncing, among whom one madam Fountaine a maike had the pryncesse. And thus passed they the most part of the night ere they departed. The next day the king tooke my lordes minstrels, and rode to a noblemans house where was some pilgrimage to whom he vowed a pilgrimage, to performe his deuotion. When he came there which was in the night, he daunced, and caused other to do the same, after the sound of my lordes minstrels, who plaied there all night, and neuer rested, so that whether it were with extreme labour of blowing, or with poison (as some iudged) because they were commended by the king more than his owne, I cannot tell, but the player on the Schalme (who was verie excellent in that instrument) died within a daie or two after. Then the king returned into Champaigne, and caused a wild Boze to bee lodged for him in the forrest of Champaigne, and thither the Cardinall rode with him to see him hunt, where the Ladie Regent with a number of Ladies and Damosels were standing in Chariots, looking on the toyle on the out side, which was pitched there for that purpose: among whome stood the Cardinall to regarde the hunting in Madame Regentes Chariot, and within the toyle was the king with diuers minton Gentlemen of France, readie furnished to this high and dangerous enterpryse of the hunting of the perillous wilde swine, the king being in his dublet and hozen all of shayes colour cloth, hauing in his slip a brace of great white Greyhounds, who were armed as the maner there is: and the rest of the kings Gentlemen being appointed to hunt this Boze, were likewise in their dublets and hose, holding each of them in their hands verie sharp boze speares. When the king commanded the keepers to vncouch the Boze, and that euery person being within the toyle should go to a standing, among whome were diuers gentlemen and yeomen of England, and incontinent the boze issued out of his den, and followed with an hound, came into a plaine, where being scaled a while, and gazing vpon the people, and incontinent pierced by the hound, he lept a little bush standing behinde a banke, ouer a ditch (vnder the which lay two French gentlemen) and thither fled, trusting there to haue defended himself, who thrust his head snuffing into the same bush, which caused the two gentlemen to fly from thence, as from the danger of death. Then was the boze by pursuit of hunters and the hound, dyuen from thence, who ran straight to one of the Cardinall's footemen, a berie tall yeoman, who hadde in his handes a zaueline, with the which hee was fayne to defende himfelfe from the Boze a great while, the Boze continuallie foyning at him with his Lufkes, so that he was fayne at last to pitch his Zaueline in the grounde betweene him and the Boze: the which the Boze brake with the force of his foyning, and with that the yeoman dzeue his sword, and stood at defence, and therewith the hunters came to the rescue, and put him once agayne to flight: with that hee fledde to another young Gentleman of Englande, called Master Henry Ratcliffe, who was sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz Walter, since Earle of Suffe, who had borrowed by chaunce of a French Gentleman, a berie fyne and sharpe Boze speare, therewith hee thrust the Boze in the month, and so into the throte, whereupon the pastime was ended. In the time of the Cardinall's abode in France, manie displeasures were doone against him, for all the payne and trauell he had taken for the qualifying of the French L. random: and amongst other this was one: there was no place where hee lodged after hee entred the territoire of France, but that hee was robbed in his priuite chamber either little or much, insomuch that at Champaine hee lost his Standish, which was all of Silver and gilte, and there it was espied, and the partie taken, which was a boie of twelue or fourtene yeres old, a russians page of Paris, which hanted my Lordes lodging without inspition, vntill hee was taken lying vnder my Lordes priuite Staires, vpon which occasion he was apprehended, examined, and confessed all things that hee had stolen, the russian his master had receyued, maintained, and procured him so to doe. The Cardinall reuealed this to the counsell, by meanes whereof the russian was apprehended, and set on the Pillorie in the midst of the Market place, which was but a small punishment for such an offence. Another displeasure was this: some lewde person hadde ingraued in my Lordes Window vpon the leaning stone there, a cardinall's hat, with a paire of gallowses ouer it, in derision of my Lord, with diuers other vnkinde dealinges, the which I omit to write, they be so slanderous matters. The Cardinall passing diuers dayes in consultation, and in other matters, expecting the returne of Christopher Gunner, at the last he returned with letters againe, vpon receipt whereof the Cardinall intended to remooue: being then at masse in his Closet, hee consecrated the Chauncelloz of Fraunce Cardinall, and put vpon him his habite, his hat and cap of Scarlet, and then toke his iourney, returning againe into England, making such necessary expedition, that hee came to Guilnes, where hee was noblely receiued by the lord Sandes then Captayne there, with all the retinue of the same. And from thence hee rode to Caleis, where hee tarried the shipping of his trusse, horses and train. And in the meane time, he established there a mart for all nations. These things and other, for the weale of the Towne and garison by him perfect, hee tooke shipping and arriued at Douer the twenty foure of September, from whence hee rode to the Court, the king beeing in his Progresse at Sy: Henrie Wyats house in Kent, hee went immediatlie to him, with whom hee had long talke, & continued two or thre daies there in the court, and then returned to his house at Westminster, where hee remained vntill Michaelmas Terme, which was

and after supper, making but tarrying, scant an houre, but that he went to bed and toke his rest.

The next night after the cardinal made a great supper for madam Regent, for the Queene of Navarre and other great estates of Ladies and Noblewomen, and at the middest of the said banquet, the kings of France and of Navarre, came sodainly in vpon them vnlooked for, and toke their place in the lowest part of the banquet. in lesse than a fortnight after, and exercised his roome of chancello:ship as hee was accustomed.

Scarcitie of bzead.

Such scarcitie of bzead was in London, & all England, that manie died for default thereof: the king of his goodnes sent to the citie of his owne prouision 600. quarters, or else for one week there had been little bzead. The bzead carts comming from Stratford towarde London were met at the Wile end by the citizens, so that the maior and Shrifis were forced to goe and rescue the same carts, and to see them brought to the markets appointed. Wheat was then at fifteen shillings the quarter: but shortly after the merchants of the Stilyard brought from Danske such store of Wheate and Rye, that the same was better cheape to bee solde in London, than in anie other parte of the Realme besides.

Cardinal Wolsey in the Star chamber decla-reth what an honorable peace
he had concluded.

After the beginning of the terme the cardinall caused to be assembled in the Star chamber, all the noblemen, Judges, and Justices of peace that were in Westminster hall at that time present: and there made to them a long orati- on, declaring the cause of his ambassage into France, and of his proceedinges there: among the which he said he had concluded such an amitie, as neuer was heard in the realme befoze, as wel between the emperoz and vs, as between the k. our soueraigne and the French k. with a perpetuall peace, the which should be confirmed in writing, sealed in fine gold: affirming farther, that the k. of England should receiue yearly his tribute by that name out of the dutchie of Ffomandy, with all the costs which he had sustained in the warres. And also, where there was a restraint made in France of the French Dukes dowrie (whome the duke of Suffolke had married) for diuers yeeres during the wars, it was concluded, that she should not only receiue it againe, but also the arre- rages that were vnpaid. This peace thus concluded, there should bee such an a- mitie betwene the gentlemen of each realme, and entercourse of merchants, that it should seme to all men both territories to be but one monarch: gentle- men male trauell from one Countrie to another, for their recreation and pas- time: the merchants being in either countrie arrived, shal be assured to trauel about their affaires in peace and tranquillity, so that this realme shall soie and prosper for ever, &c.

Ambassadors
out of France.

The 20. of October were receiued into London certaine ambassadors out of France, about 80. in number, of the most noble and worthy gentlemen in all France: they were lodged in the bishops palace in Pauls churchyard, to whom diuers noblemen resorted, and gaue them diuers presents, especially the maior of the city of London, as wine, sugar, war, Capons, Wildfoule, beffes, mut- tons, and other necessarie things in great abundance, for the expences of their house. Then they resorted vnto the court, being at Greenwich, where they were receiued by the king. They had commission to establish the king in the order of France, for whom they brought, for that intent, a collar of fine golde, with the Michaell hanging thereat, and robes to the same order appertinant, the which was of blew velvet richly embroidered. And the king to gratifie the French k. with the semblable he sent a noble man of the order here in England, with Gar- ear the herault into France, to establish the French king, in the order of the

Cartar,

Gartar, with a semblable Collar, with a Gartar and Kobes according to the same.

The ambassadoys remaining here untill their returne, all things being concluded concerning the perpetuall peace vpon solemnne ceremonies and othes contained in certain instruments touching the same, which was confirmed by receiuing of the Sacrament in Pauls Church of London by the king, and the grand master of France, who represented the king his master, and there the instrument were sealed with gold, and the king put his hand thereunto, and the grand master did the like: betwene whome the cardinall diuided the Sacrament. And that down, they departed, the K. rode with the Cardinall to Westminster, and there dined with al the Frenchmen, passing al the day after with consultation of weighty matters, touching the conclusion of the saide article of the perpetuall peace.

The king then departed again by water to Greenwich, at whose departing it was concluded by the kings deuise, that all the French men shoulde resort to Richmond, and hunt in euerie one of the parkes there: and from thence to Hampton court, and there to hunt, and the cardinall to make there a Supper or banquet, or both to them. And from thence they shoulde ride to Windsor, and there to hunt: and after to returne to London, and so to Greenwich, and there to banquet with the K. Then was there made great preparation of al things for this great assembly at Hampton court: the cardinall called before him his principal officers, as Steward, treasurer, controller, and clearks of his kitchen, to whom he declared his mind, touching the entertainment of the Frenchmen at Hampton court; his pleasure to them known, they sent out eaters, purueuers, and other, the cookes wrought both night and day in subtleties, the yeomen and gromes of the wardrobes were busied in hanging of the chambers, and furnishing the same with beds of silk and other furniture: there were provided 280. beds furnished with al manner of furniture to them belonging, too long particularly to be rehearsed.

The date was come to the French men assigned, and they readie assembled before the house of their appoyntment, wherefore the Officers caused them to ride to Hampton court, a place and a Parke of the kinges within thre miles, there to hunt and spende the date untill night, at which time they returned againe to Hampton court, and euerie of them conueied to their severall chambers, hauing in them great fiers and Wine for their comfote, remayning there untill the supper was readie. The chambers where they supped and banquetted, were ordered in this sort: first, the great waiting Chamber was hanged with rich Arras, as none were better than other, and furnished with tall yeomen to serue. There were set tables rounde about the Chamber banquetwise couered, a cupbord was there garnished with white silver plate, hauing also in the same Chamber to giue the more light, foure plates of silver set with great lights, and a great fire of wood and coles. The next Chamber being the chamber of presence, was hanged with verie rich arras, & a sumptuous cloth of estate furnished with many goodly gentlemen to serue the tables ordered in maner as the other Chamber was, sauing that the high Table was remoued beneath the cloth of estate toward the middell of the chamber covered. Then was there a cupbord, being in length as broad as the chamber, with fire deskes of height, garnished with guilt plate, hauing with lights one paire of candlestickes of siluer and guilt, being curiously wrought, which cost thre hundred markes, and standing vpon the same two lights of ware burning as big as torches to set it forth. This cupbord was barred round about, that no man could come nigh it, for there was none of all this plate touched in this banquet, for there was sufficient besides. The plates that hung on the wals to giue light were of siluer and guilt, hauing in them great pearchers of ware burning, a great fire in the chimney, and all other things necessarie for the furniture of so noble a feast. Now was all things in a readinesse. The trumpets were blown to warne to supper: the officers discretely conducted these noble men from their chambers into the chamber where they should sup, and caused them there to sit downe, and that done, their seruice came vppe in such abundance both costly and full of subtilties, and with such a pleasant noise of instruments of musicke, that the French men (as it seemed) were rayte into a heavenly paradise. The Cardinall was not yet come, but they were merrie and pleasant. Before the second course, the Cardinall came in bowled and spurred, all sodainely amongst them, and bade them Proface: at whose comming there was great ioie, with rising euerie man from his place. The cardinall caused them to sit still and keepe their rounnes, and being in his apparell as he robe, called for a chaire & sate in the midd of the high table. Anone came by the second course, with so many dishes, subtilties, and deuises, aboue a hundred in number, which were of so godly proportion & costly, that I thinke the Frenchmen neuer saw the like, the wonder was no lesse than it was woth this indeede. There were castles with images, in the same Pauls church, for the quantity, aswell counterfeted, as the Painter should haue painted it on a cloth or wall. There were beasts, birds, and personages, most liuely made and counterfeted, some fighting with swords, some with guns, & crossbowes, some baughting and leaping, some dancing with ladies, some on horses in complete harnesse, suiking with long and sharpe speares, with many more deuises. Among all other was a chesse-boorde made of spiced plate, with men there of the same, and for the good proportion, and because the French men be vertie expert in that play, my lord Cardinall gave the same to a gentleman of France, commanding there should be made a godly case for the preservati on thereof in all haste, that he might conuey the same into his countrey. Then toke my lord a bole of gold filled with spocrase, and putting off his cap, said: I drinke to the king my soueraigne lord, and next, unto the king your master, and therewith dranke a god draught: and when he had done, hee desired the grand master to pledge him cup and al, the which was well woth 500. markes, and so caused all the boords to pledge these two royall princes: then went the cups so merrily about, that manie of the French men were faine to be led to their beds.

Then rose by the Cardinall, and went into his private chamber to pull off his bootes, and to chist him, and then went he to supper in his private chamber.

and making a verie short supper, returned into the chamber of presence among the Frenchmen, vsing them so louingly and familiarly, that they could not commend him too much: and whilst they were in communication and other pastimes, all their liueries were serued to their chambers, euery chamber had a basin and an ewer of silver, a great liuerie pot of silver, and some gilt, yea and some chamber had two liuerie pots, with wine and beere: a silver candlestick, both white and plaine, hauing in it two lizes, and a staffe forch of wore, a fine manchete, and a cheat loafe. Thus was euery chamber furnished through all the house: and yet the cupboards in the two banquetting chambers not once touched.

Thus, when it was more than time conuenient, they were conueied to their lodgings, where they rested that night.

In the morning they dined with the Cardinall, and so departed to Windsor. After the returne of the strangers from Windsor, which place, with the order thereof they much commended: The day approached that they were by the king invited to the court, where first they dined, and after dancing & other pastimes by them done, the time of supper came on. Then was the banquetting chamber in the tilt yard at Greene wich, to the which place these strangers were conducted by the noblest personages in the court, where they did both sup and banquet. But to describe to you the order, the dishes, the subtilties, and strange deuises of the same, I lacke both a head of fine wit, and also cunning in my bowels to declare these wonderfull deuises. But this ye shall understand, although it were maruellous sumptuous at Hampton court, yet that notwithstanding this banquet excelled the same, as far as golde doth excede silver in value of weight for weight, and the beholders professed neuer to haue seene the like.

the French ambassadors at Greene wich.

In the midst of this banquet, there was tourneying at the barriers, with lusty gentlemen in complete harness very gorgeous on foot. Then was there the like on horsebacke. And after all this was the most goodliest disguising or enterlude made in latine, the plaiers being so rich, and of so strange deuises, that it passeth my capacity to expound.

This done, there came such a number of the fairest ladies and gentlewomen that bare any byte of beauty in all the realme, in most richest apparell that might be deuised, with whom the gentlemen of France danced, untill a gorgeous maske came in of gentlemen, who danced and masked with these ladies. This done, came in a maske of ladies: these ladies took each of them one of the Frenchmen to dance and to maske: these women maskers spake good French to the Frenchmen, which delighted them very much to heare these ladies speake to them in their mother tongue.

Thus was this night consumed, from the due of the clocke untill three of the clocke after midnight, and then euery man departed to their lodgings. After all this solemne chere at a daie appointed, they resorted to the court to take their leaue of the king and other noble men: then came they to Westminster vnto the cardinall, of whome they receiued the kings rewards, the which were these: euery man of honour and estimation had plate, some to the value of thre or foure hundred pound, and some more, and some lesse, besides other great giftes receiued before of the king, as gownes of veluet with rich furrer, great chaines of golde, and goodlie horses, with diuers other giftes, and the least of them had a sum of crownes of gold: the worst page amongst them had twentie crownes for his part: and being thus noble rewarded, they departed.

A French Craer chased to the Tower wharffe of London.

A French craer, of 30. tunne, being manned with eight and thirty French men, and a Flemmish craer of seauen and twentie tun, and foure and twentie Flemmings, meeting at Wargate, the one chased the other along the river of Thamis to the Tower wharffe of London, where sir Edmond Walsingham lieutenant of the Tower, staied them both, and tooke both their captaines and men.

The 17. day of Iune, the terme was adourned to Michaelmas, because of the sweating sicknesse that then raigned in the city of London, and there was no such watch at Midsummer, as before time had bene accustomed: of this sicknes died manie sodainlie in the kings court, namely sir William Compton, sir Francis Points, and other, who died with little warning. The king for a space remoued almost euery daie till he came to Wittenhanger, a place of the abbot of Saint Albons, and there he with the queene, and a small company about them, remained till the sicknes was past.

King Henries marriage called in question.

Before the cardinals going into France in the preceding yeere, it was talked among the people, that king Henry (as ye haue heard) was by some perswaded, that his marriage with queene Katherine could not be good nor lawfull, wherefore he determined to haue the case examined, cleared and adiudged by learning, law, & sufficient authoritie. The cardinall was by some put in blame for that scruple now cast into the kings conscience, for the hate he bare to the Emperour, and therefore he did not only procure the king of England to soine in friendship with the French king, but also (as they said) sought a diuorce betwixt the king and the queene. But howsoever it came about that the king was thus troubled in conscience concerning his marriage, it followed, that to haue the doubt clearly remoued, he called together the best learned of the realme, which were of seuerall opinions, wherefore he thought to knowe the truth by indifferent iudges, lest peraduenture the Spaniards and other would say that his owne subjects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe, and therefore wrote his cause to Rome, as also (as ye haue heard) sent to the Vniuersities of Italie & France for their opinions: and desired the court of Rome to send into the realm a legate which should be indifferent, and of great and profound iudgement to heare the cause debated. At whose request the whole consistorie of the Colledge of Rome, sent thither Laurence Campeius a Priest Cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which had bene sent thither before in the 10. yeere of this king, as ye haue heard, and with him was soined in commission the Cardinall of Poike, and Legate of England. This cardinall Campeius by long iourneies came into England, and much preparation was made to receiue him triumphantlie into London: but he was so fore beread with the gout, that he refused all such solemnities, and desired that he might without without pompe he conueied to his lodging for his more quiet and rest: and so on the 9. of October he came from S. Mary Puertes by water to the Bish. of Bathes place without Temple barre, where hee was visited of the cardinal of York, & diuers other estates and prelates: and after he had rested him a season, he was brought to the K. presence, then being at Wyndeswell, by the cardinal of York, and was caried in a chaire between 4. persons, for he was not able to stand, & the cardinal of York & he sate both on the right hand of the K. throne, and there one Francisco secretary to cardinal Campeius made an eloquent oration in Latine: in which he rehearsed first, with what cruelty the emperors soldiers had handled the pope, what tyrannie they had shewed to the cardinals and priests, what sacrilege and spoile they had committed in S. Peters church, how they had violated virgins, ravished mens wives, and in conclusion, spoiled, robbed, and tormented all the Romans and inhabitants in the citie of Rome. And further he shewed what friendship the colledge of Rome founde at the K. hands, & the French kings in the time of that tribulation, that if they had not ioined together, the city of Rome with all their gouernors had bin brought to utter ruine: for the which he saide, pope Clement and all his Colledge of Cardinals, and the Senators of the Citie, with all the Citizens rendred to the king their heartie thanks, and promised him their loue and fauor, and amittie perpetuall.

Oration

To the which Oration Doctor Foxe Prouost of Cambridge, made a discrete aunswere: and as to the first point, hee declared that the King much lamented to heare his friendes; yea, or any other Christian men to bee handled with such tyrannie: and as touching the seconde point, hee sayde that the king did but the dutie of a Christian Prince to relieue his friendes being in captiuitie, for the which hee would that the whole citie of Rome should giue thanks to God, and not to him. After which aunswere made, the two Legates communed secretlie with the King a long space, and after departed to their lodging. Of the comming of this Legate the people, especiallie Women, talked largely, and said, that the king would for his owne pleasure haue another wife, & had sent for this Legate to be divorced from his Quene, with manie foolish wordes, insomuch, that whosoever spake against the marriage, was of the common people abhorred and reproued, which common rumour was related to the king. Wherefore he like a prudent prince, willing all men to know his intent and purpose, caused all his nobilitie, iudges, and counsellors, with diuers other persons, to come to his place of Wyndeswell on Sondaye the 8. of Nouember at afternoone, in his great chamber, and there to them sayde, as neere as I coulde carie awaie (saith Hall) in these wordes following: Our trustie and welbeloued subiectes, both you of the nobilitie, and you of a meaner sort, it is not vnknowne to you that we, both by gods pteuision, and true and lawfull inheritance, haue reigned ouer this realme almost 20. yeres: during which time, wee haue so ordered vs, thanked bee God, that no outward enemy hath oppressed you, nor taken any thing from vs, nor we haue invaded no realme but we haue had victorie and honor, so that we thinke you nor none of your predecessors neuer liued more quietlie, more wealthie, nor in more estimation vnder anie of our noble progenitors. But when we remember our mortality, and that we must die, then we thinke that all our doings in our little time are clereely defaced, and worthe of no memorie, if we leaue you in trouble at the time of our death. For if our true heire bee not known at the time of our death, see what trouble shall succed to you and your children. The experience thereof some of you haue seene, after the death of our noble grandfather Edward the 4. and some haue heard what manslaughter continued in this realme betwene the houses of Yorke and Lancaster, by the which dissension this realme was like to haue bene clereely destroyed. And although it hath pleased God to send vs a faire daughter of a noble woman and me, begotten to our great comfort, yet it hath bene tolde vs by diuers great clarkes, that neither she is our lawfull daughter, nor her mother our lawfull wife, but that we liue together abominably and detestably in open adultery, insomuch, that when our ambassade was last in France, and motion was made, that the D. of B. should marrie our said daughter, one of the chiefe counsellors to the French king saide: It were well done to know whether she be the king of Englands lawfull daughter, or not: for well knowne it is, that he begate her on his brothers wife, which is direally against Gods law, and his precept. Thinke you (my lords) that these wordes touch not my bodie and soule: thinke you that these doings doe not daily and hourly trouble my conscience and ver my spirits: Yes: we doubt not but if it were your owne cause, euerie man would seeke remedie, when the perill of your soule, and the losse of your inheritance is openly laid to you. For this onely cause I protest before God, and in the word of a prince, I haue asked counsell of the greatest clarkes in Christendome, and for this cause I haue sent for this legat, as a man indifferent, only to know the truth, and to settle my conscience, and for none other cause, as God can iudge. And as touching the D. if it be iudged by the law of God, that she is my lawfull wife, there was neuer thing more acceptable to me in my life, both for the discharge of my conscience, & also for the good qualities and conditions which I know to be in her: for I assure you all, that beside her noble parentage of the which she is descended (as all you know) she is a woman of most gentleness, of most humilitie, and burannes, yea, and of all good qualities appertaining to nobilitie, she is without comparison, as I these 20. yeres almost haue had the true experiment, so that if I were to marrie againe, if the marriage might be good, I would surely chuse her aboue all other women: but if it be determined by iudgement, that our marriage was against Gods law and clereely void, then I shall not only sorrow the departing from so good a lady and louing companion, but much more lament and bewaile my infortunat chance, that I haue so long liued in adultery to Gods great displeasure, and haue no true heire of my bodie to inherite this realme. These be the sorres that bere my minde, these be the panges that trouble my conscience, and for these griefes I seeke a remedy: therefore I requyre of you all as our trust and confidence is in you, to declare to our subjects our intent, according to our true meaning, and desire them to praise with vs that the truth may be known, for the discharge of our conscience, & sauing of

of our soule : and for declaration hereof I haue assembled you together, and now you maie depart.

To see what countenance was made amongst the hearers of this oration, it was a strange sight, for some sighed & said nothing, other were sorry to heare the K. so troubled in his conscience : others fauouring the D. much sorrowed, that this matter was now opened, and so euery man spake as his hart serued him : thus much Hall. And thus G. C. The cardinall of Poike saith he, being prouoked to declare his opinion, and wisdom in the aduancement of the kings purpose, who thought it not mete to wade too far alone, or to giue his hasty iudgment in so weighty a matter, desired of the K. licence to aske counsell of men of famous learning, both in the diuine and ciuill lawes, that obtained, by his legantine authoritie, he sent his commission out for all the bishops of the realme that were learned in either of the said lawes, or had in any high estimation for their prudent counsell and iudgement, in princelie affairs of long experience. Then assembled those noble prelates and notable clarks of both vniuersities of Oxford and Cambridge, as also of diuers cathedrall churches of this realme accounted learned, and of witty discretion in determination of doubtfull questions. Then was this matter of the kings case consulted of from day to day, that it was to the learned a goodly hearing : but in fine the ancient fathers of both lawes, departed with one iudgement, contrary to the principall expectation. Then was it thought expedient, that the K. should send out his commissioners into all the vniuersities of christendom, to bring with them the definition of their opinions in the same vnder the seale of euery vniuersitie, which they obtained. Having now a sure staffe to stand by, these proceedings declared to the cardinall, he sent againe for the bishops, to whom he declared the trauell of these commissioners. And for affirmance thereof, shewed them the instruments of euery vniuersity vnder their seuerall seales. They went once againe to consultation. It was then concluded, that the king should send to the pope, declaring the opinions of these vniuersities, authorized by their common seales : to the which it was thought that the consent of these prelates of this realme should be necessary to be sent thither, altogether comprised in an instrument, sealed with all their seales annexed to the said instrument. Not long after the ambassadoys were assigned to trauell in the matter, hauing certaine instructions, among which one was this, that if the Pope would not giue iudgement definitive in the kings case, to requite another commission to be granted vnder lead, to stablish a court to be kept in England, for that purpose directed to the lord cardinall and legat of England, and to the cardinal Campeius, who was then (though he were a stranger) bishop of Bath (the which the king had giuen him) to determine, and iustly to iudge according to conscience and discretion : To the which, after long suite made, and the good will of the same Cardinall obtained to trauell into England, the pope granted to their suite, and the cardinall arrived in England, as ye before haue heard.

Now after some deliberation and consultation in the ordering and vsing of the kings matters, and his commission, and the articles of his ambassade leues,

serene and read, and digested, it was determined, that the king and Quene his wife should be lodged at Wyndesore. And then in the blacke Friars a certayne place was there appointed most conuenient for the k. and quenes repaire to the Court, there to bee kept for the disputation and determination of the case, whereas these two legates sate as iudges, before whom the king and Q. were ascited and summoned to appere: which was a strange sight, and the newest deuise that euer was read or heard of before in anye region, story, or chronicle, a king and a Quene to be constrained by procelle compellatoze to appere in anye court as common persons within their owne Realme and dominion, to abide the iudgements and decrees of their owne subiects, being the royall diademe and prerogative thereof. We shall vnderstande (as I haue sayde before) that there was a court erected in the blacke Friars in London, whereas sate these two cardinals for Iudges in the same, in the moneths of Aprill, Maie, June, and Iulie. Nowe will I set you out the manner and order of the same court: first, there was a court platted in Tables and Benches in manner of a Consistorie, one seate rayled higher for the Iudges to sit on than the other were. Then as it were in the midst of the sayde Iudges aloft about them 3. degrees high, was a cloth of estate hanged, with a Chaire royall vnder the same, wherein sate the king, and besides him, some distance from him sate the Q. and vnder the Iudges set sate the scribes and other necessary officers for the execution of the procelle, and other thinges appertaining to such a court: the chiefe scribe was D. Steuens, after B. of Winchester, and the apparator, who was Caller of the Court, was one Cooke (most commonlie called Cooke of Winchester.) Then before the king and the Iudges within the court sate the Archbish. of Canterb. D. Warham, and all the other bishops. Then stood at both endes within, the counsellors learned in the lawes, as well the kinges as the Quenes. The doctors of law for the king, were doctor Simphon that was after bishop of Chichester, and doctor Bell, that was after bishop of Worcester, with diuers other, and doctors in the same law on the same side were, doctor Peter, doctor Tregonel, with others. On the other side for the Q. were doctor Fisher B. of Rochester, doctor Scandish, and doctor Ridley, a verie small man of stature, but surelie a great and excellent cleaerke in diuinitie. Thus was the court furnished. The Iudges commaunded the crier to proclaime silence whilste their commission was reade, both to the court, and to the people assembled. What done, the Scribes comaunded the crier to call the king by the name of king Henry of Englande, come into the Court, &c. With that the king answered and sayde: Here. Then called hee the Quene, by the name of Katherine Quene of Englande, come into the Court, &c. Who made no answer, but rose incontinent out of her Chayze, and because shee coulde not come to the king directlie, for the distance seuered betweene them, shee went about by the Court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his feete in the sight of all the Court and people, to whom shee sayde in effect these wordes, as folloeweth: Spz (quoth shee) I desire you to doe mee iustice and right, and take some pittie vpon mee, for I am a poore woman, and a stranger, borne out of your dominion, hauing heere no indifferent Counsell, and lesse assurance of friendship.

Katherine.

friendship: Alas sir, what haue I offended you, or what occasion of displeasure haue I shewed you, intending thus to put me from you after this sort: I take god to my iudge, I haue been to you a true and an humble wife, euer conformable to your will & pleasure, that neuer contraried or gainesaid anie thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wher in you had anie delight or baliance, whether litle or much, without grudge or countenance of discontentation or displeasure: I loved for your sake al the whom you loued, whether I had cause or no cause, whether they were my friends or enemies. I haue bene your wife these twentie yeres or mo, and you haue had by me diuers children, and when ye had me at the first, I take God to be my iudge, that I was a verie maid, and whether it be true or no, I put it to your conscience. If there be anie iust cause that you can alledge against me, either of dishonestie, or matter lawfull to put me from you, I am content to depart to my shame and rebuke: and if there be none, then I praye you to let me haue iustice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of such an excellent wit, that he was accounted among all men for wisdome to be a second Salomon, and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando was reckoned one of the wisest princes that reigned in Spaine manie yeres before: it is not therefore to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wise counsellors vnto them of euerie realme, as to their wisdomes they thought mete, and as to me seemeth there were in those daies as wise and well learned in both the realmes, as be now at this date, who thought the marriage betwene you and me good and lawfull: therefore it is a wonder to me to heare, what new inuentions are now inuented against me that neuer intended but honestie: and now to cause me to stand to the order and iudgement of this court, ye should (as seemeth me) doe me much wrong, for ye maie condemne me for lacke of answer, hauing no counsell but such as ye haue assigned me: ye must consider that they cannot be indifferent on my part when they be your owne subiects, and such as ye haue taken and chosen out of your owne counsell, whereunto they be priuie, and dare not disclose your will and intent. Therefore I humble desire you in the way of charitie to spare me, vntill I may know what counsell and aduise my friends in Spaine wil aduertise me to take, and if you wil not, then your pleasure be fulfilled: and with that she arose vp, making a low curtisie to the king, and departed from thence, supposing that she would haue resorted againe to her former place. But she toke her way straight out of the court, leaning vp on the arme of one of her seruants, who was her general receiuer, called M<sup>r</sup>. Griffith. The king being aduertised that she was readie to go out of the house, where the court was kept, commanded the crier to call her againe, who called her by these words, Katherine Q. of England, come into the court: with that quoth M<sup>r</sup>. Griffith, Madam, ye be called againe. On, on (quoth she) it maketh no matter, it is no indifferent court for me, therefore I will not tarry, go on your waies: and thus she departed without any further answer at that time or anie other, and neuer would appeare after in any court. The king perceiving she was departed thus, and considering her words which she pronounced before him, said to the audience these words in effect: For as much (quoth he) as the Quene is gone, I will in her absence declare vnto you all: She hath been to me as true, as obedient, and as comfortable a wife, as I would wish or desire: she hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of her dignity, or in any other of a baser estate: she is also surely a noble woman by her conditions will well declare the same. With that (quoth cardinall Wolsey) Sir, I most humbly require your highnes, to declare before all this audience, whether I haue bene the chiefe and first mouer of this matter vnto your maiestie or no, for I am greatly suspected herein. My Lord Cardinall (quoth the K.) I can well excuse you in this matter: marie (quoth he) ye haue bene rather against me in the tempting hereof, than a setter forward or mouer of the same: the speciall cause that moued me vnto this matter, was a certaine scrupulositie that pricked my conscience, vpon certain words spoken at a time when it was, by the B. of Bayon the french ambassadoz, who had been hither sent vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwene the princesse our daughter the ladie Mary, and the Duke of Orleans, second son to the K. of France, and vpon the resolution and determination of the same, he desired respite to aduertise the king his master thereof, whether our daughter Mary should be legitimate, in respect of this my marriage with this woman, being sometime my brothers wife: which words once conceived within the secret bottome of my conscience, engendred such a scrupulous doubt, that my conscience was incontinently accombyed, vexed and disquieted: whereby I thought my selfe to be greatly in danger of Gods indignation, which appeared to be (as me seemed) the rather, for that he sent vs no issue male: & all such issues male as my said wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, so that I doubted the great displeasure of God in that behalfe. Thus my conscience being tossed in the waues of a scrupulous conscience, & partly in despaire to haue any other issue than I had already by this ladie now my wife, it behoued me further to consider the state of this realme, and the danger that it stood in for lacke of a prince to succede me, I thought it good in release of the weightie burden of my weake conscience, & also the quiet state of this woorthie realme, to attempt the lawe therein, whether I might lawfully take another wife more lawfully, by whom God might send me more issue, in case this my first copulation was not good, without any carnal concupiscence, and not for any displeasure or mistaking of the quenes person and age, with whom I would be as well contented to continue, if our marriage may stand with the lawes of God, as with any woman aliv: in which point consisteth all this doubt that we go about now to trie, by the learning, wisdome, & iudgement of you our prelates and pastors of all this our realme and dominion now here assembled for that purpose, to whose conscience and learning I haue committed the charge and iudgement, according to the which, I will (God willing) be right well content to submit my selfe, and for my part obey the same: wherein, after that I perceiued my conscience so doubtful, I moued it in confession to you my lord of Lincoln then ghostly father: and for as much as then you your selfe were in some doubt, you moued me to aske the counsel of all you my lords: whereupon I moued you my lord of Canterburie, first to haue your licence, cence, in as much as you were metropolitane, to put this matter in question, and so I did of all you my lordes, to which you granted vnder your seales, and that I haue here to be shewed. That is truth, if it please your grace, quoth the archbishop of Canterburie, I doubt not but my brethren here present will acknowledge the same: So sit not so, vnder your correction, quoth the bishop of Rochester, for you haue not mine: So, ah, quoth the king, loke here, is not this your hand and seale, and shewed him the instrument with seales: So forsooth, quoth the bishop. How saie you to that, quoth the K. to the archbishop of Canterburie: Sir, it is his hand and his seale, said my L. of Canterburie. So my lord (quoth the bishop of Rochester) indeed you were in hand with me to haue both my hand and seale, as other of my lordes haue done, but then I said again to you, that I would neuer consent to anie such act, for it was much against my conscience, and therefore my hand and seale should neuer be set to any such instrument. God willing, with much more matter touching the same communication betwene vs. You saie truth, quoth the archbishop of Canterburie, such words you had vnto me, but you were fully resolu'd at last, that I should subscribe your name, and put to your seale my selfe, and you would allow the same. All which, quoth the bishop of Rochester, vnder your correction my lord, is not true. Well, well (quoth the king) it maketh no great matter, we will not stand with you in argument, you are but one man. And then the king rose vp, and the court was adioyned vntill another daie.

The next court daie the cardinals saie againe, at which time the counsell on both sides were there ready to answer: the kings counsell alledged the matrimonie not to be lawfull at the beginning, because of the carnall copulation had betwene prince Arthur and the Quene. This matter being verie vehementlie touched on that side, and to proue it, they alledged manie reasons and similitudes of truth, and being answered negatiuelie againe on the other side, it seemed that all their former allegations were verie doubtfull to be tried, and that no man knew the truth. Yes (quoth the bishop of Rochester) I know the truth: how know you (quoth my L. cardinal) the truth more than anie other person: Yes forsooth my lord (quoth he) Quia ego sum professor veritatis, therefore I know the truth: I know that God is truth it selfe, and he neuer saith but truth, and God said: Quos Deus coniunxit, homo non separet. And for as much as this marriage was ioined and made by God to a good intent, I saie that I know the truth, and that man cannot breake vpon anie wilfull occasion that which God hath made and constituted. So much doth all faithfull men (quoth my lord cardinal) know as well as you, yet this reason is not sufficient in this case, for the kings counsell doe alledge diuers presumptions to proue that it was not lawfull at the beginning. Ergo it was not ordained by God, for God doth nothing without a due order, therefore it is not to bee doubted, but if the presumptions be true, which they do alledge to be most true, then the confusion was, ne could not be of God. Therefore I saie to you my lord of Rochester, ye know not the truth, vnlesse ye can auoid their presumptions by iust reasons. Then quoth doctor Ridley, it is a shame and a great dishonour to this honorable presence, that anie such presumption should be alledged in this open court, which be too detestable to be rehearsed: what (quoth my lord cardinall) Domine doctior magis reuerenter? No, no, my L. (quoth he) there belongeth no reuerence to be giuen to this matter, for an irreuerent matter would be irreuerently answered: and there they left, and proceeded forth with other matter.

Thus the court passed from session to session, and date to date, that at a certaine date of their session, the king sent for my L. cardinall to come to him to Wyndesore, who to accomplish his commandement went to him, and bring there with him in communication in his priue chamber from 11. unto 12. of the clocke at none and past, my L. cardinall departed from the L. and took his barge at the Blacke friers, and went to his house at Westminster. The Bishop of Carlisle being in his barge, said vnto him, winding his face, it is a hot date quoth he: Yea my L. (quoth the cardinall) if ye had been as well chased as I haue bin within this howre, ye would saie it were verie hot: and as sone as he came home to his house at Westminster, he went incontinent to his naked bed, where he had not laine full two howers, but that my L. of Wilshire came to speake with him of a message from the L. My Lord vnderstanding of his coming, commanded he should be brought to his bed side, and he being there, shewed him the L. pleasure was that he should incontinent go with another cardinall vnto the Q. (who was then in Wyndesore in her chamber there) to perswade with her by their wisdomes, and to aduise her to surrender the whole matter into the kings hands, by her owne consent & will, which should be much better to her honour, than to stand to the trial of law, and thereby to be condemned, which should seeme much to her dishonour. To fulfill the kings pleasure, my L. said he was readie, and would prepare him to go thither out of hand, &c. Then my L. arose, and made him ready, taking his barge, and went straight to Wyndesore place to cardinall Campeius, and so went together to Wyndesore, directly to the queenes lodging, & being in her chamber of presence, they shewed the gentleman vsher that they came to speake with the Q. grace. The gentleman vsher aduertised the queen, that the cardinals were come to speake with her: with that she rose vpp, and with a skeine of white thread about her neck, came into her chamber of presence, where the cardinals were attending, at whose coming, quoth she. Alacke my lords, I am verie sorie to make you attend vpon me, what is your pleasure with me? If it please your grace (quoth cardinall Wolsey) to go into your priue chamber, we will shew you the cause of our coming: My lord (quoth she) if ye haue any thing to saie, speake it openly before all these folke: for I feare nothing that yee can say against me, but that I would all the world should heare and see it, and therefore speake your minde openly I praye you. Then began the cardinall to speake to her in Latin: Praise god my L. (quoth she) speake to me in English. for I can (I thanke God) both speake and vnderstand English, although I vnderstand some latin. Forsooth (quoth the Cardinall) god madam, if it please your grace, we come both to know your minde how you are disposed to do in this matter betwix the king and you, and also to declare secretly our opinions and counsell vnto you, which we do only for very zeale and obedience we beare vnto your grace.

my lord (quoth she) I thanke you for your good will: but to make you answer in your request, I cā not so suddenly, for I was set among my maids at woꝝk, thinking full little of any such matter, wherein there needeth a longer deliberation, and a better head than mine to make answer; for I need of counsell in this case, which toucheth me so nere, and for any counsell or friendship that I can find in England, they are not for my profit: what thinke you I praise you my lords, will anie English man counsell me, or be friendly to me against the pleasure, that be his subiects? nay forsooth; and as for my counsell in whom I will put my trust, they be not here, they be in Spaine in mine owne country: and my lords, I am a poore woman lacking wit to answer to any such noble persons of wisdom as you be in so waighty a matter, therefore I pray you, be good vnto me poore woman, destitute of friends here in a forren region, and your counsell also I will be glad to heare: and therewith she toke the cardinall by the hand, & led him into her private chamber with the other cardinall, where they taried a season talking with the quene: which communication ended, they departed to the king, making to him relation of her talke, and after returned home to supper. Thus this case went forward from court to court, til it came to iudgement, so that enery man expected iudgement wold be giuen the next day, at which day the king came thither, and set him down in a chaire within a doze, in the end of the galerie (which opened directly against the iudgement seate) to heare the iudgement giuen, at which time, all their proceedings were openly read in Lat in. That done, the kings counsell at the barre called for iudgement, with that (quoth Cardinall Campeius) I will not giue iudgement till I haue made relation to the pope of all our proceedings, whose counsell and commandement in this case I will obserue, the matter is too high for vs to giue anie hasty iudgement, considering the highnes of the persons, and the doubtfull occasions alledged: and also whose commissioners we be, vnder whose authority we sit, it were therefore reason that we should make our chiefe head a counsell in the same, before we proceed to iudgment definitiue. I come not to please for fauor, meede, or dread of any person alieue, be he king or otherwise, I haue no such respect to the person, that I will offend my conscience, I wil not for the fauor or displeasure of any high estate, do that thing that should be against the will of God, I am an old man both weake and sickly, that loke dailly for death, &c. And for as much as I do vnderstand, hauing perceiurance by the allegations in the matter, the case is very doubtfull, and also the party defendand will make none answer, but doth rather appeale from vs, supposing that we be not indifferent, considering the kings high dignitie and authority within his owne realme, which he hath ouer his subiects, and we bring his subiects, the thinketh that we cannot do iustice for feare of displeasure. Therefore to auoide all these ambiguities and doubts, I will not waide any further in this matter, vntill I haue the full opinion and assent of the pope, and such other of more experience, or as be seene better in such doubtfull lawes, than I am: therefore I will adioyne the court for this time, according to the order of the court of Rome, from whence semblable sursoitacion is deriued: and if we should go further than our commission doth warrant vs, it were great follie and much to our blames, and maie be accounted breakers of the order of the high court, from which (as I said) our authoritties be deriued. And with that the court was dissolued, and no more done. Then slept forth the duke of Suffolke from the king, and spake with an haile countenance the se woordes: It was neuer merite in England (quoth he) while we had any cardinals among vs: which woordes were set forth both with countenance and vehemencie, that all men marvelled what he intended, to whom no man made answer. Then the Duke spake againe in great despight, to the which our Cardinall (perceiuing his vehemencie) soberlie made answer, &c. This matter continued thus a long season, and my Lord Cardinall was in displeasure with the king, for that the matter in his suite toke no better successe to his purpose, notwithstanding my L. excused him by his commission, which gaue him no authoritie to proceed in iudgement without knowledge of the pope, who reserued the same to himselfe. At the last they were aduertised by their post, that the Pope would take deliberation in the matter, untill his courts were opened, which should not be before Bartholomew tide next. The king considering the time too long ere it should be determined, thought it good to send an ambassadoe to the pope to perswade with him, to shew such honorable fauor vnto his maiestie, that the matter might sooner be ended than it was like to be, doctor Stephen Gardener secretary was thither sent, and there tarried till the latter end of sommer. The king commanded the queene to be removed out of the court, and sent to another place: and his highnes rode in his progresse. And when M. Secretarie was returned from Rome, Cardinall Campeius made suite to be discharged, and was admitted to returne to Rome.

Stephen Gardener the kings secretary sent ambassadoe.

Cardinall Campeius toke his iourney towards Rome, with the kings reward, but that it was I am vncertaine: neuertheless after their departure it was reported vnto the king by the counsell, that cardinall Campeius was departed, & caried with him great treasures of my L. cardinals of England, to be conuayed in great sums to Rome, whither they surmised he would secretly repaire out of the realme: insomuch as they caused a post to ride after the cardinall to search him. And when they ouertoke him at Caleis (where he was staied untill search was made) there was not found so much money as he receiued of the kings reward, and so he was dismissed, and went his wale.

After that Cardinall Campeius was thus departed and gone, Michaelmas terme drew on, against which time my L. cardinall resorted vnto his house at Westminster: and when the terme began, he went vnto the hall in such like sort and gesture, as he was accustomed most commonly to do, and sate in the Chancerie being then Chancelor: after which date he neuer sate more.

The next daie he tarried at home expecting the comming of the Dukes of Suffolke & Norfolke, who came not that daie: but the next day, to wit, the 18. day of October, they came thither vnto him, to whom they declared the kings pleasure, which was that he should surrender and deliuer by the great scale into their hands, and to depart simplie vnto Ather, which was an house situate nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the bishopricke of Winchester. The cardinall demanded of them their commission that gaue them such authoritie:

who answered againe, that they were sufficient commissioners, and had authority to doe no lesse by the kings mouth: notwithstanding he would in no wise agree in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authority, saying: That the great seale was deliuered him by the kings person, to enjoy the ministration thereof, with the roome of the Chancelor, for the terme of his life, wher of for his surety he had the R. letters patents: which matter was greatly debated betwene him and the dukes, with manie great and heinous words, insomuch that the dukes were faine to depart againe without their purpose, and rode to Windsor to the king, and made report accordingly: but the next day they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. Then the cardinal deliuered vnto them the great seale, & was content to depart simply, taking with him nothing but only certaine prouision for his house: and after long talke betwene him and the dukes, they departed with the great seale of England, and brought the same to the king. Then the cardinall called all his officers before him, & tooke account of them for all such stufte wherof they had charge, and in his galerie were set diuers tables, wherupon laie a great number of goodly rich stufte, as whole pieces of silke of all colours, velvet, satin, damaske, taffata, grograin and other things: also there lay 1000. pieces of fine Holland cloth, There was laid on euery table books, reporting the contents of the same, and so was there inventories of all things in order against the kings coming. He caused to be hanged the wals of the galerie on the one side, with cloth of gold, cloth of tissue, cloth of siluer, and rich cloth of bodken of diuers colours: on the other side were hanged the richest sute of copes of his owne prouision made for his colleges of Oxford and Ipswich, that euer was seene in England. Then had he two chambers adjoining to the galerie, the one most commonlie called the guilt chamber, and the other the counsell chamber, wher in were set by two broade and long tables vpon trestles, wherupon was set such a number of plate of all sortes, as was almost incredible. In the guilt chamber were set out vpon the table nothing but guilt plate, and vpon a cupboard and in a window was set no plate but gold, very rich: and in the counsell chamber was all white & parcell guilt plate, and vnder the table in baskets was all old broken siluer plate, and bookes set by them, purporting euery kind of plate, and euery parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus was all things prepared, giuing charge of all the said stufte, with all other remaining in euery office, to be deliuered to the R. to make answer to their charge: for the order was such, that euery officer was charged with the receipt of the stufte belonging to his office by indenture. Then all things being ordered, as is before rehearsed, my lord prepared him to depart by water, and before his going sir William Gascoigne being his treasurer, came vnto him (to whome he gaue among other the charge of the deliuerie of the said goods to be deliuered vnto the king) and said vnto the cardinall then being his lord and master. Sir (quoth he) I am loy for your grace: for ye shal go straight way to the tolwer, as I heare say. Is this the good comfort and counsel quoth my R. cardinall vnto him (that you can giue your master in aduersity? lies. I would you should know sir William, and all those reporters, that it is untrue, for I neuer deserved to come there, although it hath pleased the king to take my house readie furnished for his pleasure at this time. I would all the world knew that I haue nothing but it is his of right; for by him, and of him I haue receiued all that I haue: therefore it is of conuenience and reason, that I render vnto his maiestie the same againe with all my heart: therefore go your waies, and attend well to your charge. And therewithall hee made him readie, and then with his train of gentlemen and yeomen, which was no small number, hee took his barge at his priuie staires, and so went by water vnto Putney: at the taking whereof, there was walking vp and down in Thames as full of boates, filled with people of London, expecting the cardinals departing by water, supposing that he should haue gone to the toluer, whereof they loied verie much. ¶ Wauering and newfangled multitude, is it not a wonder to consider the mutabilitie of this vncertaine worlde, the common people desireth alwaies those thinges for the newelties sake, which after turneth them to small profit or commoditie? For if the sequels be wel and directly waied and considered, they had small cause to reioice at his fall. What hath succeeded, wise men do know, and the common sort themselves haue felt: wherefore to wonder at it were but a follie, to studie the remedie, it profiteth not: for thus it hath euer bene, and will alwaies be, do what yee will to redresse the same it boteth not. I cannot see, but alwaies men in authoritie bee disdained with the common sort of people, and they most of all that do obserue and minister iustice: for where they please some one that receiueth the benefit of the law at their hands, according to iustice, they in likewise displease the contrary part, supposing to sustain wrong where they haue right. Thus all iustices be in contempt with the people alwaies, for ministration of their duty, yet most some such bee alwaies elected, and deputed so to do, for else if the world should bee without inquisition and order, there should be too much error and abhominacion. When he was arrived with all his train at Putney, being vpon the land, he took his mule, and euerie man took their horses; and riding not past a paire of butts length, he espied a Gentleman come riding in posse downe the Hill in the Towne of Putney: And demanding of his Gentlemen about him, what hee was that came riding downe so fast, forsooth Sir (quoth they) it is master Noris, as it seemeth to vs; and by and by, hee came to my Lorde, saluting him and sayde: Sir, the Kinges maiestie commendeth him vnto you, and commaunded me to shewe you, that you bee as much in his fauor as euer you were, and so shall bee: therefore hee would that you shoulde bee of good cheere, and take no thought, for you shall not lacke. And although hee hath done thus unkindlie towards you, it is moze for the satisfiying of some, than of any indignacion. And yet you knowe well that hee is able to recompence you againe, and re-store you to wisse so much: and thus he had me that I shoulde shewe you, and willed me to bid you to take all this matter in patience: and sit for my part, I trust to see you in better estate then euer ye were. But when he had heard master Noris report the good and comfortable wordes of the king, hee quickly lighted from his mule, all alone, as though he had bene the yongest amongst his

his men, and incontinent kneeled downe in the dirt vpon both his knees, holding vp his hands for toy of the kings most comfortible message: master Noris lighted also, espying him so sone vpon his knees, and kneeled by him, and toke him in his armes, and asked him how hee did, calling vpon him to credite his message: ¶ Master Noris (quoth he) when I consider the soifull newes that you haue brought me, I could do no lesse than greatly reioyce, euery word pierced so my hart, that the sodain toy surmounted my memozy, hauing no regard or respect to the place, but I thought it my duty, that in the same place where I receyued this comfort to laud and praise god vpon my knees, and most humbly to render to my soveraign lord my hartly thanks for the same. And as hee was talking thus vpon his knees to Master Noris, he would haue pulled off a velvet night cappe which he ware vnder his black hat, and scarlet cap, but he coulde not vndo the knot vnder his chin: wherefore with violence hee rent his laces of his cap, and pulled his said cap from his head, and kneeled bare headed: and this don, he rose vp, and mounted againe vpon his mule, and so rode forth by the high wate in the Towne, talking with Master Noris. And when hee came vppon Putney heath, where Master Noris should depart from him, master Noris gaue him a ring of golde with a stone, and saide vnto him, that the king sent him the same for a token of his good will, which ring (quoth he) the king saith ye know very wel. It was the priate token betweene the king and him, when the king would haue ante expectall thing sped at his hands: then said he to master Noris, if I were lord of the realme, the one halfe thereof were too small a reward to giue you for your paines and good newes: but good master Noris, consider with mee that I haue nothing left me, but my clothes vpon my backe, therefore I shall desire you to take this small reward at my hand (the which was a litle chaine of gold made like a flagen chaine, with a crosse of gold, wherein was a peece of the holie crosse, which he continuallie ware about his neck next his boode:) and said further moze; master Noris I assure you, when I was in prosperitie, although it seem but smal in value, yet I would not gladly haue departed with the same for a thousande pounce, therefore I shall require you to take it in good woorth, & to weare it about your neck continually for my sake, and to remember me to the king, when ye shall see oportunitie, vnto whose highnesse I shall most instantlie require you to haue me most humble commended, for whose charitable disposition towardes me, I can but praye for the preservation of his royall estate. I am his obedient subiect, his poore chaplain, and bead man, and so will be during my life, accounting my selfe nothing, nor to haue any thing but onelie of him, and by him, whome I haue iustlie and trulie serued to the best of my grosse wit: and with that he toke master Noris by the hand bare headed, and so departed. And when hee was gone but a small distance, he returned againe, and caused Master Noris to be called to him: when master Noris was returned, hee sayde vnto him, I am lozie (quoth he) that I haue no token to sende to the king: but if yee will at my request, present the king with this poore foole, I trust he will accept him: for he is for a noblemans pleasure, forsooth woorth 1000. pounce: so master Noris toke the foole, with whome my lord was faine to send six of his tallest yeomen to helpe him to conuey the foole to the court, for the poze sole toke on like a tirant rather then he would haue departed from my L. but not withstanding they conuicted him, and so brought him to the court, where the king receiued him verie gladielie.

After departure of Paſt. Noris with his token to the king, my Lorde rode ſtraite to Aſhere, which is an houſe belonging to the Biſhoppſicke of Elincheſter, ſituate in the countie of Surreie, not far from Hampton Court, where my L. and his familie continued the ſpace of thye or ſoure weekes, without either beds, ſhertes, table clothes, or diſhes to eat their meate in, or therewith to baie anie, holwe it there was good prouiſion of all kinde of victuall, and of beere, and wine, whereof there was ſufficient, and plentie enough: but my L. was compelled of neceſſitie to borrowe of maſter Arundell, and of the biſhop of Carleile, plate and diſhes, both to drinke in, and eate his meate in. Thus my Lorde with his familie continued in this ſtraunge eſtate untill after Walowetide.

On Alhalowne daie when the cardinall had finiſhed his ſeruice, hee returned into his chamber, and called for his dinner, who was ſerued in his priuie chamber, and there dined among bluers his Doctors, among whom maſter Thomas Cromwell dined: and ſitting at dinner, it came to paſſe that in communication of his gentlemen and ſeruaunts true and faithfull ſervice, which my Lorde much commended, Maſter Cromwell tooke an occaſion, to tell my Lorde that hee ought in conſcience to conſider the trueth, and good ſeruice that they had doone him in his neceſſitie, which did not forſake him in weale nor in woo, and ſaide: Sir, it ſhall be well doone for your grace to call them before you, both Gentlemen which bee woorthie perſons, and alſo Pro-men, and let them vnderſtande, that yee right well conſider their paines and trueth, with their faithfull ſervice, and to giue them your commendation, with good wordes, the which ſhall bee to them great courage, to ſuſtaine your miſerie with paines and patience, and to ſpende their life and ſubſtance in your ſeruice. Alas, Thomas (quoth my Lorde) yee knowe I haue nothing to giue them, and wordes without deedes bee not often well taken, for if I hadde but as I late hadde, I woulde departe with them ſo frankelie, as they ſhoulde bee well contente: But nothing hath no ſauour: and I am both aſhamed and alſo ſozie, that I am not able to requite their faithfull ſervice. And although I doe reioyce, as I maie, to conſider the fidelitie that I ſee in the number of my ſeruaunts, who will not forſake mee in my miſerable eſtate, but bee as diligent, and as ſeruiceable about me, as they were in my great triumph and glozie: Yet doe I lament againe as beheimentlie the want of ſubſtance to diſtribute among them. Why Sir, (quoth Maſter Cromwell) haue yee not heere a number of Chaplaines, to whom yee haue departed liberallie with Spirituall promotions, inſomuch, as ſome maie diſpende by your Graces preferment a thouſande pounde by yeere, and ſome ſiue hundred Markes, and ſome more, and ſome leſſe: You haue not a Chaplain within your houſe, or belonging vnto you, but he maie ſpend well at the leaſt, by your procuremente and promotion, three hundred Markes yeerelie, who haue had all the proſite and gaines at your handes: and your other ſeruauntes seruantes nothing: and yet haue your seruantes taken much more paines in one daie, then all your idle Chaplaines haue doone in a yere. Therefore if they will not freelie and friendelie consider your liberalitie, and depart with you of the same goods gotten in your seruice, now in your great indigence and necessitie, it is pittie that they liue, and all the worlde will haue them in indignation and hatred, for their ingratitude to their Master. I thinke no lesse Thomas (quoth my Lorde:) wherefore I praise you cause all my seruants to assemble without in my great Chamber after dinner, and see them stande in order, and I will declare vnto them my mind. After that the wordes ende was taken vpp, Master Cromwell came to the Gentleman Vsher and saide. Hearde you not (quoth hee) what my Lorde said? Yes Sir, quoth hee, I did; why then, quoth hee, call all the Gentlemen and yeomen vpp into the great Chamber, and so it was doone: the Gentlemen placed on the right side of the Chamber, and the Yeomen on the other side, and at the last my Lord came out in his rochet vpon a biolet gowne like a bishop, who went straight to the vpper end of the saide chamber, where was the great Windowe, standing there a while, his Chaplaines about him, beholding the goodlie number of his seruants, who coulde not speake vnto them vntill the teares ranne downe his cheekes, which few teares perceiued by his seruantes, caused the fountaines of water to gush out of their faithfull eyes in such sort, as it woulde cause a cruell hart to lament. At the last, after he had turned his face to the window, and dried his moisted cheekes, he spake to them in this sort in effect. Most faithfull gentlemen, and true harted Yeomen, I do not lament to see you about mee, but I lament in a maner, a certaine ingratitude on my behalfe towards you all, in whom hath bin a great default that in my prosperitie haue not done so much for you as I might haue done either in deed or in word, which laie in my power then to do, but then I knew not the seluel and special treasure I had in my house of you my faithfull seruantes; but now experience hath taught me, and with the eyes of my discretion I do perceiue the same. There was neuer thing that repented me more that euer I did, then both the remembrance of my great and most obliuious negligence, & unkind ingratiued that I haue not promoted, preferred, and aduanced you all, according to your demerits; howebeit, it is not unknowne vnto you all, that I was not so fullie furnished of temporal promotions in my gift, as I was of spirituall preferments; and if I should haue preferred you to anie of the Li. offices, then should I haue run in the indignation of the Kings seruants, who would not much let to report behind my back, that there could no office in the Li. gift, escape the cardinal & his seruantes; and thus should I haue run in open slander before all the worlde. But now it is come to this passe, that it pleased the king to take all that euer I haue, into his hands, so that I haue nothing to giue you: for I haue nothing left mee but my bare clothes vppon my backe, the which are simple in comparison that I had, howbeit, if it might doe you anie good, I woulde not sticke to diuide the same among you, but my good gentlemen and Yeomen, my trustie and faithfull seruants, and of whome no prince had the like, I shall require you to take some patience with me a while; for I doubt not, but that the king considering my suggested offence by mine enemies, which is put against me to be of small griefe or hart, for so great and sodaine an overthrow will shortly restore me to my living, so that I shall be more able to deuide my substance among you, whereof ye shall not lacke, for whatsoeuer shall chance hereafter to be an ouerplus and superfluitie of my reuenues, at the determination of my p̄cey account, it shall be distributed among you: for I wil neuer during my life, esteeme the goods of riches of this world any other wise, then which shall be sufficient to maintaine the state, that God hath, and shall call me to. And if the king doe not so shortly restore me, then will I write for you, either to the king, or to any noble man within this realme to retaine your seruice: for I doubt not but the king or any noble man of this realme will credite my letter in your commendation: therefore in the meane time I would aduise you to repaire home to your wiues, such as haue wiues, and some of you that haue no wiues, to take a time to visit your parents in the Countrey. There is none of you all, but once in a yere ye would require licence to see and visite your wife and other your friends: take this time therefore in that respect, and in your return I wil not refuse you to beg with you. I consider that your seruice in my house hath bin such, that ye be not apt to serue any man vnder the degree of a king: therefore I would aduise you to serue no man but the king, who I am sure wil not refuse you. Therefore I shall desire you to take your pleasure for a month, and then ye may come againe: and by that time I trust the k. will extend his mercy vpon me. Sir (quoth M. Cromwel) there be diuers of these your peomen that would be glad to see their friends, but they lacke money: therefore here be diuers of your chaplaines who haue receiued at your hands great benesses, & liuings, let them shew themselves vnto you as they be bound to do: I thinke their honesty and charity is such, that they will not see you lacke, that may do you good or pleasure. And for my part, although I haue not receiued of your graces gift one peny toward the increase of my liuing, yet wil I giue you this toward the dispatch of your seruants: and therewith deliuered to my lord 5. l. in gold: and now let vs see what your chaplains will do, I thinke they wil depart with you much more liberally than I, who be more able to giue you a pound then I a penie, go to masters (quoth he) to the chapleins: Insomuch as they gaue to my l. liberallie, some 10. l. some 20. nobles, some 5. l. and so some more, & some lesse, as their powers would extend at that time: by means whereof my lord receiued among them, as much money, as paid the peomen 10. s. a peece towards their quarters wages, and as much money as would paie euery of them for a months boord wages: and then they departed do home into the hall, where some determined to go to their friends, and some would not depart from my lord, untill they might see him in better estate. My lord returned into his chamber lamenting the departure from his seruants, making his moane to Master Cromwell, who comforted him the best he coule, and desired my lord to giue him leaue, to go to London, whereas he woulde either make or marre (which was alwaies his common word.) Then after a little communication with my lord in secret, he departed, and toke his horse, and rode to London. At whose departing he said to my lords gentlemen, fare well, well, ye shall heare shortly of me, and if I speede well, I will not faile to be here againe within these two daies, and so he rode on his tourneie, Ralph Sadler, since a knight, was then his clearke, and rode with him. After my L. had supped that night, and all men got to bed, being Alhalowne daie about midnight, one of the porters wakened the gentleman vsher, & tolde him that there were a great number of horsemen at the gate, that would com in, saying that it was Sir Iohn Russell: the gentleman vsher had the porter goe downe, and make a great fire in the lodge to drie them, for it had rained al that night most vehementlie. The saide gentleman vsher rose, cast on his night Colvne, and went to the gates, and asked who was there: with that Master Russell spake, and the gates were opened, Sir Iohn Russell went to the fire to drie him, and saide he came from the king on message to my Lorde, Sir, quoth the gentleman vsher, I trust your newes be good. Yea I promise you on my fidelitie, and so tel him, that I haue brought him such newes wat will please him well. The cardinall was wakened, and told of the tourneie taken by Sir Iohn Russell that troublesome night: I praise God al be for the best quoth my lorde: Yes quoth the gentleman vsher, he told me it was such newes, as ye would greatly reioice to heare: wel then, quoth he, God be praised, and welcome be his grace, go ye and fetch him to me, and by that time I will be ready to talke with him.

Sir Ralph Sadler.

Sir Iohn Russell sent to the cas-tall.

When Sir Russell was come to my lord he had cast on his night gowne, vnto whom Sir Russell made most humble reuerence vpon his knee, whom my Lorde stopped vnto, and toke him vp, and bad him welcome: Sir (quoth he) the King commendeth him vnto you, and deliuered him a great ring of gold, with a turkes for a token, and willed me to bid you be of good cheere, for he loueth you as wel as euer he did, and is soze for your trouble, whose minde runneth much vpon you: insomuch that before his grace sate downe to supper, he called mee vnto him, and desired me to take the pains secretlie to visit you, and to comfort you the best of my power. And Sir I haue had the sorest tourneie for so litle a waite, that euer I had to my remembzance; my lord thanked him for his paines and good newes, and demanded of him if he had supped, and he said naie; wel then quoth my L. cause the cookes to prouide some meat for him, and cause a chamber to be prouided for him, that he maie take his rest a while vpon a bedde; all this commandement was fulfilled, and in the mean time my L. and Sir Russell were in secret communication, and in the end Sir Russell went to his chamber, and said he would tarie but a while, for he would be at the court, at Crénwiche again before dase, and would not for anie thing that it were known that he had bin with my L. that night. And so being in his chamber, hauing a smal repast, rested him a while vpon a bedde, while his seruantes supped, and dried them. And that doone, incontinent hee rode a waie with speede againe to the court. After this within a while, my lord was restored to plate, besseel, and household stuffe, of enerie thing necessarie some part, so that hee was better furnished than before.

Parliament at the Blacke Friers.

The Cardinall indightred in the premunire.

mayum, or thereabouts: and hee being within London deuised with himselfe to be one of the Burgessees of the Parliament, and chanced to meeete with one Sir Thomas Rush knight, a speciall friende of his, whose sonne was appointed to bee a burgesse, of whome he obtained his come, and so put his foote into the Parliament House: so that within two or thre dayes after his departure from my lord he came againe to Athere, with a pleasant countenance: and saide, that he had once aduentured to put in his foote, where he would be better regarded or euer the Parliament was finished. Then talked hee with my Lord, and after his talke, he rode againe to London, because he would not be absent from the Parliament in the Morning. There was nothing doone against him in the Parliament house, but he sent to my Lorde to knowe what answere hee might make in his behalfe: Insomuch, that there was nothing alledged against my lord, but that he was readie to make answere thereto: Insomuch, that at the length his honest estimation, & earnest behauior in his Masters cause, grew so in euerie mans opinion, how that hee was the most faithfull seruant to his Master of all other, wherein hee was greatlie of all men commended. Then was there brought in a Bill of Articles into the parliament house, to haue my Lorde condemned of treasons, against which bill Master Cromwell inueyed so discretelie with such wittie perswasions, and deepe reasons, that the same coule take no effect. Then were his enemies constreyned to indight him in a premunire, all which was to intitle the king to his goods and possessions, the which hee hadde obtained and purchased for: the maintenaunce of his Colledges in Oxforde and Ipswich, whereof hee was then in building, in the most sumptuous wise: wherein when my Lorde was demanded by the Iudges which were sent vnto him to knowe his minde, and to take his aunswere therein, hee aunswered them in this wise: my lordes Iudges (quoth hee) the Kings highnesse knoweth, whether I haue offended his Maestie or no, in vsing of my prerogatiue legantine, for the which I am indightred. I haue the Kings licence in my Coffers, vnder his hande, and broade Seale, for the exercising and vsing thereof in the most largest wise, the which nowe are in the handes of mine enemies. Therefore because I will not stand in question with the king in his owne cause, I will here presentlie confesse before you the indightment, and put mee wholie to the mercie and grace of the King, trusting that he hath a conscience, and a discretion to consider the trueth, and my humble submission and obedience, wherein I might right well stand to the tryall thereof by Justice: but thus much you maie saie to his highnes, that I am wholie vnder his obespance and will, & do submitte my selfe to all things that shall bee his Princelie pleasure, whose will and commandement I neuer disobeyed or repugned, but was alwayes contented, and gladd to please him before God, whome I ought most chieflie to haue obeyed, the which nowe mee repentes: notwithstanding, I most heartilie requaire you to haue mee vnto his royall Maestie commended, for whome I doe and will during my life, praye to God to sende him much prosperous honour and victorie ouer his enemies, and therewith they tooke their leaue and departed. Shorltie after the king sent the duke of Norfolk vnto him in mes-
but

but that it was, was kept secret. My lord being aduertised that my lord of Norfolk was comming euen at hand, he caused all his gentlemen to waite vpon him downe through the hall into the base court to receiue the duke at the gates, and commanded all his peomen to stand in order still in the hall: and he himselfe with his gentlemen went to the gates, where he receiued my lord of Norfolk bare-headed, who embraced each other: and so led him by the arme through his hall into his chamber. And when the duke had passed through vnto the vpper end of the hall, regarding the number of tall peomen that stood on each side thereof, he turned againe to the peomen and saide: Sirs (quoth he) your diligent and faithfull seruice vnto your Maister in this his calamitie, hath purchased you of all men, noble, and ignoble, much honestie, insomuch, that the King commaunded me to saie to you in his name, that for your true and louing seruice that yee haue doone to your Maister, his highnesse will see you at all times furnished with seruices according to your demerites: with that my Lord put off his cappe, and saide to my Lord of Norfolk, sir (quoth
 he) these men bee all approued men, wherefore it were pittie they shoulde want anie seruice: and beeing sozie that I am not able to doe for them as my heart wisheth, I will therefore requite you my good Lord, to bee good Lord vnto them, and extende your charitie amongst them, where or when ye shall see occasion at anie time hereafter, and that yee will prefer their diligence and faithfull seruice vnto the king. Doubt you not my lord (quoth he) but I will do for them the best in my power, & whereas I shall see cause I will be earnest suiter for them to the king: and some of you I will haue my selfe in seruice for right honest men, and as you haue begun, so continue, vntill ye heare more of the kings pleasure, Gods blessing and mine be with you, and so went vp into the great chamber to dinner, whom my lord cardinall thanked, and saide vnto him: yet my Lord of all other noblemen I haue cause to thanke you, for your noble & gentle heart, the which you haue shewed me behinde my backe, as my seruaunt Th. Cromwel hath reported vnto me: but euen as ye be a noble man in deede, so haue you shewed your selfe no lesse to all men in calamitie, and in especiall to me, whome ye haue brought down from my high estate: but now againe beeing in this miserable state, ye haue extended your fauour most honourable, with great charitie, &c. The dinner ended, the cardinall and duke went into my Lordes priuie Chamber, where they continued in consultation: and being there, it chanced Maister Shelley the Iudge to come thither, who was sent from the King, whereof relation was made to my Lord: which caused the duke and him to breake vp their communication. And as the duke desired to goe to a Chamber, hee mette with Maister Shelley, to whom Maister Shelley resorted. And after hee had made relation of the cause of his comming hee desired my Lord of Norfolk to tarrie, and to assist him in dowing of his message: whome hee denied, and saide, I haue nothing to do with your message, wherein I will not meddle, and so departed into a Chamber, where hee tooke his rest for an houre or two: and in the meane time my Lord issued out of his priuie chamber, and came to maister Shelley to know his message, who after due salutations, did declare vnto him that the Kings pleasure was to haue my

my Lordes house, called Bozke place, neere Westminster, belonging to the Bishoppe of Bozke, and to possesse the same, according to the lawe of his realme: his highnes hath sent for all the Judges, and for all his learned counsell to know their opinions for the assurance thereof, whose opinions be fullie resolved that your Grace must make a recognisance, and before a Judge to acknowledge and confesse the right thereof to belong to the king and his successors, and so his highnes shall be assured therof: wherefore it hath pleased the king to appoint and send mee hither to take of you the same recognisance, hauing in your grace such assurance, as that ye will not refuse so to do. Therefore I shall desire your grace to know your pleasure therein. Shelley (quoth my Lorde) I knowe that the king of his owne nature is of a roiall stomacke, not willing more than iustice shall leade him vnto by the lawe: And therefore I counsell you, and all other Judges and learned men of his counsell, to put no more into his head than lawe that maie stande with conscience: for when yee tell him this is the law, it were well done ye should tel him also, that although this be the law, yet this is conscience: for law without conscience is not met to be giuen to a king by his counsel, to be ministred by him, ne by anye of his ministers; for euery counsellor to a king ought to haue a respect to conscience before the rigor of the law. For Laus est facere quod decet, non quod licet. The king ought for his roiall dignitie and prerogative to mitigate the rigor of the law, where conscience hath no more force. And thefore in his princely place he hath constituted a chancelor to order for him the same. And heretofore the court of Chancerie, hath bene commonly called the court of conscience, because it hath iurisdiction to commaund the law in euery case to desist from the execution of the rigor of the same, whereas conscience had most effect. Therefore I saie to you, that in this case, although you and other of your profession perceiue by the orders of the lawe, that the king maie lawfully do that thing which yee requyre of me: how say you master Shelley, may I do it with conscience, to giue that a waile which is none of mine from me and my successors? if this bee the lawe and conscience, I praye you shewe me your opinion. Forsooth my Lorde (quoth he) there is a great conscience: but hauing regarde to the kings high power, and to a better purpose, it maie the better stand with conscience: who is sufficient to recompence the church of Bozke with double the value. That I knowe wel, but here is no such condition (quoth my L.) but onlie a bare & simple departure with anothers right. For if euery bish. that maie, should so do, then might euery prelate giue away the patrimony of their dignities, which should be but smallie to the kings honor. Well I will not stand with you long in this matter. Let me see your commission: to whome master Shelley shewed the same. And that seene, Passer Shelley, quoth he, yee shall shewe the kings highnes that I am his most faithfull subiect, obediencer and brad-man, whose roiall commandement and request I will in no wise disobey, but fulfill his pleasure in all such things wherein yee fathers of the law saie, that I maie lawfully do, therefore I charge your conscience to discharge me, howbeit shewe his highnes from mee, that I most humbly desire his maiestie to call to his most gracious remembrance, that there is both a heauen and hell. And there withall the the cleark took and wrote the recognisance, and after some secret talke they departed. Then rose the Duke of Norffolke from his repast, and after some communication with my lorde, he likewise departed. Thus continued my lorde at Ather, who receiued daily messages from the court, some good, and some as euill, but no euill than good: for his enemies procured his disquietnesse what they could, as some daie they would cause the king to sende for foure or fife of his gentlemen from him to serue the king, and another daie they would take awaie some of his promotions, or some of their promotions whome he had preferred before. Then would they fetch from him some of his peomen, insomuch as the king took sixtene of them at one time into his guard. This was his life for a long time, so that there was not one daie, but or euer he went to bedde, he had an occasion greatlie to chafe, and frette the heart out of his bodie, but that he was a wise man, and bare all things in patience. At Christmasse he fell verie sore sicke, most likelie to die, whereof the king being advertised, was verie sorie, and sent Doctor Buts his Physician vnto him; to see in what estate he was. Doctor Buts came vnto him, finding him lying verie sicke in his bedde: and perceiving the danger returned to the king, of whome the king demaunded, saying: Haue ye saine yonder man? Pea sir (quoth he.) How do you like him (quoth the king?) Sir (quoth he) if ye will haue him dead, I warrant him, he will be dead wthin these foure daies, if he receiue no comfort from you shortly: Parte (quoth the king) God forbid that he should die: I praye you master Buts go againe vnto him, and doe your cure vnto him, for I would not lose him for twentie thousand pound. Then must your grace (quoth master Buts) send him first some comfortable message, as shortly as ye can: cuen so I will (quoth the king) by you, and therefore make speede to him againe, and ye shall deliuer him this ring from me for a token, in the which ring was ingrauen the kings Image, within a rubie, as like the king as coulde bee deuised. This ring hee knoweth right well, for hee gaue me the same, and tell him that I am not offended with him in my heart any thing at all, and that shall hee knowe shortly: therefore bid him plucke vpe his heart, and bee of good comfort, and I charge you, come not from him untill ye haue brought him out of daunger of death. And so Doctor Buts departed with speede to Ather, after whome the king sent Doctor Cromer the Scot, Doctor Clement, and Doctor Wotton, to consult with master Buts for my lordes recoverie.

After master Buts had bene with my Lorde, and deliuered the kings tokens vnto him, with the most comfortable wordes that he could deuise in the kings behalfe, he reioyced not a little, and advanced him in his bedde, and receiued the tokens most ioyfullie, thanking master Buts for his paines and good comfort: Master Buts tolde him furthermore that the kings pleasure was that he should minister vnto him for his health, and to soyne with him for the better and most assured waies, he hath sent hither doctor Clement, doctor Cromer and doctor Wotton. Therefore my lorde (quoth he) it were well done they were called in to visit you, and to consult with them: to this mess-on my lord was contented to heare their iudgements, and it was not long ere they had brought him out of danger, and within foure daies set him on his seate, and got him a stomacke to meate, all which done, they took their leaue to depart, refusing bitterlie all rewards profered them, saying the king had giuen them especiall commandement that they should take of him nothing, for at their retourne he himselfe would reward them. Thus my Lord continued at Alher untill Candlemas, against which feast the king caused to be sent to my lord three or foure cart lodes of stuffe, as bedding, plate, hangings, kitchen stuffe, &c. Then commanded he master Cromwell to make earnest suite to the king, that he might remove from thence to some other house: which suite at the kings hands master Cromwell obtained, for the king was contented he should remove to Richmond, which place my lord had a little before repaired to his great costes: for the king had made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. All this was done without knowledge of the kings counsell: for if they might haue had vnderstanding hereof before, then would they haue perswaded the king to the contrarie: but when they knew of the kings grant and licence, although they dissimuled their minds in the kings presence (yet were they afraid of him, least his nigh resort to the king might moue the king at some byaide to haue resorted vnto him, and to haue called him home againe, considering the great louing affection that the king daily shewed vnto him: wherefore they doubted his rising vp againe, if they found not a meane shortly to remove him further from the king. Inso-much that they thought it conuenient for their purpose to moue the king vpon considerations which they inuented, that it were verie necessarie that my Lord should go downe into the north vnto his benefice, where he should be a good state for the countrie, to the which the king condescended. Whereupon my Lord of Norfolke bade master Cromwell to saie to him, that he must go home to his benefice: who at his next repaire to my lord (then lying at Richmond) declared to him how it was determined that he should go home to his benefice. Well then Thomas (quoth my lord) we will go to Winchester. I will (quoth master Cromwell) shewe my lord of Norfolke what yee saie: and so he did. What should he do there (quoth the Duke?) naie let him go to his Archbishoppke of Poike, where his honoz and more charge lieth: and so shewe him. The lordes who were not his friends, moued the K. to giue my lord a pension of 4000. markes out of Winchester, and the rest to distribute among his nobilitie and seruants, and so in like wise to diuide the reuenues of Saint Albons, whereof some had three hundred marks, and some an hundred pounds, and so some more, and some lesse. And all the reuenues of the lands belonging to his Colledges of Oxford and Ipswich, which the king toke into his owne hands: whereof master Cromwell had the receipt and gouernance afore by my lordes assignment. Wherefore it was thought verie necessarie, that he should so haue still, who executed all things thereof so exaclie and wittily, that he was had in great estimation for his behauiour herein, and also for the true and faithfull demeanoz towards his lord and master. Then it came to passe, that those to whome the king had giuen anie annuities or fees for terme of life

by paffent, would not be good, but onely during my lordes life, forasmuch as the king had no longer state therein, the which he had by reason of my lordes attaindoz, in the premunice, and to make their estates good and sufficient for the terme of their liues, there was none other thiffe, but to obtaine my lordes confirmation of their paffents. And this to bee brought about, there was no meane but to sue to master Cromwell to attaine the same at my Lordes handes, who they thought the best instrument for the purpose. Then began euerie man, both noble men and gentlemen, who had ante paffents of the king out of Winchester or Saint Albons, to make suite to master Cromwell, to sollicite the cause to my lord, to get therein his confirmation, and for his paines therein, both worthily rewarded him, and euerie man to shew him such pleasure as should be at all times in their feuerall powers, whereof they assured him: wherein master Cromwell perceiued an occasion giuen him to helpe himselte, and to bring to passe that hee long sought for, intending to worke in this matter according to their desires, the soner to bring his owne enterprise and purpose to passe. Then at his next returne to my lord he moued this matter to him, and so perswaded with him, that they both wrought together to bring master Cromwell in place where hee might doe good to my lord, and also to himselte. And now he hauing the ordering and disposition of the landes of these Collicoges, he had great occasions of suites, besides his continuall accesse to the king, by meanes whereof he getwe into the kings fauour, who reputed him to be a vertie wise man, and a meete instrument to serue his grace.

Now the lordes thought long to haue the cardinall remoued further out of the kings way, wherefore among other of my lordes, the duke of Norfolke said to M<sup>r</sup>. Cromwell: Cromwel (quoth he) me thinke the cardinall thy master maketh no haste to go northward, tell him, if he go not away, but shall tarrie, I will teare him with my teeth: therfore I would aduise him to prepare himselte awaie as shortly as he can, or else he shall be sent for ward. These wordes M<sup>r</sup>. Cromwell reported to my lord at his next repaire to him, who then had an occasion to resort to him for the dispatch of the noble and gentlemens paffents. And here I will leaue off this matter, and speake of other things that in this meane time happened.

The lady Margaret dutchesse of Sauoy Ant to the emperoz, & the lady Lewes dutchesse of Angolessme, mother to the French king, met at Cambray in the beginning of the moneth of June last past, to treat of a peace, where were present docto<sup>r</sup> Tonstall bishop of London, and sir Tho. Moore chanceloz of the duchie of Lancaster, commissioners for the K. of England. At length through diligence of the said ladies, a peace was concluded betwene the emperoz, the pope, the kings of England, and of France. This peace was called the womans peace, and was proclaimed by heraults, with the sound of trumpets in the cite of London, to the great reioicing of the merchants, who in time of the wars had sustained much hinderance.

The 26. of October at Greenwith, sir Th. Moore late chanceloz of the duchie of Lancaster, was made lord chanceloz of England, and the next daie led

The new Testament printed in English.

William Tindall hauing translated the new Testament into English, and caused the same to be printed beyonde the seas, manie of the m were conuicted into Englund, and there made sale of, as good merchandise, for many men desired to haue them, but this translation was forbidden by the K. to bee used of his subiects: for his counsell, namely the bishops affirmed that the same was not truly translated, and that therein were prologues and pcefes sounding to heresse, with vncharitable railing against bishops and the clergy. The king therefore commanded the Bishops, that they calling to them the best learned men of the Vniuersities should cause a new translation to be made, that the people without danger might read the same for their better instruction in the lawes of God.

Ann. reg. 22.

Ambassadors to the emperor and pope.

The K. vnderstanding that the Emperoz and the Pope were appointed to meete at Bononie or Boloigne, where the emperoz should bee crowned, sent thither an ambassade from him the earle of Wiltshire. Doctor Stokesley elected bishop of London, and his almoner doctor Edward Lee, to declare both vnto the pope and emperoz the law of God, the determinations of the vniuersities in the case of his marriage, & to require the pope to do iustice according to trueth, and also to shew to the emperoz, that the king did moue this matter, onely for discharge of his conscience, and not for anie other respect of pleasure or displeasure earthly: these ambassadors coming to Bonony, were honozable receiued, and first doing their message to the pope, had answer of him, that he woulde heare the matter disputed when hee came to Rome, and according to right he would do iustice. The emperoz answered, that he in no wise woulde do against the lawes of God, and if the court of Rome woulde iudge that the matrimonie was not good, hee woulde bee contented to stand by the dispensation, which he thought to bee of force enough to prooue the marriage lawfull. With these answeres the ambassadors departed, and returned homewards, till they came on this side the mountaines, and then receiued letters from the K. which appointed the earle of Wiltshire to go ambassador to the French K. which then lay at Burdeaur, making shift for mony for the redeeming of his sonnes. And the bishop of London was appointed to go to Padua, and other Vniuersities in Italy, to know their full resolutions and determinate opinions in the kings case of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne into Englund.

Sute to Rome forbidden.

Afterwards king Henry vpon occasion of delate made by the Pope in his controuerfie of disoucement, and through displeasure of such reportes as hee heard had bin made of him to the court of Rome, & thirly pycked forward by some counsellors, to follow the example of the Germans, caused proclamation to be made on the 19. of September, forbidding all his subiects to purchase anie manner of thing from the court of Rome, containing matter preiudiciall to the high authoritie, iurisdiction, and prerogatiue rofall of this Realme, to the hinderance and impeachment of the kings maiesties noble and vertuous intended purposes.

Cardinall Wolsey hauing licence of the king (as ye haue heard) to repaire into Richmond, was there lodged with in the lodge of the great parke, which was a verie pretie house, there my lord lay untill Lent with a pretie number of his seruants, for the rest went to woꝝd wages. You haue heard tofore what woꝝds the Duke of Norfolke had to master Cromwel, touching my lords going into his benefice of Poꝝke. At such time as master Cromwell tolde these woꝝds to my lord: Maie Thomas (quoth my lord) then is it time to be going, if he take it so, therefore I pray you to go to the king, and saie I would go to my benefice of Poꝝke but for lacke of money, desiring his grace to helpe me with some: for ye maie say that the last money that I receiued from his grace hath bene too little to paie mine olde debts, and to compell me to the painment thereof hath bene too much extremitie, taking my goods from me, wherein I trust his grace will haue a charitable respect: ye maie also shewe my lorde of Norfolke and other of the counsell, that I would depart if I had money. Cromwell went to London, and my lorde remoued out of the lodge into the charterhouse at Richmond, where he lay in a lodging with doctor Collet, made for himselfe, untill he remoued northward, which was in the Passion weeke: and euerie daie resorted to the charterhouse there, and in the after noones hee would sit in contemplation with one of the most ancient fathers of that house in their cels, who conuerted him, and caused him to despise the vaine glorie of the world, and gaue him shirtes of haire to weare, the which he ware diuers times after. When master Cromwell came to the court, he shewed my Lorde of Norfolke, that my lord would gladly go northward, but for lacke of money, wherein he desired his helpe to the king. When was the king moued therein as well by master Cromwel, as by the counsell: which matter the king referred to determine and assigne to the counsell, who were in diuers opinions, so that after long debating it was concluded that he should haue by way of prest a thousand markes of his pension out of Winchester: when this determination was concluded, they declared the same to the king, who straightwaie commanded the same thousande markes to be deliuered out of hande to master Cromwell, and so it was. The king commanded master Cromwell to resort to him againe, when he had receiued the same summe of money: at whose returne to the king, the king said: Shew my lord, although our counsell haue assigned no summe of money for to beare his charges, yet ye shall shewe him in my behalfe, that I haue sent a thousand pound of my beneuolence, and tell him that he shall not lacke, and bid him be of good cheere. Maister Cromwell humbly in my lords behalfe, thanked the king, and therewith departed, and came to Richmond to my lord, to whom he deliuered the money, and thereof it was leuied, that the counsell sent him, and of the money which the king sent him, adding thereto the kings comfortable sayings, wherein my lord did not a little reioice. Then my lord prepared all things for his iourney, and sent to London for liuerie clothes for his seruants that should ride with him: so that all things being furnished towards his iourney, in the beginning of passion weeke before Easter he set forthward, and rode from Richmond to a place of the abbot of Westminster called Hendon: the next daie he removed to a place where plady Parry lay called the Kie: the next day to Rossford, where he lodged in the priorie: the next daie to Huntington, and there lodged in the Abbey. And the next daie he removed to Peterborough, and there lodged in the abbey, making there his abode all the next weeke, where he kept his solenne feast of Easter, with all his traine, in number 160. persons, hauing with him twelue cartes to carrie his stuffe of his owne, which he sent forth from his Colledge of Oxford, that were there prouided, beside thre score other carts of his dailie carriage of necessaries for his buildings. Upon palme fundaie he went in procession with the monkes. And vpon maundie thursdaie he made his maundie there in our Ladie chappell, hauing 59. poore men, whose fete he washed, and kissed after he had wiped them, he gaue euerie of the said poore men twelue pence in money, thre elles of good cannas to make them thirties, a paire of new shooes, a cast of red herrings and thre white herrings, and one of them had two shillings. Upon easter daie he rose to the resurrection, &c. On thursdaie next he removed to master Fitz Williams knight (sometime a merchant tailor of London, and then of the kings counsell, who dwelt within thre or foure miles of Peterborough) where he was foyfullie receiued, and had honorable entertainment. On mundaie next he removed vnto Stamford, and the next daie to Grantham, and was lodged in the house of master Hall. The next night he lodged in the Castle of Newark, where he remained the next daie, and from thence rode to Southwell, and there continued the most part of that summer, not without great resort of the most worshipfull of the countrey. And diuers noble men hauing occasion to repaire into the same countrey there, thought it good to visit my lord as they travelled, of whome they were most gladly entertained, and had right good chere: whose noble and gentle behauior caused him to haue much loue in the countrey of all kinde of people: he kept there a noble house, where was both plentie of meate and drinke for all commers, and also much almes giuen at his gate vnto the poore of the towne and country. He vsed much charity and clemencie among his tenants and other: he made managreements betwene gentlemen and gentlemen, and betwene some gentlemen and their wiues, and other meane persons, the which had bene long before a sunder and in great trouble, making for euerie of them (as occasion serued) great assemblies & feasts, not sparing his purse where he might make amittie. It chanced vpon Corpus Christi euen, in the night, when my lord and all his household were at rest in their beds, there knocked at the gate two gentlemen, the one named master Brierton one of the gentlemen of the kings private chamber, and master Wrietherley, who were come from the king in post to speake with my lord. These were let in, my lord was raised, and came to them into the dining chamber: they seeing him in his night apparell, did to him due reuerence, whom he toke by the hands, demanding how the king his soueraigne lord did. Sir (said they) right well and merry, we must desire to talke with you apart: With a good will (quoth he.) After long talke, they toke forth of a little maile a little coffer covered with with graine belnet, and bound with bars of silver and gilt, with a locke and a gilt key, with the which they opened the chest, out of the which they toke an instrument or booke containing more than a skinne of great parchment, having manie seales hanging to the same, whereunto they put more iware for my lordes seale: the which my lord sealed, and subscribed his name with his owne hand, and deliuered the same againe vnto them, desiring them to take a bed: for it was somewhat past midnight. But they saide they would straight way ride to the earle of Shrewsburie, to be with him ere he were stirring: so my lord caused them to eat such colde meate as was readie, and to drinke a boile or two of wine: that done, he gaue each of them foure olde soueraignes of fine golde, and so they departed. In this sort and manner my lord late at Southwell untill about the latter end of grasse time, then he removed to Rewike, an abbey, to Kufford and Blith abbey, and so to Scroby, where he continued till after Michaelmas, exercising many deedes of charity, a commonly euery sunday he would trauell vnto some poore parish church, and there would say his diuine service, and cause one of his chaplaines to preach vnto the people: that done, he would dine in some honest house of the towne, where should be distributed to the poore a great almes in meat and drinke, as of monie. About the feast of S. Michael, he removed to Calwood castle within 7. miles of Pozke, where he lay long after with much honor and loue of the countrey, doing deedes of charitie, and held there an honorable household for all comers, and also built and repaired the castle, hauing artificers and laborers about the number of 300. persons daillie in wages, &c. At length being thereunto perswaded by the doctors of the church of Pozke, he determined to be stalled there at Pozke minster the next mundaie after Alhallowne day, against which time due preparation was made for the same, but not in so sumptuous wise as were his predecessours. My lord sent his gentleman vther to Pozke, to foresee things there that should bee ordered and provided for the solemnitie, which should haue bene as meane as could be. Upon Alhallowne daie one of the head officers of the Church of Pozke, which should haue the most dooings in all this stallation, was with my lord at dinner at his house of Calwood, and sitting at dinner they fell in communication of this matter, and of the order thereof, saying, that my lord should go on foote from a chappell of Saint Iames, without the gates of the citie vnto the minster vpon cloth, the which should be distributed among the poore after his passage. My Lord hearing this, made answer in this wise: Although our predecessours did go vpon cloth, so we intend to go on foote from thence without any such gloze, for I take God to witnes, I do not intend to go thither for any triumph or gloze, but only to performe the rules of the church, to the which I am bound. And therefore I desire you all, and will command other my seruants to go as humble thither without anie sumptuous or gorgeous apparell, other wise than in decent maner: for I doe purpose to come to Pozke vpon Sundae at night next, and to lodge in the deans house, and vpon munday to be stalled, and there to make but a dinner for you of the close, and for other worshipfull gentlemen that shall chaunce to come thither to the same, and to suppe with some of the residences, and the next daie to dine with the Maſoz, and then to prepare home hither againe. The daie being once knowne vnto all the countrie, which coulde not bee hid, the worshipfull Gentlemen and other, as Abbots and Priors sent in such provision of victualles, that it is almost incredible, as of fat beaſts and muttons, wilde fowle, and veniſon both red and fallowe, and other daintie things such as would haue plentifully furnished the feaſt. All which things were vnknewen to my lord, for as much as hee being preuented and diſappointed of his purpose, by reason that he was arreſted of high treason, as ye ſhall heare hereafter, ſo that moſt part of this Sommer provision, was ſent vnto Poſke that ſame daie of his arreſt, and the next daie following: for his arreſt was kept as cloſe and ſecret from the countrie, becauſe they doubted the common people, which had him in great eſtimation and loue, for his great charitie and liberality which he vſed daily amongſt them. It is appointed by the king & counsell, that Sir Walter Waſh knight, one of the kings priuate chamber, ſhoulde be ſent downe with a commiſſion into the North vnto the earle of Northumberland, who was ſometime brought vp in houſe with the cardinall, and they twaine being iointlie in commiſſion to arreſt the Cardinall of high treason: Maſter Waſh tooke his horſe at the court gate about noone vpon Alhalowne daie, toward the earle of Northumberland. And now we haue 3 occaſion to declare what happened about the ſame time, which peraduenture ſignified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall ſitting at dinner vpon Alhalowne day, hauing at his bowdes end diuers chaplaines ſitting at dinner, ye ſhall vnderſtand that the cardinals great croſſe ſtood in a corner at the tables ende, leaning againſt the hanging, and when the bowdes ende was taken vp, and a conuenient time for the chaplaines to ariſe, one doctor Auguſtine a Venetian, & phyſition to the cardinall, riſing from the table with the other, hauing vpon him a great golwe of boiſſerons veluet, ouerthrew the Croſſe, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the croſſes, brake doctor Boners head, that the blood ranne downe, the companie there ſtanding, greatlie aſtonied with the chaunce. The Cardinall perceiuing the ſame, demaunded what the matter meant of their ſodayne amaze? and they ſhewed him of the fall of his Croſſe vpon doctor Boners head: and hath it, quoth he, brake anie blood? Yea forſoth my Lord quoth they: with that he caſt his head aſide, and ſaide ſhaking his heade, Malum Omen, and therewith ſaide Grace, and roſe from the Table, and went to his Chamber. Nowe marke the ſignification how the Cardinall expounded this matter at Pomfret after his fall. Firſt ye ſhall vnderſtand that the Croſſe which hee bare as Archbiſhoppe of Poſke, ſignified himſelfe, and Auguſtine the Phyſition who ouerthrew the Croſſe, was oncle hee that accuſed the Cardinall, whereby his enemies caught an occaſion to ouerthrowe him: it fell vpon doctor Boners head, who was Maſter of the Cardinales faculties and Spirituall iuriſdictions, and was then damaged by the ouerthrowe of the Croſſe: yea, and moreouer drawing blode of him, betokened death, which shortly after did enſue. About which time of this miſchaunce, the ſame verie daie and ſeaſon Maſter Waſh tooke his horſe at the Court, as nigh as coulde bee iudged, and ſo muſt needes bee taken for a signe or token of that which followed. Nowe the appointed time drew neere of his scaulation, and sitting at dinner vpon the Friday next before the Mon-daie, on the which daie hee intended to be scauled at Porke, the Earle of Northumberland and Maister Walsh, with a great companie of Gentlemen of the earles house, and of the country, whom he had gathered together in the kings name, came into the hall at Catwood, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not fullie dined, being then in his suites. The first thing that the earle did after hee had set order in the hall, hee commanded the porter at the gates to deliuer him the keies thereof, who would in no wise obey his commandement although he were roughly threatened, and straitly commanded in the kings name to make deliuey of them to one of the earles seruants: sir (quoth hee) seeing that ye do but intend to set one of your seruantes in my place to keepe the gates, I know no seruant that ye haue, but I am as able as he to do it, and keepe the gates to your purpose, whatsoeuer it be; and also the keies were de-liuered me by my L. and mast. wherefoze I pray you to pardon me, for whatsoe-uer ye shall command me to do in the ministracion of mine office, I shal do it with good will: with that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke, and commanded him to laie his hand thereon: thou shalt sweare (quoth he) that thou shalt well and true lie keepe the gates to the kings vse, and to do all such things as mee shall command, and that ye shall let passe neither in nor out at these gates, but such as ye be commanded by vs, and with this oth, hee receiued the keies at the earles hands. Of all these doings knew the cardinal nothing, for they stoppe d the staires, so that none went vp to the cardinals chamber, and they that came down, could no more go vp again: at the last one escaped, who shewed the cardis-nal that the earle was in the hall: whereat the cardinal marvelled, and woulde not beleue him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the staires, saw the earle of Northumberlande, and returned, and said it was very he: then (quoth the cardinal) I am soze that we haue dined, for I feare our officers bee not prouided of anie store of good fish, to make him some honorable chere, let the table stand (quoth hee) with that hee rose vp, and going downe the staires, hee encountred the Earle comming vp with all his suite, and as soone as the Cardinal espied the Earle, he put off his cap, and said, my Lord, ye be most heartilie welcome, and so embraced each o'her: then the cardinal tooke the earle by the hand, and had him vp into his chamber, whom followed all the number of the Earles seruantes. From thence, he led him into his bed chamber, and they being there all alone, the Earle saide vnto the cardinal, with a soft voice, laying his hand vpon his arme, my L. I arrest you of high treason: with which wordes the Cardinal beeing marueylouslie affonished, standing both still a good space, at the last, quoth the Cardinal, what authoritie haue you to arrest mee? Forsooth my lord, quoth the earle, I haue a commission so to do: where is your commission, quoth he, that I may see it?

 Saie sir that you make not, saide the earle: well then, quoth the cardinal, I will not obey your arrest. But as they were debating this matter betwene them in the chamber, so busie was M. Walsh in arresting doctor Augustine at the Doze in the Pallace, saying vnto him, go in traitor: or I shall make thee.

At

At the last master Walsh being entered the cardinales chamber, beganne to plucke off his hode, and after kneeled downe to the cardinall, vnto whome the cardinall said, come hither gentleman, and let me speake with you: sir here my L. of Northumberland hath arrested me, but by whose authoritie hee theweth not: if ye be iointed with him, I pray you shew me. And ade my lord, quoth sp. Walsh, hee theweth you the truth: well then, quoth the cardinall, I pray you let me see it. Sir, I beseech you, quoth master Walsh, hold vs excused: there is annexed to our commission certaine instructions which you maie not see: well quoth the Cardinall, I trowe yee are one of the kinges priuie Chamber, your name is Walsh, I am content to yeld to you, but not to my lord of Northumberlande without I see his commission: the worst in the kinges priuie Chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest peere of the Realme by the kinges commaundement, without anie Commission, therefore put your Commission and authoritie in execution, spare not, I will obeye the kinges will: I take God to iudge, I neuer offended the King in worde nor deed. Then the earle called into the Chamber dyuers Gentlemen of his owne seruantes, and after they had taken the Cardinales keyes from him, they put him in custodie of the earles Gentlemen, and then they went about the house to set all things in an order: then sent they Doctor Augusine a waie to London with as much speeche as they coude, who was bounde vnto the horse like a Traytor, but it was Sundaie towarde night ere the Cardinall was conueied from Calwood, and lodged that night in the Abby of Pomfret. The next daie hee remooued toward Dancaster, and was there lodged at the Blacke Friers, the next daie he was remoued to Sheffield parke, where the earle of Shrewsbury with his ladie, and a traine of Gentlemen and Gentlewomen receiued him with much honor: And the cardinall being thus with the earle of Shrewsbury, continued there 18. daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuers gentlemen to attend continuallie, to see that hee shoulde lacke nothing, beeing serued in his owne Chamber, as honourable as he had bene in his owne house, and ouer euerie daie the Earle woulde repaire vnto him, and commune with him. After the Cardinall had thus remayned with the Earle of Shrewsburie about a fortnight, it came to pas at a certain time as he sate at his dinner in his owne Chamber, hauing at his bordes ende a messe of Gentlemen and chaplaines to keepe him companie, towarde the ende of his dinner, when hee was come to eating his fruites, his colour was perceyued often to chaunge, whereby hee was iudged not to bee in good health: whereupon, one of his Gentlemen sayde: Sir, me seemes you are not well at ease: to whome he answered with a loud voice, forsooth no more I am, for I am, quoth he, taken sodainelie with a thing about my stomack, that lieth there along, as colde as a whetstone. which is no more but wind, I pray you go to the Poticarie, and inquite of him if hee haue anie thing that will breake wind vptoward. Then went he to the earle, and shewed him what estate the cardinall was in, and what hee desired: with that the Earle caused the poticarie to be called before him, and demanded of him if he had any thing that woulde breake wind vptowarde in a mans bodie, and hee answered hee had such geare. Then, quoth the Earle, fetch mee some: thorn the Poticarie

Cardinal lodged at Sheffield with the earle of Shrewsbury.

The cardinall sicketh.

Poticarie fetched a white confection in a faire Paper, and shewed it to the Carle, who commaunded one to giue the assaie thereof before him, and then the same to bee brought to the Cardinall, who receyued it vpper all at once into his mouth: But immediatlie after, surelie hee auoyded much wind bywarde. Lo, (quoth hee) yee maie see that it was but winde, and nowe I am well eased, I thanke God, and so he rose from the Table, and went to his prayers: And that doone, there came on him such a loosenesse, that it caused him to goe to his Stoole. And not longe after the Carle of Sh:ewsburie came into the gallerie to him, with whome the Cardinall met, and then sitting downe vpon a Bench, the Carle asked him howe hee did, and hee most lamentable aunswered him, and thanked him for his gentle entertaynement: Sir, (quoth the Carle) if yee remember, yee haue often wished to come before the King, to make your answere, and I haue wzitten to the King in that behalfe, making him p'suie of your lamentation that yee inwardlie haue re- ceined for his displeasure, who accepteth all your wrongs therein, as friends bee accustomed to do in such cases: wherefore I would aduise you to pluck vp your heart, and be not agast of your enemies, I doubt not but this your iourney to his highnes shall be much to your aduancement. The king hath sent for you that woorthypfull knight Master Kingstone, and with him 24. of your olde ser- uants, now of the guard, to the intent yee maie safelie come to his maiestie: sir (quoth the Cardinall) I trow master Kingstone is Constable of the tower: yea, what of that, quoth the Carle? I assure you hee is elected by the king for one of your friends: Well, quoth the cardinall, as God will, so be it, I am sub- iect to fortune, being a true man, readie to accept such chances as shal follow, and there an end. I pray you where is M. Kingstone? quoth the carle, I wil send for him: I praie you so do, quoth the cardinall: at whose message he came, and as soone as the Cardinall espied him, he made haste to encounter him, and at his comming hee kneeled to him, and saluted him in the kings behalfe, whom the Cardinall bare-headed offered to take vp, and said: I praie you stande vp, kneele not to me, I am but a wretch replete with miserie, not esteeming my selfe but as a vile abiect, vtterlie cast awaie without desert as God knoweth. Then saide M. Kingstone with humble reuerence, Sir, the king hath him com- mended vnto you: I thanke his highnes, quoth the cardinall, I trust hee be in health: yea, quoth M. Kingstone, and he commanded me to say to you, that you should assure your selfe that he beareth you as much good will, as euer hee did, and willet you to be of good chere, and where report hath bene made, that ye should commit against him certaine heinous crimes, which he thinketh to bee vntrue, yet he can do no lesse than to send for you to your trial, and to take your iourney to him at your own pleasure, commanding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore sir I pray you when it shall be your own pleasure to take your iour- ney, I shall be ready to giue attendance: Master Kingstone, quoth he, I thanke you for your nemes, and sir, if I were as lusty as I haue ben of late, I would ryde with you in Horse, but I am diseased with a sike that maketh mee verie weakie: but I shall with all speede make me readie to ryde with you to Wor- tow. When night came, the Cardinall waied vertie like with the Laske, the which caused him continually to go to the steele al that night, in somuch, that he had that night 50. steeles: therefore in consideration of his infirmittie, they caused him to carrie all that day: and the next daie he toke his journey with master Kingstone and them of the guard, till he came to an house of the earle of Shrewsburies, called Hardwike hall, where he lay all night verie euill at ease. The next daie he rode to Pottingham, and there lodged that night more sicke: and the next day he rode to Leicester Abbey, and by the waie wared so sicke, that he was almost fallen from his mule, so that it was night before he came to the Abbey of Leicester: where at his comming in at the gates, the Abbot with all his couent met him with diuers torches light, whom they honorably receiued and welcommed: to whom the Cardinall said: father abbot, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding so still untill he came to the staires of the chamber, where he alighted from his mule, and master Kingston led him vp the staires, and as soone as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the saturday at night, and then encreased sicker and sicker, untill Mondae, that all men thought he would haue died. So on Tuesdaie S. Andrewes euen, master Kingston came to him and bad him good morrow, for it was about fife of the clocke, and asked him how he did: sir, quoth he, I carrie but the pleasure of God, to render vp my poore soule into his hands: not so sir, quoth master Kingston; with the grace of God, ye shall liue and do better well, if ye will be of good chere: nay in god sooth master Kingston, my disease is such, that I cannot liue: for I haue had some experience in Physicke. Thus it is, I haue a flure with a continuall feauer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the same within eight daies, either must ensue excoziation of the entrailes, or framie, or else present death, and the best of them is death, and as I suppose this is the eight daie, and if ye see no alteration in me, there is no remedie, saue, though I maie liue a daie or twaine after, but death must ensue. Sir, quoth master Kingston, you be in such peniturnes, doubting that thing, that in god faith ye neede not. Well, well, master Kingston, quoth the Cardinall, I see the matter how it is framed: but if I had serued God as diligentlie as I haue done the king, he would not haue giuen me ower in my gray haire: but this is the iust reward that I must receiue for the diligent paines and studie that I haue had to doe him service, not regarding my seruice to God, but only to satisfie his pleasure: I praye you haue me most humble commended vnto his Royall maiestie, and beseech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance, all matters proceeding betwene him and me from the beginning of the worlde, and the progresse of the same, and most especiallie in his weightie matter, and then shall his graces conscience know whether I haue offended him or no, &c. Master Kingstone farewell: I can no more saie, but I wish all things to haue good successe, my time draweth on fast, and euen with that he began to draw his speech at length, and his tong to faste, his eyes being set, whose sight fayled him, then did they put him in remembrance of Christ his Passion, and caused the peomen of the guard to stand by to see him die, and to witnes of his words at his departure: and incontinently the clocke stroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghost, and departed departed this present life, which caused som to cal to remembrance how he said the day before, that at eight of the clock they should lose their master: One of them looked on the other, supposing that either he knewe or prophesied of his departure.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancy of men exalted by fortune to dignities: for I assure you in his time hee was the haughtiest man in all his proceedings alive, having more respect to the honor of his person, than he had to his spirituall profession, wherein should be shewed all meeknes, humility and charity, the discussing whereof any farther I leave to diuines.

Example of pride and arrogancie.

After that hee was thus departed, master Kingstone sent a posse to the king, advertised him of the departure of the cardinall by one of the gard, that saue and heard him die. And when mast. Kingstone and the abbot had consulted for the order of his buriall, it was thought good that he should be buried the next daie following: for master Kingston would not tarrie the returne of the posse: and it was thought good, that the Spaloz of Leicester and his brethren should be sent for, to see him personallie dead, to auoyde false rumors that mought happen. In the meane time the body was taken out of the bedde, who had by on him next his bodie a shirte of haire, besides his other shirte of holland: now having put upon his deade corpes, all such ornaments, as hee was professed in, when he was made Bysshoppe and Archbysshoppe, as Garter, Crosse, Ring, and Pall, with all other things due to his order and dignitie: and lying thus all daie in his Coffin open faced, euerie man that would might see him there dead, as the Spaloz, his brethren, and other did. About foure or fve of the clocke at night, he was carried downe into the Church, by the Abbot and chanoins, and service was sung for the funerals. And about foure of the clocke in the morning master Kingstone and his seruantes came into the Church, and there carried the executing of diuers ceremonies, and then was hee buried in the midst of our ladies chappel, and by that time it was fve of the clocke in the morning. Then prepared euery man to horseback being S. Andrewes day the apostle, & so toke their iourney to the court. And thus ended the life of this rich cardinal of England, whose historie, who list to read with a cleare eie, maie behold the mutabilitie of vaine honors, and brittle assurance in abundance, the vncertaintie of dignities, the flattering of fained friends, and the sickle fauor of worldly princes: whereof this L. cardinal had felt and tasted both of the sweet & sowre in each degrees, as floting from honors, losing of riches, deposed from dignities, forsaken of friends, and the mutabilitie of princes fauor: of all which things hee had in this world, the full felicitie, as long as fortune smiled vpon him, but when she beganne to frowne, how soone was hee deprived of all these mundaine ioies, and vaine pleasures, which in twentie yeeres with great tra- uaille and studie he obtained, was in one yere and lesse, with great care and sorow lost and consumed. O madnesse! O sonde desire! O foolish hope! O greedy desire of vaine honor, dignities, and riches! of what vnconstant hope and trust is it, in the false fained countenance and promise of fortune, where- fore the Prophetesse sayde full well: The saurissat & ignorat cui congregabit ea. Who is certayne that hee shall leaue his ryches that hee hath gathered in the world, would, vnto them whome he hath purposed: The Wiseman saith: That an other whome peradventure he hated in his life, shall spende it out, and consume it.

The clergy condemned in the premunire.

The Clergie of England, being iudged by the L<sup>d</sup>. learned counsell to bee in the premunire, for maintaining the power legantine of the cardinal, were called by procelle into the kings bench to answer, wherfore in their conuocation they concluded a submission, wherin they called the king supream head of the church of England, according to the law of God, and not other wise, and were contented to giue the king 100000. poundes, to pardon their offences touching the premunire.

R. H. supream head of the Church.

When the parliament was begun the 6. of Januarie, the pardon of the spiritual persons was signed with the kings hand, and sent to the Lordes, which they consented to, and signed the bill. But when the same came downe to the commons it could not so easlie passe, because diuers froward persons would also that the L<sup>d</sup>. should pardon the laity aswell as the spirituality, saying that all men which had dealt with the Cardinall were in like danger: This their saile and bold demand was thought more then reason, for that they would seeme to enuie other mens wealth, and also to restraine the king of his libertie: but at length they seemed to be sorrowfull for that they had dealt so vnaduisedly, and then the king sent them their Pardon, for the which they humble thanked him.

Conclusions against the kings marriage.

The 30. daie of March the Lorde Chancelor, and diuers other Lordes, both Spiritual and Temporal, came into the Common house, and there the Lorde Chancelor declared what the king had done, touching the doubt of his marriage, to knowe the opinions of learned men of diuers Vniuersities in Christendome, and there were reade the determinations of the same Vniuersities, which they had written and sealed, concluding, that the kings marriage could not be lawfull: there were shewed also diuers booke diuine, by doctors of foraine nations, which were to the same effect, but were not reade, for that the daie was spent.

A cooke boiled in Smithfield.

The 5. of April one Richard Rose a cooke, was boiled in Smithfield, for poisoning of diuers persons, to the number of 16. or more, at the Bishop of Rochesters place, amongst the which Benet Curwine gentleman was one, and he intended to haue poisoned the bishoppe himselfe, but hee ate no potage that daie, whereby hee escaped, marie the poore people that ate of them, manie of them died,

An. reg. 23.

King Henry sent vnto the Quene diuers Lords of the Counsell, about the last of Maye, the which Lordes in her Chamber at Greenwich, declared vnto her the determinations of the Vniuersities concerning the marriage betwixt them two, and demanded of her, whether shee would for the quietnesse of the kings conscience, put the matter to foure prelates, and foure temporal lords of the realme: but she still affirmed her selfe to be his lawfull wife, and therefore would abide in that point, till the court of Rome had made a finall ende therein.

Chantery priests of London down against their bishop.

The chanterie priests of London being called afore the bishop, who would haue

haue had them contrbutaries toward the payment of the 100000. l. granted to the k. for his pardon of the premunire, kept such a stir, in breaking into the Chapter where the Bishop sate, that the Bishop was faine with faire words to dismisse them for the time: but after vpon complaint made to the Lorde Chancelor, dyuers of them, and of their partakers were arrested and committed to prison, to the number of fiftene priests, and fwe late men, some to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and to other prisons, where they lay long after.

This yere king Henry tooke into his hands, the Hospitall of Saint Iames, nere vnto Charing Crosse, and all the medowes to the same belonging, <sup>The k. house at S. Iames built 1532.</sup> compounding with the Sisters of that house, they to haue pensions during their liues. And then builded in place of the said hospitall, a goodlie mansion, retelling still the name of S. Iames: hee also there inclosed a parke with a wall of bricke, nowe indifferently seruing to the saide mansion, as also to his place of Whitehall at Westminster.

After Christmas the Parliament beganne againe, in the which the Commons declared themselues to be soze agreed, with the cruelties of the ordi-naries, that called men afoze them ex officio. At length a booke was drawn of all their griefes, and the same deliuered to the king by the speaker, who humbly beseeched him in the name of the Commons to take such direaion therein, as to his highnes might seme expedient: whereunto the king answered hee would take aduice, and heare the partie accused speake. In this Parliament was made an act, that bishops should pay no more annuities, or other wisse mo-nie for their buls to the pope, for it was affirmed that there had bene paid for buls, of bishops and other, sith the fourth of Henry the seuenth, 60000. pounde sterling.

Parliament.

The parliament began againe after Easter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with mony towardes his charges about the edifying of pylles and other fortifications, vpon the borders foreaneust Scotland, both for better habitation to bee hadde there, and also for restraint of the Scottes that vsed to make inuasions: there was therefore a fiftene granted, but not inacted at this season, because that sodainly began a pestilence in Westminster: wherefoze the parliament was proroged.

Ann. reg 24.

The 15. of May, sir T. Moore after great suite made by him, was discharged of his chancelorship.

The twentieth eyght of Maie, Frier Elstowe standing in the Roode losse of the Friers Church at Greenwich, contraryng the Preacher doctor Curwine, sayde hee lyed, befoze the king, and was for the same sent to prison. This Provision in the towne of Caleis.

The towne of Caleis had at this season 24. C. beds, and stabling for two thousand horses, besides the villages about.

The 21. of October, King Henry rode toward Boloigne, and was by the way at Sandingfield met by the French king, and many nobles of France, who rode all to Boloigne, and were there lodged.

King H. rode to Boloigne.

The twentie five of October, whilst the king lay thus in Boloigne, the French king called a chapter of the companions of his order called Saint Michell, of whome the king of England was one, and so he there created the

Dukes

Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, to be companions of the same order, who being brought to the Chapter had their collars delivered to them, and were sworn to the statutes of the order. The same daie, they departed out of Boloigne toward Caleis: without the towne of Caleis, about the distance of two miles, the Duke of Richmond the kinges base sonne, with a great companie of noble men, which hadde not bene at Boloigne, met them, and saluting the French k. embraced him in most honorable and curteous maner. Then they passed forward to Hevenhambidge, and so to Caleis, where was such provision made for the receiving of them, as well for lodging, plate, and all such other furniture of household, as also of all sort of viandes, wines, and other necessaries, & it seemed wonderful. The French kings train was 1200. horse or more, among the which was the king of Navarre, the Cardinall of Roaine, and manie Dukes, Bishoppes, and great Estates of France, Calcoigne, Bytaine, and Poymandy: but there was lodging enough in Caleis, not onlie for them, but also for manie other, so that there were about 8000. persons lodged within the Towne at that time. Whilest these two kings lay at Caleis, king Henric made the king of Navarre knight of the Garter. The next daie, the French king, with the king of Navarre, and all the great Lordes of France, rode againe to Boloigne: and king Henry of Englande rode with them to Sandringfield, where hee made the French king a collie banquet. At this entertaine, there was a communication of a joint armie to bee made by them both, agaynst the Turke, who hadde at that time a great armie in Hungarie. The two kings should bying into the felde agaynst him fourescore thousand men, whereof 10000. to bee horsemen with artillerie and furniture, but the enemie of peace (the diuell) stirred all christian princes agaynst the Emperour, for that they feared he sought to be monarch of all Italie. Whereupon king Henry of England sent presentie to the French king, by the Lord of Poimerie the French ambassador 50000. crownes. The king of England feared & the Emperour, for queene Katherine his Aunts sake (whome the saide king had refused to be his lawfull wife) would ioine with the Pope agaynst him, therefore hee made great complayntes to the French king agaynst the saide Pope, for the wrong hee did him in the matter of deuorise, and namelie in that hee woulde constrainne him to goe in proper person to Rome, or else to sende thither a Deputie with sufficient pporie to aunswere the lawe, which the sayde king helde for rigorous: furthermoze hee requested the French king that they shoud might sende Ambassadors together agaynst the Pope to summon him to a counsell, to see what abuse and great wronges hee had done agaynst Christian Princes, and their subiects, and eracting of the clergie of England, and that the same, by the saide counsell, might bee reformed. To this the French king agreed, and forthwith willed the king of Englande to make all sure at home, and let him alone to deale abroad, but not to call the Pope to any counsell, for that by their two powers, hee was otherwise to be dealt withall. Thus was the king of Englande now bent agaynst the Pope, where of late hee hadde given monethlie threescore thousande angelles, towardes the paye of an army vnder Mounsier de Foys, for the popes deliuey, when he was holden prisoner in Castle Angell, by the late Duke of Barbons souldiers, and the prince of Orange.

The banquet being ended at Sandringfield, as is aforesaid, the three kings departed like loving brethren in great amitie. Whilst the king of England was in the French kings dominions, he had the upper hand, and likewise had the French king in the dominions of the king of England. And as the French king paid all the English mens charges at Boloigne, so did the king of England pay the French mens charges at Caleis.

The fourteenth of November the king returning into England landed at Dover.

King Henry kept his Christmase at Greenwich, and after Christmase, sir Thomas Audley keeper of the great seale, was made Lorde Chancellor of England.

King Henry
married the Lady Anne Boleine.

King Henry privately married the Lady Anne Boleine in his closet at Whitehall, on the five and twentieth day of January being S. Paules day: Mistress Anne Savage boze by Quene Annes traine, and was her selfe shortly after married to the lorde Berkeley, doctor Rowland Lee, that married the king to Quene Anne, was made Bishop of Chester, then Bishop of Countrey and Lichfield, and president of Wales.

Parliament at Westminster.
Sure to Rome forbidden.

And then began the parliament, in the which was chosen Speaker Humfrey Wingfield Gentleman of Exeques Anne. In this parliament was enacted, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the archbishop to the king, and all causes of the kings to be tried in the upper house of the Conuocation. It was also enacted the same time, that Quene Katherine should no more be called Quene, but Princesse Dowager, and the widowe of Prince Arthur.

Ann. reg 25.

After that the king perceived his new wife to be with childe, he caused all officers necessary to be appointed to her, and so on Easter eue being the 12. day of Aprill, she went to her closet openly as Quene, and was proclaimed Quene of England: and then the king appointed the day of her coronation to be kept on Whitsonday next following, and writtings were sent to all Sheriffes, to certifie the names of men of forty pound lands, to rectifie the order of knightthode, or else to make fine for the same. The assailement of which fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell master of the kings iewel house, who so used the matter, that a great summe of money was leuied to the kings vse by those fines.

The matter of appeale made by Quene Katherine, whereunto she still sticked, and by no meanes could be remoued from it, was communed of both in the Parliament house, and also in the conuocation, where it was so handled, that manie were of opinion, that not onlie her appeale, but also all other appeales made to Rome, were void, and of none effect, for that in ancient councelles it had bene determined, that a cause rising in one prouince should not be determined in an other. This matter was opened with all the circumstances to the Ladie Katherine Dowager, the which persisted still in her former her opinion, and would by no meanes reuoke her appeale to the court of Rome. Whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury docto<sup>r</sup> Thomas Cranmer accompanied with docto<sup>r</sup> John Stokesley bishoppe of London, Stephen Gardener bishoppe of Winchester, the bishopps of Bathe and Lincolne, and diuers other learned men in great number rode to Dunstable, which is five miles from Amphyll, where the princeesse Dowager laie, and there by one docto<sup>r</sup> Lee she was ascited to appeare before the said Archbishop in case of matrimony in the saide towne of Dunstable: but shee made default and appeared not, wherefore she was called peremptorily euery daie 15. daies together, and at the last for lacke of appearance, by the assent of the learned men there present, she was diuorced from the king, and the marriage declared to be holde and of none effect.

In the moneth of Maie Pope Clement sent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare personally at the generall Councell, which was appointed to be kept in the yere following: but when his commission was shewed, at the earnest request of the king, there was neither place nor time certaine specified for the keeping of that councell, and so with an vncertaine answer to an vncertaine demaunde, he departed, but not vnrwarded. Notwithstanding the king vnderstanding that the Pope, the Emperour, and the French king should meete at Pise in Iune following, he appointed the duke of Suffolke, the Lord Rocheford brother to Quene Anne, Sir William Pawlet controller of the kings house, Sir Anthony Browne, and Sir Francis Brian knights, to go in ambassage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to Pise, and also to commune with the pope there, concerning his state in the kings diuorce. These made their provision ready, and so with the number of eight score horses they went to Douer, and passing ouer to Calcis, toke their waie through France, to accomplish their ambassade as they had charge.

King Henry
required to ap-peare in a generall councell.

The kings highnesse addrested his letters to the Maior and communalte of London, signifying vnto them, that his pleasure was to solemnize the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wife Quene Anne at Westminster on Whitsondate next ensuing, willing them to make preparation, as well to fetch her grace from Grenewich to the Tower by water, as to see the Citie garnished with pageants in places accustomed, for the honour of her grace, when she should be conueyed from the tower to Westminster. Whereupon a common councell was called, and commandement giuen to the Waterbailies, of which craft the Maior was, that they shoulde prepare a Barge for the Waterlois, with a wafter, and a foyke, garnished with banners, like as they vse when the Maior is presented at Westminster, on the morrowe after the feast of Saint Simon and Iude. Also all other Craftes were commanded to prepare Barges, and to garnish them, not onely with their banners accustomed, but also to decke them with targets by the sides of the Barges, and to set up all such seemely banners and Bannerets, as they had in their Whalles, or could get to furnish their said barges, and euery barge to haue minstrels, according to which commandement great preparation of quene Anne.

was made for all things necessarie for such a noble triumph.

The nine and twentieth date of May being thursdaie, the Maior and his brethren all in Scarlet, and such as were knights had collars of Esses, and the residue having great chaines, and the Councell of the Citie assembled with them at Saint Mary Hill. And at one of the clocke descended to the new faire to their barge, which was garnished with manie godly banners and streamers and richly conered, in which barge was Shalmes, Shage, butches, and diuers other Instrumentes of Musicke, which played continually.

The coming by water from Greenwich.

After that the Maior and his brethren were in their barge, seeing that the companies to the number of fiftie barges were ready to waite vpon them, they gaue commandement to the companies, that no barge should row nearer to another, than twice the length of the barge, and to see the order kept, there were three whirries prepared, and in euery part one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order.

After which commandement given, they set forth in order, as hereafter is described. First, before the Maiors barge was a foisse, for a wafter full of ordinance, in which foisse was a great red Dragon continually moving and casting wilde fire, and round about the saide foisse stood terrible monstrous and wilde men casting fire, and making hideous noise: next after the foisse a good distance came the Maiors barge: on whose right hand was the Bachelers barge, in the which were trumpets, and diuers other melodious instruments: the deckes of the saide barge and saile yarde and the top castles were hanged with rich cloth of golde and silke: at the foreship and the sterne were two great banners rich beaten with the armes of the King and the Quene: and on the top castle also was a long streamer newly beaten with the said armes: the sides of the barge was set full of flags and banners of the deuises of the companies of Haberdashers and merchant Adventurers, and the lasserers of cordes were hanged with innumerable Pensels, hauing little belles at the endes, which made a godlie noise, and was a godly sight, wauering with the winde: on the out side of the barge were three dozen Scutcheons in metall, of the armes of the King and Quene, which were beaten vpon square Brekeram deuised, so that the right side had the Kings colours, and the lefte side the Quenes, which Scutcheons were fastened on the clothes of Golde and siluer, hanging on the deckes: on the lefte hande of the Maior was another foisse, in the which was a mount, and on the mount stood a white Faulcon crowned vpon a roste of Golde, enuironed with white roses and red, which was the Quenes deuise: about which mount sate Virgins singing and playing melodiously: Next after the Maior followed his fellowship the Haberdashers: next after them the Mercers: then the Grocers, and so euerie companie in his order, and last of all the Maiors and Sheriffes officers, euerie companie hauing melodye in their barge by themselves, and godly garnished with banners, and some couered with silke, and some with arras or such like, which was a godly sight to behold: and in this order they rowed by Greenwich to the point beyond Greenwich, and there they turned backward

In an other order, that is to wete, the Maiors and Sheriffes officers first, and the meanest craft next, and so ascending to the uppermost craft in order, and the Mayor last, as they go to Paules at Chrismasse, and in that order they rowed downe-ward to Greenwich towne, and there cast anchor, making great melodie. At thre of the clocke, the Quene apparelled in rich cloth of Golde, entred into her barge, accompanied with diuers Ladies and Gentlewomen, and incontinent the Citizens set forward in their order, their minstrels continually playing: and the Bachelers barge going on the Quenes right hande, which she took great pleasure to beholde. About the Quenes barge were many noble men, as the Duke of Suffolke, the Marquesse Dorset, the Earle of Wilshire her father, the Earles of Arundale, Darby, Rutland, Worcester, Huntington, Suffer, Orford, and manie bishops and noble men, euerie one in his barge, which was a godly sight to behold: she thus being accompanied rowed towards the Tower: and in the meane waite the ships which were commaunded to lie on the shoare for letting of the barges, shot diuers peales of guns, and ere she landed, there was a marvellous shot out of the Tower, I neuer heard the like: and at her landing, there met with her the Lord Chamberlaine with the officers of Armes, and brought her to the King, which receiued her with louing countenance at the posterne by the water side, and kissed her, and then she turned backe againe and thanked the Mayor and the Citizens with manie goodlie wordes, and so entred into the Tower.

waters side.

After which entrie the Citizens all this while houered before the Tower, making great melodie, and went not aland, for none were assigned to lande but the Mayor, the Recorder, and two Aldermen: but to speake of the people that stood on euerie shoare to behold this sight, he that saw it not will not beleue it.

On Fridate at dinner serued the King all such as were appointed by his highnes to be knights of the Bath, which after dinner were brought to the chambers, and that night were bathed, and shynen according to the old vsage of England, and the next daie in the morning the king dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging, whose names hereafter ensue nineteene in number.

The conveying of queene Anne thorough the city to Westminster.

On Saturdate the one and thirtieth daie of Pale, the Quene was conueyed through London in order as followeth: To the intent that the horses should not slide on the pauement, nor that the people should be hurt by horses, the high strates, where-through the Quene should passe, were all grauelled from the Tower vnto Temple barre, and rayled on each side, with in which rayle stode the craftes along in their order from Grace church, where the merchants of the Stilyard stode vntill the little conduit in Cheape, where the Aldermen stode, and on the other side of the strate stode the constables of the Citie, appparelled in veluet and silke with great stanes in their hands, to canse the people to giue roume, and keepe good order: and when the strates were some what ordered, the Paloz in a gowne of crimosin veluet, and a rich collar of esles, with two footemen clothed in white and red damaske, rode to the Tower, to giue his attendance on the Quene, on whome the Sheriffes with their officers did awaite vntill they came to the Tower hill, where they taking their leaue rode downe the high strates, commanding the constables to see roume and good order kept, and so went and stode by the Aldermen in Cheape, and before the Quene with her traine should come, Grace-strate and Coznehill were hanged with fine scarlet, crimosin, and other grained clothes, and in some places with rich arras, and the most part of Cheape was hanged with cloth of tisse, golde, veluet, and many rich hangings which did make a goodly shewe, and all the windowes were replenished with Ladies and Gentlewomen to behold the Quene and her traine, as they should passe by.

The first of the Quenes companie that set forwarde, were 12. French men belonging vnto the French Ambassadoz, clothed in coates of blew veluet, with sleeves of yelow and blew veluet, their horses trapped with close trappers of blew farfenet poudered with white Crosses: after them marched gentlemen, esquires, knights, two and two: after them the iudges: after them the knights of the Bathe in violet gownes with hodes purled with miniver like doctors: after them abbots: then barons: after them bishops: the earles and the marquesses: then the lord Chancellor of England: after him the archbishop of Yorke, and the ambassadoz of Venice: after them the archbishop of Canturburie, and the ambassadoz of France: after rode two esquires of honor with robes of estate rolled and worne banlozlike-wise about their neckes, with caps of estate, representing the Dukes of Normandy and Aquitaine: after them rode the Paloz of London with his mace, and Garter in his coate of armes, which bare also his mace of Westminster hall: after them rode the lord William Howard with the marshals rod deputy to his brother the Duke of Norfolke marshall of England, which was ambassadoz then in France, and on his right hand rode Charles Duke of Suffolke for that date high constable of England, bearing the warder of silver appertaining to the office of constableness, and all the Lordes for the most part were clothed in crimson velvet, and all the Quènes seruants or officers of armes in scarlet: next before the Quene rode her Chancelor bare-headed: the sergeants and officers at armes rode on both sides of the lordes: then came the Quene in a white litter of white cloth of golde, not couered or bailed, which was led by two palestres clad in white damaske downe to the ground, head and all, led by her footmen: shee had on a kittle of white cloth of tisse, and a mantle of the same furred with ermine, her haire hanging downe: but on her head shee had a coise with a circlet about it full of rich stones: ouer her was borne a canapie of cloth of gold with foure gilt stauces, and foure silver belles: for bearing of the which canapie were appointed sixtene knightes, foure to beare it one space on each side, and foure an other space, according to their owne appointment: next after the Quene rode the Lord Browgh her chamberlaine: next after him William Coffin master of her horses, leading a sparc horse with a side saddle, trapped downe with cloth of tisse: after him rode seven ladies in crimson velvet, turned up with cloth of gold and of tisse, and their horses trapped with golde: after them two chariots couered with red cloth of golde, in the first chariot were two ladies, which were the olde Dutchesse of Suffolke, and the olde marchionesse of Dorset: in the second chariot were foure ladies all in crimson velvet: after them rode seven ladies in the same sute, their horses trapped and all: after them came the thirde chariot all in white, with six ladies in crimson velvet: next to them came the fourth chariot all red, with eight ladies also in crimson: after whom followed thirtie gentlewomen all in velvet and silke, in the liuerie of their ladies, on whom they gaue their attendance: after them followed the garde in coates of Goldsmiths worke, in which order they rode forth till they came to Fan-church, where was made a pageant all of childzen apparellled like merchants, which welcommed her to the Citie, with two proper propositions both in French and in English: and from thence she rode vnto Grace church corner, where was a costlie and marvellous cunning pageant made by the merchants of the Stilyard, therein was the mount Peruassus with the fountaine of Helicon, which was of white marble, and foure streams without pipe did rise an ell high and met together in a little cop above the fountaine, which fountaine ranne abundantly with racht Rhenish wine till night, on the mountaine sate Apollo, and at his fete sate Caliope: and on euerie side of the mountaine sate foure muses playing on seuerall sweete instruments, and at their fete Epigrams and poesies were written in golden letters, in the which euerie muse according to her propertie praised the Quene.

From thence the quene with her traine passed to Leaden hall, where was a goodly pageant with a tipe and heavenly Rose, and vnder the tipe was a goodly roset of golde, set on a little mountaine enuironed with red roses and white, out of the tipe came downe a fancon all white, and set vpon the roset, and incontinent came downe an Angell with great melodie, and set a close crowne of gold on the faulkens head : and in the same pageant sate S. Anne, with all hir issue beneath her: and vnder Mary Cleopha sate hir foure childzen, of the which childzen, one made a goodly Oracion to the Quene of the fruitfulness of S. Anne, and of her generation, trusting, that like fruit should come of her. Then she passed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were the three Graces set in a throne, afore whome was the Spring of Grace, continuallie running wine : afore the fountaine sate a poet, declaring the property of euery Grace: that done, euery Lady by hir selfe according to hir property, gaue to the Quene a seuerall gift of Grace.

That doone, she passed by the great Conduite in Cheape, which was newelie paynted with Armes and deuises, out of the which Conduite, (by a goodlie Fountayne set at the ende,) ranne continuallie wine, both white and Claret all that afternoone : and soe she rode to the Standart, which was richly paynted with Images of Kinges and Quenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the toppe was marueylous sweete Harmonie, both of songs and Instrumentes.

Crosse in cheap
newly gilt.

Then she went forwarde by the Crosse, which was newelie gilt, till she came where the Aldermen stoode, and then Maister Baker the Accorder came to her with lowe reuerence, making a proper and briefe proposition, and gaue to her, in the name of the citie, a thousand marks in golde, in a purse of golde, which she thankesfully accepted with manie good words, and so rode to the little Conduite, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and songs, in which pageant were Pallas, Iuno, & Venus, and afore them stoode Mercurie, which in the name of the three goddesses, gaue vnto her a ball of Gold, diuided in three, signifying three gifts which these three goddesses gaue to hir, that is to say, wisdom, riches, and felicity.

As she entered into Pauls gate, there was a pretie pageant, in which sate three Ladies richly clothed, and in a circle on their heade was written Regina Anna, prosper, preceede, and raigne. The lady in the middelt had a tablet, in the which was written Veni amica, coronaberis, and vnder the tablet sate an angell with a close crowne. And the lady sitting on the right hand had a tablet of silver, in which was written, Domine dirige gressus meos. And the third lady had a tablet of gold, with letters of azure written, Confido in Domino, and vnder their feet was written :

Regina Anna paris regis de sanguine natam, Et paries populis aurea sacra tuis.

And these Ladies cast downe Waters, on the which she sayde two verses were written.

From thence she passed to the East end of Pauls church against the school, where stood a scaffolde, and childzen well apparelled, which saide to her diuers goodly verses of Poets translated into English, to the honor of the R. and her, which she highly commended. And then she came to Ludgate, which gate was new garnished with gold and bisse, & on the leades of S. Martins church stood a goodly godly quere of singing men and childzen, which sang newe Ballets made in praise of her grace.

After that she was past Ludgate, she proceeded toward Fleetstreet, where the conduit was newlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, and the shalmes melodiously sounding. Upon the conduit was made a Tower with foure turrets, and in euery turret stood one of the cardinall vertues with their tokens and properties, which had severall speeches, promising the Quene neuer to leaue her, but to be aiding and comforting her: and in the midst of the tower closely was such severall solemne instruments, that it seemed to be an heavenly noise, and was much regarded and praised: and besides this, the conduit ran Wine, claret and red all the afternoone, so she with all her company, and the Maior, rode forth to Temple bar, which was newlie painted and repaired, where stood also diuers singing men and childzen, till shee came to Westminster Hall, which was richly hanged with cloth of arras, and newlie glazed, and in the midst of the hall she was taken out of her litter, and so led vp to the high deske vnder the cloth of estate, on whose left hand was a cupboard of tennages high, marueylous rich and beautifull to beholde, and within a little season was brought to the Quene with a solemne seruice in great standing Spice plates, a boyde of Spice, and subtleties, with Iporasir, and other Wines, which shee sent downe to her ladies, and when the ladies had drunke, she gaue hartly thanks to the lords and ladies, and to the Maior, and other that had giuen their attendance on hir; and so with hersele with a few ladies to the White hall, and so to her chamber, and there shifted hir, and after went in hir barge secretly to the king to his manor of Westminster where she rested that night.

On Whitsontide the 1. of June the Maior clad in crimosin velvet, with his collar, and all the Aldermen and Sherifs in scarlet, and the counsel of the city, took their barge at the crane by seven of the clock, and came to Westminster, where they were welcommed, and brought into the hall by M. Treasurer, and other of the kings house, and so gaue their attendance till the Quene shoulde come forth: betwene eight and nine of the clocke shee came into the hall, and stood vnder the cloth of estate, and then came in the kinges Chappell, and the monks of Westminster, all in rich coapes, and many Bishops and abbots, in Coapes and Miters, which went into the midst of the hall, and there stood a season, then was there a ray cloth spread from the quenes standing in the hall, through the pallace and sanctuary, which was railed on both sides, to the high altar of Westminster, after that the ray cloth was cast, the officers of armes appointed the order accustomed. First went gentlemen, then Esquires, then knights, then aldermen of London in their cloakes of scarlet, cast ouer their gownes of scarlet.

Queene Anne.

After them, the Judges in their mantles of scarlet and robes: then followed the knights of the Bath, being no lords, every man hauing a white lace on his left sleeue: then followed barons and vicounts in their parliament robes of scarlet: after them came Earles, Marquesses, and Dukes in their Robes of Estate, of Crimosin velvet, furred with Ermin, powdered according to their degrees.

degrés. After them came the Lord Chancelloz in a robe of Scarlet, open before, bordered with lettice. After him came the kings chappell, and the monks solemnely singing, with procession. Then came abbots and bishops mitred, then Sergeants and officers at armes: Then the Mayor of London with his mace, and Garter in his coate of armes: then the marques Dorset in his robe of estate, which bare the Scepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell, which bare the rod of iuorie with the doue both together: then alone the earle of Oxforde high Chamberlaine of England, which bare the crowne. After him the duke of Suffolke in his robe of estate, for that day being high Steward of England, having a long white rod in his hand, and the Lord William Howard with the rod of the marshalls ship, and euery knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then proceeded forth the Quene in a circote and robe of purple velvet, furred with Ermine in her haire, colfe, and circlet, as she had the Saturdaye, and ouer her was borne the Canapie, by foure of the Cinque portes, all in Crimofin, with points of blew and redde hanging on their Accurs, and the Bishoppes of London and Winchester bare vp the laps of the Quenes robe, and her traine which was verie long, was borne by the old Dutchesse of Suffolke. After her followed Ladies, being Lordes Wiues, which had circotes of scarlet, with narrow sleeves, the breast all lettice, with barres of pouders according to their degrés, and ouer that, they had mantles of scarlet furred, and euery mantle had lettice about the neck like a neckerchiefe, likewise powdered, so that by the powderings their degrés might be knowne. Then followed Ladies being Knights Wiues, in Cownes of Scarlet, with narrow sleeves without traines, onely edged with lettice, likewise had all the quenes Gentlewomen.

When shee was thus brought to the high place made in the middell of the Church betweene the queere and the high altar, shee was set in a rich Chaire, and after that shee had rested a while, shee descended downe vnto the high Altar, and there prostrated her selfe while the bishop of Canterburie said certain collects ouer her. Then she rose, and the bishop annointed her on the head and on the breast, and then she was led vp againe to her chaire, where after diuers orisons saide, the archbishop set the crowne of S. Edward on her head, and then deliuered her the Scepter of gold in her right hand, and the rod of Iuory with the doue in the left hande, and then all the quere sung Te Deum, &c. Which done, the bishop toke off the crowne of S. Edward bearing heaule, and set on her heade the Crowne made for her, and so went to masse, and when the offering was begunne, she descended downe and offered being crowned, and so ascended vpp againe and sate in her Chaire till Agnus, and then shee went downe and knéled before the high altar, where she receiued of the archbishop the holy sacrament, & then went vp to the place agayne. After that Masse was done, she went to S. Edwards shrine, and there offered. After which offering done, shee withdrew her into a little place made for that purpose on the one side of the queere. Now in the meane season euery dutchesse put on her bonet a cozonell of gold wrought with flowers, and euery marchionesse put on a beuery cozonell of gold, and euery countesse a plain circle of gold without flourcs, and and every king at armes put on a crowne of copper and gilt, all which were woone till night.

When the Queene had a little reposed her, the companie returned in the same order that they set forth, and the Queene went crowned, and so did the ladies aforesaid: her right hand was sustained by the earle of Wiltshire her father, and her left hand by the L. Talbot, deputy for the earle of Shrewsbury, & Lord Furniwall his father. And when she was out of the sanctuary within the pallace, the trumpets played marvellous freshly, and so she was brought to Westminster hall, and so to her withdrawing chamber: during which time, the lords, Judges, maiors and aldermen, put off their robes, mantles, and cloakes, and tooke their hodes from their neckes, and cast them about their shoulders, and the Lordes sate onelie in their circotes, and the Judges and Aldermen in their gownes, and all the Lordes that served that daie served in their circotes, and their hodes about their shoulders. Also dyvers officers of the kings house being no Lordes, had circotes and hodes of Scarlet, edged with miniver, as treasurer, controller, and master of the iswell house, but their Circotes were not gilt.

While the Queene was in her Chamber, every Lord and other that ought to do service at the coronation, did prepare them according to their duetie, as the Duke of Suffolke high steward of Englands, which was richlie apparelled, his doublet and sacket set with orient pearle, his gowne crimosin beluet embrothered, his courser trapped with a close trapper, head & all to the ground of crimosin beluet, set full of letters of gold of Goldsmithes worke, having a long white rod in his hand. On his left hand rode the Lord William, deputy for his brother, as earle marshall with the marshalls rod, whose gown was crimosin beluet, and his horse trapper purple beluet cutte on white satin, embrothered with white Lions. The earle of Orford was high chamberlaine, the earle of Essex carver, the earle of Sussex sewer, the earle of Arundell chiefe butler, on whom twelve citizens of London did giue their attendance at the cupbord: the earle of Darby cupbearer, the viscount Lisle panter, the L. Burgeyny chiefe larder, the L. Bray almoner for him and his copartners, & the maior of Orford kept the buttery bar, and Th. Wyat was chosen ewerer for sir Henry Wyat his father.

The sitting at
Queene Anne.

When all things were readie and ordered, the Queene vnder her canopy came into the hall and washed, and sate downe in the midst of the table vnder her cloth of estate. On the right side of her chaire stood the countesse of Orford to do so, and on her left hand stood the countesse of Worcester all the dinner season, which dyvers times in the dinner time did holde a syne cloth before the Queenes face when she liste to spitte, or doe otherwise at her pleasure: and at the Tables ende sate the Archbyschoppe of Canterburie on the right hande of the Queene, and in the midst betwene the Archbyschoppe and the countesse of Orford stood the Earle of Orford with a white staffe all dinner time, and at the Queenes feete vnder the table sate two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all these things were thus ordered, came in the duke of Suffolke, and the Lorde William Howard on horsebacke, and the sergantes of armes before before them, and after them the sewer, and then the knightes of the Bashe, byring in the first course, which was eight and twenty dishes, besides subtleties, and ships made of ware, marvellous gorgeons to behelde, all which time of seruice the trumpets standing in the windowe at the neather ende of the hall, played.

When the was serued of two dishes, then the Archbishops seruice was set downe, whose sewer came equal with the third dish of the Quenes seruice on his left hand. After that the Quene and the Archbishoppe were serued, the barons of the Ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, then at the table sate the masters and clerkes of the Chancerte, and beneath them other Doctors and Gentlemen. The table next the wall on the left hand by the cupboorde was begunne by the Maior and Aldermen, the Chamberlaine, and counsell of the Citie of London, and beneath them saue substantiall merchants, and so downeward other worshipfull persons. At the table on the right hand in the middelt of the hall sate the lord Chancellor, and other temporary lordes: on the right side of the table in their circotes, and on the left side of the same table sate bishops and abbats in their parliament robes: beneath them, sate the Judges, Sergeants, and the Kings Counsell: beneath them, the knightes of the Bashe. At the table on the left hande in the middle part sate Dutchessees, Marquessees, Countessees, Baronessees in their robes, and other Ladies in circotes, and Gentlewomen in gownes, all which Gentlewomen and Ladies sate on the left side of the table along, and none on the right side, and when all were thus set, they were incontinent serued so quicklie, that it was marvellous, for the seruitors gaue so good attendance, that meat, no drinke, no anie thing else needed to be called for, which in so great a multitude was marvell. As touching the fare, there could be deuised no more costlie dishes, no subtleties. The Maior of London was serued with foure and thirtie dishes at two courses, and so were all his brethren, and such as sate at his table. The Quene had at her second course foure and twentie dishes, and thirtie at the third course, and betwene the last courses, the kings of armes crowned, and other officers of armes cried larges in thre partes of the hall, and after stode in their place, which was in the bekens of the kings bench: and on the right hand out of the cloyster of Saint Stephens Chappell was made a little closet, in which the king with diuers ambassadours stode to beholde the seruice, the Duke of Suffolke, and the Lord William rode oftentimes about the hall, chæring the lordes, ladies, and maior, and his brethren.

After they in the hall had dined, they had wafers and spocrase, and then they washed, and were commanded to rise and stand still in their places before the tables or on the fourmes till the Quene had washed. When she had taken wafers & spocrase, the table was taken vp, and the Earle of Rutland brought vp the surnape, and laide it at the boordes end, which immediatly was drazone and cast by master Reade marshall of the hall, and the Quene washed, and after the archbishop, and after the surnape was withdrazone: then she rose, and stode in the middelt of the hall place, to whom the earle of Suffre, in a goodly like plate, brought a boſe of ſpice and confections. After him, the Maſor of London brought a ſtanding cup of gold, ſet in a cup of aſſay of gold, and after that ſhe had drunke, ſhe gaue the maſor the cup, with the cup of aſſay, becauſe there was no couer, according to the claime of the Citie, thanking him and all his brethren of their paine.

Then ſhe vnder her canapie departed to her chamber, and at the entry of her chamber, ſhe gaue the canapie with bells and all to the barons of the poſts according to their claime, with great thanks: then the Maſor of London bearing his cup in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and ſo did all other noblemen and gentlemen, for it was ſixe of the clocke.

On Mondaye were the ſiſſes at the tilt before the kings gate, where the Maſor and his brethren had a goodly ſtanding, but there were few ſpeares broken, by reaſon the hoxes would not cope.

On Wedneſdaie the king ſent for the Maſor and his brethren to Weſtminſter, and there he himſelfe gaue vnto them hartie thanks, with manie goodly words.

On Fridaye euen deceased Mary the French Quene, ſiſter to King Henry the eight, and wiſe to Charles Duke of Suffolke, and ſhe was buried at Saint Edmundsborte.

The 7. of September being ſunday, betwene thre and foure of the clocke at after none, the Quene was deliuered of a faire Ladie, for whoſe good deliuerance Te Deum was ſung incontinently, and great preparation was made for the chriſtning. The Maſor, and his brethren, and ſonie of the chiefe Citizens were commanded to be at the chriſtning the Wedneſdaie following. Upon which daie the Maſor Sir Stephen Peacocke in a gowne of crimſin beluet, with his collar of eſſes, and all the aldermen in ſcarlet with collars and chaines, and all the counsell of the citie with them toke their barge at one of the the clocke, and the Citizens had another Barge, and so rowed to Crænwich, where were many lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled: all the walles betwene the kings pallace and the Friers, were hanged with arras, and all the way strewed with græne rushes. The Friers Church was also hanged with rich arras: the font was of silver, and stood in the midst of the church thre steps high, which was couered with a fyne cloth: and dyuers Gentlemen with Aprones and Towels about their Peckes, gaue attendance about it, that no filth shoulde come to the fonte:ouer it hung a square Canapye of Crymolin Sattin, fringed with Golde, about it was a rayle, couered with redde Saie, betweene the queere & bodie of the church was a close place with a pan of fire to make the Childe readie in. When all these thinges were ordered, the Childe was bzought to the Hall, and then euerie man set forwarde: First the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, Esquires, and Chaplaines, next after them the aldermen, and the Mayor alone, and next the kings counsell, then the kings chappell in coapes, then barons, bishops, earles, the earle of Essex bearing the couered basons gilt, after him the Marques of Worcester with a taper of virgin wax, next him the Marques Dorset bearing the salt, behind him the ladie Mary of Rosfolke bearing the crismoe, which was verie rich of Pearle and Stone. The old dutchesse of Rosfolke bare the childe in a Mantle of Purple velvet, with a long traine furred with Ermine. The Duke of Rosfolke with his marshals rodde went on the right hand of the saide dutchesse, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went officers of armes, the countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the childes mantle, and meane betwene the childe and the countesse of Kent went the earle of Willshire and the earle of Darby on either side, supporting the said traine in the middelt: ouer the childe was borne a rich canapye by the Lord Rochford, the lord Hufley, the Lord William Howard, and the Lord Thomas Howard the elser. After the childe followed mante ladies and gentlewomen. When the childe was come to the church doore, the Bysshoppe of London mette it with diuers Bysshoppes and abbots mitred, and beganne the obseruances of the Sacrament. The Godfather was Lord Thomas Archbysshoppe of Canterburie: the Godmothers were the old dutchesse of Rosfolke, and the old marchionesse of Dorset widowes, and the childe was named Elizabeth, and after that all thinges were done at the church doore, the childe was bzought to the Font and chylined: and that done, Gattar chiefe king of armes cried aloud: God of his infinit godnes send prosperous life and long to the high and mighty princesse of Englande Elizabeth, and then the trumpets blew, then the childe was bzought vp to the altar, and the gospel said ouer it. After that immediatly the archbishop of Canterbury confirmed it, the marchionesse of Worcester being Godmother: then the bisshoppe of Canterburie gaue vnto the princesse a standing cup of golde, the Dutchesse of Rosfolke gaue to her a standing cup of golde fretted with pearle, the marchionesse of Dorset gaue thre gilt boles pounsed, with a couer, and the marchionesse of Worcester gaue thre standing boles grauen, al gilt with a couer. Then was bzought in wafers, confects, and ipocrasse, in such plenty, that euery man had as much as he woulde desire: then they set forwarde, the trumpets afore going going in the same order toward the kings palace as they did when they came thitherward, saying that the giftes that the Godfather and godmothers gave, were borne before the child by 4. persons, that is to saie, first sir John Dudley bare the gift of the Ladie of Excester, the Lord Thomas Howard the younger bare the gift of the Ladie Dorset, the Lord Fitz Walker bare the gift of the lady of Rossefolke, and the Lord of Worcester bare the gift of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the one side as they went was full of stafetothes, to the number of six hundred, born by the gard and other of the kings servants: and about the child were many other proper tothes born by gentlemen. And in this order they brought the pyncesse to the quæns chamber doore, and then departed.

The spall went to the kings chamber, & tarried there a while with his brethren the Aldermen, and at the last, the dukes of Rossefolke and Suffolke came out from the king, and reported to the spall and his brethren, that the king thanked them heartilie, and commaunded them to giue them thanks in his name, and from thence they were had to the seller and thanke, and so went to their barge.

About this time the crafty praaises of one Elizabeth Barton, named the holy maide of Kent, came to light, and were discovered, so that shee and her adherents in November following, were brought to the Star chamber, and there before the kings counsell confessed their fained hypocritie and dissimuled holiness, traiterous purposes and intentes. The names of those her adherentes, which were presented with her before the lords in the Starre chamber, were as followeth: Richard Master parson of Aldington in Kent, Edward Bocking doctor; of disintitie a monke of Canterburie, Richard Dering monke also of Canterburie, Edward Twaites Gentleman, Thomas Laurence Regisser to the Archdeacon of Canterburie, Henry Golde parson of Alder Marie in London, Hugh Rich frter obseruant, Richard Risby, and Thomas Golde gentleman. These were aduoged upon their confession, to stande at Pauls Crosse in the Sermon time, where they with their owne handes shoulde severallie deliuer each of them to the preacher a bill declaring their subtil and superstitious doings, which thing they did the Sunday next following, standing upon a stage or scaffolde before the Crosse, the bishop of Wango late abbot of Hyde there preaching, shewed their offences, from whence they were committed to the tower of London.

In this meane time the Scottes were not quiet, but robbed the kinges subtiedes both by sea and lande, whereupon the king caused them to bee requested, not onlie by the Borderers and other to them associate, which entering the marches, burnt manie of their Wiles and strong holdes; but also he set forth certaine Shippes, which entered into their streames, and fetched out many of those prizes, which they had taken out of their haucens, yet was there no warre proclaimed.

At the suite of Ladie Katherine Dowager, a curse was sent from Rome, which accursed both the king and the Realme. This curse was set vp in the towne of Dunkerke in Flaunders (for the bringer thereof durst approach no nêerer) nearer) where it was taken doone by one William Lock a Mercer of London: because (as it was said) that the lady Katherin Dowager had procured this curse of the pope, the duke of Suffolke was sent to hir, as then lying at Wugden beside Huntington, where according to that hee had in commandement, he discharged a great sort of her household seruants, and yet left a conuenient number to serue hir like a princeesse, which were sworn to serue her, not as a queen, but as princeesse Dowager: but such as toke that othe theie bitterly refused, and would none of their seruice, so that she remained with a small number of seruants about her.

Holy Walde of Went attained.

After Christmasse the Parliament beganne, wherein the forenamed Elizabeth Barton, and other her complices were at saynted of treason, for sundrie practises by them put in vze, sounding to the bitter reproch, perill, and destruction of the Kinges person, his honour, fame, and dignitie, for they hadde put into the heades of manie of the Kinges subiects, that to the said Elizabeth Barton was giuen knowledge by reuelation from god and his Saints, that if the king proceeded to the diuorce, and married another, he shoulde not be a king of this Realme one moneth after, and in the reputation of God, not one day nor houre.

This Elizabeth first through sicknesse, being oftentimes brought as it were into a trance, whereby her visage and countenance became maruellously altered at those times when she was so bered: at length by the encouraging, procurement and information of the forenamed Richard Master parson of Aldington, she learned to counterfeite such manner of trances, as in her sickness by force of her disease she had bene acquainted with, so that shee shewed vnto the people dyuers maners, and sundry alterations of the semblable parts of her bodie, craftilie vttering in her saide fained trances dyuers counterfeited vertues and holie wordes, tending to the rebuke of sin, and reproofing of such new opinions as then began to be spread. And to bring the people the more in beleefe with hir hypocritical doings, she was counselled to say, that she should neuer be perfectlie whole, till she had visited an image of our Lady at a place called Court at strate, within the parsh of Aldington aforesaide. Whither was she brought, and by the meanes of the said Richard Master and Edward Bocking there was assembled a two thousand persons at the date appointed of hir thither comming to see the miracle. At which time she being thither brought also: all that assemble & multitude of people, she falsly fained & shewed in the chapel of our Ladie of Court at strate manie alterations of her face, and other outward sensible partes of her bodie: and in those trances she vttered wondrous wordes, as she was before subtilly induced by the sayde Edward Bocking and Richard Master. And amongst other things she vttered, that it was the pleasure of God, that the saide Bocking should be her ghostlie father, and that shee shoulde be a religious woman. And within a while after such fained trances, she appeared to the people to be sodaynelie releued from hir sicknesse by the intercession of the image of our Ladie being in the said chapel, by reason of which hypocritical dissimulation, the sayde Elizabeth was brought into a marvellous fancy, credite, & good opinion of a great multitude of

of people of this realme, and to increase the same by the counsell of the said Edward Bocking she became a nunne in the priorie of Saint Sepulchres at Canterburie, to whome the said Edward Bocking had commonly his resort: and by conspiracie betwene her and him, she still continued her dissembled frances, alledging that in the same she had reuelations from almighty God and his Saints: and among other, that which as before we haue mentioned, touching the kings marriage, as ye haue heard. This matter proceeded so farre, that there was a booke written by her complices, namely, by Thomas Laurence Register to the archdeacon of Canterburie, of her fained miracles, reuelations, and hypocriticall holinesse. All things were handled so craftilie, that not onely the simple people, but also the wise and learned were deceiued by the same: in so much, that William Warham late Archbischoppe of Canterbury, and Iohn Fisher bishop of Rochester, and diuers other being informed thereof, gave credit thereunto. All which matters and many other had bene traiterously practised amongst the parties many yeres, chiefly to interrupt the diuorce, and so to destroy the king, and depriue him of the crowne and dignitie roiall of the realme, as in the act of their attaindoz made more at large doth appeare.

In this Parliament also was made the act of succession, for the establishing of the crowne, to the which euerie man was swozne being of lawfull age.

During this parliament, euery sunday at Paules crosse preached a bishop, declaring the pope not to be supzeme head to the Church. Also in other places of this realme great troubles were raised about preaching, namely, at Wythlow where M<sup>r</sup>. Latimer preached, and there preached against him one master Hobberton, and doctor Powell, so that there was great part-takings on both sides: inso much that diuers priests and other set by billes against the Maior, and against master Latimer, but the maior (permitting lay men to preach) caused diuers priests to be apprehended and cast into Newgate with bolts vpon them, and diuers other ran away and lost their liuings, rather than come in the maiors handling.

Ann, reg. 28.

The eyght of Iannarie dyed Ladie Katherine Dowager at Hymbalton, and was buryed at Peterborow.

The twentieth nine of Iannarie, Queene Anne was deliuered of a man Child before her time, which was bozne deade.

In a Parliament begunne in the moneth of februarye, was granted to the king and his heires all religious houses in the realme of Englande, of the value of two hundred pounde and vnder, with all landes and goods to them belonging: The number of these houses then suppressed, were 376. the value of their landes then 32000. pound, and more by yere, the moueable goods as they were solde, Robine Hoods pennie woorthes, amounted to more than one hundred thousande poundes, and the religious persons that were in the sayde houses, were cleerlie put out, some went to other greater houses, some went abroade to the worlde. It was (saith mine autho;) a pitifull thing to heare the lamentation that the people in the Countreie made for them: for there was great hospitalitie kept among them, and as it was thought more then tenn thousand persons, maisters and seruauntes had lost their linings by the putting downe of those houses at that time.

Justs at Greenwich.

On Maie daie was a great Justing at Greenwich, where were Challengers the Lorde Rochforde and other: and Defenders Henrie Norrice and other. From this Justes King Henrie sodaynelle departed to Westminster, having onlie with him 6. persons: of which sodain departure many men marueyled.

On the next morrowe, George Boleine Lorde Rochforde, Brother to the Queene, and Henrie Norrice, were brought to the Tower of London prisoners. Also the same daie, about fise of the clocke in the afternoone, Quene Anne Boleine was brought to the Tower of London by Sir Thomas Audley Lorde Chancellor, the Duke of Norffolke, Thomas Cromwell secretarie, and Sir William Kingstone Constable of the Tower. And when she came to the Tower Gate entering in, she fell on her knees before the saide Lordes, beseeching God to helpe her, as shee was not guiltie of that wherof shee was accused, and then desired the sayde Lordes to beseech the Kinges grace to bee good vnto her, and so they left her there Prisoner.

On the 15. of Maie Quene Anne was arraigned in the Tower of London on a scaffold for the purpose made in the kings hall, before the Duke of Norffolke, who sat under the cloth of estate as high steward of England, with the Lord Chancellor on his right hand, the Duke of Suffolke on his left hand, with marqueses and lordes, &c. and the earle of Surrey sat before the duke of Norffolke his father, as earle marshall of England: The kings commission being read, the Constable of the Tower, and the Lieutenant brought the Quene to the barre, where was made a Chaire for hir to sit downe in, and there her inditement was read, wherunto she made so wise and discret answers, that she seemed fully to clere herselfe of al matters laid to hir charge; but being tryed by hir pères, twenty 6. in number, wherof the duke of Suffolke was chiefe, she was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the Duke of Norffolke, to be byent on the greene in the Tower, or elle to haue hir head

smitten off, as the kings pleasure should be further knowen, and so she was conuained to warde againe: the lady Kingston, and the lady Bolein her Aunt attending on her. And then immediatly, the lord Rochford the Quenes brother was likewise arraigned and condemned: the Mayor of London, his brethren the aldermen, the wardens, and foure persons mo of euery the twelue principall companies being present.

The seuentéene date of May, the lord Rochford brother to the Quene, Hentie Norrice, Marke Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the Kings priuie Chamber, about matters touching the Quene, were beheaded on the tower hill, the lord Rochfords bodie with the heade was buried in the chappell of the tower, the other foure in the churchyarde there.

On the ninetēth date of May about eight of the clocke in the morning, Rob. Greene. Quene Anne Bolein was brought to the greene within the tower of London, by the white tower, the lord chancelor, the duke of Richmond, the duke of Suffolk, with the most of the kings councill, as earles, lords, and nobles of the realme being present, also the Mayor of London, with his brethren the aldermen, and sheriffes, and certaine of the principall companies of the citie, &c. All these being on a scaffold made there for the execution, the said Quene Anne saide as followeth: Masters, I here humbly submit me to the lawe, as the lawe hath iudged me, and as for mine offences, (I here accuse no man) God knoweth them, I remit them to God, beséeching him to haue mercie on my soule, and I beseech Iesu saue my Soueraigne and master the King, the most goblest, noblest, and gentlest Prince that is, and long to raigne ouer you, which wordes she spake with a smiling countenance: which done, she kneeled downe on both her knees, and said, To Iesu Christ I commend my soule, and with that word suddenly the hangman of Calets smote off her head at one stroke with a sword: her body with the head was buried in the quire of the chappell in the tower.

Quene Anne
beheaded.

The twentieth of May, the king married ladie Iane daughter to sir Iohn Seimour knight, which at Whitsontide was openlie shewed as Quene, King H. married lady Iane. and on tuesdaie in the Whitson weeke, Sir Edward Seimour was created viscount Beauchampe, and Sir Walter Hungerforde made Lord Hungerforde.

The 8. of June began a parliament, and the cleargie helde a conuocation in Pauls church, where after much disputing and debating of matters, they published a booke of Religion, entituled, Articles deuised by the kings highnes. In the which booke is mentioned but thre sacraments. Articles of religion deuised by the king.

On Saint Peters night, the king and Quene stood at the Mercers hall, and saw the watch most brauely set forth.

The 29. of June, the king held a great iusting and triumph at Westminster, where were ordained two lighters made like ships to fight vpon the water, one of the which brest in the midst, whereby one Gates gentleman, a servant of master Kneucs was drowned in his harnesse. In the other, a gunne brest her chamber, and maimed two of the mariners.

T. Cromwell
Lord keeper.

After that the earle of Wilshire and Diamond, called Sir Thomas Bolein, had deliuered the kings priuy seale, whereof he was Custos, into the kings hands: Thomas Cromwel secretary to the R. and D. of the rolles, was made L. keeper of the said priue seale. And Christopher Hales the kings attorney, was made maister of the Rolles, and maister Baker Recorder of London was made the kings attorney.

Th. Cromwell
lord priuy seale vicegerent.

The 9. of July, the L. Fitzwaren was created earle of Bath, and the morrow after T. Cromwel was made lord Cromwel.

Henry Duke of Richmond.

The 18. of July lord T. Cromwel was made knight, and high vicar generall ouer all the spirituallty vnder the king, and saue diuers times in the conuocation among the bishops, as head ouer them.

Lord Thomas Howard sent to the Tower.

The 22. of July, Henry duke of Richmond and Somerset, earle of Nottingham, a bastard son of R. Henry, borne at Blakmore in Essex, of the lady Tailor boise, that time called Elizabeth Blunt, died at saint James, and was buried at Cheshford in Dorsetshire.

This moneth of July, lord Thomas Howard, youngest brother to the duke of Dorsetshire, was sent to the tower of London, for making a priue contract of matrimonie with the Ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter to the Queene of Scots by the earle of Angus, and niece to king Henry of England: the saide lord Thomas was attaint by parliament, and also the said lady Margaret Dowglas was after committed to the tower for the same.

mandements.

Commotion in Lincolneshire.

In September, Thomas Cromwel lord priuy seale, and vicegerent, sent out vnder the kings spirituall seale, certaine iniunctions to the prelates and clergie of the realme, charging Curates to preach and to teach their parishioners, the Pater noster, Aue and Creede, the commandements and articles of the faith in English, with other articles.

Commotion
appealed.

In the beginning of October, at a tise for the Kinges subsidie kept in Lincolneshire, the people made an insurrection, and gathered nigh twentie thousand persons, who take certaine lords and gentlemen of the country, causing them to be sworne to them vpon certaine articles which they had devised, and such as refused to sweare, they kept prisoners, and beheaded a priest, who was the bishop of Lincolnes chancelor: Against those the king did send the Duke of Suffolk, the earle of Shrewsburie, and the Earle of Rutlande with a strong power, whereof when the rebelles heard, they desired pardon, brake by their armie, and departed home, but their Captaynes were apprehended and executed.

A priest and a butcher executed.

The ninth of October, a priest and a butcher were hanged at Windsoze, by martiall lawe, for wordes spoken in the behalfe of the Lincolneshire men, the butcher wished the good fellows (as he termed them) in Lincolneshire, to haue the flesh on his skell, rather than to sell it at such price as hee was offered: the priest standing by, likewise wished them to haue it, for he said they had need of it. Also James Mallet doctor of lawe, late chaplaine to Q. Katherin, for like wordes was executed at Cheshford in Essex.

Commotion in Dorsetshire.

The men of Lincolneshire beeing pacified, within six daies after began an insurrection in Dorsetshire for the same causes: there people gathered to the number number of 40000. who took the archbishop of York, and the L. Darcie, and caused them to be swoyne to their partie.

He shall not enter into this your pilgrimage of grace for the common wealth onely, but for the love that you do beare to Gods faith and the church militant, and the maintenance thereof, and the preservation of the kings person and his issue, and the purifying of nobilitie, and to the intent to expresse all villainies blond, and euill counsaillers against the common wealth, from his Grace, and the private counsell of the same. And that ye shall not enter into our said pilgrimage for no particular profit to your selues, nor doe any displeasure to any private person, but by the counsell of the common wealth, ne to murder or sleie for any enuy, but in your hart to put away all feare fro the common wealth, and to take before you the crosse of Christ, and in your harts his faith, to the restitution of Gods church, and to the suppression of erronous opinions.

God saue the king.

Against those rebelles, the King sent the Duke of Suffolke, the Duke of Suffolke, the Earle of Shrewsburie, and the Marquesse of Excester, with a great armie, with whome a battaile was appointed to haue bene fought, on the feue of Saint Simon and Iude: but as God woulde, there fell such raine the night before, that the two armies coulde not mete: Whereupon, they desired the Duke of Suffolke to sue vnto the kings maiestie for their pardon, and that they might haue their liberties, &c. which the duke promised, and rode poste to the king then lying at Windsor, to knowe his pleasure, and so appeased them. Sir Robert Aske, that was chiefe of this rebellion, came to London, and was not onely pardoned, but rewarded with great gifts.

Death of the rebels in York. Wyre.

Commonion appealed.

Sir Ralph Eure kept Skarborough Castle in the North, being five weekes besieged by the rebels, twentie daies whereof he and all his companie (which were his onely friends, seruants and tenants, and serued for good will to him) were forced to sustaine themselves with bread and water, and yet kept the same safe to the ende of the said rebellion, and so deliuered it to king Henrie, who sent him sone after to serue in the borders against Scotlande, where in great credite he continued his seruice, keeping the Scots without doing hurt to England, and with such obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the borders of Scotlande for against him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement, and so continued till he was killed in Anno 1545.

Sir Ralph E. nere his good seruice in the north.

The 13. of November, master Robert Pagation a graue citizen, and a mercer of London, was slaine with a gun, as he was going from his house, by Soper lane end, to moztowe masse in S. Thomas of Akers, now called the Percers chappell in cheape: but the murderer was neuer openly knowne, till by his owne confession made many yeres after, when he came to the gallows at Banberie where he was hanged for felonie.

Robert Pagation murdred there.

tists, and were on the 3. of May brent in the high way beyond Southwarke towards Belwenton.

Taking of challengers.

On Maie daie, was a great tryumph of Jousting at Westminster, which Jousts had ben proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spaine, for al commers that woulde, against the challengers of Englande, which were Sir John Dudley, sir Thomas Seymer, sir Thomas Poininges, sir George Carewe knights: Anthony Kington, and Richard Cromwel esquires, which said challengers came into the lisses that daie richlie appa-relled, and the ir horses trapped all in white beluet, with certaine knights & gentlemen ryding afore them, apparelled all in white beluet, & white sarfenet, and all their seruants in white doublets, and hosen cut after the Burgonian fashon: and there came to iust against

against them the said day of defendants, 46. the earle of Surrey being the foremost, L. Wil. Heiward, L. Clinton, and L. Cromwell son and heire to Th. Cromwell earle of Essex, and chamberlaine of Englands, with other, which were all rightlie appavelled. And that date sir Iohn Dudley was overthrown in the field by mischance of his horse, by one Paister Breime defendant, neuer the lesse he brake diuers speares valiantly after that: and after the said lusts were don, the saide challengers rode to Durham place, where they kept open household, and feasted the king and quene, with hir ladies, and all the court.

The 2. of May Anthony Kingston and Ric. Cromwell were made knights at the said place.

The 3. of May, the said challengers did Courney on horseback with swords, Courneying. against them came 29 defendants: sir Iohn Dudley and the earle of Surrey running first, which the first course lost both ther gauntlets, and that day sir Ric. Cromwell overthrew M. Palmer in the field off his horse, to the great honoꝛ of the challengers.

The sixt of May, the sayde Challengers fought on foote at the Barriers, and agaynst them came thirtie Defendants, which fought ballantlie, but sir Richard Cromwell overthrew that date at the Barriers, Paister Culpeper in the fild: and the sixt of May the sayde Challengers brake vp their household.

In the which time of their house-keeping, they had not only feasted the king, quene, ladies, and the whole court as is aforesaid, but also on the Tuesday in the Rogation weeke, they feasted al the knights and burgesles of the common house in the parliament: and on the morowe after they had the Maye of London, the aldermen, and all their wiues to dinner, and on the Friday they brake vp, as is aforesaid.

The 7. of May sir W. Weston knight, L. pꝛior of S. Iohn of Jerusalem without Smithfield died, and neuer receiued any part of his pension, and the king toke all the lands that belonged to that house, and to that order, into his hands, to the augmentation of his crown: and gaue to euery of the challengers aboue written, for a reward of their ballantnes 100. marks, and a house to dwell in of perely revenues out of the said lands for ever.

The 26. of May, was sent to the tower doctoꝛ Wilson, and doctoꝛ Sampson bishop of Chichester, for releueing certayne prisoners which had denied to subscribe to the kings Supremacie: for the same offence Richard Farmer Grocer of London, a rich and wealthie citizen, was committed to the marshalsea, and after arraigned and attainted in the premunire, and lost all his goods, his wife and childzen thrust out of doores. Also the keeper of Petegate was sent to the marshalsea, for giuing liberty to doctoꝛ Powell and doctoꝛ Abell his prisoners to go vnder baile.

Richard Farmer in the premunire.

The 9. of July, T. L. Cromwell earle of Essex being in the counsell chamber, was sodainly apprehended, and committed to the tower of London. The 19. he was attainted by parliament, of heresie and high treason, as appereth by the same attaindoꝛ which I haue seene and read, but for beare to set downe the same being long.

On the 28. of July, the said Thomas Cromwell was brought to the scaffold on the tower hill, where he spake these words (as was then noted) I am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe, as may happen some thinke I will, for if I should so doe, I were a very wretch and miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and I thanke my Lord God that hath appointed me this death for mine offences: for sithence the time that I came to yeres of discretion, I haue liued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him heartlie forgiveness. And it is not vnknowne to many of you, that I haue been a great traucailer in the world, and being but of a base degree was called to high estate, and sithen the time I came threunto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartly forgiveness, and beseech you al to pray to God with me, that he will forgive me. O father forgive me, O sonne forgive me, O holy ghost forgive me, O thre persons in one God forgive me. And now I pray you that be here to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in any article of my faith, no nor doubting in any sacrament of the church. Many haue slandered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue maintained euill opinions, which is vnttrue: but I confesse, that like as God by his holy spirit doth instruct vs in the truth, so the diuell is readie to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witnes that I die in the catholike faith of the holy church, and I hartly desire you to pray for the kings grace, that hee may long liue with you in health and prosperitie, and after him that his sonne prince Edward that goodly knyght may long raigne ouer you. And once againe I desire you to pray for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I waue nothing in my faith. And then made he his praier which was long, and after committed his soule to the hands of God, and so laid him downe, and patiently suffered the strokes of the axe, by the hands of him who illaureably performed his office. At the same time also with the said earle was beheaded the lord Hungerforde of Beilsbery, who at the houre of his death seemed so vniquiet, that many iudged him rather frenzie than otherwile: he suffered (as it was said) for buggerie.

Thomas lord Cromwell beheaded.

Thomas Cromwell (as before is shewed) was attainted by parliament, but neuer came to answer. He was bozne in Putney a village in Surrey by the Thamis side, about 4. miles west from London, and was son to a black smith (in his latter daies a byuer) after whose deceale, his mother was married to a sherman in London. This Thomas notwithstanding the baseness of his birth, through a singular excellency of wit, ioyned with industrious diligence of mind, grew to such a sufficient ripenes of vnderstanding and skill in ordering of twaightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit to any rowth or office wherunto he should be admitted, which being apercelued of the cardinall Wolsey, he toke him into seruice, & making him his sollicitor, imployed him about businesse oftentimes of great importance, wherein hee acquit himselfe with such dexteritie, as answered alwaies the credite to him committed. At the fall of the cardinall he got him to the court, saying he would make or marre, as before ye haue heard: where, being once aduanced into the kings seruice, he behaued himselfe so aduisedly in matters which he toke in hand, that in short time time he rose to the greatest authoritie that might be in this realme, under the maiestie of the king, wherein peradventure forgetting the fall of his late master cardinall Wolsey (a notable spectacle) he fell himselfe, as ye haue heard.

In this meane time, to wit, on the 25. day of June, the k. caused the quene to remoue to Richmond, perswading it should be more for her health & pleasure, by reason of the cleere and open aire there. But on the 6. of July, certaine lordes came downe into the nether house of the parliament, and expressely declared causes, for the which the marriage was not to be taken latofull: and in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation cleerely determined, that the king might lawfully marry where he would, and so might she: and thus were they cleerely diuorced. And by the parliament it was enacted, that she should be taken no more for Quene, but called the lady Anne of Cleue.

King Henry di-uorced from lady Anne of Cleue.
Lord Leonard Gray sent to the tower.

This yere the lord Leonard Gray brother to Thomas marques Dorset, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was reuoked home, and vpon his coming to London, was sent to the tower.

Sixe Doctors,
three hanged,
and three hanged.

The 30. of July were drawne from the tower of London to west Smith- field Robert Barnes doctor of diuinity, T. Gerard parson of Hurry lane, and William Ierom vicar of Stephenheth, bachelors in diuinity: also Edward Powell, Thomas Able, and Richard Fetherstone all three doctors. The first three were drawen to a stake & there burned. The other three were drawen to a gallowes, and there hanged, headed and quartered. The three first as appeareth in their attainders, were executed for diuers heresies. The last three for treason, as in their attainders was mentioned, to wit, for denying the kings supremacie, and affirming his marriage with quene Katherine to be good: of the which argument doctor Powell wrote a booke which was printed in quarto, and I haue seene it.

The 4. of August, Thomas Empton sometime a monke of Westminster, which had bene prisoner in Newgate more than three yeres, was brought before the Iustices of goale deliuerie at Newgate, and for that he would not aske the king pardon for denying his supremacie, nor be sworne thereto, his monkes cole was plucked from his backe, and his body reppied till the king were informed of his obstinacie. The same 4. of August were drawen to Tyburne 6. persons, and one led betwixt twaine, to wit, Laurence Cooke prior of Dancaster, William Horne a lay brother of the Charterhouse of London, Giles Horne gentleman, Clement Phillip gentleman of Caleis, and servant to the lord Lisle, Edmond Bromholme priest, chaplaine to the said lord Lisle, Darby Gening, Robert Bird, all hanged and quartered, and had bene attainted by parliament, for deniall of the kings supremacie.

Seauen persons executed.

The eight of August, Ladie Katherine Howard daughter to Edmond lord Howard, nece to the duke of Norfolk, was shewed openly as Quene at Hampton court.

K. Henry married.

The latter end of this sommer, was bitter fallly through this realme greaf death by a strange kinde of ague and flure, with some pestilence: in which season was such a drought, that welles and small riuers were dried vp, so that much cattell died for lacke of water.

Dry sommer.

The twentie two of December, Ralph Egerton seruant to the lord Audley lord chancelloz, and Thomas Harman seruant to master Flighewood, were executed: the one for counterfeiting the kings seale in leade, wherewith they had sealed diuers Wattens counterfeited and antidated, making strangers denisons, vnder the names of diuers clerks of the chancery: the other for writing them. One Tuckfield being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleys chappell, of the chalice, pyre, basons and candlesticks of siluer, and fled, who breing afterward apprehended at Caleis, which to lowne he would haue betrayed, hee slew himselfe with a dag.

Ann. reg. 33.
A new commotion in Powke-shire.

In Aprill, certaine persons beganne a new rebellion in Powkeshire, which were shortly after taken, and put to execution in diuers places: of which, Leigh a gentleman, Tatarfall a clothier, and Thornton a yeoman, were put to death at London: Sir John Neuill knight, a ten persons or mo were put to death at Powke.

Countesse of Salisbury beheaded.

The 27. of Maie, Margaret countesse of Salisburie, sometime daughter and heire to George Duke of Clarence, wife to sir Richard Poole knight, and mother to cardinal Poole, was beheaded in the tower of London, being neuer arraigned nor tried before, but condemned by act of parliament.

Damport and Chapman hanged.

The 9. of June, Damport and Chapman, two of the kings gard, were hanged at Greenwich for robbery.

Sir Edmond Kneuet arrai-ned for striking in the court.

The tenth of June, Sir Edmond Kneuet knight of Dorsetshire, was arraigned before the kings Iustices (sitting in the great Hall at Greenwich), master Gage comptroller of the kings household, master Suchwell, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Anthony Winkfield, Maister Wisley, and Edmonde Pecham confessor of the kings household, for striking of one Maister Clere of Dorsetshire, seruant with the Earle of Surrey, within the kings house in the Venice Court. There was first chosen to go vpon the said Edmond a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of yeomen, to inquire of the said stripe, by the which inquests, he was founde guiltie, and had iudgement to lose his right hande: whereupon was called to do the execution, first the sergeant chirurgion, with his instruments appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the Woodyarde with the mallet and a Blocke, whereupon the hande shoulde lie: the master cooke for the king with the knife: the Sergeant of the larder to set the knife right on the joint: the Sergeant farrier with his searing yrons to seare the Veines: the Sergeant of the poultrie with a Cocke, which cocke shoulde haue his head smitten off vpon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the yeoman of the chandery with seare clothes: the yeomen of the scullery with a pan of fire to heat the yrons: a chafer of water to cole the ends of the irons: and two fourmes for all officers to set their stufte on: the sergeant of the seller with wine, ale, and beere: the yeomen of the elyze in the sergeantes steele who was absent, with bason, elyze, & towelles. Thus euery man in his office ready to do the execution, there was called forth Sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmond Kneuet, and when he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iustice declared to him his trespassse, and the said Kneuet confessing himselfe to bee guiltie, humbly submitted him to the kings mercy: for this offence he was not onelic iudged judged to lose his hand, but also his bodie to remaine in prison, and his landes and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the saide Sir Edmond Knevet desired that the king of his benigne grace, would pardon him of his right hande, and take the left: for (quoth he) if my right hande bee spared, I maie hereafter do such good service to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. At this submission and request, the Iustices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnes, considering the gentle heart of the saide Edmond, and the good report of lordes and ladies, granted him pardon, that he should lose neither hande, lande, nor goods, but should go free at liberty.

The Lord Leonard Gray beeing indited of certaine pointes of treason by him committed, as was alledged against him, during the season that hee was the Kings Lieutenant in Ireland, to witte, for deliuering his nephew Giralde Fitz Gerarde, Brother to Thomas Fitz Gerarde before executed, and also for that hee caused certaine Irishmen to invade the landes of the Kings friends, whom he fauoured not: The 25. of June he was arraigned at Westminister in the Kings Bench, and appointed to bee tried by knightes, because hee was a Lord by name, and no lord of the parliament, but he discharged the Jurie, and confessed the inditement, whereupon he had iudgement, and on the 28 of June being St. Peters euen, he was beheaded at tower hill, where he ended his life very quietly and godly.

The Lord Leonard Gray beheaded.

This noble man, as he was come of high linage, so was he a right valiant and hardy personage, hauing in his time don his prince and country good service, both in Ireland, France, and other places, greatly to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to lose his head.

The same day that he suffered, there were executed at Saint Thomas Waterings three gentlemen, John Mantel, John Frouds, and George Roidon. They died for a murther committed in Suffex (as their inditement imported) in companie of Thomas Fines Lord Dacres of the South. The truth whereof was thus. The saide lord Dacres through the lewd perswasion of some of them, as hath bene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Pelham esquire at Loughton in the same Countie of Suffex, beeing accompanied with the saide Mantell, Frouds, and Roidon, John Cheiney, and Thomas Isley gentlemen, and Richard Middleton and John Goldwel yeomen, passed from his house of Hurstmonseur the last of Aprill in the night season, toward the same parke, where they intended so to hunt, and comming into a place called Piskelap in the parish of Whillingley, they founde one John Busbrig, James Busbrig, and Richard Somener, standing there together; and as it fell out through quarrelling, there ensued a frate betwixt the saide Lord Dacres and his company on the one part, and the saide John and James Busbrig and Richard Somener on the other, insomuch that the saide John Busbrig receiued such hurt, that he died thereof the seconde of Maie next ensuing; whereupon as well the saide Lord Dacres, as those that were there with him, and diuers other likewise that were appointed to go another waie to meete them at the saide parke, were endited of murther, and the seauen and twentieth of June the Lord Dacres himselfe was arraigned before the lordes Audley of Walden, then lord chancelor, sitting that daie as high Stelward of England, with other pæres of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the said L. Dacres to die for that transgression: and afterwards the nine and twentieth of June being Saint Peters daie, at eleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, the Sherifs of London accordinglie as they were appointed, were readie at the tolwer to haue receiued the saye prisoner, and him to haue led to execution on the Tower hill. But as the prisoner should come forth of the Tower, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chambers house came, and in the kings name commanded to stay the execution til twis of the clock in the afternoone, which caused manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuer the les at thre of the clock in the same afternoone hee was brought forth of the Tower, and deliuered to the Sherifs, who led him on foote betwixt them vnto Tyborne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of Saint Sepulchers: he was not past foure and twentieth pæres of age when he came thus through great mishap to his end: for whom manie fore lamented, and liketwise for the other thre gentlemen, Mantell, Frouds, and Roidon, but chiefly for the said young lord beeing a right towardly gentleman.

The 1. of July, a Welchman a minstrel, was hanged and quartered for singing of songs, which were interpreted to be prophesying against the B. Sir Dauid Genson knight of the Rhodes was drawn through Southwark to S. Thomas of Watrings, and there executed for the supremacy.

In the month of August, the B. took his progresse toward Dorke, and passed through Lincolnshire, where was made vnto him an humble submission, &c. About this time Westminster and Wilsow were made bishopricks.

On Christmas euen at seuen of the clock at night, began a great fire in the house sometime named Elsing spittle, then the house of Sir Iohn Williams M. of the kings iewels, where manie of those iewels were bent, and more imbezelled, as was thought.

The Ladie Katherine Howarde, whom the king hadde married, for her vnchaste liuing committed with Thomas Culpepper and Frauncis Derham, was by Parliamente attainted; Culpepper and Derham were put to death at Tyborne the tenth daie of December. Culpepper was headed, his bodie buried at Saint Sepulchers Church by Newgate; Derham was quartered, &c.

The 23. of January the B. was proclaimed king of Ireland.

The 12. of February, the lady Howard, other wise called M. Katherine, and the ladie Iane Rochford for being of her counsell with Th. Culpepper, were both beheaded within the tolwer of London.

In the beginning of the moneth of March died Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle, Bastarde sonne to Edward the fourth, in the Tower of London vntattainted, when he should haue been deliuered and set at libertie (as it was said) the occasion of his trouble in the tolwer, rose vpon suspition that he should be ppiute to a practice which some of his men (as Philpott and Brindholme executed the last yere) had consented vnto, for the betraying of Coleis to the French whilist he was the kings Lieutenant there. But after that by due tryall it was was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed sir Thomas Wriothesley his secretarie to go vnto him, and to deliuer vnto him a ring with a rich diamond for a token from him, and to will him to be of good cheere, sith it was manifestlie proued that hee was void of all offence, for hee should find that he would make account of him, as of his most true and faithfull kinsman, and not onelie restore him to his former libertie, but otherwise be readie to pleasure him in what he could. Master Secretarie set forth this message with such effectuall words, as he was en eloquent man, that Lorde Lisle toke such an immoderate ioie thereof, that his heart beeing oppressed therewith, hee died the night following through too much reioicing (as was said.) After whose decease, to wit, the 12. of March, sir John Dudley was at Westminister created Viscount Lisle, by the right of his mother lady Elizabeth sister and heire to sir John Gray Viscount Lisle, who was late wife to Arthur Plantagenet viscount Lisle late deceased, as ye haue heard.

The 28. of March, the Parliament sitting, George Feres Burgesse for the town of Plimmouth, was arrested in London vpon a condemnation, whereupon the sergeant at armes of the common house was sent to the counter in Breadstreet to fetch him, but the clerks would not deliuer him, till the sherifs came themselves, who in the end deliuered him: howbeit, this matter was so taken in the common house, that the sherifs, the clerks, and fine officers, with the party plaintiff, were sent to the Tower, and there laie two daies, and were then deliuered by the speaker and common house: the Sherifs were deliuered from all charges, except twenty pound for their fees.

Scotland.

After the departure of our army from Scotland, the king of Scots made a roade into England, and did much harme, but at the last sir Thomas Wharton and sir William Musgrave with a few of the borderers, met the Scottes, where they being in number 15000. were ouerthrowne: in which conflict was taken the earle of Cassels and Glencarne, the Lord Maxwell admirall of Scotland and Warden of the West marches, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwell, the Lord Oliphant, the Lord Gray, the Lord Oliuar Sinclair, &c. more then two hundred of the better sort, and more then 8. hundred of meaner persons. They toke also foure and twenty peeces of ordinance, 4. cartes laden with speares, and ten pavilions. The king of Scots tooke such griefe and inwarde thought for this ouerthrow, and also for the murder of an English herault that was slaine at Dunbar by one Lech an English man (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnshire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a feuer, and died. Of the prisoners before named 21. of them were brought by to London, and on the 19. of December entred the citie at Bishops gate, and so were conuained to the tower, where they remained the space of two daies, and vpon S. Thomas day the apostle, they were conueied to Westminster, sir Iohn Gage Constable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the tower riding behinde them, they rode two and two together, and eight of them being earles and lordes had new golwines of blacke damaske furred with blacke conies, coates of blacke veluet, and doublets of satten, &c. all newe of the kings charge. Comming thus before the kings counsell in the starre chamber, the lord charcelor declared to them their vntruth and unkindnesse, for the which the king had cause of warre against them, as well as for the deniall of their homages, and also for their traitorous inuasions made into his realme without defiance, and also for keeping his subiects prisoners without redemption, contrarie to the lawes of the marches, for the which doings, God as they might well perceiue had scourged them. Howbeit the king more regarding his honor than his princely power, was content to shew them kindnes for unkindnes, right for wrong. And although he might keepe them in streight prison, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of the realme in their houses, and so according to their estates they were appointed to dukes, earles, bishops, knights and gentlemen.

The 22. of December came tidings of the king of Scots death. And vpon Saint Iohns daie in Christmas weeke, the foresaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court then at Greenwich, where they had great chere, and were lodged within the court. And here it is to be considered, that where the king of Scots had left no issue but only one daughter: the king and his counsell perceiuing a meane now offered, whereby without warre the two realmes might be vnitied: the Scottissh lords hauing first made the motion themselves for a marriage to be had betwixt Prince Edward and their yong Quene, the king required them to helpe to the furtheraunce of that matter, which might be such benefite to themselves and their countrey. This they promised faithfully to doe, and as well by themselves, as their friends, to bring the same to effect, so much as the king could require, whereupon the king was not onely contented to release them home, but also highly rewarded them with rich gifts.

The 30. of December, they departed from the court, and the morrow after eight of them dined with sir Iohn Coats then lord maior of London, and the rest with the sheriffes, and had very great chere. On New-yeres day they departed from London home wards toward Scotland, and by the way dined at Enfield there to beholde the prince, whom they highly commended, for the great liking they had of his person, from thence they kept on their iourney till they came to the north partes, where they found the Duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him they remained till such pledges were come forth forth of Scotlande, as it was covenanted they shoulde leaue behinde them. The Duke after he had receiued the hostages, permitted them to depart, and so they returned into Scotland, where they were ioyfully welcomed home, to their friends. With them went the earle of Angus, who had bene banished Scotland, and hauing remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings for a thousand markes by yere: and likewise his brother sir George Dowglas, who had 500. markes by yere, likewise of the kings gift. They were now both restored home into their countrey, and that was (as was saide) by the last kings will. The said earle of Angus, and diuers of the lords that had bin prisoners here in England, were made of the priuy counsell of the realme, by the earle of Arraine, that was chosen gouernor to the yong quene, and of the realme, as next helpe apparent. Notwithstanding that, the archbishop of S. Andrewes Cardinall, enemy to the K. of England, had a will (forged as some haue said) expelling how the king had made him gouernor, as well of the quene as realme, whereupon the said earle, according to his right, as he pretended, with the helpe of his friends toke vpon him the authoritie of gouernor, and put the said cardinall in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes, and the other English prisoners, by their bondes, according to the custome of the marches.

The 9. of February, a proclamation was made, whereby the people were licenced to eate white meates in Lent. But straightly forbidden the eating of flesh. Whereupon, shortly after the earle of Surrey with diuers lords, knights, and gentlemen, were imprisoned for eating of flesh in the same Lent, contrary to the said proclamation.

King Henry minding wars with France, made great preparation and provision aswell of munitions and artillery as also of brasse ordinance, amongst the which, at that time, by one Peter Bawd a French man borne, a gunfounder, or maker of great ordinance, and one other Allen, called Peter van Collen, a gunsmith, both the kings souldiers, who conferring together, deuised and caused to be made, certaine mortar pieces, being at the mouth, from 11. inches vnto 19. inches wide, for the vse whereof, the said Peter, and Peter caused to be made certaine hollow shot of cast yron, to be stuffed with fierworke, or wilde fire, whereof the bigger sort for the same, had scrues of yron to receiue a match to carry fire kindled, that the fierworke might be set on fire, for to breake in small pieces the same hollow shot, whereof the smallest piece hitting any man would kill or spolie him. And after the kings return from Wales, the said Peter Bawd by himselfe, in the first of Edw. the first, did also make certaine ordinance of cast yron, of diuers sorts, and formes, as Falconets, Fatwons, Minions, Sakers, and other pieces: vnto this Bawd, Iohn Iohnson his covenant seruant, suruiuing his master, did likewise make and cast yron

Great subsidie.

This yere in a parliament holden at Westminster a subsidie was granted to the king to be paid in thre yeres, every Englishman being worth in goods 20.s. and upward to 5.l. paid 4.d. of every pound, from 5.l. to 10.l. 8.d. from 10.l. to 20.l. 16.d. from 20.l. and upward of every pound 2.s. Strangers, as well denizens as other, being inhabitants, doubled this sum: and every stranger not being an inhabitant that was 16. yeres of age and upwards paid 4.d. of every pole. And for lands, fees, and annuities, every one bozne within the kings dominions paid 8.d. of the l. from 20.s. to 5.l. and from 5.l. to 10.l. 16.d. from 10.l. to 20.l. 2.s. and from 20.l. upwards 3.s. Strangers still doubled the sum. The cleargie granted a subsidie of 6.s. the pound, to be paid of their benefices, and perpetuities in thre yeres, and every priest having but an annual stipend, 6.s. 8.d. 10. as in the statute.

Going to Calis.
Dart.

About the same time the king of England, and the emperoz, sent Garter, and Toysonodor kings at armes, to demand the performance of certain articles of the French k. which if he denied, they were commanded then to besiege him, but he would not suffer them to come within his lande, and so they returned. Wherefore the k. of Engl. caused the demands to be declared unto the French ambassadoz at Westminster. And in the month of July the k. sent over 6000. men, under the leading of sir John Wallope, accompanied with sir T. Seimer marshall, sir Robert Bowes treasurer, sir Richard Cromwell captaine of the horsemen, and sir George Carew his lieutenant. There were likewise sir T. Palmer, sir John Rainsfoorth, sir John Seint-Iohn, & sir John Gascoigne knights, that were captaines of the footemen: they were appointed to joine with the emperozs pinner, and so to make war into France: they departed from Calis the 22. of July. The 3. of August open war was proclaimed betwixt the emperoz and the k. of England on the one party, and the French king on the other party, as enemy mortall to them both, and to all other christian kings as he that had confedered himselfe with the Turke.

Open warre
proclaimed.

The armie that was sent over under the leading of Sir John Wallope, passed forth from the marches of Calis, and keeping alongst betwixt the borders of the French and Burgontans pales, and condies, and toying with the emperozs forces, Spaniards, Wallons, and Dutch, came at length before Landarsey, a towne lately fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperozs dominions, to the which they laid strong siege. At length the emperoz, having dispatched his wars against the D. of Cleve, who had submitted himselfe himselfe into him, came now to the siege of Landersey, with a mighty power of sundry nations, so that the towne was sore constrained, & in danger to haue been lost, if at that present the French king had not likewise with him an huge armie of French men, Swichars, Lantsquits, Italians, and other, came to the rescue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if hee ment presently to haue giuen battaile: and verilie it was thought that two such powers as were there at that time so nere together should neuer haue departed without battaile. The Emperour thinking surely to fight, raised his siege, and drew his people into the fieelde. The Frenchmen thereby espying their aduantage, put as well fresh men as viduals, and all kinde of munition necessarie into the towne, and in the meane while kept the Emperours men occupied with hotte skirmishes: but now after the towne was thus relieved, which thing the French king onely wished to accomplish, the next daie when the emperour was readie with his army inranged in battailes to haue fought with his aduersaries, the French king put his armie also in order, but hauing no minde to come forthward, he trised forth the daie, and in the night following secretly departed with as much haste as possible. When the next morning had discovered the French mens flight, it was no neede to bid diuers troupes of the Emperours armie to hie after them: but some made too much haste, for the French king suspecting what would insue, appointed his eldest sonne Henry the Dolphin, to remaine behinde with the reerward, accompanied with diuers noble captaines, which ordered their people in their retire with such warinesse, that such of the Emperours campe as aduentured ouer rashly, fell within danger of such ambashes as were by the waie laide in places of aduantage: and so diuers were taken, as sir George Carew, sir Thomas Palmer knight, porter of Calceis, Edward Bellengham and others. Nevertheless a great number of the French men were snapped by, slaine, and taken in no small numbers by their enemies that followed them. This was after Halowmtide, so that now by reason the winter was farre entered, the Emperour brake by his campe, and licensed the most part of the people to depart home.

In the meane space, to wit on the 28. of Iuly, Anthony Parson, Robert Test-

On Maie euen, dyed Lord Thomas Audley Lord Chancellour of England. After whome succeeded Lord Thomas Wriothesley.

An army sent into Scotland.

The third of May, sir John Dudley Viscount Lisle high Admirall of England, arrived with his flete of 200. saile in the Frith of Scotland, where hee landed diuers of his men, and toke there diuers vessels. The 4. of May he landed the residue of his men at Lieth, and from thence marched forward in three great battayles, whereof the sayde Lord Admirall ledde the Vawarde, the Earle of Shrewsburie the Rerewarde, and Edward Seymer Earle of Hertford Lieutenant Generall of the Battayles. Here they founde the Scottes to the number of six thousand horsemen, besides manie footemen ready to stop their passage, who at the first, made as they would haue set on the Vawarde, but after certaine shotte on both sides, they todaynelie, leauing their artillerie behinde them, fled towarde Edenborough, the foremost in fleeing was the cardinal of Saint Andrewes, the Earle of Huntley gouernor, Murrey and Bothwell, and then the Englishmen entered the towne of Lieth, where they found such riches, as they thought hadde not bene in ante Towne of Scotland. The next daie our armie went towarde Edenborough; and when they approached neere, the Proposse of the Towne with other profered to haue deliuered the same, vpon condition, that the people might departe with Bagge and Baggage, and the Towne to bee safe from fire. Whereunto our Lieutenant answered, that hee was sent thither to take vengeance vpon them for their detestable falsehood, and that vnlesse they would yeelde vpp the towne simple without condition, and cause man, woman, and child to depart into the fields, submitting them to his pleasure, hee would put them to the sword, and their

Towne to the fire. The Provost answered, that it were better for them to stand to their defence, and so departed, and forthwith the Lord Lieutenant caused the Toward to march towards the towne, which they did so couragiously with helpe of the English gunners, that then kept the Scots from their ordnance, and so entred Caniegate, and there slew a great number of the Scots, and set fire on the Towne, which continued three dayes after burning. Shortly after came to the Lord Lieutenant by land, William Lord Eurie warden of the East March of England, and governor of Barwicke, with his sonne sir Ralph Eurie, and joined themselves with the armie thus lying in Leth, where after their comming they did such exploits, in riding and wasting the Countrey, that within seven miles euerie wate of Edenborough, they left few places, either pile, village, or house unbrent. And besides this, they brought great numbers of cattaille daylie into the armie, and not without much good suffice which the inhabitants of Edenborough had for safety of the same conuerted out of the Towne.

Leth.

The 13. of May the Englishmen brake down the ptre of the hauen at Leth, and brent euery sticke of it. This done, and hauing shipped their great artillery, and picked forth all such Scottish ships as were meet to serue, they tooke vpon them to returne home by land. Amongst other ships, they tooke out of Leth hauen, there were two of notable fairenes, the one called the Salamaunder, the other the Unicoon; the rest of the Scottish shippes beeing taken awaie together with their owne ships, were for the most part pestered with the spoile and bottles of the souldiers and mariners.

The sixteenth of May the armie and flete departed from Leth, both in one houre, the towne being set on fire, and burned to the ground. The english army encamped that night at a place called Soton, scauen miles from Leth, where they brent the castle, and spoiled the grounds about it. The same date was Haddington brent, with an house of Bunnies, and an house of Friers. The next night they encamped beside Dunbar, and in the morning brent the Towne,

About the same time the Earle of Lenox fledde out of Scotlande into the realme of England, where he was right gladlie receiued by king Henry, and shortly after he obtained in marriage the ladye Mary Dowglas, neere to King Henry, and returned with a competent crewe of English men, but finding no such friendship amongst his countymen as he looked for, he returned without atchieuing the enterprize which he had taken in hand.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 16. of May, proclamation was made for the enhaunsing of gold to 48.s. and silver to foure shillings the ounce. Also the king caused to bee coined base moneyes in great abundance, which was since that time, to wit, in the first yeere of King Edward the first, called downe, from twelue pence to nine pence, from nine pence to five pence: and in the seconde yeere of Quene Elizabeth called in to hir maiesties mints, and there refined.

Procession in English.

In the moneth of Iune, the Letanie or Procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the king to be generallie used in euery parish Church.

An armie into France.

The king tooke order for the leuying of a mightie Armie to passe ouer into France, according to the appointmēte made with his confederate friende the Emperour, against the French king. There were therefore appointed thre Battailles: The Forwarde under the leading of the Duke of Suffolke: the Battaille vnder the Duke of Suffolke, which also was counted the Kings Battaille, because hee minded to bee present with the same in person, and the Rerewarde was ledde by the Lord Russell, Lord Priuie Seale. Those of the Forwarde vnder the Duke of Suffolke, were apparelled in blew Coates garded with redde, and had cappes and hosen after the same sute, partie blew, and partie redde. The Battaille vnder the Duke of Suffolke in Coates, Cappes, and hosen in like maner, but the colours blew and yealow. The Duke of Suffolke, and the lord priuie Seale, accompanied with diuers other noble men, as the Earle of Surrey Marshall of the field, the Earle of Orford, the Lord Grey of Wilton Lieutenant of Hains, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and Sir Richard Deuereux his sonne and heire, they brought with them a great number of Welshmen, Sir Thomas Cheynce Lord Warden of the Portes, the lord Mountioy, Sir Francis Bryan knight, Sir Thomas Poynings Captaine of Gloucestre, and diuers other, passed ouer to Calais about Whitsonde, and from thence forward to France, left Bo-loigne on their right hande, and keeping forward towarde Puterell, joined with an Armie which the Emperour had raised for that purpose, vnder the leading of the Countie of Buren, Admirall of the lowe Countreys, and so these Armies being vnited in one, came before Puterell, and there laide Siege to the Towne, being well manned, and furnished with all thinges necessarie for defence, as well in munition as in victuall, the chiefe Captaine of which Towne, was Mounſire de Bitz, one of the Marshalles of France.

The Duke of Suffolke with the kings armie passed ouer, accompanied with the Earle of Arundell marshall of the field, the Lord Seint Iohn, and the Bishoppe of Winchester, Sir Iohn Gage, comptroller of the kings house, Sir Anthonie Browne, Master of the kings horse, with diuers other Captaines, the which on the nineteenth of Iuly came before Boloigne, and encamped on the eastside of the same Towne, aloft vpon the hill, and after remoued into a valley, where after many sharpe skirmishes, they first entered the base Towne, being lesse and forsaken by the inhabitants, which hauing set fire on their fishing nets, and other such baggage, vnder couert of the smoake, got them vp into the high Towne, before the Englishmen coulde espie them.

After this the old man, a towler standing without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the hauen, and now being kept by 16. souldiers, was yeldd by by them.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being dispoyled of these two places, yet spared not to shoote off from their walls and bulwarks, doing what they could, and namely from the Castle, and græne bulwarke, they did much hurt to the Englishmen with their shotte.

The 14. of Iuly B. Henry in person, accompanied with diuers noble men, passed the Seas from Douer to Caleis, and on the 26. of Iuly encamped before Boloigne on the north-side, within lesse then three quarters of a mile of the Towne, where he remained till the Towne was surrendered into his hands: the Kings lierie was red garded with yealowe. Besides the trenches which were cast and brought in manner rounde about the Towne, there was a mount raised vpon the east side, and diuers pieces of artillerie planted alofte the same, the which together with the mortar pieces, soe annoyed them within, battered downe the Stæple of our Ladie church. To conclude, the batterie was made in most forceable wise in three seuerall places, and the walls, towlers, and castle were undermined, and the towne within so beaten with shotte out of the campe, and from the mount and trench, by the mortar pieces, that there were verie few houses left whole therein. The towne thus standing in great distresse, there were 200. Frenchmen and Italians, which enterpsied vnder the conduct of Ioucurtio to enter the Towne in covert of the night, which exploit they so warily atchieued, that by meanes of a priell that coulde speake the English tong, they passed by the scowzers, and through the watch, so as the most part of them were got ouer the trenches, ere it was knowne what they were: to the number of an hundred and twentie of them got into the towne, but the residue being intercepted, were either taken or slaine. At length when a piece of the castle was blottedt bype, and the breaches made as was thought reasonable, the assault was giuen by the admirall lord Dudley that was come thither by the sea, which he had scoured, after his retorne out of Scotland. This assault was courageously giuen, and also manfully defended, so that when the assailants had perceiued in what estate the breach stood, and what provision they within had made for defence of their towne, which was great, they were called backe, and retired, but not without losse on both sides, especially of them within: for during the assault, the great artillerie did beate still vpon them that presented themselves at the breaches to repulse the assailants, and so diuers of their valiant captaynes and brave souldiers were slaine at this assault: shortly after, the captaynes within the towne, doubting to be eassones assaulted, and perceiuing themselves in extreme danger to lose the towne by force, if they provided not the sooner, by rendring it, to saue themselves: they sent forth two of their chiefe captaynes, Mounsier Semblemount, and Mounsier de Veruine, gouernoꝝ of the towne, his retinue was contented to deliuer the towne to his grace, with condition that they might passe with bag and baggage, which request the king granted, and so the next day the duke of Suffolke rode into Boloigne, vnto whom, as vnto the king the keies of the towne were deliuered, and in the afternoone departed all the French men. The number of all the men of war that were strong, and able to serue were of horse-men 67. of fote-men 1563. of hurt men 87. of women and children 1927. beside a great number of aged and sicke persons, not able to depart with the rest.

K. Henry entred
Boloigne.

The 25. of September, the king hauing the sword bozne before him by the lord Marquesse Dorset, like a conqueror rode into Boloigne, and the trumpeters on the wals sounding. In the entring, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and deliuered vnto him the keies of the towne, and so he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared on the south side of the towne, two daies after the king rode about the towne, within the wals, and appointed that our Ladye church of Boloigne should be taken downe, and in place thereof a mount to bee made, for strengthening of the towne: finally, after that hee had set things in order for the safe keeping of the town, he appointed sir Iohn Dudley, Lord Lisle, high admirall of the seas, to be his deputy of the same towne, and then taking the seas, he returned into England, landing at Dover on the first of October.

The 9. of October in the night, the French men came vnatwares vpon the Englishmen in base Boloigne, and slewe of them a great number: howbeit, they were shortly after chased from thence, and the base towne holden after in good quiet.

Prisles taken.

This yere was taken by the kings shippes of the West countrey, and of the English coast the number of 300. French shippes and more, so that the Grey Friers Church in London was laide full of wine, the Austin Friers and Blacke Friers, were laid full of hearing, and other fish that was taken going into France.

A beneuolence demanded.

1545

The king demanded a beneuolence of all his subiects, Spiritual and Temporal, towards his wars in France and Scotland.

And the twelfth of January the lord Chancelor, the duke of Suffolke, and other of the Kings Councell began to sit at Baynards Castle, where they first called before them the Mayor and Aldermen, &c. And because Richard Read Alderman would not agree to pay as they set him, he was committed vpon a great paine to serue the king in his wars of Scotland, who departed from London the thre and twentieth of January, where he was taken prisoner.

ner, &c. Also sir William Roche Alderman, for words of displeasure taken by the kings counsell, was by them sent to the Fleet, where he remained till Passion Sunday.

Sir William Roche sent to the Fleet.

The five and twentieth of Januarie, there camped on the West side of Boloigne beyonde the haueu, an army of French to the number of foureteene thousand, where they lay ten daies, and the first of February, were put to flight, by the earle of Hertford, and sir John Dudley lord Admirall then being deputie of Boloigne.

The 13. of February, a priest was set on the pillorie in Cheape, and burnt in both cheekes with the letters F. and A. and a paper on his head, wherein was writtten For false accusing, which iudgement was giuen by the Lorde Chancelor in the Star Chamber, a notable example of Justice: great cause haue I to wish the like Justice had been ministred vnto him, that after he had defrauded me of my worldly goods, sought to haue depriued me of my life, by likewise accusing me of many articles (seauen score and odd) suborned witness (detected of perjury, burnt in the hand for felony, and such like) which all could proue neuer one article against me, befoze the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other her maiesties high commissioners, (as appeareth in their register) by whom I was answered, there was no remedie against the accuser, by meane of a statute late made, &c. Whereupon the false accuser of his master and eldest brother, sweareth to some, he neuer did any such acte: to other, that all those articles were true, and also largely (to the like effect) libelleth against me.

False accuser set on the pillorie, and marked in the face, as he and other the like haue well deserved.

In the beginning of March, a road was made into Scotland toward Gedwoth, by the Englishmen, who at the first got great praise, but they were so greedy, and went so farre, that a great army of Scots beset them with three battels, where the Englishmen for the most part were slaine and taken at Baner Hotwaghe, among whom sir Ralph Eure lord Eure, and warden of the Cast Marches was slaine, and R Read Alderman of London, with other taken prisoners by the Scots. T. Wriothesley L. chancelor made knight of the garter.

About the 25. of June was a great tempest of winde in Darbithire, where through trees were ouer-turned, and diuers Churches, chappels, and houses, were vncouered. Also in Lancashire, there fell hailestones as big as mens fists, which had diuers prints in them, some like mens faces, some like Gun holes, &c.

The 24. of November began a parliament, wherein was granted to the K. a subsidy of 2.s. 8.d. of the pound in goods, and 4. s. of the pound in lands. Also all collicoges, chauuntries, and hospitals, were committed to the K. order, to alter and transpore, which he promised to do to the glory of god and the common profit of the realme.

E. Hall.
H. Henry his Oration.

The 24. of December the Parliament was proroged, on the which date the K. comming into the house to giue his roial assent vnto such acts as were passed, the speaker made vnto him an eloquent oration: to the which, although the custome hath alwaies bin that the Lord chancelor should make the answer, it pleased the K. at this present to make the answer himselfe, which hee uttered as here followeth, set downe by Edward Hall.

Although my chancelor for the time being, hath before this time used verie eloquentlie and substantiallie to make answer to such Orations, as hath bin set forth in this high Court of Parliament, yet is hee not so able to open and set forth my minde and meaning, and the secrets of my heart in so plaine and ample maner, as I my selfe am, and can do: wherefore I taking vpon me to answer your eloquent oration. M. speaker, say that where you in the name of our welbeloued commons, haue both praised and extolled mee, for the notable qualities that you haue conceived to bee in mee, I most heartily thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my duetie, which is to indoe not my selfe to obtain and get such excellent qualities and necessary vertues as a prince or gouernor ought to haue, of which gifts I recognise my selfe both barren and bare: but of such small qualities as God hath indued me withall, I

render to his goodnes my most humble thankes, intending with all my wit & diligence to get and acquite to me such notable vertues and princely qualittes as you haue alleadged to be coꝛpozated in my person: these thankes for your louing admonition and good counsell first remembꝛed, I esteeme thanke you againe, because that you, considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for your defence, not for our gaine, but to our great cosse, which wee haue lately sustained, as well in defence of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that ffortresse, which was to this Realme most displeasante, and shall hereafter by Gods Grace bee to our Nation moste profitable and pleasaunte, haue freelite of your owne minds granted to vs a certaine subsidie, here in an act specified, which verily we take in good part, regarding more your kindnes, than the profite thereof, as hee that sets more by your louing heartes, than by your substance. Besides this heartie kindnes, I cannot alittle reioyce when I consider the perfitt trust and confidence, which you haue put in mee, as men hauing vndoubted hope, and vnfaigned beleefe in my good doings and iust proceedings for you, without my desire or request haue committed to mine order & disposition, all chantries, colledges, hospitals, & other places specified in a certaine act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glory of god, and the profit of the common wealth: surely if I contrary to your expectation should suffer the Ministers of the Church to decaye, or learning, which is so great a lewell to be minished, or poore and miserable to bee vnrelieued, you might saie, that I, beeing put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable to mine owne churche, neither a louer of the publicke wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be rendꝛed of al our doings. Doubt not I pray you, but your expectation shal be serued more godly and godly than ye will wish or desire, as hereafter ye shal plainly perceiue. Nowe sithence I finde such kindnes on your part towards me, I cannot chuse but loue and fauour you, affirming, that no Prince in the worlde more fauoreth his subiects, than I doe you, nor no subiects or commons more loued and obeyed their soueraign Lord than I perceiue you do me, for whose defence my treasure shall not be hidde, nor if necessitie require, my person shall not be vnaduentured: yet although I wish you, and you wish me to be in this perfitt loue and concord, this friendly amitie cannot continue except both you my lords temporal, and my lords spirituall, and you my louing subiects studie and take paine to amend one thing which surely is amisse, and farre out of order, to the which I most heartilie require you, which is. That Charitie and concord be not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euery place: Saint Paul saith to the Corinthians the 13. Chapter, Charity is gentle, charity is not enuious, charity is not proud, and so forth in the same chapter. Behold then what loue and charity is amongst you, when the one calleth an other heretike, and anabaptist, and hee calleth him againe Papist, hypocrite, and Pharisey: bee these tokens of charity amongst your selues? No, no, I assure you that this lacke of Charity amongst your selues will bee the hinderaunce and allwaing of the feruent loue betwene vs, as I said before, except this wounde be salued and cleerlie made whole, I must needes iudge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partlie by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the spirituality: for if I know a man which liueth in adultery, I must iudge him lecherous, and a carnall person: if I see a man boast and bragge himselfe, I can not but deeme him a proud man. I heare daily that you of the cleargie preach one against another, teach one contrary to another, enuying one against another, without charity or discretio: some be too stiffe in their old Mumfimus, other be too busy and curions in their new Sumpfimus: thus all men almost be in barysty and discord, and few or none preach truly and sincerely the word of God, according as they ought to doe. Shall I iudge you charitable persons doing thus? No, no, I cannot so do: alas how can the poore soules lue in concord, when you preachers so to amongst them in your sermons debate and discord? of you they looke for light, and you bying them into darknes. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and set forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giuing, or els I, whome God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these diuisions extirpate, and these enoynties corrected, according to my very duty, or els I am an vnprofitable seruant, and vntrue officer. Although I saie the spirituall men be in some fault that charity is not kept amongst you, yet you of the tempozalltie bee not cleere and vnspotted of malice and enuie, for you raise on bishops, speake slanderouslie of priests, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to god order, and christian fraternity: if you knowe surely that a Bp. or preacher, preacheth or teacheth peruers doctrine, come and declare to some of our counsell or to vs, to whom is committed by god the high authoritie to reforme and order such causes and behauiours, & be not iudges your selues of your owne fantastical opinions and vaine expositions, for in such high causes you may lightly erre: and although you be permitted to read holy scriptures, and to haue the word of god in your mother tong, you must vnderstand it is licenced you so to do, only to inform your consciences, and to instruct your childezen and familie, and not to dispute and make Scripture a railing and a taunting stocke, against priests and preachers, as manie light persons do. I am verie sozie to knowe and heare howe vnreuentlie that most precious treasure the worde of God is disputed, rymed, sung, and sangeled in euerie Alehouse and Tauerne, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet I am euen as much sozie that the readers of the same, followe it in dooing so faintly and coldelic: for of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so faint amongst you, and vertuous and godlie liuing was neuer lesse bled, nor God himselfe amongst christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued: therefore, as I saie before, bee in charity one with another, like brother and brother: loue, dread and serue god, to the which I as your supreme head and soveraigne Lord exhort and require you: and then I doubt not, but that loue and league, that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer bee dissolved or broke betwene vs. And to the making of lawes which we haue now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making and furthering of the same, or else your labor shall be vaine, & your common wealth nothing releued. Now to your petition, concerning our tollall assent, to be giuen to such actes as haue passed both the houses,

They shall be read openly, that ye may heare them. And so beeing read his grace assented, and so rose and departed.

Many proper feates of armes were exploited and done in this meane while betwixt the English and the French about Boloigne.

On the morrowe after the feast of the Epiphantie, there came a conuoie of victualles towards the French Fort builded besides Boloigne, garded with three or foure thousande Rauncequents, vnder their Coronell, the Reingraue and certaine Frenchmen. The earle of Surrey then lieutenant of Boloigne advertised thereof, made out with such power as hee might conueniently spare out of Boloigne, and the olde man, to cut off those victualles; but coming to encounter with the enemies at S. Estiennes he was put to flight, Sir Edward Poyninges captain of a band called the B. gard of Boloigne was slain in that conflict, with sixtene or sirtene other Captaines, besides officers and common souldiers.

The 27. of Aprill, being Tuesday in Easter weeke, W. Foxley potmaker for the mint in the tower of London, fell asleep, and so continued sleeping and could not be wakened with picking, cramping, or other wise burning whatsoeuer, till the first day of the next terme, which was full 14. daies, and 15. nights, for that Easter terme beginneth not afore 17. daies after Easter. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be knowne, though the same were diligently searched for by the kings physicians and other learned men, yea the king himselfe examined the said W. Foxley, who was in all points found at his wakening to be as if he had slept but one night, and liued 41. yere after, to wit, till the yere of Christ 1587.

The 18. of May, there were 4. of the B. ships, and 4. pinnaces abroad on the seas afore the haven of Hamble tow, and there came an 8. of the French galleies to set vpon them, there was great shooting betwixen them, but at the last one of the galleies was taken, in the which were 280. souldiers, and 140. rowers. The rest of their galleies packed away. Whereouer while the campe lay thus at Hamble tow, it chanced y one day a mutenie rose among the Lanquenets against their captaine, so that they got themselves into order of battell, seised vpon the great artillery, and shewed countenance, as if they would haue set vpon the residue of the whole campe. Hereupon every man was commanded to repaire to his ensign, and the Spaniards came and ioined themselves with the Englishmen ready to take such part as they did. At length by the diligence of the ch. estains, and good countenance of the English souldiers & Spaniards, the tumult was staied, and 6. of the principall beginners therof were hanged.

The 21. of May, the French army came and encamped beyond Boloign at the church on the hill, & the morrowe after the earle of Hertford marched with his power to a place within 2. miles of them, and certain horsemen & footmen went forth and skirmished with them, and in the mean time the artillery ceased not to shoot off, as well from the French Campe, as from Boloigne, and the Old-man. This day were slain 14. Frenchmen, and 2. taken prisoners: and 3. of the English part were taken, and so the earle of Hertforde returned to his camp, and left the Lanquents upon the hill, encamped before the enemies, not 2. miles distant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raised, which was called the fort of Boloigne beage.

The 23. of May, the soldiers of Boloign and the Lanquents skirmished with the Frenchmen, and slew and took of them about the number of 7. score, of the which there were 40. of them in velvet coats, and some with chains.

In this meane while, by the motion of diuers Princes, a meeting was had of diuers Commissioners appointed to treat of some peace, to bee concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France, herupon there came to Gwisnes for the K. of Englande, the earle of Hertforde, the bishop of Winchester, Sir Iohn Dudley viscount Lisle, baron of Paupas, and high admiral of Englande, Sir William Paget the kings Secretarie, and Doctor Nicholas Wotton Deane of Canterburie: For the French king there came to Arde, Mounfier Claude Danebaulte Admirall of France, the Byschoppe of Curcor, Mounfier Reymond chiefe president of Roane, the Secretarie Boucherell. These mette diuers times betwixt Arde and Gwisnes. After long debating, on the seventh of June a peace was concluded, which peace was with heraultes and sound of trumpets, proclaimed at London on Whitsonday, being the 13. of Iune, and the same daie was a generall Procession, before the which was borne all the richest Silver crosses in London, to wit, of euery church one, then proceeded all the parish clearkes, condocts, quirksters, and priests in London, with the Maire of Pauls, all of them in their richest coapes, singing: Then the companies of the Citie in their best liueries. The Loyde Maior, the Aldermen and Sheriffs in scarlet, &c. All these went from Pauls church through Cheape, and Cornhill vp to Leaden hall, and so back again to Pauls. And this was the last shew of the rich crosses and coapes in London: for shortly after they, with other their church plate were called into the kings treasury and wardrobe. And the same daie was the same Peace likewise proclaimed in the Citie of Paris, in Roan, & other places: the first article of which peace was, that the French king paying to the K. of England 800000. crownes, within the terme of 8. yeres, he should haue Boloign again to him restored, which in the mean time should remain in the hands and possession of the king of England.

Moreouer for the full establishing of the peace, and for to receiue the French K.oth, the viscount Lisle A. admirall, with the B. of Durham, and diuers other lords and gentlemen to the number of more than 100. all in velvet coates and chaines of gold, with 45. yeomen seemely appointed, went into France from Boloign, the 10. of Iuly, & came to Bellune, a town beyond Paris, where the French K. lay: by whome, and the Dolphin his son, they were royally receiued, feasted & banqueted: and hauing done that for the which they came, the said lord admirall Dudley the 1. of August took his leaue of the French K. who rewarded him with a cupbowde of plate of gold, valued at 1500. pound. also and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and yeomen had 1200. crownes bestowed amongst them, and so they returned into England.

The 16. of July were burned in Smithfield for the sacrament Anne Akew alias Keime, Io. Lassels, Nicholas Oorden, priest, Io. Adlam tailor, and Doctor Shaxton sometime bishop of Salisbury preached at the same fire, and there re-

The 21. of August came into England Claude de Honnebald high admirall of France, who brought with him the sacre of Diep, and 12. galleies, hee landed at the tower Wharffe, where he was honorably receiued, and brought to the Bishop of Londons palace, where he lodged two nightes, and then rode to Hampton court where the king lay. By the way prince Edward receiued him with a company of 500. coates of beluet, with one piece of cloth of golde, and halfe the coat embroidered with gold: there was in all to the number of 800. horses. And so the French admtrall came to the court, giuing the prince the upper hand as they rode; and at the entrie gate of the court, the L. chancelor and al the L. counsell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

On Bartholomew day the king admitted him to his presence, welcommed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the L. receiued his oath, to performe the articles of the league. I omit to speake of huntinges and banquettings, which was wonderfull. But on the 27. of August, he being rewarded with a cupbord of plate to the value of 1200. l. hee returned to London, and so to his galleies, and departed homeward: besides the L. gift, he had giuen to him by the city of London two flagons gilt, and two other parcell gilt, valued at 136. l. besides wine, wax, &c.

The 12. of December Th. D. of Rosfolke, and Henry Earle of Surrey his son and heire upon certain surmises of treason, were committed to the tower of London, the one by water, the other by land, that the one knew not of the others apprehension.

The 3. day of January, the late dissolved church of the grey friers in London was opened, and masse sung there; and that day preached at Pauls crosse the bishop of Rochester, who declared the kings gift to the city of London, for the relieuing of the Poore people, which gift was by Patent vnder his great seale, S. Bartholomewes Spittle in Smithfield, latelic valued at 305 pounde 6. shillings and 7. pence, and surrendered to the king, the church of the said grey friers, valued at 32. pounde, 19. s. and seauen pence, and surrendered, and two parish Churches, the one of S. Nicholas in the Shambles, the other Saint Ewine in Newgate Market at Martiske lane end, all to bee made one parish, in the said church of the Grey friers: and in landes hee gaue for the maintenance of the same church, with diuine seruice, reparat[i]on, &c. 500. markes by yere for euer, and this church to be named Christs church, founded by king Henry the eight.

The thirteenth date of Januarie, the king then lying dangerously sick, the Earle of Surrey was arraigned in the Gaile hall of London, before the lord Mayor, the lord chancelor, and other lords and iudges being there in commission; some thinges hee flatly denied, weakening the credit of his accusers, by certaine circumstances, other hee excused with interpretations of his meanings to proue the same to be far other wise than was alleadged against him: the speciallest matter, therewith he was charged, was, for bearing certaine armes that were said belonged to the king and prince: the bearing whereof he iustified, that as he toke it, he might beare them, as belonging to his ancestors, and withall affirmed that he had the opinion of the heraults therein, and so to his indictment he pleaded, not guilty. And for that he was no lord of the parliament, he was enforced to stand to the triall of a common inquest of his countrey, which found him guiltie, and thereupon he had iudgement of death: and shortly after, to wit, on the 19. of January he was beheaded on the tower hill.

Earle of Hertford made lord
protector.

The first of February, the earle of Hertford was nominate, elected and chosen, by al the executors, to be protector and chiefe gouernor of the kings person, until he came to his lawfull age of 18.yeres, and so was he proclaimed.

king Edward made knight.
Lord Protector of London made knight

The first daie of February the earle of Hertford lord protector in the tower of London, endued King Edward with the order of knighthood: and then immediately the king standing by, under the cloth of estate, Henry Hoblethorne lord Mayor of London was called, who kneeling downe, the king toke the sword of the lord protector and made him knight, which was the first that euer he made. Then the lords called the iudges and communed with them, and then euery of them came befoze the king, who put forth his hand, and euery of them kissed it: then master William Poite-man one of the iudges of the kings bench was called forth, whom the king made knight, and then the king mouing his cap departed to his priuie chamber againe.

The 14. of February the corpes of B. Henrie the eight, was with great solemnitie and honor conueied vnto Spon, and the next day to Windsor, and there buried in the colledge.

Pauls steeple
lay at anchor.

The nineteenth of February B. Edward rode from the tower of London, accompanied with his nobilitie through the citie of London towards Westminster, and as he passed on the south side of Pauls churchyard, a man of the nation of Arragosa, came from the battlements of the Steeple of Pauls church vpon a cable, being made fast to an anchor by the Deanes gate, lying on his breast, atding himselfe neither with hand nor foote, but spreading the m abroade, and after ascended to the midst of the cable, where he tumbled and plaid many pretty toles, whereat the king and the nobles had good pastime.

King Edward
crowned.

He was crowned at Westminster on the twentieth daie of February. And there was the same day proclaimed a general pardon of all maner of persons sauing fire, to wit, the duke of Northfolke, Edward L. Courtney eldest sonne to the Marquisse of Erceffer, M. Foskew, M. Throkmorton, Cardinall Poole, and Doctor Pates.

The 6. of March, the great scale of England was taken from sir Thomas Wriothesley, and on the morrow the same was deliuered to the lord Seint Iohn lord great master.

The 11. of Aprill being munday in the Easter weeke, the Complin (being a part of the euening prayer) was sung in English, in the kings Chappell. Also the same month of Aprill, doctor Glasier preaching at Pauls crosse, affirmed there, that the Lent was not ordained of God, to be fasted, neither the eating eating of flesh to be forborne, but that the same was a politike ordinance of men, and mought therefore be broken by men, at their pleasures. More on the 15. of May being Sunday, Doctor Smith master of Whittington Colledge in London, doctor of divinitie, and reader of the same in the kings Colledge at Oxford, recanted at Pauls crosse, declaring his former books, and teachings to be erroneous, and hereticall. Also on the nineteenth of June, one Peren did recant in the parish church of S. Andrew Underhaff in London, where he had before (to wit on S. Georges day) preached that it was good to worship the pictures of Christ, and of Saints, but now hee saide he had bene deceived, and was soyle that he had taught such doctrine, &c.

On the same 19. of June was a Dirige sung in every parish church in London, for the French king late deceased (to wit on the 22. of March last before passed) also the church of S. Paul in London, being hanged with blacke, and a sumptuous herse set vp in the quire, a Dirige was there sung, and on the next morrow, the archbishop of Canterbury, assisted of eight Bishops, all in rich miters and other their pontificals, did sing a masse of Requiem, and the bishop of Rochester preached there a learned Sermon.

The first of July two priests were arraigned, and condemned in the Guildhall, for keeping of certain reliques, amongst the which there was the left arme and shoulder of a Monk of the Charterhouse, on the which arme, was written, it was the arme of such a monke, which suffered martyrdome under king Henry the eight.

The 9. of July 15 galleies of France, passed through the narrow seas into Scotland, where they destroyed the Castle of S. Andrewes, wherein were certaine Scots, that had in the same Castle murdered the cardinall of S. Andrewes. And on the 8. of August the said galleies returned again into France.

In the month of August, Edward Duke of Somerset lord protector as generall, and John Dudley earle of Warwicke lord lieutenant, with a noble army were sent into Scotland, and neer to Edenborough at a place called Pussleborough the Englishmen and Scots met, where betwene them the tenth of September was fought a cruell battell. The victorie thereof fell to the Englishmen, and of the Scots were slaine 14000. and taken prisoners 1500. whereof many were gentlemen, and not above 60. Englishmen slaine: more of this ye may reade in master Patten his booke extant intituled, The expedition into Scotland.

Wm. Patten,

The 2. of September the French Gallies, did take a pinnace of the kings, called the Km, betwene Calais and Dover.

The lord protector, and the rest of the Councell, sent commissioners into all parts of the realme, willing them to take all images out of their churches, for the avoiding of idolatry, with them were sent divers preachers, to perswade the people from their beades, and such like ceremonies: and at that time the going in procession was forbidden to be used: and the Gospel, & Epistle was commanded to be read in English. And the 5. of September the kings commissioners did sit in Pauls church there to reforme, such ceremonies and superstitions. And on the 8. of September the Litanie was sung in English in Pauls

Pauls Church, betwene the quire and the high altar, the singers knéeling, halfe on the one side and halfe on the other side. And the same day, the Epistle and Gospell was read in English at the high masse in Pauls church. And on the 11. of September, Edmond Bonner bishop of London was by the Council committed prisoner in the fléete. And on the 25. of September Stephen Gardener bishop of Winchester was likewise committed to the fléete. And Nicholas Ridley was made bishop of Rochester.

The 24. of October, Richard lord Rich, was made lord chancelor.

Parliament at Westminster.

The 4. of November, the parliament begun at Westminster, and that same day masse was sung before the lordes of the parliament in the English tong. Sir Iohn Baker knight, chancelor of the fruites and tenthes was speaker of the common house for the said parliament: In the which was granted to the king, all colledges, chantries, free chappels, hospitals, fraternities, brotherhoods, and guildes. And an acte was made for the receiving of the sacrament, in both kindes of bread and wine; and the statute of the six articles was repealed.

Colledges,
chantries, free chappels, and hospitals given to the king.

The 17. of November was begon to be pulled downe the Roode in Pauls church with Mary and Iohn, and all other images in that church, and then the like was done in all the Churches in London, and so throughout England, and terres of scriptures were written upon the wals of those churches against Images, &c. And on the 24. of December the parliament was proroged.

In the 1. of January doctor Latimer preached at Pauls crosse, which was the first sermon by him preached in almost eight yeres before, for at the making of the six articles, he being bishop of Worcester would not consent unto them, and therefore was commanded to silence, and gaue by his bishoplike: he also preached at Pauls crosse on the 8. of January; where he affirmed, that whatsoever the cleargie commanded, ought to be obeyed, but he also declared that the cleargie are such as sit in Moyles chaire, and beake not their masters commission: adding nothing thereto, nor taking any thing there from: and such a cleargie must be obeyed of all men, both high and lowe. He also preached at Pauls on the 15. and on the 29. of January. And on the 2. of February being the feast of the purification of our Lady, commonly called Candlemasse day, the bearing of candles in the church, was left off throughout the whole Citie of London.

The 12. of February being Shrouesunday, and the monday, and tuesday following, was great iusts, and warlike seates done in the parke at Chénceswich, where was a castle or fort of turnes, besieged and assaulted, to shew the king the manner of wars, wherein hee had great pleasure. The wednesday following commonly called Ashwednesday, the vse of giuing ashes in the church was also left.

The 7. of March, being wednesday was a pulpit set up in the kings priuie garden at Westminster, and therein doctor Latimer preached before the king, where he mought be heard of more then foure times so manie people as could haue stood in the kings chappel: and this was the first sermon preached there. And this yere the ceremonie of bearing of palmes on palme sunday was left off and not vsed as afoze.

About

About the beginning of the month of March, the K. sent his commissioners into euery shire in England to suruey all Colledges, free chappels, and chantries with bozther hoods as faces in the articles of their commission.

Surreiours sent out.

Also in the said moneth of March, the K. sent forth his proclamation, with a booke for the order of receiuing of the holy communion of the body and blood of Christ, vnder both kinds of bread and wine to bee ministred by the priest to all persons at Easter, and at all times after, when the people required it. Whereupon at Easter following began the communion and confession in English, but no man constrained thereto except he woulde: but after Easter began the seruice in English in diuers parish churches, and at Whitsonside at Pauls, by the commendement of Doctor W. May Deane of the same Church. Barking chappell nigh the towne of London, and the Colledge Church of S. Martins le Grand nigh the Shambles, were pulled downe. Also the parish churches of S. Nicholas in the Shambles, and Saint Ewines within Newgate, were pulled down, and the parishoners appointed to the late dissolved Greyfriars church which is now named Christs Church, founded by king Henrie the eight. Also the Parish Church at the Strand without Temple bar was pulled downe, with Strand Inne, and Strondbridge, in place thereof to build the Protectors house.

Ann. reg. 2.

The watch which had bene accustomed in London at Midsummer of long time laid down, was now againe vsed, both on the euen of S. Iohn, and of S. Peter, in as comely order as it had bin accustomed, which watch was greatly beautified by the number of more than 300. demilances and light hoisemen that were prepared by the citizens, to bee sent into Scotlande for the rescue of the towne of Haddington and other, kept by Englishmen in Scotland.

Great watch at Midsummer &
S. Peters tide.

On S. Peters euen, mounseur Dasley, lieutenant to the French king, and the Kingraue of France, with the number of 10000. French and Almaines, besides Scots, besieged the towne of Haddington in Scotland, defended by the Englishmen, vnto whose aide shortly after came from Bartwike 1300. hoisemen, which were 700. men of armes and demilances, the Captaines whereof were Sir Robert Bowes, and Sir Thomas Palmer, which hoisemen not long after by the Frenchmen were inclosed, and the most part either starue, or taken with their Captaines before named: neuertheless, our Englishmen defended the towne, often skirmishing with the French, and putting them to the worse, untill the twentieth daie of August, and then came an armie out of England of 16000 of the which 4000. were Almaines, the Kings lieutenant was the Earle of Shrewsburie, the Generall of the Almaines was capitaine Courteney.

The Rege of Haddington.

At the coming of this army, the Frenchmen and Scots in peaceable manner departed from before Haddington, giuing our captains and soldiers great commendation for their seruice. Francis earle of Shrewsbury after he had seen the towne besialled and stored with fresh soldiers and munitions, departed into England, and our men kept the Towne of Haddington, oftentimes skirmishing with the Frenchmen and Scottes, till the 20. daie of September, and then came the Earle of Rutlande with 3000. B. of Winchester sent to the tower by the L. protector.

A. p. test of Cornwall executed.

On S. Peters day Stephen Gardner B. of Winchester preached in the palace of White hall at Westminster before the k. for the which sermon he was on the morrow after sent to the tower of London.

The 7. of July a priest was hanged and quartered in Smithfelde, for that hee and other in Cornewall had slain Q. Body, one of the Kings commissioners, the others of his societie were put to death in diuers other partes of the Realme.

Great pestilence in London.

This yere a great mortality by the pestilence was in London, therefore commandement was given to all curates and other hauing to do therewith, that no corps should be buried before 6. of the clocke in the morning, nor after 6 of the clock at night, and that there should at the buriall of euery corpse, be rung one bell at the least, by the space of 3. quarters of an houre.

Quene Katherine died.

In September died Quene Katherine, late wife to king Henry, and after married to Sir Thomas Seimer lord admirall; she died of childbirth, being deliuered of a daughter.

Ann. reg. 3.

The 16. of Januarie, Sir Tho. Seimer knight of the garter, baron of Sudley, lord admirall, brother to the lord protector, and vncle vnto king Edward, was arrested, and sent to the tower of London. On the 19. of January Sir William Shepington was also committed to the tower; which Sir William on the 14. of February, was arraigned in the Guild Hall at London, and condemned of treason, for misusing of the kings mint at Wiltow. The lord Th. Seimer vncle to the king was condemned by the Parliament, and neuer came to his answer. This Parliament brake vp on the 14. of March, and on the 20. of March the saide lord Th. Seimer was beheaded on the Tower hill, hee tooke it on his death, that hee had neuer committed or meant anie treason against the king nor realme. The 29. of March doctor Latimer preached before the king at Westminster, and there in his Sermon, declaring manie things against the lord Thomas Seimer late beheaded, he affirmed that in time whyles he was prisoner in the Tower, he wrote letters vnto the ladie Mary, and Ladie Elizabeth the Kings sisters, that they should make some sturre against the lord protector, and reuenge his death.

1549

The 6. of April, proclamation was made for the Masse to bee put downe through the whole realme.

Dance of Pauls pulled downe.

Charnill house of Pauls.

The 10. of April, the cloister of Pauls church in London, called pardon churchyarde, with the dance of death, commonlie called the dance of Pauls about the same cloister coldly and cunningly wrought, and the chappel in the middell of the same churchyard, were all begun to be pulled downe. Also the charnil house of Pauls, with the chappel there (after the tombes and other monuments of the dead were pulled downe, and the dead mens bones buried in the fieldes) were conuerted into dwelling houses and shops.

Church of S. John by Smithfelde blowne vp.

About the same time the steeple, and most part of the church of S. John of Ierusalem, neere vnto Smithfield, most beautifullie new builded, and late finished, by the Lord ppio named Docary, was vndermined, and ouerthrowne with with gunpowder, the stone whereof was applied in the building of the L. protectors house at the Strand.

The 27. of Aprill, diuers anabaptists were examined in our lady chappel of
S. Pauls church in London, befoze T. Cranmer archb. of Canterbury, Edmond Thurby first B. of Westminster, D. Cox, D. Smith, D. Maie Deane of Pauls, and D. Cok deane of the arches, and chancelor to the archb. of Cant. these sate on the altar of our ladie in iudgement of these anabaptistes, and at their next sitting, there sate with them the sherifs of London; and on the next Sundate being iow Sundate, one of them named Champenes bare a fagot at Pauls crosse, Myles Couerdale preached the rehearsall sermon there: on the next Saturday the said commissioners sate there againe, befoze whome was brought Ioan of Kent, alias Ioan Burcher, alias Knel, he was condemned: and a tanner of Colchester named Puto recanted, and on the morow bare a fagot at Pauls crosse, and after that at Colchester. Also that date stood at Pauls crosse a botcher an anabap. of Mary Magdal. parish in old Fishstreet, & again h Sunday after because he made a mock at the first time: & thus much of h anabap. of that time.

In the moneth of May, by meanes of a proclamation for inclosures, the commons of Somersetshire and Lincolnshire made a commotion, and brake bp certain parks of sir W. Herberds, and L. Sturtons, but sir W. Herberd slewe and executed many of those rebels.

Commotion in Somersetshire & Lincolnshire.

In July, the commons of Essex & Kent, Suffolk & Norfolk, rose against inclosures, and pulled downe diuers parks and houses.

Also the Commons of Cornwall and Devonshire rose against the nobles and gentlemen, and required not onely that the inclosures might bee disapked, but also to haue their old religion, and act of five articles restored: these besieged the citie of Excester, which was ballantlie defended. Against these rebels was sent Iohn L. Russell Lord priuy seale, with a number of souldiers, who entred the city of Excester the 5. of August, where they slew and took prisoners of the rebels moze than 4000. and after hanged diuers of them in the towne and country about. The L. Gray was also sent with a number of strangers Al-maine and Germaine hoysmen, who in diuers condisas slewe manie people, and spoiled the country.

Commotion in Cornwall and Devonshire.

Rebels subdued

The last of July, Wil. L. marques of Northampton, entred the city of Norwich, and on the next morning, the rebels also entred the towne, burned parte thereof, put the L. marques to flight, and slew the L. Sheffield.

Commotion at Norwich.
Lord Sheffield
slaine.

In this meane time diuers persons were apprehended as aiders of the fore-said rebels or reporters of their doctinges, of the which one was the Bailife of Romford in Essex, hanged within Aldgate, and an other of Kent, at the bridge cot toward Southwark, both on Mary Magdalens day by martiall law.

Partiall Law.

The 8. of August the French L. ambassadoz, did in name of his master the fr.
king, make defiance vnto the L. of England, and so the wars to begin with all their force, & the same night following, all Frenchmen were taken prisoners, and their goods registred.

In the beginning of August, the French L. determining to take the Isles of Guernesey and Jersey, did set there sodainelie vpon our shippes with a great number of galleis, but they were so manfully encountered by the kings navy, that with the losse of a thousand men, and great spoile of their galleis, they were forced to retire into France, and desist from their purpose.

The 16. of August, a man was hanged without Bishopsgate of London, and one other without Albgate, the third at Totenham, the fourth at Waltham, and so forth in diuers other places, all by martiall law.

French men
apprehended.

The 8. of August, the French ambassadoys gave a defiance to the lord protector, whereupon all French men with their goods being no denizens were apprehended and committed to prison.

The Earle of Warwicke went against the rebels at Portowich.

The rebels in Dorsettolke and Suffolke encamped themselves at mount Surrey, in a wood called S. Nicholas wood, nere unto Porowich, against whom sir Io. Dudley earle of Warwicke went with an army, where both he & a great number of gentlemen meeting with the rebels were in such danger, as they had thought all to haue died in that place, but God that confoundeth the purpose of all rebels, brought it so to passe, that aswell there as in all other places, they were partly by power constrained, partly by promise of their pardon, perswaded to submit themselves to their prince: the earle of Warwicke entered the city of Porowich the 27. of August, when he had slaine about 5000. of the rebels, and taken their chiefe captaine Robert Ket of Windham Tanner, which might dispend in lands fifty pound by yere, and was worth in mouerales aboue a thousand markes, when he had put to execution diuers of the rebels in diuers places about Porowich, he returned.

Newhamen by Boleine woon
by the French.

The 28. of August tidings was brought to Is. Edward, and the lord protector, that the French men had taken Blacknes, Hamiltew and Newhamen by Boleine, and had slaine all the Englishmen, and taken the kings ordinance and victuals, which was reported to be begun by one Sturton a ballard son of the lord Sturtens, which had betrayed Newhamen, and went himselfe to the French kings service: hereupon the captaine of Boleine Barke for feare of the French army conueyed all the ordinance, victuals, goods, and men of that fort, to the high towne of Boleine, and after their departing, with gunpowder blew by the fort.

Commotion in Dorsetshire.

About this time also, a commotion began at Semer in the north-riding of Yorke shire, and continued in the east-riding, and there ended: the principall rasyers thereof were William Ombler of east Hesterton peoman, Thomas Dale parish clearke of Semer, and Steuenson of Semer: being pzevented by the lord president from rising at Waintringham, they drew to a place at Semer by the sea coast, and there by night rode to the beacon at Starton, and set it on fire, and so gathered a rude route: then they went to master Whites house, and took him, and Clopton his wines brother, Sauage a merchant of Yorke, and Bery seruant to sir Walter Mildmay, which foure they murdered a mile from Semer, and there left them naked: their number increased to 3000.

Rebels executed at Yorke.

On the one and twentieth day of August, the kings pardon was offered, which Ombler and other refused, who were shortly after taken, and brought to Yorke, where Thomas Dale and other were executed the 21. of September.

The first of September Edmond Boner bishop of London preached a sermon

mon at Paules crosse, for the which he was accused vnto the counsell by William Lacimer, parson of S. Laurence Pountney, and Iohn Hooper, sometime a white monke, and so conuented before the Archbishop of Canterbury and other commissioners at Lambheath on the thirteenth, the sixteenth, the eighteenth, and on the one and twentieth day of that same month he was sent to the sparchalsea in his habite of a bishop, but on the first of October he was deposed of his bishopricke, for disobeying the kings order in religion.

On the first day of October in the morning, the earle of Marwike with other lords of the counsell sent for the lord Dalo; and the Aldermen of London, to his place in Holbozne, where was declared to them by the lord Chancellor and other of the kings counsell, diuers abuses of the L. protector, concerning the kings person, and his affaires both in England and also in Scotland, and other his pecces beyond the seas. And that after none was kept a court of the aldermen in the Guild hall, where was shewed a letter, from the king and the lord protector for to haue one thousand men of the citie, well harnessed with weapons for defence of the kings maiesties person. And another letter also from the lords of the counsell, to haue two thousand men to aide them, for defence of the kings person: and also, that the citie should bee well kept with watches both day and night, &c.

And the same first day, the king being at Hampton court, the lord protector caused proclamations to be made in diuers towne nere to the court, for men to aide the king against the lords, and also sent letters to diuers townes to the same effect: whereupon great assemblies of people were made at Hampton court. And in the night of the same day, he conueyed the king to Windsor, with a great number of horsemen and footmen.

My lords, we commend vs most hartly vnto you: and whereas the kings maiestie was enformed that you were assembled in such sort as y<sup>e</sup> doe notwe remaine there, was aduised by vs, and such other of his counsell, as were here about his person, to send master secretary Peter vnto you with such a message as whereby might haue ensued the suretie of his maiesties person, with preservation of his realme and subiects, and the quiet both of vs, and your selues, as master secretary can well declare vnto you, his maiestie, and we of his counsell here, do not a little maruell that you stay still with you the said master secretary: and haue not (as it were) boundes to send an answer to his maiesty, neither by him, nor yet by any other. And for our selfe, we do much more maruell, and are right loy, as we and you haue good cause to be, to see the manner of your doings, bent with force and violence to bring the kings maiestie and vs to those extremities, which as we doe intend, if you will take none other way but violence, to defend vs, as nature and our allegiance both binde vs to extremitie of death, and put it vnto Gods handes, who giueth victory as please him. So if our reasonable conditions and offers will take no place, as hitherto none hath bene signified vnto vs from you, nor we doe not vnderstand what y<sup>e</sup> doe require or seeke, nor what y<sup>e</sup> do meane, and that y<sup>e</sup> speake no hurt of the kings maiesties person: as touching all other priuat matters, to auoide the effusion of christian blood, and to preserve the kings maiesties person, his realme, and subiects, ye shall finde vs agreeable to any reasonable conditions that you will requite. For we do esteeme the Kings wealth and tranquillity of the realme more than all other worldly things, yea more than our owne liues. Thus praying you to sende vs a determinate answer herein by M. secretary Peter (or if ye will not let him go) by this bearer, we beseech God to giue both you and vs grace to determine this matter as may be to Gods honor, the preservation of the king, & the quiet of vs all, which may be, if the fault be not in you. And so we bid you most hartly farewell. From the kings maiesties castle of Windsor the 7. day of October, 1549.

A letter from the duke of Somerset to the earle of War-wike.

My lord, I cannot perswade my selfe that there is any ill conceiued in your heart as of your selfe against me, for that the same seemeth impossible, that where there hath been from your youth and mine so great a friendship and amity betwixt vs, as neuer for my part to no man was greater, now so suddenly there should be hatred, and that without iust cause, whatsoeuer rumours and brutes, or perswasion of others haue moued you to conceiue, in the sight and iudgment of almighty God, I protest & affirme this vnto you, I neuer meant wrong to you than to my selfe, wherefore my lord, for God sake, for friendship, for the loue that euer hath bin betwixt vs, or that hereafter may be, perswade your selfe with truth, and let this time declare to me and the world your iust honor, and perseverance in friendship, the which God be my witness, who seeth all hearts, was neuer diminished, nor euer shall be whilst I liue. And because my heart and minde shall be more plaine and open than my writings: this bearer master Hobie shall declare vnto you the effect thereof at length, to whom I pray you giue credite, &c. the 8. of October, 1549.

A letter from the lords at Windsor to the lords at London.

After our hartly commendations vnto your good L. we haue receiued from the same a letter by master Hunnings, dated at London yesterdaie, whereby you doe vs to vnderstand the causes of your assemble there, and charging the lord protector with the manner of gouernment, require that he withdraw himselfe from the kings maiestie, disperse the force which hee hath leised, and bee contented to be ordered according to iustice and reason. And so you will gladly commune with vs, as touching the suretie of the kings maiesties person, and the order of all other things, with such conformance on that behalfe as appertaineth, and otherwise you must (as you write) make other account of vs, than you trust to haue cause, and burden vs, if things come to extremities. To the first point we verily beleue, that as brutes, rumors, and reports, that your lordships intended the destruction of the lord protector induced his grace to flee to the defence which he hath assembled, excuse your lordships, hearing that his grace intended the like destruction towards you, haue been moued to doe as you haue done, so as for lacke of vnderstanding one of any others right meaning, things be growen to such extremities, as if the sauing of the kings maiesties person, and the common weale, take not more place in his grace and your lordships, than private respect or affaires, you see, we doubt not, as we doe, that both our king, our countrie, and also our selues shall as verily as God is God, be bitterly distressed and cast away. Wherefore, might if please you, for the tender passion of Iesus Christ, vse your wisdom, and temper your determination in such sort, as no blood bee shed, nor crueltie used, neither of his graces part, nor of your lordships; for if it come to y<sup>e</sup> point, both you and we are like to see presently with our eyes, that which euery being of all our hearts will blad to behold. Wherefore, as true subiectes to the kings Maiestie, as faithfull Counsellors, though unworthie Counsellors to his Maiestie and his realme, and as lamentable petitioners, we beseech your lordships most humble, and from the bottome of our hearts, to take pity of the king and the realme, whereof you be principall members, and to set apart Summum ius, and to vse at this time Tum bonum & equum; and thinke not that this is written for anie private feare or other respect of our selues, but for that vnbondedlie we heare and know more of this point with your fauors, than you there do know; yea, and howsoeuer it shall please you to account of vs, we are true men to God, to the king, to the realme, and so will we liue and dy whersoeuer we be, and in respect of them thre esteeme little anie other person or thing, no not our owne liues; and hauing cleere consciences, as somewhat sooner ill maie followe, vpon the vse of extremitie there, that neither now is, nor shall be found fault in vs, and so quieting our selues we rest. Now to that you would haue the lorde protector to do, for his part his grace and wee haue commited herein, & much to our comfortes and yours also, if it shall like you to waite the case, who is contented if you will againe for your parts vse equity, to put that now in execution which many times he hath declared by his wordes, that is to saie, so as the king and the realme maie be otherwise well serued. hee passeth little for the place he now hath. May be doth consider, that by the kings Maiestie with all your aduices, and the consents of the nobles of the realme he was called to the place (as appereth in writing vnder his maiesties great Seale and Signe, wherunto your owne handes also and ours, with all others the Lordes of the vpper house in parliament are subscribed): And therefore in biglent sort to be thus thrust out against his will, he thinketh it not reasonable: he is here with the kings person, where his place is to be. and we bee heere with him we trust in God for the good seruice of the king, the weale of the realme, and the good acquitting both of his Grace and of your Lordships, which was most heartilie desire, and see such hope heere thereof, as if you bee not too sore bent vpon the extremities, as is reported, and as equitie canne take no place, my Lordes grace maie liue in quiet, and the kings Maiesties affaires maintained in such order, as by his Maiesties Counsellors shall bee thought conuenient; marie to put him selfe simple into your handes, hauing harde as both we and he haue, without first knowledge vpon what conditions, it is not reasonable. Life is swete my Lords, and they saie, you seeke his bloude and his death; which if ye do, and maie haue him other wise conforable to reason, and by extremitie dyue him to seeke extremitie againe; the bloude of him and others that shall die on both sides innocentlie, shall bee by God iustlie required at your handes. And when peradventure you would haue him againe vpon occasion of seruice, you shall soethink to haue lost him. Wherefore god my Lords, we beseech you againe and againe, if you haue conceiued any such determination, to put it out of your heads, and incline your hearts to kindnesse and humanitie, remembryng that he hath neuer been cruell to any of you, and why should you be cruell to him: as we trust you be not, what soeuer hath been said, but will shew your selues as conformable for your parts, as his grace is contented, for the zeale he beareth to the king and the realme, to bee for his part, as this bearer sir Phillip Hobbie will declare vnto you, to whom we praye you to giue credite, and to returne him hither againe with answer hereof. And thus beseeching the liuing God to direct your hearts to the making of a quiet end of these terrible tumults, we bid your lordships most hartlie well to fare. From the kings maiesties castle of Windsor the eight of October, 1549.

Proclamation against the lord
protector.

These letters notwithstanding, the same eight of October, after a common council in the Guild hal at London, whither all the lords of the counsell came, the lord Chancelor and other declared diuers abuses of the lord protector, desiring the citizens to be ayding and assisting with them, for the preserving of the kings maiesties person, which they greatly feared, being in his adversaries hands. The lords dined with master Yorke one of the Sheriffs, and in the afternone proclamation was made in diuers places of the citie with trumpets, heraults, and kings at armes, wherein was contained diuers articles touching the euill gouernment of the lord protector.

First they charged him with making inward diuision, whereby the quiet state of the realm left by king Henry the 8. was now disturbed, and thousands of the kings naturall subjects slaine.

Item, the losse of his maiesties peeces beyond the sea, which his highnes father (not long before his decease) wan to the honor of himselfe, and commoditie of the realme, not without the auenture of his owne person.

Item, that in all times of the wars in France and Scotland he hath enriched himselfe, and builded sumptuous and faire houses, leauing the kings poore souldiers unpaid of their wages.

Item, that he hath labored to make himselfe strong in all countries.

That he hath subuerted all lawes, iustice, and good order of the Realme, whereby he hath fearfully shaken the chaire of the kings state.

That he hath little esteemed the graue aduice of the kings good and faithfull counsellors.

That he hath little regarded the order appointed by the late Is. Henry the 8. for the gouernment of the king his sonne, his realmes and dominions in his tender age.

That he hath labored to sowe diuision in the realme among the nobles, gentlemen, and commons.

Finally, that it is easie for euery man to see what losse the king and realme haue of late suffered by his wilfull negligence, and lacke of prouision and furniture of the peeces beyond the sea. Subscribed,

The tenth of October, by a common counsell at the Guild hall, was granted five hundred men of the citie, (100. to be horsemen) to bee readie on the next morrow: and this day the lords dined with master Turke one of the sheriffes of London.

The 11. of October, the lords sitting at the L. great masters, sir Anthony Wingfield captaine of the gard was sent to the king at Windsor, and seuered the L. protector from his person, and caused the garde to watch him till the lords comming. On the morrow, the lord chancelor with the rest of the counsell, rode to Windsor to the king, and that night the lord protector was put in warde into Beauchamps tower in the castle of Windsor.

The 14. of October in the afternone, the duke of Somerset was brought from Windsor, riding betwixt the earles of Southampton, and of Huntingdon, through Oldbozne in at Pelagate, and so to the tower of London, accompanied with diuers lords and gentlemen, with 300. horse: the lord maior, sir Ralph Warren, sir Iohn Gresham, master Recorder, sir William Lock, and both the sheriffs, and other knights sitting on their horses against Soper lane, and all the officers with halbarbs, and from Holbozne bridge to the tower, certaine aldermen or their deputies on horse-backe in euery stræte, with a number of householders standing with bills as he passed. There was with him committed to the tower, sir Michaell Stanhope, sir Thomas Smith, sir Iohn Thin knights, Wolfe of the priuie chamber, and Grey of Reading.

The 17. of October, king Edward came from Hampton court to his place in Southwarke, then called Suffolke place, and there dined, where after dinner he made master Iohn Yorke one of the sheriffes of London knight, and then rode through the citie of London to Westminster.

Now when the duke of Somerset was first apprehended, Steph. Gardener B. of Winchester then being prisoner in the tower (as before ye haue heard) was bozne in hand, he should be set at libertie, in hope wherof he prepared him new apparell for that purpose, thinking verily to haue come abroade within eight or tenne daies: but when he was forgotten, and nothing said vnto him, by the space of one moneth after, he thought it good to put the lords in remembyance by his letters, wherein (after commendations had vnto them) he wrote as followeth: I haue continued here in this miserable priſon now one yeare, one quarter and one moneth, this ſame day that I write theſe my letters, with want of aire to relieue my body, want of booke to relieue my mind, want of god companie, the onelie ſolace of this world, and ſinallie, want of a iuſt cauſe why I ſhoulde haue come hither at all. Poſe of this Letter came not to my hands, but that the lordes tooke it in good part, & laughed verie merrilie thereat, ſaying, hee had a pleaſant brade, for rewarde whereof they gaue him leaue to remaine ſtill in priſon ſixe or ſixe weekes after, without ſaying or ſending a my word to him, which when he conſidered, then hee wrote to them this letter following.

After my due commendations to your good lordſhips: Howſoeuer the time is ſtoien from you with the multitude of buſineſſes and varietie of matters, where with ye be trauelled, whereby ye rather want time (as I ſuppoſe) than bee glatted with it; yet with mee (being alone comfortles in this miserable priſon) the time paſſeth moze ſenſibly, and as the griefe groweth in length, ſo it bringeth moze encombrance and trauell with it. And being now the time of parliament, whereof I am a member in my owne grace, called vnto it by writ, and not cut from it by any fault, but only by power kept here: It is a double calamity to be detained in priſon by ſo intolerable wrong, and excluded from this aſſembly ſo much againſt right. I haue ſuffered the like in the late laſt protectorſ time againſt all reaſon; which god hath giuen you power now to reforme. And among manie other things which in his time were wronged amuſſe, no one thing (as I ſuppoſe) was of worſe example, ne moze prejudiciall to the good order of the high court of Parliament, which is the direction of all maner liues, lands, and goods in this realme, than to allowe for a preſident, that any one man being member thereof, might without cauſe be excluded, and ſo letted to ſerue there his maner in publike matters, for the wealth of the realme, and ſuch other private cauſes as do occurr. If the ſtrength of the parliament be not impaired by wrong in one, becauſe right conſiſteth not in number, it ſhall be at the pleaſure of him that ruleth, to do the ſame in more. Whereby others may take more harme then I, as experience hath ſhewed in ſuch examples. But I knowe it becommeth me not to reſaie the ſtrength of that court, ne the order of it: the lawyers of this realme knowe that, and to theſe knowledge I ſubmit my iudgment, and take for good that they allowe. But this I dare ſay, when religion is entreated in a generall council of Chriſtendom, if the rulers of the council let any mans repaire thither that hath right to be there: what ſoever is there concluded, is in the lawes of the world abroad taken of no force, by excluding of one member wrongfullie that ſhould furniſh the bodie, which I write vnto your lordſhips, for the good opinion I haue of you, truſting that ye intend not to uphold or followe the late lord protectorſ doings by wrong, but ſo faſhion your proceedings, as they maie agree with iuſtice at home, and ſeem agreeable to reaſon, to others abroad: being ſo aſſured of mine innocencie, that when your lordſhips ſhal heare what can be ſaid againſt me & mine answer thereunto, there ſhal appeere cauſe why I ſhould haue had praife, thanks & commendations

tions of the late L. protector (if truth, honestie, and due obedience might looke therfore) and no cause of trouble or displeasure at al, so wrongfully haue I ben tormented in this prison, so boldly dare I speake to you of my cause, with such an opinion and estimation of your wisdoms which I know, and reuerence, as I ought not, ne would not vainly hope to abuse you with words: but vpon certain confidence of your indifferencies, verily I trust that ye will deeme & take things in such sort, as being plainly and truly opened, shall appeare vnto you by-matter indeed. In consideration whereof, I renew my suit vnto your lordships, instantly requiring you that I may be heard according to iustice, & that with such speed, as y delay of your audience giue not occasion to such as be ignorant abroad of my matter, to think that your lordships allowed and approved the detaining of me here. Which without hearing my declaration I trust ye will not, but haue such consideration of me, as mine estate in the common wealth, the passing my former life amongst you, and other respects do require, wherein you shall bind me, and do agreably to your honors and iustice: the free course whereof, you haue honorably taken vpon you, to make open to the realm without respect, which is the onely establishment of al commonwelths, and therefore the zeale of him was allowed that said, Fiat iustitia, & ruat munda: signifying, that by it the world is kept from falling indeede, although it might seme otherwise in some respect, and some trouble to arise in doing it. And this I write, because in the late L. protectors time there was an insinuation made vnto me, as though I were kept here by policie, which with the violation of iustice toke neuer good effect, as I doubt not of your wisdoms ye can and will consider, and do therefore accordingly: for the effectual execution whereof I shall not faile to praise almightie God with the preservation and increase of your honors. From the tower. Thus much concerning these letters haue I thought good to set downe, for that I find not the same otherwise extant in larger discourses of the said B. writings.

The 29. of Nouember, Robert Ket and William Ket his brother were deliuered out of the tower of London, to sir Edmond Windham knight, and the-rixe of Norfolk to be conuayed to Norwich, where Robert Ket was hanged in chaines on the top of Norwich castle, and William Ket likewise hanged on the top of Windham steeple.

Robert Ket and
hanged.

In the moneths of Nouember and December, the Scots toke Burtirrage in Scotland, and other holds then possessed by Englishmen, where the Scots slue man, woman, and childe, except sir Iohn Lutterell the captaine, whome they toke prisoner.

Holds lost in Scotland.

The lords of the counsell resorted to the tower of London, and there charged the lord protector with sundrie articles, which he confessed, and subscribed vnto them as followeth.

1 First, you did take vpon you the offices of protector and gouernor vpon condition expessed: y and specially, that ye would do nothing in the kings affaires publike or priuate, but by the assent of the late kings executors, or the most part of them.

2 Item, you contrarie to the same condition and promise, of your owne

authoritie

authoritie did staie and let iustice, and subuerted the lawes as well by your letters, as by your commandement.

3 Item, you caused diuers persons rested and imprisoned for treason, murder, manslaughter, and felonie, to be discharged and to go at large, against the lawes and statutes of this realme.

4 Item, you haue made and ordained lieutenants for the kings armies, and other the kings waightie affaires, vnder your owne writings and seales.

5 Item, you haue communed with the ambassadozs of other realmes, discussing alone with them the waightie matters and causes of this our realme.

6 Item, you haue sometimes rebuked, checked, and taunted as well privately as openly, diuers of the kings most honorable counsellors, for thetewing and declaring their minds & aduices or opinions against your purpose in the kings waighty affaires, saying sometime to them, that they were not worthy to sit in counsell, and sometimes saying to them, that you had not to open matters to them, and ye will be otherwise aduised, and that ye would if they were not agreeable to your opinions, put them out, and take in other at your pleasure.

7 Item, ye had and held against the lawes, in your own house, a court of requests, and thereby did enforce diuers of the kings subiects to answer for their free holds & goods, and determined the same to the subuersion of the same lawes,

8 Item, you being none officer, without the aduice of the council, or the more part of them, did dispose the officers for money of the kings gifts, and granted leases and wards of the kings, and gaue presentations of the kings benefices and bishopricks, hauing none authoritie so to do: and further, ye did meddle with selling of the kings lands.

9 Item, you commanded multiplication and alcumistrie to be practised, thereby to abate the kings come.

10 Item, you are charged that ye haue diuers & many times both openly and priuately said & affirmed, that the nobles and gentlemen were the only causes of the dearth of things, whereby the people rose & did reform things themselves.

11 Item, you caused proclamations to bee made concerning inclosures, whereby the common people hath made diuers insurrections, and leued open war, and destroyed and spoiled the kings subiects, which proclamation went forth against the wils of all the counsell.

12 Item, you caused an intencion with certaine articles thereunto annexed, to be made out concerning inclosures, commons, highwaies, decaying of cottages, and diuers other things, giuing the commissioners authoritie to heare and determine the same causes, to the subuersion of the lawes and statutes of this realme, whereby much sedition, insurrection, and rebellion haue risen and grown among the kings maiesties subiects.

13 Item, you suffered the rebels and traitors to assemble and lie in camps and armies against the kings nobles and gentlemen, without any speedie subduing or appeasing them.

14 Item, you did comfort and encourage diuers of the said rebels, by giuing to them diuers summes of your owne money, and by promising to diuers of them fees, rewards, and seruiccs.

15 Item,

15 Item, you in fauor of the saide rebels did against the lawes, and caused proclamation to be made, that none of the said rebels or traitors should be punished or bereed by anye manner of person, for anye of their offences in the said rebellion, to the clere subuersion of the lawes here.

16 Item, you haue said in the time of rebellion, that you liked well the doings and proceedings of the said rebellious and traitors, and said that the cowardinesse of gentlemen gaue occasion to the common people to arise: saying that better it were for the commons to die, than for to perish utterly for lacke of liuing.

17 Item, you said that the lords of the parliament were loth to incline themselves to reformation of inclosures and other things, therfore the people haue good cause to reforme the things themselves.

18 Item, you asser the report and declaration of the defaults and laches reported to you by them that did suruey Boloigne, and the peces, you saide you would neuer attend the faults.

19 Item, you would not suffer the kings peces beyonde the sea called Petuhamen and Blacknes, to be furnished with men and victuals, although that ye were aduertised of the defaults therein by the captaines of the said peces, as by others, and was also aduertised by the kings counsell, whereby the French king being the kings enemy was encouraged and comforted to inuade and win the said peces to the kings great losse and dishonor.

20 Item, also you said, ye would not suffer the noble men and gentlemen to subdue and to repressse the said rebellious in time conuenient, neither would you giue any authoritie to the said nobles and gentlemen, to the subduing of the said rebels, but wrote your letters to them to speake faire to the rebels, and to handle them gently.

21 Item, you haue caused the first of October last past, at Hampton court for the defence of your owne cause, diuers seditious bills to be written in counterfected handes, and secretly to be throwen abroad in diuers partes of this realme, thus beguiling the good people, &c. meaning thereby for to stir and raise by the kings subjects vnto armoz and open war.

22 Item, when that the kings maiesties priuate counsellors of their loue and zeale that they did beare vnto the king and the realme, did counsell at London to come to you, to the intent to commune with you charitably, to amend your doings and misgouernance: you hearing of their assembly, did cause to be declared by letters in diuers places, the said lords to be traitors to the k. to the great disturbance of the realme.

23 Item, you declared and published vntruely as well to the kings maiestie and other the yong lordes attendant vpon his maiesties person, and to the kings subjects at diuers and sundrie times and places, that the said lordes at London minded to deströie the king, and you required the king neuer to forget it, but to reuenge it, and likewise required the said yong lordes to put the king in remembrance thereof, to the intent to make sedition and discorde betwene the kings maiestie and his lords.

24 Item, you said in the month of October last at Hampton court, and the eight of the same month at Windsor, or at one of the same places these wordes:

The lords of the counsell at London doe intend to kill mee, but if I die, the 31.
shall die, and if they fannish me, they shall fannish the king.

25 Item, you caused and procured by your owne letters, the kings people in great number to rise, and assemble in armes after the maner of war, to your aid and defence.

26 Item, the 9. of October last, you did of your own head sodainly remoue the kings maiesties person late in the night from Hampton court to Windsor, without anie provision there made for his Grace, whereby his highnesse was not onelie in great feare, but tooke also such disease as was to his great perill.

27 Item, you caused your owne servants and friendes at Hampton court, and at Windsor to be harnessed with the kings armes, the kings graces ser-uants hauing none armes nor harnesse.

28 Item, you caused at Windsor your own person in the night time to be garded in harnesse by many persons, leauing the kings maiesties person ungarded, and woulde not suffer his owne gard or seruants to be next the kings person, but appointed your seruants and friends to keepe the gates.

29 Item, you minded for to fly to Harsey or to Wales, and laide posse hoyle and a bote and men for the same intent.

Edward D. of Somerset his first submission.

I Edward Duke of Somerset, haue read and considered these saide 29. articles before specified, and doe acknowledge my saide offences, faultes, and crimes, done and con'ined in the same, and most humble prostrate on my knees, do fullie and wholie submit my selfe to the most abundant mercy and clemencie of the kings Maiestie, for the moderation of my saide offences, hauing my full trust and confidence, that his Maiestie with the aduise of his highnesse most honourable counsaile, will consider mine offences, faultes, wordes, and proceedings, that if anie of my said offences be by his clemencie, pardoned, remitted, or otherwise discharged, that I maie enioie the benefite thereof, although the same become unknowne. And farther I do most humbly beseech all my Lordes and other his maiesties most honorable counsaile, not onelie to be meanes to his maiestie, to take awaie and consider mine offences to haue proceeded more of ignorance, negligence, follie, wilfulness, and for lacke of good consideration, than of anie cankered or malicious hart, enill intent or thought, tending to any treason to his maiesty or realme: but that it may please his maiesty by the charitable aduise of their good lordships to haue pity vpon me, my wife, and children, and to take some mercifull way with me, not according to the extremity of his lawes, but after his great godnes and clemencie, whereunto whatsoeuer it shall bee, I doe most humbly with all my hart submit my selfe. Written with mine owne hande the 23. day of December, in the 3. yeere of the raigne of our soueraigne L. king Edward the 6.

The submission of the D. of Somerset prisoner in the tower, made the 2. of february.

I am most fearefull and full of heauinesse my verie good Lordes, to vnderstande that my last letters were no better accepted at your lordships handes, to whome I am bounde during my life, for your most gentle and merciful dealing with me, that it pleased your godnesse to bring my case to a fine. I trust your Lordships neuer thinke that I euer did or wolde intende to stande against the kings Maiestie and your lordships godnes, or that I wolde goe about to iustifie my cause, seeing his maiestie and your Lordships offereth clemencie, merche and pardon. Although the fine be to me impoitable, yet I doe commit my selfe wholie to his highnesse, and your Lordships mercies, I pray onelie the moderation of it: And did couet to declare to your godnesse mine inhabilitie to beare it: And yet referred all to his Maiestie, and your wisdom, goodnesse, and discretion. And I most humble desire your Lordships not to thinke that I was about to contende with your Lordships, when I did speake of my conscience, I might erre, in that I thought I did for the best, as I doe acknowledge and confesse, that neither I am the wisest man in the woꝝlde, noꝝ yet if I were, I shoulde not escape without a most singular grace, but manie times I shoulde offende: But I leaue all that, and most humble, simple, wholie, and lowlie, I submit my selfe to the Kings Maiestie, and to your good loꝝdships: appealing from the rigour and extremitie of his Maiesties lawes, to his maiesties great mercie and clemencie, praying your goodnesse to bee meanes to his Maiestie not to bee offended with mee, noꝝ to exclude his maiesties mercie and benignitie from me, foꝝ my rudenes and lack of discretion, but to accept my god minde as one that faire woulde doo that were well. And then I cannot, oꝝ haue not doone that thing I ought to do, I woulde gladlie amende, and am readie at all times, without condition to doo and suffer willingly that thing that your honours will appoint mee, accepting that clemencie oꝝ mercie soeuer I obtayne to bee of his Maiesties, and your goodnesse: most humble on my knees praying, his Maiestie and your good Loꝝdshippes to pardon mine offences, and to order mee foꝝ the me as to his mosse high mercifull clemencie shall appeere conuenient. And finally flying from extremitie of iustice, desire mercie, as you be and are called most mercifull counsellours, not imputing my writings, and doings hitherto as of stoutenesse oꝝ stubbornnesse, but onelie foꝝ lacke of discretion and wisdom. Foꝝ the which once againe I require pardon: sauoꝝ to be shewed. And if it pleased your good loꝝdships to heare me, I trust ye should find me loyaly vnto your honours, and so conformable vnto your loꝝdships orders, that I trust to make amends, and obtayne pardon foꝝ my former folly. And thus I most humbly commit your good loꝝdships to almighty God: To whome I shall alwaies pray that ye maie long continue in honoꝝ. From the Tower the 2. of Februarie.

Of the like counterfeite physition haue I noted (in the summarie of my Chronicles Anno 1382.) to be set on horse-backe, his face to the horse-taile, the same taile in his hande as a bridle, a collar of Jordans about his necke, a whetstone on his breast, and so led through the citie of London, with ringing of basons, and banished. Whereunto I had added as followeth. Such deceitners no doubt are many, who being neuer trained vp in reading, or practise of physicke and Chirurgie, boast to do great cures, especially vpon women, as to make them straight that before were crooked, corbed, or crumped in any part of their bodies, &c. But the contrary is true, for some haue receiued gold, when they haue better deserued the whetstone. These wordes tending generallie against all such counterfeite physitions, hath bin so hardly taken to hart, by one priuate person, not of the best, or second sort, (but my common aduersary) that he hath largely libelled against me, to my great slander, but to the full bewraying of himselfe, as one touched more then other, that being wiser, helde their peace, I forbore to answer his libelling, as I haue before borne his false accusing, and other greater matters, still referring my cause to the Almighty: who abhorreth lying lips, and maketh the proud to stumble.

The 15. of Aprill, the infectious sweating sicknesse began at Shrewsbury, Sweating sicknesse. which entered not in the North part of England but all the ende of September. In this space what number died, it cannot be well accomplished, but certaine it is that in London in fewe daies 960. gaue vp the ghost: it began in London the 9. of Iuly, and the 12. of Iuly it was most vehement, which was so terrible, that people being in best health, were sodainly taken, and dead in foure and twenty houres, and twelue, or lesse, for lacke of skill in guiding them in their sweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell chiefly or rather on men, and those also of the best age, as betwene thirty and fortie yeres. fewe women, nor children, nor olde men died thereof. Sleeping in the beginning was present death, for if they were suffered to sleepe but halfe a quarter of an houre, they neuer spake after, nor had any knowledge, but when they wakened fell into panges of death. This was a terrible time in London, for many one lost sodainly his friends, by the sweat, and their money by the proclamation. Seauen honest householders did sup together, and before eight of the clocke in the next morning, six of them were dead: they that were taken with full stomacks escaped hardly. This sicknesse followed English men as well within the realme, as in strange countreies: therefore this nation was much afraid of it, and for the time began to repent and remember God, but as the disease relented, the deuotion decayed. The first wache died in London 800. persons.

The 17. of August, the shilling which of late was called downe to nine. Second fall of base monies. pence, was called downe to 6. d. the groate to 2. d. the halfe groate to one penny, the penny to an halfe penny.

And that daie shee dined on the Quenes side with the king, the kings seruice and hers comming both togither, the kings on the right hande, the quenes on the left hande, shee sitting by the king apart by his cloth of estate: All the great ladies of England, and the ladies of Scotland, dined in the quenes great chamber, all most sumptuously serued. After dinner, the king shewed vnto the Q. his galleries, gardens, &c. and about foure of the clock he brought hir down by the hand into the hall, where he kissed hir, and so she departed to the bishops palace as afore.

The 6. of Nouember the saide Scottish Quene departed towarde Scotlande, shee rode from Paules through all the high streetes of the Citie, out at Bishops gate, accompanied with diuers Noble men and women, to conueie her through the Citie to Shorditch Church, the Duke of Northumberlande hauing of Horsemen standing in Cheape-side with Fauelines 100. persons, whereof 40. Gentlemen apparelled in blacke Veluet, garded with white, with beluet hats, and white feathers, and chaines of gold about their neckes, next them stode 120. horsemen of the earle of Pembroke, with blacke Fauelines, hats and feathers, next them stode 100. of the lord treasurers gentlemen and yeomen, with Fauelines, which three ranks of horsemen, compassed from the crosse in Cheape, to Birchen lane end: and when the said nobles had brought her to Shorditch church, they tooke their leaue and departed; the Sheriffs of London had the conduction of her to Maltham towne end, where they left her, and harbengers were sent afore into euery shire to the Borders of Scotland, that euery shirif in euerie shire, accompanied with the gentlemen of the country, should receiue hir, & make prouision for lodging and victualing both for hir selfe, family, and hoxes, till she came to the borders of Scotlande at the charges of the shires.

D. of Scots returned towards Scotland.

The earle of Arundell and the L. Paget sent to the towler.

The 30. and last of Nouember, by commandement from the Li. counsell, order was taken in London, that euery household should see to his familie, and keepe his house, hauing in a readinesse that daie a man in harness in euerie house, but not to go abroad till they should be called, if neede were: and further, that on the night following there should bee kept a good and substantiall watch of householders in euery ward, which was so done.

And on the next morrowe being the first of December, the Duke of Somerset was had from the towler of London by water, and that London bridge at foue of the clocke in the morning, and he went to Whitehall, where was made readie a great Scaffold in Whitehall-gate, and there the said Duke appeared before the Lords and peers of the realm, the Lord William Poulter marques of Winchester and lord high treasurer of England, that day sitting

The 21. of December, the great seale was taken from the lord Rich being then lord Chancellor of England, by the Duke of Northumberland, and the earle of Pembroke in the afternoon: and on the next morowe the keeping thereof was committed to doctor Godtrike bishoppe of Ely, one of the kings counsell, he was sworne lord chancelor on the 22. of January in the Chancery, the lord treasurer gave him his oth.

Duke of Somerset beheaded.

The 22. of January Edward duke of Somerset was beheaded on the towler hill. The same morning early the constables of every warde in London (according to a precept directed from the counsell to the Maior) streightly charged euery household of the same citie not to depart any of them out of their houses before ten of the clocke of that day, meaning thereby to restrain the great number of people, that otherwises were like to haue bene at the said execution: notwithstanding by seuen a clock the tower hill was couered with a great a great multitude, repairing from all parts of the citie, as well as out of the suburbs, and before 8. of the clocke the duke was brought to the scaffold inclosed with the kings gard, the sheriffs officers, the warders of the towler, & other wolth halbarbs: the duke being ready to haue been executed, suddenly the people were diuised into a great feare, few or none knowing the cause: wherefore I thinke it good to write what I saw concerning that matter.

Great feare
with small cause

The people of a certaine hamlet, which were warned to be there by 7. of the clocke to giue their attendance on the lieutenant, now came through the posterne, & perceiuing the D. to be already on the scaffold, the foremost began to run, crying to their follovers to follow fast after, which suddenness of these men being weaponed with bills and halbarbs thus running, caused the people which first saw them, to thinke some power had come to haue rescued the duke from execution, and therefore to crie away, away, whereupon the people ran some one way some another, many fell into the towler ditch, and they which carried thought some pardon had been brought, some saide it thundered, some that a great rumbling was in the earth vnder them, some that the ground moued, but there was no such matter, more than the trampling of their fete, which made some noise.

The 17. of February, on which day was receiued the booke of the reliefe of all the wardes of London towards the new hospitals by the kings commissioners. The counsell dined at M. Cowpers the sherife, and after dinner master Thomas Courteys alderman came thither to speake with the lord chancelor for a matter he had depending afore him in the chancerie, but for his misdeemeanor in words and signes to the lord chancelor at that time, the said M. Courteys was committed to ward in the Fleet.

The 26. of February, sir Ralph a Vane and sir Miles Partridge were hanged on the tower hill, sir Michael Stanhope with sir Thomas Arundel were beheaded there: all which foure persons toke on their death that they neuer offended against the kings maiestie, nor against any of his counsell.

A monster.

The thirde of August, at Middleton eleuen miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a childe, which had two perfect bodies from the nauell vpward, and were so ioined together at the nauell, that when they were laid in length, the one head and body was eastward, and the other west: the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies ioyned, and had but one issue for the excrements of both bodies: they liued eightene daies, and were two men children.

Great fishes.

The 8. of August, were taken at Riuinborough thre great fishes called dolphins: and the weeke following at Blackwall, were fire more taken, and brought to London, the least of them was more than any horse.

This moneth of August, began the great prouision for the poze in London, towards the which euery man was contributozie, and gaue certaine money in hand, and covenanted to giue a certaine weekeley.

The first of Nouember, being the feast of all Saintes, the new Service booke called Of common praier began in Paules church, and the like through the whole citie, the bishop of London Doctor Ridley executing the seruice in Paules church in the forenone in his rochet onely, without coape or vestment preached in the quire: and at afternone he preached at Paules crosse, the lord maiors, aldermen, and crafts in their best liueries being present: which Sermon tending to the setting forth the saide late made Booke of Common prayer, continued till almost five of the clocke at night, so that the maiors, aldermen, and companies entered not into Paules church as had been accustomed, but departed home by torchlight. By this Booke of Common praier all coapes and vestments were forbidden through England, and prebends of Pauls left off their hoods, the bishoppes left their crosses, &c. as by an act of parliament more at large is set out.

A parliament.

In the month of January, the king fell sicke of a cough at White hall, which grievously encreased, and at the last, ended in a consumption of the lights.

The first of March began a parliament at Westminister, and all the lordes spirituall and temporall assembled that daie in the White hall in their robes, where a sermon was preached in the kings chappell by doctor Ridley bishop of London, and his maiesty with diuers lordes received the communion. Which being done, the king with the lordes in order, went into the kings great chamber on the kings stee, which that day was prepared for the lordes house: the king sitting under his cloth of estate, and all the lordes in their degrees, the bishop of Ely doctor Godrike lord Chancelor, made a proposition for the king: which being ended, the lordes departed. This was done, because the king was sickely.

The morrow after, the burgeses sate in the common house at Westminister, and chose for their speaker master Diar, one of the late made sergeants at the law.

The 3. of March being good friday, the parliament brake up, and was clayed by dissolued at the kings palace of White hall at 7. of the clocke at night.

The 3. of Aprill, being munday after Easter day, the children of Christs hospitall in London came from thence through the citie to the sermon kept at S. Maries spittle, all clothed in plonket coates and red caps, and the maiden children in the saure livery, with kerchiefs on their heads, all which with their matrones and other gouernors were there placed on a scaffold of eight stages, and there sate the same time, which was a goodly shew.

Widwell given to the citie at London.

The tenth of Aprill, the lord maior of London was sent for to the court at White hall, and there at that time the kings maiesty gave to him, to the commonaltie and citizens, for to be a worke-house for the poore and idle persons of the Citie of London, his place of Widwell, and seven hundred markes land of the Sauoy rents, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture of the hospitall of the Sauoy, towards the maintenance of the said worke-house of Widwell. And the hospitall of Saint Thomas in Southworke, king Edward confirmed the said gift, by his charter dated the six and twentieth of June next following.

The 11. of Aprill, the lord maior was presented to the king in his palace of White hall at Westminister, and was made knight by his maiesty, and the same day the king remoued in the afternone to Greenwich.

In this month of Aprill and in May, commissioners were directed through England,

England, for all the church goods remaining in cathedrall and parish churches, that is to say, Jewels of golde and silver, crosses, candlesticks, censers, chalices, and all other such like, with their ready money, to be deliuered to the master of the kings Jewels in the tower of London, all coopes and vestments of cloth of gold, cloth of tistue, and silver, to the master of the kings wardrobe in London, the other coopes, vestments, and ornaments to be sold, and the money to be deliuered to the kings treasurer sir Edmond Peckham knight, reseruing to euery church one chalice or cup, with table clothes for the communion board at the discretion of the commissioners, which were for London the lord Bishop, the lord chiefe Justice, with other.

Jewels and church plate called into the kings hands.

The 20. of May, by the encouragement of one Sebastian Cabot, three great ships wel furnished were set forth for the aduenture of the unknowne voyage to Posconia, and other east partes by the north seas, diuers merchants and other being free of that voyage, yeldeo towards the charges of the same five and twenty pounds apiece. Sir George Barnes and sir William Garrard being the principall doers therein.

About the same time two other ships were sent to seeke aduentures southwards.

Whiles king Edward lay dangerously sicke, lord Gilford the duke of Northumberland fourth son, married lady Iane the duke of Suffolks daughter, whose mother being then allue, was daughter to Mary king Henries sister, which was first married to the french king, and after to Charles duke of Suffolke. Also the earle of Pembrokes eldest son married lady Katherine, the said dukes second daughter. And Martin Keies gentleman porter, married Mary the third daughter of the duke of Suffolke. And the Earle of Huntingtons son called lord Hastings, married Katherine youngest daughter to the duke of Northumberland.

Three notable marriages at Durham place.

King Edward being about the age of 16. yeres ended his life at Greenewich, on the first of July, when he had reigned six yeres, five moneths, and odde daies, and was buried at Westminster. He was in this his youth a prince of such forwardnes in vertue, learning, and all godly gifts, as seldome hath been scene the like.

King Edward deceased.

The 8. of July, the lord maior of London was sent for to the court then at Greenewich, to bring with him six aldermen, as many merchants of the staple, and as many merchant aduenturers, vnto whom by the counsell was secretly declared the death of king Edward, and also how he had ordained for the succession of the crowne by his letters pattents, to the which they were sworn, and charged to keepe it secret.

King Edwards death opened.

The 10. of July in the afternone about 3. of the clocke, lady Iane daughter to Francis Dutchesse of Suffolke, (which Lady Iane was married to the lord Gilford Dudley, fourth sonne to the duke of Northumberland) was conveyed by water to the tower of London, and there receiued as Quene. After five of the clocke the same afternone, was proclamation made of the death of king Edward the first, and how he had ordained by his letters pattents, bearing date the 21. of June last past, that the ladie Iane (as is aforesaid) should punished in Cheape.

The 11. of July, Gilbert Port taylor to Ninion Saunders vintner, dwelling at S. Johns head within Ludgate, who was accused by the saide Saunders his master, was set on the Pillory in Cheap with both his eares nailed, and cleane cut off for words speaking at the time of the proclamation of Ladie Iane, at which execution was a Trumpet blowne, and a Herault in his coat of armes read his offence, in presence of William Garrard one of the Sheriffes of London.

About 5. of the clocke the same day in the afternone, Ninion Saunders master to the said Gilbert Port and Iohn Owen a gunmaker, and both gunners of the tower, comming from the tower of London by water in a Whirrie, and shoting London bydge towards the Black friers, were drowned at S. Mary Lock, and the whirry men saved by their Dres.

Lady Mary
proclaimed Queene at Dorwich.

The 12. of July, the lady Mary sent to Norwich to be proclaimed there, which they refused to do, for that they were not certain of the kings death: but on the next day after they did not only proclaime hir, but also sent hir men and munition to aid her.

Preparation to go against Lady Mary.

The same twelfth of July, word was brought to the Councell, being then in the tower with the ladie Iane, that the ladie Mary, eldest daughter to King Henry the eight, was at Weninghall castle in Dorffolke, and with her the earle of Bath, Sir Thomas Wharton sonne to the Lorde Wharton, Sir Iohn Mordant sonne to the Lorde Mordant, Sir William Drurie, Sir Iohn Shelton, Sir Henry Bedingfield, Master Henry Iernigham, Master Iohn Sulierde, Master Richard Frelton, Master Sargeant Morgan, M. Clement Higham of Lincolnnes Inne, and diuers others, and also that the Earle of Suffr, and Master Henry Ratchiffe his sonne were comming towards her: whereupon by speedie counsell it was there concluded, that the Duke of Suffolke with certaine other noblemen, shoulde go towards the ladie Mary, to fetch hir by to the tower: this was first determined: but by night of the same date, the said voiage of the Duke of Suffolke was cleane dissolved by the spectall meanes of the lady Iane his daughter, who taking the matter heauilie, with weeping teares made request to the whole councell, that hir father might tarry at home in her company: whereupon the counsell perswaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that voiage vpon him, saying, that no man was so fit therfore, because that he had atchieued the victorie in Dorffolke once already, and was therfore so feared, that none durst once lift vp their weapon against him: besides that, he was the best man of war in the realme, as wel for the ordering of his rampes and souldiers both in battell and in their tentes, as also by experience, knowledge & wise doings, he could both animate his army with witty perswasions, & also pacify and alay his enemies pride with his stout courage, or else to dissuade them if need were, from their enterpryse. Finally said they, this is the short and long, the Queene will in no wise grant, that her father shall take it vpon him: wherefore (quoth they) we think it good, if it may please your grace, it lieth in you to remedy the matter. Well (quoth the duke then) since ye thinke it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelitie to the queens maiesty

which I leaue in your custody: So that night he sent for both lordes, knightes and other that shoulde go with him, and caused all things to bee prepared accordingly: then went the counsell in to the ladie lane, and tolde her of their conclusion, who humbly thanked the Duke for reseruing her father at home, and beseeched him to vse his diligence, whereto he answered, that he would do what in him laie.

The morrow following, great preparation was made, the Duke early in the morning called for his owne harnesse, and sawe it made ready at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to meete.

The same day carts were laden with munition and artillery, and felds pieces were set for ward.

The same forenoon the duke moued erstwhiles the counsell to send their powers after him, as it was before determined, & same to meet with him at Belsmarket, and they promised they would. He said further to some of them: My lordes, I and these other noble personages, with the whole army that nowe go forth, as well for the behalfe of you and yours, as for the establisshing of the Englishnes, shall not onelie aduenture our bodie and liues amongst the bloudie strokes and cruell assaults of our aduersaries in the open fields, but also we do leaue the conseruation of our selues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogether committed to your truth and fidelities, whom, if we thought ye woulde through malice, conspiracy, or dissention leaue vs your friendes in the byters and betraie vs, wee coulde as well sundry waies foresee and prouide for our owne safegardes, as anie of you, by betraying vs, can doe for yours. But nowe vpon the onelie trust and faithfulness of your honors, whereof wee thinke our selues most assured, wee do hazarde our liues, which trust and promise if yee shall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion, yet shall not God conuict you innocent of our bloods, neither acquitte you of the sacred and holie oth of alleageance made swelie by you to this vertuous lady the queenes highnesse, who by your and our enticement, is rather of force placed therein, than by her owne seeking and request. Consider also, that Gods cause, which is the preferment of his woode, and feare of papistes entraunce, hath beene (as yee haue heere before alwaies saide) the originall ground whereupon yee euen at the first motion graunted your good willes and consentes thereunto, as by your handes writing appeareth: and thinke not the contrarie, but if yee meane deceyte, though not forthwith, yet heereafter God will reuenge the same.

Duke of Northumberland sent against the lady Mary, his words to the Ladies.

I can saie no more, but in this troublesome time with you to vse constant hearts, abandoning all malice, enmie, and pinate affections: and therewith, all the first course for the lordes came vp, wherefore the duke shut vp his talke with these wordes: I haue not spoken to you in this sort vpon anie mistrust I haue of your truthes, of which alwaies I haue euer hitherto conceiued a trusty confidence, but I haue put you in remembrance thereof, what chauce of variance soeuer might grow amongst you in mine absence, and this I prae you, with mee not woode god speede in this iourney, than yee woulde haue to your selues. My lord, saith one of them, if ye mistrust any of vs in this matter, your grace is far deceived, for which of vs can wash his hands cleane thereof? and if we shoulde thinke from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuse himselfe to be guiltles? therefore herein your doubt is to far cast. I pray god it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and so they sate down. After dinner the duke went in to the D. where his commission was by that time sealed, for his lieutenant shippe of the army, and then toke his leaue of hir, and so did certaine other lords also.

Then as the Duke came through the counsell chamber, hee tooke his leaue of the Earle of Arundell, who praised God bee with his grace, saying, he was soze it was not his chance to go with him, and beare him companie, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his bloude, euen at his feete: then the earle of Arundell tooke Thomas Louell the Dukes bote by the hande, and saide, fare well gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the L. Marques of Northampton, the L. Grey, and diuers other, tooke their barge, and went to Durham place, and to White hall, where that night they mustered their men: and the next daie in the morning, the Duke departed with the number of 600. men, or thereabouts. And as they rode thorough Shorditch, saith the duke to the Lord Grey, the people presse to see vs, but not one saith God speede vs.

The same day sir Iohn Gates and other went out after the duke.

By this time word was brought to the tower, that the Lady Mary was fled to Flamingham castle in Suffolke; where the people of the countrey almost wholy resorted to hir; and that William L. Windsor, sir Edward Hastings, Sir Edmond Pecham with others, were proclaiming Quene Mary in Buckinghamshire, sir Io. Williams in Dorsetshire, &c.

About this time, sixe Ships well manned, that were appointed to lie before Portsmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Mary if she had fled that waie, were by force of weather driven into the Hauen, where one Maister Ierningham was raising powder on the Ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing thereof, came thither, whereupon the captaines tooke a boate and went to the ships, but the Sailers and Souldiers asked Maister Ierningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their Captaines or no? and he said yea: marie said they shall haue them, or we will throwe them into the bottome of the Sea, but the Captaines sayde forthwith, that they would serue Quene Marie willingly, and so brought forth their men, and conuected with them their great Ordnance: At the comming of these Shippes the ladie Marie was woonderfull ioyous, and afterwarde doubted little the Dukes puissance: but when newes thereof was brought to the Tower, each man there beganne to draw backward, and ouer that, word of a greater mischief was brought to the Tower, that is to saie, that the Noblemens tenants refused to serue their lords against quene Marie.

The duke thought long for his succors, and wrote somewhat sherpelie to the counsell at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as of munition, but a slender answer had he againe: And from that time forward certaine of the counsell, to wit, the earle of Pembroke, and sir Th. Cheyney lord Warden, and other, sought to get out of the Tower to consult in London, but couide not yet.

and

The 16. of July, being Sunday, doctor Ridley Bishop of London, by commandment of the counsell preached at Pauls crosse, where he vehemently perswaded the people in the title of the ladie Iane, late proclaimed Q. and inuited earnestly against the title of lady Marie, &c.

The same 16. of July, the lord Treasurer was gone out of the tower to his house in London at night, and forthwith about 7. of the clocke the gates of the tower vpon a sodain were shut vp, and the keyes bozn vp to the lady Iane, which was for feare of some packing in the T. treasurer, but he was fetched again to the tower, about 12. of the clocke in the night.

The 18. day, the D. perceiving that the succors promised came not to him, and also receiuing from some of the counsell letters of discomfirt, hee returned from Bury backe againe to Cambridge.

The 19. of Iulie, the Councell, partlie moued with the right of the ladie Mariess cause, partlie considering, that the most of the realme was wholy bent on her side, chaunged their mindes, and assembled themselves at Baimardes castle, where they communed with the Earle of Pembroke: And the earle of Shrewsburie, with Sir Iohn Mason Cleark of the Councell, spake to the lordes spaiors secretly, that he with the Sheriffes and such other of the Aldermen with the Recorder, as he thought best, to make him and the Councell at Baimardes Castle, within lesse than an houre: which they did, where the counsell declared to the lordes spaiors and his brethren, that hee and they must ride with them into Cheape to proclaim a newe Quene, which was the ladie Mariess grace, daughter to King Henry the eight; and they riding from thence to Pauls Church-parke, and into Cheape, the people were so assembled, that the Lordes couide not ride by them to the Crosse, where spaior Gattar king at armes in his rich Coate of armes, with a Trumpet beeing readie, the Trumpet was sounded, and then they proclaimed the ladie Mary, Daughter to King Henry the eight and Quene Katherine, Quene of Englande, Fraunce, and Irelande, defender of the faith, &c. Which Proclamation ended, the Lordes spaiors, and all the Counsell rode to Pauls Church, where the Canticle of Te Deum was sounge. And the same night the Earle of Arundell, and the Lordes Pager, rode in posse to Quene Mary with thirtie horse with them.

The counsell assembled at Baimardes castle.

Lady Mary proclaimed
Quene.

The 20. of Iulie, Iohn Duke of Northumberland, beeing then in Cambridge, and hauing sure knowledge, that the ladie Mary was by the Nobilitie and others of the Counsell remaining at London proclaimed Quene; about five of the clocke the same night, he with such other of the nobilitie as were in his companie, came to the market crosse of the towne, and calling for an Herald, himselfe proclaimed quene Mary, and among other he thewe vpp his owne cappe, and within an houre after he had letters from the counsell, by the bandes of Richard Rose herault: Dated at Westminster the 20. of Iune in some following.

Duke of Northumberland
proclaimed
Mary at Cambridge.

In the name of our Soueraigne Lady Mary the Quene to bee declared to
the

Counsellors letters to the Duke of Northumberland.

the Duke of Northumberland, and all other of his band of what degree soever they be.

Ye shall command and charge in the Quenes highnesse name, the saide Duke to disarm himselfe, and to cease all his men of war: and to suffer no part of his army to doe any villanie, or any thing contrary to the peace: and himselfe to forbear his coming to this citie untill the Quenes pleasure be expressely declared unto him. And if he will shewe himselfe like a good quiet subiect, we will then continue as wee have begunne, as humble suiters to our soueraigne lady the Quenes highnesse for him and his, as for our selues. And if he do not, we will not faile to spend our liues in subduing him and his.

Item, ye shall declare the like matter to the Marquesse of Dorsethampton, and all other noble men and gentlemen, and to all men of war being with any of them.

Item, ye shall in all places where ye come, notifie it, If the Duke of Northumberland do not submit himselfe to the Quenes highnesse, Quene Marie, he shall be accepted as a traytour. And all we of the nobilitie that were counsellors to the late king, will to the uttermost portion, persecute him and his to their utter confusion. Thom. Cant. archbishop, Thomas Elie Chancelor, Will. Winchester Marquesse, I. Bedforde Earle, H. Suffolke Duke, F. Shrewsburie Earle, W. Penbrough Earle, Thomas Darcy Lozde Chamberlaine, R. Cotton, W. Peter secretarie, W. Cecill second secretarie, I. C. I. Baker Chancelor of the tenth, I. Mafen master of requests, R. Bowes master of the Kols.

Duke of North-
arrested.

The rumour of these letters was no sooner abroad, but euery man departed. And shortly after, the Duke was arrested in the Kings Colledge by one master Slegge, Sergeant at armes. At the last letters were brought from the counsell at London, that all men should go each his way: Whereupon the Duke said to them that kept him, Ye doe me wrong to withdraw my libertie, for ye not the Counsellors letters without exception, that all men should go whither they would: At which wordes, they that kept him and the other Noble men, let them at libertie, and so continued they for that night, insomuch, that the Earle of Marwick was readie in the morning to haue rode awaie, but then came the Earle of Arundale from the quene to the Duke into his Chamber, who went out to meete him, and as soon as he sawe the Earle of Arundale, he fell on his knees, and desired him to be good to him, for the loue of God, consider (saith he) I haue done nothing but by the consents of you and all the whole Counsell: My Lord (quoth the Earle of Arundell) I am sent hither by the Quenes maiestie, and in her name I doe arrest you: and I obey it my Lord (quoth he) I beseech you my Lord of Arundell (quoth the Duke) vse mercie towards mee, knowing the case as it is: my Lord (quoth the Earle) ye should haue sought for mercie sooner, I must doe according to my commandement, and therewith he committed the charge of him, and of other to the guard and gentlemen that rode by.

The 25. of July, the Duke with other were brought by to the Tower of London, under the conduct of Henry Earle of Arundale, with a great number of light horse-men, bowes and speares, they came into London at bishops gate, all the streets as he passed by standing with men, in harnessse aforesaid every mans doore, till hee came to the Tower wharfe: the prisoners names that came in at that time, were the Duke of Northumberlande, the Earle of Warlike, the Earle of Huntingdon, the lord Hastings, lord Ambrose Dudley, lord Henrie Dudley, sir Andrewe Dudley, sir Iohn Gates, Henrie Gates, sir Thomas Palmer, doctor Sands, but when they came to the Tower, the Earle of Arundell discharged the lord Hastings, and had him awaie with him.

Duke of Northumberland brought to the Tower.

On the five and twentieth, the lord Marquess of Northampton, the bishop of London, the lord Robert Dudley, and sir Robert Corbet were brought from the Quenes campe into the Tower. And thus was the matter ended without bloodshed, which men feared would have brought the death of many thousands.

Queene Mary.

Mary, the eldest daughter of King Henrie the eight, An. reg. 1. began her raigne the first of July, in the yere 1553. when she dissolved her campe at Framingham, which was to the number of 13000. men, the Earle of Sussex being lieutenant of the armie: victuals were of such plentie, that a barrell of beere was solde for five pence with the caske, and foure great loaves of bread for a penny.

The 27. of July, sir Roger Cholmely lord chiefe Justice of the kings bench, sir Edmond Mountague lord chiefe iustice of the common place, were sent to the Tower, on the next morrow Henry duke of Suffolke, and sir Iohn Cheeke were had to the Tower.

On the 30. of July, the lady Elizabeth sister to the Quene, rode from her place at Strand, (where she had lien the night before) through the city of London, out at Aldgate toward the Quene, accompanied with 1000. horse, of knights, ladies, gentlemen and their servants.

On the 31. of July, the duke of Suffolke was discharged out of the tower, by the earle of Arundell, and had the quenes pardon.

Queene Mary came from Mansfield in Essex, to London on the 3. of August, being brought in with her nobles very honorably, and strongly, the number of helmet coats that did ride before her, as well strangers as others were 740. and the number of ladies and gentlewomen that followed, was 180. The earle of Arundale riding next before her, bare a sword in his hand, and sir Anthony Browne did beare by her traine. The lady Elizabeth her sister followed.

loved her next, and after her the lord marquisse of Excesters wife. The garde followed the ladies, and after them Northamptonshire and Dorsetshire men, and then Buckinghamshire men, and after them the lords servants: the whole number of horse-men were esteemed to bee about 1000. The Quene staid without Aldgate, before the stage, whereon the poore children of the hospitall were placed, and one of them made to her an Oracion. Sir George Barnes then lord Mayor, with the Aldermen, brought her into the citie, the lord Mayor riding next to the earle of Arundale, with a Scepter or mace in his hand. A great peale of ordinance was shotte off at the Tower of London, when the Quene entered the Citie through Aldgate, by to Leaden hall, then downe Grace stræte, Fanchurch stræte, Marke lane, Tower stræte, and so into the Tower, where Thomas duke of Norfolk, doctor Gardener late Bishoppe of Winchester, Edward Courtney sonne and heire to Henry marquisse of Excestre, the Dutchesse of Somerset, prisoners in the Tower, kneeling on the hill within the same tower, saluted her grace, and she came to them and kissed them, & said, these be my prisoners. On the next morrow, Edward Courtney was made marquisse of Excestre, and the other fornamed prisoners pardoned, and discharged in the Quenes chamber.

The 5. of August, Edmond Bonner late Bishop of London, prisoner in the Marshalsea, and Cuthbert Tonsall the olde bishop of Durham prisoner in the Kings bench, had their pardons, and were restored to their Sees. Shortly after all the Bishops which had bene deposed in the time of king Edward the first, were restored to their Bishopricks, and the other which were placed in king Edwards time, removed: also all beneficed men that were married, or would not forsake their opinion, were put out of their livings. & other known to be of the contrarie part, were set in the same, especially if any were alive, that had of late bene put out of the same, as bishop Daie of Chichester, Heath of Worcester, &c.

Sir Nicholas Hare master of the Hols, was made keeper of the great scale, for the space of a fortnight or thereabout.

The 9. of August, in the afternoon, the Quene helde an Obsequie in the tower for king Edward, the dirge being sung in Latin, and on the morrowe a masse of Requiem, whereat the Quene with her ladies offered. The same daie the corpes of king Edward was buried at Westminster, the lord Treasurer, the Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Shrewsburie being chiefe mourners, with diuers other noble men and other. Doctor Daie Bishop of Chichester preached at the said burfall, and all the seruice with a Communion was in English.

The 11. of August, certaine gentlemen minding to passe under London bridge in a whirrie, were there ouerturned, and 7. of them drowned, one was master T. Bridges sonne.

The 13. of August, master Bourne a Chanon of Pauls preaching at Pauls crosse, not onely praised for the dead, but also declared, that Doctor Bonner bishop of London (late restored, and there in presence) for a sermon by him made in the same place, vpon the same Gospell, was about foure yeres since, since, vnlawfully cast into the vile prison of the Marshalsea, and there kept during the reigne of king Edward: which saying so offended some of the audience, that they breaking silence, said the bishop had preached abomination, or ther some cried (meaning of the preacher) pull him out, pull him out, and some being nere the pulpit, began to cline, wherewith the preacher stepped backe, and one Maister Bradford a preacher of King Edwards time, stepped into his place, and gentlie perswaded the audience to quietnes and obedience, alleading 3. Paul to the Romans: Let every soule submit himselfe to the authoritie of the higher powers, &c. Neuer theles master Bourne standing by Maister Bradford, one threw a dagger at him, which hit a side post of the pulpit, and rebounded back again a great way, whereupon M. Bradford brake off his speech, and forced himselfe with the helpe of Io. Rogers another preacher, to conuete M. Bourne out of the audience, which with great labor they brought into Pauls Schole.

The 18. of August, Iohn Dudley Duke of Northumberlande, William Parre Marques of Dorhampton, and Iohn Carle of Marthwicke son and heire to the duke, were arraigned at Westminister hall, befoze Thomas D. of Dorfolke, high steward of England, where the duke of Northumberland with great reverence towards the iudges, protested his faith and alleageance to the queen, whome he confessed greivously to haue offended, and said, that he meant not to speake any thing in defence of his fact, but requested to vnderstande the opinion of the court in two points. First, whether a man doing any act by authoritie of the princes counsell and by warrant of the great seale of England, and doing nothing without the same, might bee charged with treason for any thing which he might do by warrant thereof. Secondly, whether any such persons as were equally culpable in that crime, and those, by whose letters and commandements he was directed in all his doings, might be his iudges, or passe vpon his tryall as his Peeres.

and other arraigned.

Whereunto was answered, that as concerning the first, the great Seale (which he laid for his warrant) was not the seale of the lawfull Queene of the realme, nor passed by authoritie, but the seale of an vsurper, and the refoze could bee no warrant to him. As to the second, it was alledged, that if any were as deeply to be touched in that case as himselfe, yet so long as no attaindo: were of record against them, they were neuer the les persons able in law to passe vpon any triall, and not to be chalenged therefore, but at the princes pleasure. After which ans were, the Duke vsed few words, but confessed the inditement, by whose example the other prisoners arraigned with him did the like, and thereupon had iudgement.

And when iudgement was giuen the duke saide, I beseech you my lordes, all to be humble suiters to the M. maiestie, and to grant mee foure requestes, which are these. First, that I maie haue that death which noble men haue had in times past, and not the other. Secondlie, that her Maiestie will bee gracious to my childe, which maie hereafter do good seruice, considering, that they went by my commandement, who am their father, and not of their owne free willes. Thirdly, that I maie haue appointed to mee some learned man for the instruction and quiet of my conscience. And fourthlie, that shee will send two of the counsell, to commune with mee, to whome I will declare such matters as shall be expedient for her and the common weale: and thus I beseech you all to pray for me.

On the nineteenth of August were arraigned at Westminster, Sir Iohn Gates, Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, where without anie quest they pleaded guiltie, and submitted themselves to the Quenes mercie, and so hadde iudgement.

The twentieth of August, Doctor Watson, Chaplaine to the Bishoppe of Winchester preached at Paules Crosse, by the Quenes appointment, and for feare of the like tumult, as had beene the Sundae last past, certain lordes of the Counsell repaired to the Sermon, as the Lorde Treasurer, the Lorde Prinsie Seale, the Earle of Bedforde, the Earle of Pembroke, the Lorde Wentworth, the Lord Rich, and Sir Henrie Gernigam captaine of the gard, with 200. of the guard, which stode about the Preacher with halberts. Also the Maior had warned the companies of the citie to be present in their liuries, which was well accepted of the Quenes counsell, and the Sermon was quietlie ended.

The twentie two of August, Sir Iohn Cage Lieutenent of the Tower, deliuered to the Sheriffes of London, by Indenture these prisoners following: first Sir Iohn Gates was brought forth, and set at the Garden Gate, then the Duke of Northumberlande, was likewise brought forth, and Sir Thomas Palmer after him: When the Duke and Sir Iohn Gates mette, Sir Iohn saith the Duke, God haue mercie vpon vs, for this date shall ende both our liues, and I praye you forgie me what soeuer I haue offended, and I forgie you with all my heart, although you and your counsell was a great occasion hereof: Well my Lorde quoth Sir Iohn Gates, I forgie you, as I woulde bee forgiven, and yet you and your authoritie was the originall cause of all togither, but the Lorde pardon you, and I praye you forgie me. So either making obeisance to other, the Duke proceeded, and when he came vpon the Scaffold, hee putting off his Coloure of Crane coloured Damaske, leaped vpon the East Raile, and saide to the people: God people, all you that be here present to see mee die, though my death bee odious, and horrible to the flesh, yet I praye you iudge the best in Gods woordes, for hee doth all for the best. And as for mee, I am a wretched sinner, and haue deserved to die, and most iustlie am condemned to die by lawe. And yet this Acte wherefore I die, was not altogether of mee (as it is thought) but I was procured and induced thereunto by other, I was, I saie induced thereunto by other: Howbeit, God so bidde that I shoulde name anie man vnto you, I will name no man vnto you, and therefore I beseech you looke not for it. I for my part forgie all men, and praye God also to forgie them. And if I haue offended any of you here, I praye you and all the worlde to forgie mee; and most chiefeilie I desire forgiveness of the quenes highnesse, whome I haue most greivously offended. And I praye you all to witness with mee, that I depart in perfect loue and charitie with all the worlde, and that you will assist me with your prayers.

praiers at the houre of death. The rest of his speech almost in euerie point, was the like as hee hadde saide in the Chappell of the Tower, in the daie before, saying, when hee hadde made confession of his beleefe, hee hadde these wordes. And heere I doe protest vnto you good people, mosse earnestlie, even from the bottome of my heart, that this which I haue spoken is of my selfe, not being required nor moued thereunto by any man, nor for any flatterie, or hope of life, and I take witnesse of my Lorde of Worcester heere, mine olde friende and Ghostlie father, that hee founde mee in this minde and opinion, when hee came to mee; but I haue declared this onelie vpon mine owne minde and affection, and for the zeale and loue that I beare to my naturall Countreie. I coulde good people rehearse much more euen by experience that I haue of this euill that is happened to this Realme by these occasions, but you knowe I haue another thing to doe, whereunto I must prepare mee, for the time draweth awaie. And now I beseech the Queenes highnes to forgive mee mine offences against her Maiestie, whereof I haue a singular hope, for as much, as she hath already extended her goodnesse and clemencie so farre vpon mee, that where as she might forthwith, without iudgement or anie further tryall, haue put mee to most vile and cruell death, by hanging, drawing, and quartering, for as much as I was in the field in armes against her highnesse, her Maiestie neuertheless of her most mercifull goodnesse suffered me to be brought to my iudgement, and to haue my triall by law, where I was most iustlie and woorthilie condemned. And her highnesse hath now also extended her mercie and clemencie vpon mee, for the manner and kinde of my death. And therefore my hope is, that her grace of her goodnesse will remit all the rest of her indignation and displeasure towards mee, which I beseech you all most heartilie to praye for, and that it maie please God long to preferue her Maiestie to raigne ouer you in much honour and felicitie. After hee had thus spoken he kneeled downe, saying to them that were about him; I beseech you all to beare me witnesse that I die in the true Catholike faith, and then saide the Psalmes of Miserere and De profundis, his Pater noster, and five of the first Verses of the Psalm, In te Domine speravi, ending with this verse; Into thy handes O Lorde I commend my spirit; and when hee had thus finished his praiers, the executioner asked him forgiveness, to whome hee sayde: I forgive thee with all my heart, and doe thy parte without feare. And bowing towarde the Blocke, hee saide, I haue deserued a thousande deaths, layde his heade vpon the Blocke and so was beheaded. Whose bodie with the heade was buried in the Tower, by the bodie of Edward late Duke of Somerset, so that there lieth before the high Altar, in St. Peters church two dukes, betweene two queenes, to wit, the duke of Somerset, and the duke of Northumberland, betweene queene Anne, and queene Katherine, all foure beheaded.

burials in the Tower.

At the same time and place also, was likewise beheaded Sir Iohn Gates, Sir Iohn Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer, which Sir Iohn Gates in that place used these or like wordes. My comming hither this daie good people is to die, whereof I assure you all I am well woorthie: for I haue liued as bitiouslie and wickedlie all.

Sir Iohn Gates and Sir Thomas Palmer beheaded.

all the daies of my life as any man hath down in the world. I was the greatest reader of scripture that might be of a man of my degree: And a troupe follower thereof not liuing: for I did not read to the intent to be edified thereby, nor to seeke the glory of God: but contrariwise, arrogantly, to be seditious, and to dispute thereof, and privately to interpret it after my owne haine and affection. Wherefore good people I exhort you all to beware howe, and after what sort you come to read Gods holie word; for it is not a trifle, or playing game to deale with Gods holie mysteries: stand not too much in your owne conceits, for like as the bee of one flower doth gather honie, and the spider poison of the same, euen so you, except you humbly submit your selues to God, and charitablely reade the same to the intent to be edified thereby, it is to you as poison, and worse: and it were better for to let it alone. And then after hee had asked the Quenes highnes forgiveness, and all the world; he desired the people of their charitie to pray vnto God with him for remission of his sinnes, and then refusing the kerchiefe laide downe his heade, which was stricken off at three blowes. Sir Thomas Palmer, as sone as he came to the scaffold, toke euery man by the hand, and desired them to pray for him; then putting off his gown, hee leane upon the Cast Rayle, and saide these wordes in effect: My Masters (quoth hee) God saue you all: it is not vnknowne vnto you therefore I come hither, which I haue woorthily well deserued at Gods handes, for I know it to be his diuine ordinance, by this meanes to call mee to his mercie, and to teach mee to know my selfe, what I am, and whereunto we are all subiect: I thanke his mercifull goodnes, for he hath caused me to learne more in one little dark corner in yonder Towre, than euer I learned by any traual in so many places as I haue bin, for there (I say) I haue seen God, what he is, & how vnscardeable his wonderful works are, and how infinit his mercies be; I haue seen there my selfe thoroughly, and what I am, nothing but a lump of sin, earth, dust, and of all vilenes most vilest; I haue seen there and know what the world is, how vaine, deceitfull, transitorie, and short it is, how wicked and loathsome the works thereof are in the sight of Gods maiesty, how he neither regardeth the manaces of the proud men and mighty ones, neither despiseth the humblenes of the poore and lowly which are in the same world. If in alie, I haue seen there what death is, how nere hanging ouer euery mans head, and yet how vncertaine the time, and how vnknowne to all men, and how little it is to be feared; and should I feare death? or be sad therefore? haue I not seene two die before mine eyes? Yea, and within the hearing of mine eares? No, neither the sprinkling of the blood, or the shedding thereof, nor the bloody fire it selfe shall make me afraid; and now taking my leaue to the same, I pray you all to pray for me: come on good fellows (quoth he) art thou hee that must do the deed? I forgive thee with all my hart, and then kneeling down, laying his head on the blocke, said, I will see how meet the blocke is for my necke, I pray thee strike not yet, for I haue a few prayers to saie, and that done, strike on Gods name, god leaue haue thou, his prayers ended, and desiring each man to pray for him, hee laide downe his heade againe, and so the executioner toke it from him at one stroke.

The 23. of August, the Quene deliuered the great Seale to doctor Gardener bishop of Winchester, and made him lord chancelor.

The third of September, Edward Courtney was created earle of Denonshire at Richmond.

Earle of Denonshire created.

The lord Fencers of Chartley, the lord chiefe iustice, sir Roger Cholmley, the L. Mountague, sir Io. Cheeke, and other, were deliuered out of the tower.

The 4. of September was proclained certaine new coines of gold and silver, a soueraigne of gold of 30. s, the halfe soueraigne 15. s, an angel of 10. s, the halfe angel 5. s: of silver, the groat, halfe groat, and penny. All base coines to be currant as before.

New coines.

Also the same day by proclamation, was pardoned the subbidie of foure s. the pound lands, and two s. eight d. the pound of moueable goods, granted in the last parliament of king Edward the first.

Subbidie pardoned.

The 12. of September the Quene remoued to S. James.

The 14. and 15. of September master Latimer and doctor Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury were sent to the tower of London.

The 27. of September, Q. Mary came to the tower by water, accompanied with the Lady Elizabeth her sister, and other ladies, before whose arrivall was shot a great peale of guns.

The last of September, Quene Mary rode through the Citie of London towards Westminster, sitting in a chariot of cloth of tisse drawn with fire horses, all trapped with the like cloth of tisse. She sate in a gowne of purple velvet furred with powdered ermine, hauing on her head a caule of cloth of tinsel, beset with pearle and stone, and aboue the same vpon her head, a round circlet of gold beset so richly with pretious stones, that the value thereof was inestimable, the same caule and circlet being so masse and ponderous, that she was faine to beare vpon her head with her hand, and the canopy was borne ouer her chariot. Before her rode a number of gentlemen and knights, then iudges, then doctors, then bishops, then lords, then the counsell: after whom followed the knights of the Bath, thirtene in number, in their robes, the bishop of Winchester lord Chancelor, and the marquesse of Winchester lord high treasurer, next came the duke of Norfolk, and after him the Earle of Arundell, who bare the sword before her, the maior of London in a gowne of crimson velvet bare the scepter of gold, &c. after the Quenes chariot, sir Edward Hastings led her horse in his hand: then came an other chariot, hauing a covering all of cloth of silver all white, and fire horses trapped with the like, therein sate the lady Elizabeth and the lady Anne of Cleue, then Ladies and Gentlewomen riding on horses trapped with red velvet, and their gownes and kirtles likewise of red velvet: after them followed two other chariots couered with red sattin, and the hozes betrapped with the same, and certaine gentlewomen betwene euery of the saide chariots riding in crimosin sattin, their hozes betrapped with the same, the number of the gentlewomen fording were 46. besides them in the chariots. At Ffanchurch was a costly pageant made by the Genowayes: at Grace-church corner there was another pageant made by the Casserlings. At the vpper ende of Grace strate there was an other pageant made by the Florentines verie high, on the top whereof there stode foure pictures, and in the midst of them and most highest, there stode an angell all in greene, with a trumpet in his hand, and when the trumpetter who stode secretly in the pageant did sound his trumpe, the angell did put his trumpe to his mouth, as though it had bene the same that had sounded, to the great maruelling of many ignozant persons: this pageant was made with three thousand fares of gates, &c. The conduit in Coznehill ran wine, and beneath the conduit a pageant made at the charges of the citie, and another at the great conduit in Cheape, and a fountaine by it running wine. The standart in Cheape newe painted, with the waites of the Citie aloft the roof playing. The crosse in Cheape newe washed and burnished. One other pageant at the little conduit in Cheape next to Paules made by the Citie, where the aldermen stode: and when the Quene came against them, the Recorder made a short proposition to her, and then the chamberlaine presented to her in the name of the maior and the city, a purse of cloth of gold, and 1000. marks of gold in it: then she rode forth, and in Paules churchyard against the schole, one Maister Haywod fate in a pageant vnder a vine, and made to her an oration in Latine and English. Then was there one Peter a Dutch man stode on the weatherecoke of Paules keple, holding a streamer in his hand of fives yardes long, and waving thereof, stode sometime on the one fote, and shoke the other, and then kneeled on his knees, to the great maruell of all people. He had made two scaffoldes vnder him, one aboue the crosse, hauing torches and streamers set on it, and one other ouer the bole of the crosse, likewise set with streamers and torches, which could not burne the winde was so great: the said Peter had sixtene pound thirtene shillings and foure pence giuen him by the citie for his costs and paines, and all his stoffe. Then was there a pageant made against the deane of Paules gate, where the queristers of Paules plaied on vials, and song. Ludgate was newe repaired, painted, and richlie hanged, with minstrels playing and singing there: then was there another pageant at the conduit in flete strate, and the Temple barrc was newe painted and hanged. And thus she passed to White hall at Westminster, where shee toke her leaue of the lord maior, giuing him great thanks for his paines, and the Citie for their cost. On the morrow, which was the first daie of October: the Quene went by water to the olde palace, and there remained till about eleven of the clocke, and then went on fote vpon blew cloth, being railed on either side vnto Saint Peters Church, where shee was solemnlie crowned and annointed by the Bishop of Winchester, which coronation and other ceremonies then vsed according to the olde custome, was not fully ended till it was nigh foure of the clocke at night that shee returned turned from the Church, before whom was then bozne three swords sheathed, and one naked. The great seruice that day done in Westminster hall at dinner by diuers noble men, would aske long time to write. The Lorde maior of London and twelue citizens kept the high cupbord of plate as butlers, and the Quene gaue to the Maior for his fee a cup of golde with a couer waiping seventene ounces.

The 5. of October, the parliament began at Westminster, sir Iohn Yorke, Parliament. and Henry Dudley, were deliuered out of the Tower.

The 25. day of October, the Barge of Grauesende, a Catch running vpon her, was ouerturned, and foureteene persons drowned, and sixtene saued by swimming. Grauesend Barge ouerturned.

Cardinall Poole, who had long time bene forth from this realme, and now in great estimation in the court of Rome, was sent for by Quene Mary to returne into his countrey of England. Cardinall Poole.

The 3. of Nouember, the weathercocke of Paules was set vp, which cocke waiped forty pound, his length from the bill to the taile was foure fote, and his breadth ouer the wings three fote and a halfe, the which cocke being of copper, was ouer gilt. Weathercock of Paules.

The thirteenth of Nouember, Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Ladie Iane that was before proclaimed Quene, and the lorde Guilford her husband, and the Lorde Ambrose Dudley, were arraigned at the Guild hall of London, and condemned of treason: sir Henry Gates was deliuered out of the Tower.

The Parliament was dissolved on the first of December. And on the one and twentieth of December, began throughout England the Church seruice to be done in Latin, as was enacted by the last Parliament, and as the same had ben left in the last yere of K. Henry the eight. The Lady Iane had the liberty of the Tower, to walke in the Quenes Garden and on the hill. The Lorde Ambrose Dudley, and the Lorde Gilsford Dudley, had the liberties of the ports where they were lodged: the Marquesse of Northampton had his pardon and was deliuered. Latin seruice in the church.

In the beginning of the month of Ianuary, the Emperour sent a noble man called Edmond, and certaine other Ambassadors into England to conlude a marriage betwene K. Philip his son, and Quene Mary of England.

The 14. of Ianuary, doctor Stephen Gardener bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancelor of England, in the chamber of presence at Westminster, made to the Lords, Nobility, and Gentlemen, an Oracion very eloquent, wherein he declared that the Quenes Maiestie, partly for amity, and other waighty considerations had, after much suite on the Emperours and Prince of Spaines behalfe made, determined by the consent of the Counsell and Nobilitie, to match her selfe with the saide Prince in most godly and lawfull matrimonie: and declared further, that she should haue for her iointer 30000. dockets by the yere, with all the low-countrey of Flanders, and that the issue (if there happened any) betwene them two lawfully begotten, should be heire as wel to the Kingdome of Spaine, as also to the said low-countrey. He said therefore that they were all bound to thanke God that so noble, worthy, and famous a Prince would vouchsafe so to humble himselfe, as in this marriage to take vpon him rather as a subject, than otherwise, for the Quene and her counsell should rule all things as she did before, and that there should be of the council no stranger, neither to haue the custodie of any forts, or Castles, &c. nor beare any rule or office in the quenes house, or else-where in all England, with diuers other articles there by him rehearsed, wherefore he said the quens pleasure and request was, that like good subjects for her sake, they would most louingly receiue him with reuerence, loy and honor.

The next day, the Lord maior of London, with his brethren the aldermen, were sent for to the court, and to bring with them fortie of the head commons of the citie, vnto whom before the counsell, the lord chancelor made the like oration, desiring them to behaue themselves like good subjects with all humbleness and reioycing.

Robert Dudley sonne to the late duke of Northumberland, was arraigned at the Guild hall of London of high treason, he confessed the indictment, and had iudgement giuen by the earle of Sussex, to be drawne, hanged, boyled and quartered.

Within five daies after, there was worde brought to the court, how that sir Peter Carow, sir Gawine Carow, sir Thomas Deny with diuers other, were by in Devonshire, in the resisting of the king of Spaines comming thither, and that they had taken the city of Excester, and castle there into their custodie.

About the thre and twentieth or foue and twentieth day of January, sir James a Crofts departed from London toward Wales, as it was thought, to haue raised power there.

Conspiracy.

The purpose of the Quenes marriage was so grieuously taken of diuers men, that for this & for religion, they in such sort conspired against the quene, that if the matter had not broken out before the time by them appointed, men thought it would haue brought much trouble and danger.

Commotion in Kent by sir Thom. Wyatt.

The 25. of Januarie, sir Iohn Gage lord Chamberlaine, certified the lord maior of London, that sir Thomas VVyat with certaine other rebels, were by in Kent about Maidstone, whereupon great watch was kept, and that night the lord maior rode about to peruse the same, and euery night after two aldermen did the like: in the daytime the gates of the Citie were warded by substantiall citizens.

The 26. day of January was brought into the tower as prisoners, the lord marquisse of Northampton, sir Edward Warner, and other. And the same night there went out certaine of the gard, and other against the Kentish men. And the city of London began to be straighly kept and watched by hardned men, by the appointment of the lord treasurer, who had the day before sent for the lord maior and aldermen, and giuen them so in charge for safety of the city. And the same day, or rather on the day before, the duke of Norfolk with his power went downe toward Grauesend.

About the which time the lord Burgaunoy, by chance, encountred with sir Henry Ile (one of sir Thomas Wyats faction) and Aue 2. or 3. of his men, he dying

ling with the rest of his company to Wyats campe.

The 27. of January, the Lorde Treasurer came to the Guilder hall from the counsell, to request the citizens to prepare 500. footemen well harneessed to go against Wyat, which was granted and made ready the same night, and on the morrow were deliuered to their capitaines, and sent to Graueland by water.

The D. of Norfolk folk sent against Wyat.

The 29. of January, the D. of Norfolk lieutenant of the army, and with him the earle of Arundell, M. Henry Ierningham capitaine of the guard, with a great number of the guard, and other souldiers, and the capitaine and souldiers that were sent from London, minded to assault Rochester Castle, where Wyat and his people late, so that vpon Thursday they were set in arraie towards Rochester byrge, which was kept by Wyats companie, and furnished with 3. or 4. double canons: but before the setting forwarde of these men, the D. sent master Nory an Herault vnto Rochester, with the Proclamation of pardon to all such as would desist from their purpose, who comming to the byrge, woulde haue gone through into the citie, but they that kept the byrge would not suffer him till that the capitaine came, who at the last graunted the same to be read in the citie, but holding a bag against him, cried, speake softly, or els they would shoot him through, so that they would not suffer the people to heare the Proclamation: which beeing ended, each man cried they had don nothing wherefore they should need any pardon, and in that quarrel which they had taken in hand, they woulde liue and die: neuertheles, at the last Sir George Harpar receiued the pardon outwardly, and being receiued vnder the D. of Norfolks protection, came on forwarde against the Lientishmen, and euen as the companie were set in a readines, and marched forwarde toward the byrge, Bret beeing capitaine of the 500. Londoners, of which the more parte were in the forwarde, turned himsele about, and drawing out his sword, saide these or like wordes: Passers wee go about to fight against our native Countrymen of England and our friends, in a quarrel vnrighful, & partly wicked, for they, considering the great miseries which are like to fall vpon vs, if wee shall be vnder the rule of the proude Spaniards or strangers, are here assembled to make resistance of their comming, for the auoiding of so great inconueniences likely to light, not onely vpon themselves, but on euery of vs & the whole realme, wherefore I thinke no English hart ought to say against them, much lesse by fighting to withstande them: wherefore I and others (meaning such as were in that ranke with him) will spend our blood in the quarrel of this worthy capitaine M. Wyat, and other gentlemen here assembled: which words once pronounced, each man turned their ordinance against their followers, and thereupon cried, a Wyat, a Wyat, of which sodaine noise, the Duke, the capitaine of the guard and other, beeing abashed, fled forthwith: immediatlie came in master Wyat and his companie on horsebacke, rushing in amongst as well the guard as the Londoners, and saide, so manie as will come and tary with vs shall bee welcome, and so manie as will depart, good leaue haue they, and so all the Londoners, part of the gard, and more than three parts of the rest, went to the campe of the Lientishmen, where they still remained. At this discomfiture, the Duke lost eight Peeces of Brasse, with all other munition and ordurance, and himselfe with fewe other hardly escaped.

The last of January, Wyat and his compaignie came to Dertford, and the next day they came full and whole to Greenwich and Depeford, where they remained thursday, friday, and the forenoon of satterday. On the friday, which was Candlemas day, the most part of the householders of London, with the maior and aldermen were in harnesse, yea this daie and other daies the iustices, sergeants at the law, and other lawyers in Westminster hall, placed in harnesse.

In this meane time, to wit, on the 25. of January, Henry duke of Suffolke, father to the lady Iane, flying into Leiceestershire and Warwicks shire with the lord John Grey, and the lord Leonard Grey and a small company in diuers places as he went made proclamation against the queenes marriage with the pince of Spaine, &c. but the people inclined not to him.

The first day of february, proclamation was made at London, that the duke of Suffolke was discomfited, and fled with his two brethren. And also that sir Peter Carow, with his uncle sir Gawine Carow and Gibbes, were fled into France: and further, that the queene did pardon the whole campe of the Kentishmen, except Wyat, Harpar, Rudstone, and Isely, and that whosoever could take sir Thomas Wyat, except the saide four persons, should haue an hundred pound lands to him and his heires for ever.

Q. Mary came to the Guild
hall in London.

The same day in the afternoon being Candlemas euen, the commons of the city assembled in their liberties at the Guild hall, whither the queene with her lordes and ladies came riding from Westminster, and there after behement words against Wyat, declared, that she meant not other wise to marry than the counsell should thinke both honorable and commotions to the realm, and that she could continue unmarried, as she had done the greatest part of her age, and therefore willed them truly to assist her, in repressing such as contrary to their dueties rebelled. When she had done, vnderstanding that many in London did fauour Wyats part, she appointed lord William Howard lieutenant of the citie, and the earle of Pembroke generall of the fildes, which both prepared all things necessary for their purpose.

Lord William Howard lieutenant of the city.

Wyat came into Southwarke

In the meane season, to wit, the third daie of february, about three of the clocke in the afternoon, sir Thomas Wyat and the Kentishmen marched forward from Depeford towards London with sixe ancientes, being by estimation about two thousand, which their coming so sone as it was perceiued, there was shot off out of the White tower sixe or eight shot, but missed them, sometime shooting ouer, and sometime short. After knowledge thereof once had in London, forthwith the drawe bridge was cutte downe, and the bridge gates shut. The maior and sherifes harnessed, commanded each man to shut in their shops and windowes, and to be readie harnessed at their doores, what chance soever might happen. By this time was Wyat entred into Kent street, and so by Saint Georges Church into Southwarke. Himselfe, and part of his compaignie came in god array downe Barmondsey strate, and they were suffered peaceably to enter Southwarke without repulse, or ante stroke stricken, either by the inhabitants, or of any other: yet was there many men of the the countrey in the Innes, raised and brought thither by the lord William and other, to have gone against the said VVyat, but they all toynded themselves to the Gentlemen, and the inhabitants with their best entertained them. Immediately upon the said VVyats coming, he made proclamation, that no soldier should take any thing, but that he should pay for it, and that his coming was to resist the Spanish king. Notwithstanding, forthwith divers of his companie being Gentlemen (as they saide) went to Winchester place, made hauncke of the Bishops goods, (hee being lord Chancelor) not onely of his vituals, whereof there was plentie, but whatsoeuer else, not leaving so much as one Locke of a doze, but the same was taken off and carried awaie, nor a booke in his gallerie or librarie vncut, or rent into pieces, so that men might haue gone by to the knees in leaues of bookes, cut out and shrowne vnder fete.

The Bishop of Winchester's library and other his goods spoiled in Southwarke

At the bridge fote he laid two pieces of ordinance, and began a great trench betwene the bridge and him. He laid one other piece of ordinance at Saint Georges, and one going into Barmondsey strate, and an other toward the Bishop of Winchester's house.

On Shrove-tuesday the first of February sir Thomas VVyat removed out of Southwarke, toward Kingston bridge, which was done upon this occasion. The night before his departing out of Southwarke, by chance as one of the lieutenants men of the Tower named Thomas Menchen rowed with a sculler ouer-against the Bishop of Winchester's place, there was a water-man of the Tower staires, desired the said lieutenants man to take him in, who did so, which being espied of VVyats men, seuen of them with barguebuffes, called to them to land againe, but they would not, whereupon each man discharged their piece, and killed the said water-man, which forthwith falling downe dead, the sculler with much paine rowed through the bridge to the tower wharfe with the lieutenants man, and the dead man in his boate, which thing was no sooner knowen to the lieutenant, but that euen the same night, and the next morning, he bent seauen great pieces of ordinance culuerings, and demie-cannons full against the fote of the bridge, and against Southwarke, and the two steeles of Saint Oliues, and Saint Mary Querles, besides all the pieces on the white Tower, one culuering on Dueling Tower, and three fauconets ouer the water-gate: which so soon as the inhabitants of Southwarke vnderstood, certaine both men & women came to VVyat in most lamentable wise, saying, Sir, we are all like to be bitterly vndone and destroyed for poor sake, our houses shall by and by be throwen downe vpon our heads, to the bitter spoile of this borough, with the shot of the Tower, all ready bent and charged towardes vs, for the loue of God therefore take pittie vpon vs: at which wordes, he being partly abashed stayed a while, and then saide: I praye you my friends be content a while, and I will some ease you of this mischiefe, for God forbid that you, or the least here should bee killed or hurt in my behalfe. And so in most spacie manner he marched awaie. As he marched towardes Kingstone, he met, by chance a merchant named Christopher Dorell, whom he called, saying, Cousin Dorell, I praye you commende me vnto your citizens the Londoners, and say vnto them from me, that when liberty & freedom was offered them, they would not receiue it, neither would they admit me to enter within their gates, who for their freedom, and the disburthening of their griefes, and oppression by strangers, would haue frankly spent my blood in that their cause and quarrell, but now well appeareth their vnthankfulness to vs their friends which meaneth them so much good, and therefore they are the lesse to be moned hereafter, when the miserable tyranny of strangers shall oppresse them, and so he went forwaite.

This day about 4. of the clocke in the afternone he came to Kingston vpon Thames, ten miles west from London, where finding the bridge to be broken, as a .30. fote or thereabout to be taken away, sauing the postes that were left standing, & the other side kept by 200. men, he caused two peeces of ordinance to be planted against them, whereupon they durst not abide: then caused he certaine sailers to swim ouer the Thames, who towed the westerne barges, which there had been tied, and so brought them ouer, by which meanes he passed the water: it was wonder to see what paines he and others toke, whilest the number of souldiers bapted in the towne, he caused the bridge to be repaired with ladders, planks, and beames, the same being tied together with ropes, so as by ten of the clocke in the night, it was in such plight, as both his ordinance, and companies of men might passe ouer without peril. And so about 11. of the clocke, Wyatt with his band, without resistance marched towards London, meaning to haue borne at the court gate before day of the next morning. They came almost to Batnford or euer they were descried by his quens scouts, who there by chance meeting Bret & his company, Bret said to the scout, backe villaine, if thou go further to discouer any thing here, thou shalt die out of hand, so the scout returned in great haste: but as God would haue it, before he came within fire miles of the citie, staying vpon a piece of his great ordinance, which was dismounted by breach of the wheeles, his comming was discovered, & it was 9. of the clocke of the day following, before he came to Hyde parke, as ye shall heare anone. Whilest Wyatt and his counsell were devising how to raise his ordinance dismounted, many of his society slipped from him, among the which, M. Harper was one, who went to the court, and opened al the premises aforesaid, to the D. and counsel, where Wyatt was, what had chanced, and what was his intention. The breaking of the said gun was such an humderance to his enterprize, that all about him were amazed, and at their wits end, because by that means, the hours was broken of appointment, wherefore, Vaughan, Bret, and other appoynted souldiers and counsellers, such as had wise heads in other affaires, as Doctor Poinet and other, did counsell the said Wyatt to march forwards and keepe his appointment, and to let the gun lie, which in no wise he could be perswaded to do. Doctor Poinet therefore, considering how many of his confederacie was stolne away from him, he began to perswade with captaine Bret, and other his friends to shift for themselves, as he would do, and at that very place where the gun did breake, he took his leaue of his secret friends, and said he would pray vnto God for their good successe, and so did depart, and went into Germany, where he died.

The same day in the afternoon, were two men hanged on a gibbet in Pauls churchyard by marshall law, the one John Egerley servant to the duke of Suffolke, and late Sheriffe of Leicesters, the other a Baker, one of the white coates sent out of the Citie against Wyat: and the same day came tidings, that the duke with his brethren were taken.

Execution in Pauls churchyard.

The same day towards night, there was laden 10, or 12. carts with ordinance, as bills, pikes, spears, bowes, arrows, powder, shot, Mouels, mattocks, ballists, and other munitions, 2. culverings, 1. sacre, 3. faucons, and a fauconet, all which stufte staid in Pauls churchyard.

The same night also about five of the clocke, a trumpetter went about, and warned all horsemen and men of armes to be at S. James field, and all footmen also to be there by five of the clocke in the next morning.

The Quenes scout upon his returne to the court, declared Wyats bring at Baintford, which sodaine newes, made all in the court wonderfully astraide, Drummes went through London at foure of the clocke in the morning, commanding all souldiers to armor, and so to Charing crosse.

Wyat hearing that the Earle of Pembroke was come into the felde, hee staid at Linights bridge untill day, where his men being very weary with travail of that night, and the day before, and also partly scabied and faint, hauing receiued small sustenance since their comming out of Southwarke restlesse: There was no final adu in London, and likewise the Towre made great preparation of defence. By ten of the clocke the earle of Pembroke had set his troupe of horsemen on the hill in the high way about the new bridge, ouer against S. James: his footmen were set in two battels, somewhat lower, and nearer Charing crosse, at the lane turning downe by the bricke wall from Flington ward, where he had set also certaine other horsemen, and hee had planted his ordinance vpon the hill side. In the meane season, Wyat and his compaignie planted his ordinance vpon a hill beyond S. James, almost ouer against the parke corner, and himselfe after a few words spoken to his souldiers, came down the old lane on foot, hard by the court gate at S. James, with foure or five ancients, his men marching in god array. Cuthbert Vaughan and a two ancients turned downe toward Westminster. The earle of Pembrokes horsemen honored all this while without moving, untill all was passed by sauing the taile, vpon which they did set, and cut off: the other marched forward in array, and neuer staid or returned to the aide of their taile: the great ordinance shot off freshly on both sides: Wyats ordinance ouerhot the troupe of horsemen. The Quenes ordinance, one piece strake thre of Wyats compaignie in a ranke vpon the heads, and slaying them, strake through the wall into the parke: more harme was not done by the great shot of neither partie. The Quenes whole battaile of footmen standing still, Wyat passed along by the wall towardes Charing crosse, where the said horsemen that were there, set vpon part of them, but was sone forced backe.

Wyat in Saint James field.

At Charing crosse there stode sir John Gage lorde chamberlaine with the garde, and a number of other, being almost a thousand, the which vpon Wyats comming, shot at his compaignie, but at the last fled to the court gates, which certaine certaine pursued, and forced with shot to shut the Court Gates against them. In this repulse the said lord chamberlain and others were so amazed, that many cried treason in the court, and had thought that the Earle of Pembroke, who was assaulting the taile of his enemies, hadde gone to Wyat, taking his part against the Queene: there was running and crying out of Ladies and Gentlewomen, shutting of doores and Windows, and such a shynking and noise, as was wonderfull to heare. Wyat with his men marched still forward all along to Temple bar, and so through Fleet streete till hee came to the Bell Sauage an Arme nigh unto Ludgate, without resistence, his men going not in anye good order or array. It is saide, that at Strand, certaine of the Lordes treasurers band, to the number of thre hundred men, whereof the lord Chidoke Powlet his sonne was captaine, met them, and so going on the one side, passed by them on the other side, without anye thing saying to them. Also this is more strange, the said Wyat and his company passed along by a great compaignie of harneiled men which stood on both sides the streets, without anye withstanding them. And as hee marched forward through Fleetstreete most with their swords drawne, some crying, Queene Mary hath graunted our request, and giuen vs pardon: other said, the Queene hath pardoned vs. Thus some of Wyats men, some say it was Wyat himselfe, came euen to Ludgate and knocked, calling to come in, saying there was Wyat, whome the queene had graunted to haue their requests, but the lord William Howard stood at the gate, and saide, auunt traitor, thou shalt not come in heere. Wyat a while staied, and rested him vpon a stall ouer-against the Bell Sauadge gate, and at the last seeing hee could not get into the citie, and being deceiued of the aide hee hoped for, returned backe againe in arraie to wardes Charing Crosse, and was neuer stopped till hee came at Temple barre, where certaine horsemen which came from the ficke, mette them in the face, and then beganne the fight agayne, till Clarentius an Herault came and sayde to Walter Wyat: Sir, you were best by my counsell to yeelde, you see this daie is gone against you, and in resisting, you canne get no good, but hee the death of all these your soldiers, to your great perill of soule: perchance you maye finde the Queene mercifull, and the rather, if yee stint so great bloudeshed as is like heere to be. Wyat herewith being somewhat assonted (although he saide his men bent to fight) saide, Well, if I shall needes yeelde, I will yeelde me to a gentleman, to whome sir Maurice Berkeley came straight, and bad him leape vp behinde him, and an other tooke Thomas Cobham and William Kneuer, and so carried them behinde them vpon their horses to the court, then was taking of men on all sides. It is saide, that in this conflict, one pikeman, setting his backe to the wall at Saint Iames, kept sequentene horsemen off him a great time, and at the last was slaine. The whole number on both sides slaine at this battell passed not fortie persons, as farre as coude bee learned by them that viewed the fildes, but there were manie more hurt. The noise of women and children, when the conflict was at Charing Crosse, was so great, that it was heard to the toppe of the white tower, and also the great shot was well discerned there out of Saint Iames fildes: there stood vpon the leades the Marques of Northampton, hampton, Sir Nicholas Poyntes, Sir Thomas Pope, Maister Iohn Seimer, and other.

Apparient to the Tower.

About fise of the clocke, Thomas Wyat, William Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, two brethren named Mantels, and Alexander Bret, were brought by sir Henry Ierningham by water to the tower prisoners, where sir Philip Denny receiued them at the bulwarke, and as Wyat passed by he saide, go traitor, there was neuer such a traitor in England: to whome sir Thomas Wyat turned and said, I am no traitor, I woulde thou shouldest well knowe, thou art more traitor than I, it is not the pointe of an honest man to call mee so, and so went forth: then he came to the tower gate, sir Thomas Bridges lieutenant tooke in through the wicket, sir Mantel and said: Ah thou traitor, what hast thou and thy companie wrought? But he holding downe his head saide nothing: then came Thomas Kneuet, whome Maister Chamberlaine gentleman porter of the tower tooke in: then came Alexander Bret, whome sir Thomas Pope tooke by the bosome, saying: Oh traitor, how couldest thou find in thy heart to worke such a villanie, as to take wages, and beeing trofled ouer a bande of men, to fall to her enemies, returning against her in battell? Bret answered, yea, I haue offended in that case; then came Thomas Cobham whome Sir Thomas Poyntes tooke in, and saide, Alas maister Cobham, what winde headed you to worke such treason? and hee answered, oh Sir, I was seduced. Then came in Sir Thomas Wyat, whome Sir Iohn Bridges tooke by the collar, and said; O thou villaine and unhappie traitor, howe couldest thou finde in thy heart to worke such detestable treason to the Queenes Maestie, who gaue thee thy life and liuing once alreadie, although thou diddest before this time beare Armes in the field against her, and nowe to yelde her battell, to her maruellous trouble and fright? If it were not (saith he) but that the law must passe vpon thee, I woulde sticke thee through with my dagger; to the which Wyat holding his armes vnder his side, and looking greuouslie with a grimace looke vpon the lieutenant, said, it is no mastery now, and so passed on. Thomas Wyat had on a Gyrt of mase, with sleeves very faire, thereon a beluet cassocke, and a yellow lace, with the wardblace of his bag hanging thereon, and a paire of bootes and spurs on his legs, and on his head a faire hat of beluet, with broad boneworke lace about it.

VWilliam Kneuet, Thomas Cobham, and Bret were the like apparelled.

On the morowe, and next day following were brought into the tower prisoners, George Cobham, sir VWilliam Cobham, Anthony Kneuet, Hugh Booth, T. Vane, Robert Rudstone, sir George Harpar, Edward VWyat, Edw. Fog, George Moore, and Cutbert Vaughan; which Cutbert being a verie handsome man, sir Thomas Bridges at his entrie into the Tower, did wonderfullie repproh him, calling him ranke traitor, and said that hanging was too good for him: to whom this Vaughan answered with a stout courage saying; I pray God to sende you charitie, and I woulde all men knew it; I am as true a man to the queene and common wealth, as any man that I shall leaue behinde mee, and for death, I care not for it.

The tenth of February, the Earle of Huntington, and other Gentlemen;
and

and to the number of 300. horsemen, brought into the Tower as Prisoner the D. of Suffolk, and the L. John Grey his brother from Countrey, where the D. had remained three daies after his taking in the house and custody of Christopher Warren alderman there.

The 11. day sir Henry Mley, who had fled, was brought into the tower prisoner in an old frecke coat, and old paire of hose, all his apparell not worth 4. s. The same day came in two of the Culpeppers, one Cromer, and T. Rampton the Duke of Suffolks secretary.

The 12. of February being Monday, about tenne of the clocke, there went out of the tower to the scaffold on the tower hill, the L. Guilford Dudley son to the D. of Northumberland, husband to the lady Jane Gray, daughter to the D. of Suffolke, who at his going out, took by the hands sir Anthony Browne, M. John Throckmorton and many other gentlemen, praiesing him to pray for him: and without the bulwarke gate M. Thomas Okeley one of the Sheriffs of London receiued him and brought him to the scaffold, where after a small declaration, he kneeled down and said his praies, then holding by his eyes and hands to heauen, with teares, at the last he desired the people to pray for him, and after was beheaded: his body being laide in a car, and his head in a cloth, was brought into the chappell within the tower, where the lady Jane, whose lodging was in master Partridges house, did see his deade carcasse taken out of the car, as well as shee did see him before alius going to his death, a sight to hir worse than death.

By this time was there a scaffold made vpon the greene, ouer-against the white tower, for the lady Jane to die vpon, who with hir husbande was appointed to haue been put to death on the Friday before, but was staied till then: this lady being nothing at all abashed, neither with feare of her owne death, which then approached, neither with the sight of the dead carcasse of her husband when he was brought into the chappell, came forth, the lieutenant leading her, with countenance nothing abashed, neither her eyes anie thing moistened with teares (although hir gentlewomen Elizabeth Tilney and mistress Helen wonderfully wept) with a booke in her hand, wherin she praied until she came to the said scaffold, wheron when she was mounted, she was beheaded: whose deathes were the more hastened for feare of further troubles and str for hir title, like as hir father had attempted.

The same day was brought into the tower as prisoner by the lord chamberlaine and 200. of the gard, Edward Courney earle of Devonshire, who as hee passed by the lieutenant, being asked the cause of his thither comming, answered, he could not accuse himselfe.

The 14. and 15. of February, about the number of 50. of Wyats faction were hanged on 20. paire of gallowes made for that purpose in diuers places about the citie.

The 17. of February was proclamation made, that all strangers shoulde auoid the realme within foure and twentie daies next ensuing, vpon paine of their goods to be confiscate, all free denizens, merchantes, and ambassadours excepted.

The same leuentéenth daie of februarye the Duke of Suffolke was conueied to Westminster by the clearke of cheeke and the guard, at his going out he went with a cheerefull and a vertie skoute countenance, but at his retourne vertie pensue and heauie, desiring all men to praise for him, the Lorde Courteney lying in the Bell tower saw both his going out and returning, hee breuing arraigned, and the earle of Arundell sitting vpon him in iudgement, hee saide it was no treason for a péere of the realme, as he was, to raise his potwer, and to make proclamation, onely to auoid strangers out of the realme, and thereupon he asked the sergeants at law standing by whether it were or no, but they would say nothing: then was it laid to his charge, hee mette with 200. men in armes, the Quéenes lieutenant the earle of Huntington, which was treason against the Quéene, forsomuch as the lieutenant representeth the prince; to the which he answered, that he knew not the said earle to be such a lieutenant, but quoth he, I met him indeed with 50. men or thereabouts, and would not haue shrunke from him if I had had fewer, by which wordes hee was sounde to bee guiltie of treason. Whereouer, he partly accused his brother the Lorde Thomas, who said, as he said, perswaded him rather to fly into his country, than to abide, sith it was to be feared, he should againe be committed to the tower, whereas being in his country amongst his friends and tenants, who darst fetch him? Touching other articles laid to his charge he said he neuer knew of them, saying that one should say at his table once at supper, that he would vnder take for need, only with 100. men to set the crowne vpon Courtenays head, and so hee was condemned.

The 18. of februarye, Alexander Bret one of the Captaines of the Londoners that fled to Wyat, and 22. persons more of the Kentishmen, were deliuered to the sherife of Kent, to be executed in diuers places of Kent, but for the most part, they were all pardoned. This Bret going out of the tower embraced M. Chamberlaine the gentleman porter, & desired him to commend him to sir T. Wyatt, then praising al men to pray for him, he said, I am worthy of no lesse punishment than I now go to suffer, for besides my owne offence, I refused life and grace threé times offered, but I trust God doeth all for the best, that I might repent, and thereby obtaine grace.

The 20. of februarye William Thomas late clearke of the counsell, William Winter, and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton were sent to the Tower, and on the next morrow were Sir Iames a Crofts and the Lorde Thomas Grey sent to the Tower.

The 20. of februarye certaine of Wyats faction, to the number of 400. and more were ledde to Westminster, coupled together with halters about their necks, and there in the tiltyard, the Q. (who looked forth of hir gallery) pardoned them.

Kentishmen
pardoned.

The 23. of februarye Henry Grey duke of Suffolke was beheaded on the tower hill, his wordes on the scaffold were these: Good people, I am come hither to die, being iustly condemned for my disobedience against the Q. highnesse, of whom I do most humbly aske forgiveness: doctor Vveson answered and saide, my Lord, her grace hath already forguén you: then saide the Duke,

D. of Suffolke
beheaded.

I beseech you all good people, to let me bee an example to you for obedience to the Q. and the magistrates, for the contrary therof hath brought me to this end. I desire you all to beare me witness, that I die a true christian man, beleuing to be saued by none other meanes but by almighty God, through the passion of his son Iesus Christ: and now I praise you to praise with mee: then kneeling downe, & doctor Weston with him, they said the psalme of Miserere mei Deus, and In te Domine speravi, the duke one verse, and doctor Weston another, which done, he put off his gowne and dublet, knit the kerchiefe about his eyes, held by his hands, laid his head ouer the block, which head at one stroke was taken from him.

The 26. of February William Thomas had almost slain himselfe, by thrusting a knife vnder his paps.

The 11. of March, Wil. L. Howard admirall of England, was created baron of Effingham at Westminster.

The 14. of March, the earle of Bedford L. priuy seale, chiefe ambassado; to the prince of Spain, set forward on his vantage to fetch him hither.

The 15. of March, sir T. Wyat was arraigned at Westminster, of whose arraignment you maie reade in larger volumes, wherein I haue bestowed my labors.

The 18. of March being Palm Sunday, the lady Elizabeth the Q. sister, was by the L. treasurer and the earle of Sussex conueied to the tower of London, from Westminster by water.

The 24. of March, were released out of the tower, the Marques of Northampton, the L. Cobham, sir Wil. Cobham, Iohn Few Williams, Culpepper, H. Vane, Iohn Harington, Corbet &c.

Parliament.

The 2. of April, the parliament began at Westminster, which was appointed to haue bin kept at Oxford.

Barons created.

The 5. of April sir I. Williams was created baron of Lame at S. Iames.

The 7. of April sir Edw. North was created baron of Chartlege by writ at S. Iames.

Cat hanged in Cheape.

The 8. of April, sir Iohn a Bridges was created baron Chandois of Sudley at S. Iames. The same 8. of April, being then Sunday, a cat with hir head thorn, and the likenes of a vestment cast ouer hir, with hir fore feet tied together, and a round peece of paper like a singing cake betwixt them, was hanged on a galloves in Cheape, nere to the crosse, in the parish of S. Mathew, which cat being taken downe, was caried to the Bish. of London, and he caused the same to be shewed at Pauls crosse, by the preacher D. Pendleton. The 10. of April D. Cranmer archb. of Cant. D. Ridley B. of London, and Hugh Latimer once B. of Worcester, were conueied prisoners from the tower of London to Windso; and after from thence to Oxford, there to dispute with the diuines and learned men of the contrary opinion.

Disputation at Oxford.

Thomas Wyat beheaded.

The 11. of Aprill, sir Th. Wyat was beheaded on the tower hill, and after quartered, his quarters were set by in diuers places, and his head on the galloves at Hay hill nere Hyde parke, from whence it was shortly after stolne and conueied awaie. This sir Tho. Wyat before his coming down out of the the tolwer, was conueyed by the L. chamberlaine, and the Lord Shandos to the tower ouer the water gate, where the L. Courneye late, and there he remained in talk more than halfe an houre, but what was spoken betwixt them I know not. Then was he brought downe, and at the garden pale, the L. chamberlain took his leaue of him, and likewise did master secretary Bourne, to whome sir Thomas Wyat saide, I praye you to pray for me, and be a meane to the queene for my poore wife and children, and if it might haue pleased her grace to haue geanted me my life, I trust to haue done her such good seruice as should haue recompensed mine offence: but since not, I beseech God to haue mercie on me, to the which master Bourne made answer, and so Wyat came toward the hill betwixt Doctor Weston and the lord Shandos: when he was vpon the scaffold, he desired all men to pray for him and with him, and then said in effect these or the like words: Good people, I come presentlie here to die, being thereto lawfully and worthily condemned, for I haue sore offended against God and the queenes maiesty, I trust God hath forgiven me, and will take mercy vpon me; I beseech the M. maiesty also of forgiveness: She hath forgiven you quoth Doctor Weston: then, quoth he, let euery man betwixt holwe hee taketh any thing in hande against the higher powers, vnlesse God be prosperous to his purpose it will neuer take good effect or successe, thereof you may now learn of me, and I pray God I may bee the last example in this place, for that or any other like. And where it is said and noised abroad, that I should accuse the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courneye, it is not so good people: for I assure you, neither they nor any other now ponder in holde was p'suite of my rising before I began, as I haue declared no lesse to the M. councill, and that is most true. Then said doctor Weston at those words, marke this my masters, he saith that, that which hee hath shewed to the councill in writing of them is true, and so without any more talke sir Tho. Wyat turned him, and put off his gowne, trusted his points, then taking the earle of Huntington, the L. Hastings, sir T. Stranguish, and many other by the bandes, hee plucked off his dublet and wastcoat, and then kneeling downe, laid his head to the block, and raising himselfe againe on his knees after a few wordes spoken, with his eyes lifted vp toward heauen, hee knit the kerchiefe ouer his eyes, and holding by his bandes, sodainlie laide downe his heade, which the executioner tooke from him at one stroke.

The senetenth of April, were led to the GUILDE HALL in London to bee arraigned sir Nicholas Throckmorton and sir James a Croft, Robert Winter, and Cuthbert Vaughan being also had thither to witnes against them, where that day was no more arraigned but sir Nicholas Throckmorton, who tarrying from 7. of the clocke in the morning untill almost siue at night was by verdict of the Iurie quit; hee pleaded not guiltie, and that he was consenting to nothing, &c. But the Iurie which quit him, was commanded to appeere before the Councill at an houres warning, and the losse of siue hundred pounds the p'ce.

On Saint Marks day or the 25. of April, they were before the councill in the Starred Chamber, and thence about two of the clocke Thomas Whetstone

Ann. reg. 2.
A spirit in a wall.

The 15. of July, Elizabeth Croft a wench about the age of 18. yeres, stood vpon a scaffold at Pauls crosse all the sermon time, where she confessed, that she being moued by diuers lewde persons therunto, had vpon the 14. of March last before passed, counterfitted certain speeches in a wall of an house without Aldersgate of London, through the which the people of the whole Citie were wonderfully molested, for that all men might heare the voice, but not see her person. Some said it was an angel: a voice from heauen, some the holy ghost, &c. This was called the spirit in the wall: shee had laine whispering in a strange whistle made for that purpose, which was giuen hir by one Drakes, seruant to sir Anthony Neuill: then were there diuers companions, one named Myles, clearie of S. Butolphs without Aldersgate, a plaier, a weaner, Hill clearie of S. Leonards in Foster lane, and other confederate with hir, which putting themselves among the prease, took vpon them to interpret what the spirit said, expressing certaine seditious words against the quēne, the prince of Spaine, the masse, confession, &c.

The 19. of July the prince of Spaine arrived at Southampton, the 4. daie after he came to Winchester in the evening, and there going to church was honorably receiued of the bishop, and a great number of nobles: the next daie he met with the quēne, with whom he had long familiar talke.

On S. James day, the marriage was solemnized betwene him and queene Mary, at which time the emperours ambassadoz being present, pronounced, that in consideration of the marriage, the emperour had giuen unto his sonne the kingdome of Naples. The solemnitie of this marriage being ended, the king of hebraites proclaimed their title as followeth: Philip and Mary by the grace of God, King and Queene of England, Fraunce, Naples, Hierusalem, and Ireland, defenders of the faith, princes of Spaine and Sicilie, archdukes of Austrich, dukes of Millaine, Burgundy and Brabant, counties of Alsperge, Flanders and Tyrol: which being ended, the trumpets blew, the king and queene came forth hand in hand, and two swordes borne before them. Shortly after king Philip and queene Mary remooued from Winchester to Basing, from thence to Windsor, where on the first of August the king was staled in the noble order of the garter, where he kept a great feast, and at that time the earle of Suffex was made knight of the garter.

and was received with much honour: he was by parliament restored to his old dignitie that he was put from by king Henry, and shortly after came into the parliament house, where the king, queene, and other states were present. Then he declared the cause of his legacie, first exhorting them to returne to the communion of the church, and restore to the pope his due authoritie. Secondly, he aduertised them to give thanks to God that had sent them so blessed a king and queene. Finally, he signified, for so much as they had with great gentlenesse restored him to his honour and dignitie, that he most earnestly desired to see them restored to the heavenly court, and unitie of the church.

The next day the whole court of parliament drew out the forme of a supplication, the summe wherof was, that they greatly repented them of that schisme that they had liued in, and therefore desired the king, queene, and cardinall, that by their meanes they might be restored to the bosome of the church, and obedience of the sea of Rome.

The next day the king, queene, and cardinall being present, the lord chauncellor declared what the parliament had determined concerning the cardinals request, and offered to the king and queene the supplication before mentioned, which being read, the cardinall in a large oration declared how acceptable repentance was in the sight of God, &c. And immediatly making prayer vnto God by authoritie to him committed, absolved them. When all this was done, they went all vnto the chappell, and there singing Te Deum with great solemnitie, declared the ioy that for this reconciliation was pretended.

The 28. of Nouember, the lord maior of London, with the aldermen in scarlet, and the commons in their limeries assembled in Pauls church at nine of the clocke in the forenoone, where doctor Chadley one of the prebends preached in the quire in presence of the bishop of London, and nine other bishops, and read a letter sent from the queenes counsell, the tenor wherof was, that the bishop of London should cause Te Deum to be sung in all the churches of his diocesse, with continuall prayers for the Quenes maiestie, which was conceived and quicke with child: the letter being read, he began his sermon with this Anthetime: Ne uisum est Maria, inuenisti enim gratiam apud Deum. His sermon being ended, Te Deum was sung, and solenne procession was made of Salve festa dies, all the circuit of the church.

The third being the Philip and Marie, arrived in the

Chanis

Thamis nigh London y<sup>e</sup> 18. of April, in y<sup>e</sup> yeare 1557. The Edward Bonaventure trauesing the seas foure moneths: finally the tenth of Nouember the said yeare 1557. arriued within the Scottissh coastes, where by extreme stormes, the said ship being braten from her ground, shales, was driuen vpon the rockes on shore, where she brake and split in peeces, in such sort, as the grand pilote, taking the boate, of the said ship, trusting to attaine the shore, and so to saue the bodie of the said ambassadour, and seauen of the companie. the same boate was by darke night overwelmed and drowned, wherein perished, not onely the said Richard Chancelor drowned. ground pilote, with seauen Russies, but also diuerse mariners, the ambassadour with a few others with much difficultie saued. In which shipwracke not onely the said shippe was broken, but also the goods laden in her was by the rude people of the countrie, rifled and carried away. As soone as by letters it was to the company in London knowne of the losse of their pilote, men, goods, and ships: the Merchants obtained the Queenes letters to the Lady Dowager of Scotland, for the gentle entertainment of the said Ambassado<sup>r</sup> with his traine, and restitution of his goods, & also addrested two Gentlemen, maister Lawrence Huisse docto<sup>r</sup> of the ciuill Law, and George Gilpin with money, and other requisites into Scotland, to comfort him and his there, and also to conduct him into England, so that on the 14. of Februarie, the said Ambassado<sup>r</sup> left Scotland, comming towards England, hauing attending vpon him the said two English Gentlemen and others, came the 18. day of Februarie to Barwike, where he was honorably receiued by the Lord Wharton, Lord Warden of the east Marches: he prosecuting his voyage vntill the 27. of Februarie, approached the citie within 12. miles, where he was receiued with 80. merchants with chains of gold, and goodly apparell, riding, who conducting him to a merchants house fower miles from London, receiued there a quantitie of gold, beuet, & silke, with all furniture thereto requisite: the next day being the last of Februarie, he was by the merchants aduenturers for Russia, to the number of 140. persons, and so many or more seruants in one liuerie, conducted towards the citie of London, where by the way he had not onely the hunting of the fore, &c. but also by the Queenes Maiesties commandement was receiued by the Viscount Montague, he being accompanied with diuers lustie knights, esquiers, gentlemen and yeomen, to the number of 300. horse, led him to the north parts of the Citie of London, where, by 4. merchants richly apparelled, was presented to him a faire richly trapped horse, together with a footcloth of crimosin beuet, enriched with gold laces, whereupon y<sup>e</sup> ambassado<sup>r</sup> mounted, riding towards Smithfield bars, the L. maioz accompanied with the aldermen in scarlet did receiue him, and so riding thorough the citie of London, in the middle betweene the lord maioz and Viscount Montague, a great number of merchants, and notable personages riding before, was conducted into his lodging in Sanchurch street. At his first entrance into his chamber, there was presented vnto him on the queenes behalfe, for a gift and present, one rich peece of cloth of tissue, a peece of cloth of gold, another peece of cloth of gold raised with crimosin beuet, a peece of crimosin beuet in graine, a peece of purple beuet, a peece of damaske purpled, a peece of crimosin damaske: which he thankfully accepted. In this his beautifull lodging, he abode expecting the kings reparaire repaire out of Flaunders into England: whose highnesse arriuing the 21. of March, the same ambassadoꝝ the 25. of March ( the day twelue month he tooke his leaue from the emperoz his maister) was honorably brought to the king and queene at Westminster, where arriuing at the bridge, was there receiued with 6. lords, conducted into a chamber, where by the lords Chancelor, Treasurer priuy seale, Admirall, bishop of Ely, and other counsellors, he was saluted, and consequently brought unto the kings and queenes presence, sitting vnder a stately cloth of honor. Where after he had deliuered his letters, made his oration, giuen two timber of sables, and the report of the same made both in English and Spanish, was with much honor, eschoones remitted by water to his former lodging, to the which within two daies after by assignement of the king and queene, repaired and conferred with him two graue counsellors, the bishop of Ely, and sir William Pecer: knight chiefe secretarie, who after diuerse talkes and conferences, finally concluding vpon such treaties and articles of amitie, as the letters of the kings and queens maiesties vnder their great seal of England, to him by the said counsellors deliuered, both appeare.

A league & articles of amitie confirmed.

The 24. of Aprill, was celebrated the solemnitie of the noble order of the garter at Westminster, the said ambassadoꝝ was conducted to the court by the lords Talbot & Lumley, to her maiesties presence, where he tooke his leaue with commendations to the emperoz, which being done, he was led vnto y<sup>e</sup> chappell, where was prepared for him a stately seate, wherein he accompanied with the duke of Norfolk, the lords aboue mentioned and other, was present at the whole seruice: the diuine seruice being done, he was remitted and reduced to his barge, and so to his lodging. The merchants hauing prepared foure goodly and well trimmed ships, laden with all kinds of merchandizes apt for Russia, the same ambassadoꝝ baled downe the riuer of Thamis, from London to Grauelend, where he with his traine and furniture, was imbarcked towards his voyage homeward on the 3. of May. It is to be remembred, that during the whole abode of the said ambassadoꝝ in England, the company of merchants did frankly giue to him and his, all manner of cosles and charges in victuals, riding from Scotland to London, during his abode there, and vntill setting of saile aboard a ship.

Thomas Stafford, and other hauing conspired diuers treasons against the King and Queene, fearing iust punishment for their deserts, fled beyond the Seas, and there remayning attempted diuers times to stirre rebellion within this Realme, by sending Bookes, Billes, and letters, written and printed, farced full of vntruthes, and at length the said Stafforde, and other English rebels, and some strangers, entered this Realme, on the fower and twentieth of Aprill, and tooke by stealth the Castle of Skarborough in the countie of Yorke, and let out a shamefull Proclamation, wherein he traytfroulie called and affirmed the Queene to be vnrightfull and most unworthie Queene, and that the King had brought into this Realme the number of twelue thousand Spaniardes, and that into their hands were deliuered twelue the strongest holdes in this Realme. In which Proclamation the said Stafford named himselfe Protector, and gouernor of this Realme, but he with the other his complices, by the good diligence of the Earle of Westmerland and other noble men, were apprehended on the last of Aprill.

complices, to enter into a new conspiracie, the said kings ambassadour was not onely priuie, but receiued them into his house, there to assemble and contriue their malicious and diuellsish enterpryse: & although the said king were advertised thereof by our ambassadoys, neuerthelesse, Dudley, Ashton, and others flying into France, were both receiued of the king, and also maintained with annuall pensions by him giuen, contrarie to his promise. Also he hath receiued sundrie famous pirates, and notozious enemies, and of late he sent Scalford with other rebels, who he had entertained, furnished with armour, money, munition and ships, to surprise the castle of Skarborough: proclamation was made to giue warning to our subiects to forbear all traffike with any of that Realme, and to repute the French king and his subiects as open enemies, &c.

The last of Iune, the lord Philip Howard, sonne of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, was borne in London, at the earle of Arundels house without Temple bar, which house sometime belonged to the bishop of Bath, and shortly after was christened in the queenes chappell at Westminster in a font of gold, where Philip king of Spaine, and Nicholas Heath archbishop of Poike, then chancelor of England were his godfathers in proper person, and the ladie Elizabeth duchesse of Norfolk his great grandmother, was his godmother. This lord Philip was the onely begotten child of the said Duke, borne of the ladie Marie, daughter and heire of Henry firz Allen, the last earle of Arundell of that name. To whome the inheritance and dignitie of the said Earle therefore descended.

The 6. of Iuly, the king passed ouer to Calcis, and so into Flaunders, where he made great prouision for warre against the French king. The same moneth, the Queene sent ouer an armie of a thousand horsemen, foure thousand footmen, and two thousand pioneers, to ayde king Philip, whercof the earle of Pembroke was Generall. The 15. of Iuly, died the lady Anne of Cleue at Chelsea, and was buried at Westminster on the 3. of August.

The 10. of August, were taken of Fraunce the chiefest captaines, the Duke of Montmorency Constable of Fraunce, and his sonne Monsieur de Merne, the Duke of Monpencier, the Duke of Longuille, the Marshall of Saint Andrew the Reinegrauie colonell of the Almains, Roche du Maine, the count de Rochefort, the Vicount of Touraine, the baron of Curton, the prince of Mantua, besides many gentlemen and captaines.

The eighteenth of August, the towne of Saint Quintins was taken by king Philip, with the helpe of Englishmen, at the siege whercof the lord Henry Dudley, youngest sonne to John late Duke of Northumberland, was slaine with a gunne: which Henry Dudley and sir Edward Windesore were the first that advanced banner on the wall.

This yeare before harvest, wheat was sold for foure marke the quarter, mault at 44. s. the quarter, beanes and rie at 40. s. the quarter, and pease at 46. s. 8. d. But after harvest, wheat was sold for 5. s. the quarter, mault at 6. s. 8. d. rie at 3. s. 4. d. so that the penny wheat losse that wayed in London the last yeare but 11. ounces Troy, waied now 56. ounces Troy, according to the list set down by the

The 7. of September, at 7. of the clocke at night, in a blacke rainy cloude in the west was seene a raineboorn, the moone in the east risen one houre before, and faire shining, and at the full the day before.

This yeare in Michaellmas terme, men might haue seene in Westminster hall at the kings bench barre, not two men of law before the Iustices, there was but one named Foster, who looked about, and had nothing to do, the Iudges looking about them. In the common place, no mo sergents but one, which was sergent Bouloise, who looked about him, there was elbowe roome enough, which made the lawyers complaine of their iniuries in that terme.

The 20. of Nouember, sir Thomas Tresham knight, receiued the order of the Crosse, and was made lord prioz of S. Iohn of Ierusalem in England.

The first of Ianuarie, the duke of Guise with a great armie of French men, entred a plot of ground, entrenched at Sandgate, and there diuiding his power into two parts, sent the one with certaine peeces of ordnance along the downes towards Rislebanke: and the other with battering peeces to Newnam bridge, which two forts both at one time they shot at, and loone recovered without resistance, for there was not a man in them, for they priuily fled into the towne of Calcis. The next day therefore the Frenchmen began a battery from the sandhills, next Rislebanke, against the wall of Calcis, betwixt the watergate and the prison, and continued the same by the space of two or three daies, untill they had made a little breach, but not yet laugtable, neither was it meant, but to make the Englishmen to haue the lesse regard to the defence of the castle, where they were ascertained to haue an easie entrie: so that while the Englishmen trauelled to defend that breach, the Frenchmen being passed through the ditch full of water, entred the castle, and thought to haue entred the towne that way: but by the prowess of sir Anthonie Agar knight, and marshall of the towne, they were put backe into the castle, but the same sir Anthonie Agar lost his life, and this was on the first of Ianuarie. The same night William L. Wentworth, deputie or lieutenant of the towne, sent Nicholas Fellowes alias Gwins, and Richard Turpin alias Hams to the castle to demaund parle, which they graunted, putting forth of the postern two French gentlemen, and receiued in pledge of them into the castle I. Hiefield, master of the ordnance, and Edmond Hall a constable of the staple. Hereupon they falling in talke, at length agreed, that the towne with all the artillerie, victuals and munition, should be yeilded to the French, the liues of the inhabitants saued, they vnder safe conduct to pass: whither they would, leauing the lord deputie with 50. other, such as the duke of Guise should appoint, to remaine prisoners, & to be put to raunsonne. The next morning, the Frenchmen entred the towne and possessed it. And forthwith, all the men, women and children were commaunded to leaue their houses, and to go into certaine places appointed for them, there to remaine till order were further taken for their sending away. The places appointed for them to remaine in, were chiefly foure, the two churches of our lady, and of Saint Nicholas, the deputies house, and the staple, where they rested part of that day, the night following, and the next day till the afternoone. And while they were thus in these foure places, proclamation was made in their hearings, straightly charging them that were inhabitants of the towne of Calceis, having about them any mony, plate, or icwels to the value of foure pence, to bring the same forthwith, and lay it on the high altars of the said churches upon paine of death, bearing them in hand they should be searched. By reason of which proclamation there was made a sorrowfull offering, and while they were at this offering in the churches, the Frenchmen rised their houses, where they found inestimable riches & treasure: but especially in that towne, ordinance, armour, & other munitions, as the Frenchmen write, besides the great riches of gold & silver, coine, icwels, plate, woolls, & other merchandize (which was inestimable,) there were found 30. peeces of brasse mounted on wheeles, & as many of yron, with such furniture of powder, pellets, armour, victuals, & other munitions of war scarcely credible. On the next day being y<sup>e</sup> 7. of January in the after noon a great number of y<sup>e</sup> meanest sort were suffered to passe out of the towne in safety, being guarded through the army with a number of Scottish light horsemen, who used the Englishmen very well & friendly, and after this, every day for the space of 3. or 4. daies, there were sent away diuerse companies, till they were all avoided, those excepted that were reserved prisoners.

There were in the towne of Calceis, 500. English souldiers in ordinarie pay, & of the towne men about 200. fighting men: & there were in the whole number of men, women & children, as they were accounted going out of the gate, 4200. persons or thereabout. The lord Wentworth depurte of Calceis, sir Ralph Chamberlaine capitaine of the castle, Iohn Harlestone capitaine of Rusebanke, Nicholas Alexander capitaine of Petonham bridge, Edward Grimstone controller, Iohn Rogers suriour, with other to the number in al of 50. were sent prisoners into France. The losse of this towne seemed strange to many men of great experience, the same towne being so many yeres so strongly fortified with all munitions that could be deuised, should now in so short space be taken of our enemies without fight or slaughter of any man, more then sir Anthonie Agar, as ye haue heard. The counsell of England had with all expedition raised a great power, to haue bene sent for the defence of that towne, but it auailed not, for such a tempest of wind arose, as the like in many yeaes had not bene seene, whereby no ship could brooke the sea, by means whereof our men were forced to remaine at Dover in a readinesse to haue passed the seas, till netwies was brought the towne was lost as ye haue heard, and then every man returned to his home. And shortly after, to wit, in the same moneth of January y<sup>e</sup> strong forts of Guisnes and Harnes, though most valiantly defended by the lord Gray of Wilton and others, English men, was wonne by the French, & by them possessed: whereof maister George Ferrers hath written at large, for he collected the whole historie of M. Mary, as the same is set downe under the name of Richard Grafton.

The 18. of Januarie, Edward Hastings knight of the garter, lord chamberlaine to the Q. was created baron Hastings of Loughborough at Westminster.

The 28. of Aprill, Francis the French kings eldest sonne called the dolphin, was married vnto Mary Stewart daughter and sole heire of Iames the fift late king of Scotland, in the citie of Paris, with great pompe and triumph.

France.

The losse of Calcis being generally grievous to the whole realm of England, but specially to queene Mary, she ceased not to trauell with king Philip her husband, as with her owne counsell, & lords of the realm which way should be best to reuenge this iniurie, especially now whilst the French king was occupied in wars with king Philip, to endamage some of his countries by way of inuasion, & to surpris some of his townes upon a sudden. And amongst sundry deuises none was thought so fit to be attempted as an haueu to wone in Britaine called Brest a towne as well for the situation thereof convenient to receive fresh succors, & victuall out of England by sea, as also for that it was knowne to the queene & her counsell at that present not to be furnished with any garrison of souldiers sufficient to repulse the power of a prince upon a sudden. Wherefore there was immediately order giuen to Edward lord Clinton then high admiral of England, with all expedition to prepare himselfe, with all the queenes ships of war, furnished with soldiers, munition, & victuall, to ioyne with the admirall of king Philip, who had like order fro his said king to ioyne with his navy of England, for the atchieuing of this enterprise.

In the meane time while K. Philip being absent from the low countries, was occupied with his wars in France, monsieur de Thermes captain of Calcis, being a man very expert in the wars, taking out of Calcis so many of his soldiers as might be spared from thence adioyned to the all the forces of the French garrisons in Artoys, Follonois, & Picardy, whercof together with the soldiers of Calcis, being to the number of 700 footmen, & 300. light horsemen, there were assembled 14. ensignes of the French footmen, 18. Companies of Almaines, 4. or 500. men at armes of France, beside the light horsemen Scots, amounting in the whole to the number of 9000. footmen, & 1500. horsemen, entered into Flanders with full determination to spoile king Philips countrie along the sea coast, & namely a proper haueu town called Dunkerke, & with like purpose to haue surprised the town of Graueling. This captain of pollicie passing by the towne of Graueling laid siege to a little towne not far from thence called Berghes, which he won with final resistance. And without long staying marched on to Dunkerke, & planting a siege there, battered the same so warply with the canon, that within lesse then foure daies he won the towne which he like as the other put to sack, & after setting the towne on fire, he with his French men spread abroad, wasted the most fruitful quarter of that part of Flanders almost to Detroppe: the army withdrew, & incamped within halfe a mile of Graueling. The countie Egmont lieutenant generall for king Philip in the low countrie, assembled all the power as well of king Philips garrisons, as also of men of war in the low country, to the number of 14. or more footmen, & 2. or 3. Companies of horsemen, determining so to affront the French, that either they should passe no further into the country, or at the least to impeach the fro the siege of Graueling: monsieur de Thermes hearing of this power assembled, made all possible hast toward Graueling, where he was no sooner arrived, but that he saw his enemies readie ranged ranged in the field, by reason whereof his studie was now nothing else but how he might bring home his army in safety to Calcis. The countie Egmond clypping the Frenchmens bent to march away with the spoile of the countie, cut betwixen the ayre and home, placing his battels in such order, that the Frenchmen had no way to passe, but vpon the sands betwixt the towne and the sea: whereas by good chance lay a great flecte of D. Maries ships of warre, within the danger of whole gunshot the Frenchmen had no shift, but to passe as their iourney lay: and so being forced either to faniish or to fight at diladuantage. Monsier de Thermes without staying any longer, caused his haungard to passe ouer the riuer somewhat nere the towne to auoid the shot of the English ships, and staid vpon the further side for the residue of his battels: there came such thicke haile shot of artillerie out of the towne on the one side, and from the English ships on the other side, that there was a full batterie made vpon the Frenchmen on all sides, which they neuertheless abode without breaking order for the time, when suddenly appeared before them two great troupes of horsemen of 1500. a peece, part forward Butters, and part Burgonians, whereof the one in front, and the other in flanke, gaue strong charges vpon the French bantgard, who being well backed with their other battels, slowly repulsed those two first troupes. Thus both parties being at a stay, the countie Egmond with 1800. men of armes, and his foote battels following, before the French had well recouered breath, recharged vpon them with all his forces together so terribly, that he shokt all their battell, and the number take the to flight, the victorie was soone had, by reason the Almaines beaten backe with the artillerie, as well of the towne as of the ships, brake their order, and came not to the shooke, whereby the whole charge of the battell rested vpon the Frenchmens heads. This field was foughten the 13. of July, vpon the sea sands nere to Graueling, where besides those that were slaine which were esteemed to the number of fise thousand, there were taken pylsoners the marshall de Thermes captain of Calcis, monsier Senerpont gouernor of Boloigne, monsier Villebon gouernor of Picardie, monsier Annabaute sonne to the late admirall, monsier de Moruilliers gouernor of Abuille, monsier de Channe gouernor of Corbier, beside a number of gentlemen, captaines and soldiers, but specially the bands of Calcis went to wracke, so as very few returned home. The admirals before named knew nothing of this matter, wherefore, following their prescribed course, and ioyning together at the place appointed, sailed from thence with prosperous wind, and on the nine and twentieth of the same moneth, with seuen score ships of warre appeared before the haven of Conquet in Britaine: at whose arriual there, they sounded their trumpets, and with a peale of great ordinance, gaue a loude salue to the Brittaines: and by eight of the clocke the same morning, the Englishmen maiming forth their ship-boates, recouered landing, and within short time became masters of the said towne of Conquet, which they sacked and bent with a great abbey, & many pretty towne and villages nere thereabouts, where our men found great store of pillage.

This being done, the Englishmen withdrew downe to the sea side, where their ships lay readie to receive them. But the Flemmings being covetous of the spoile, passing further into the land, before they could recover their ships againe, were were encountered by the power of the countrie, by whom there were slaine of them to the number of foure or five hundred. The admirall perceiuing the power of the countrie greatly to increase, thought it not best to attempt any assault against the towne of Brest, or to make longer abode there, but returned home.

In this meane time, while king Philip and the French king with two most puissant armies affronted each other nere unto the water of Somme, either of them being obstinately bent to drive the other out of the field, for which cause they entrenched their camps: diuers conferences were had concerning peace, and at the last concluded vpon all controuersies, except the restitution of Calcis, required by the ambassadoys of Queene Marie, which the French part would in no wise heare of, by reason of which difficultie, this treatie could take no effect, nor come to good conclusion. King Philip thinking himselfe bound to stand in that case with the Queene his wife, did therfore stay a long time before he concluded peace with the French king.

The second of Iuly, the Lord Wentworth and diuerse other that had bene gouernours of Calcis, were attainted of treason being then in France.

The 11. of Iuly, within a mile of Nottingham was a maruellous tempest of thunder, which as it came through two townes, beate downe all the houses and Churches, the bells were cast to the out side of the Church yards, and some webs of lead foure hundred foote into the field, withen like a paire of gloves. Ann. reg. 6. Tempest at Nottingham

The riuer of Trent running betwene the two townes, the water with the mud in the bottome was carried a quarter of a mile, and cast against the trees, the trees were plucked vp by the rootes, and cast twelue score off. Also, a child was taken forth of a mans hands two speares length high, and carried a hundred foote, and then let fall, wherewith his arme was broken, and so died. Five or six men thereabout were slaine, and neither flesh nor skin perished: there fell some hailestones that were fifteene inches about, &c.

This yere in haruell tune, the quartaine agues continued in like manner more vehemently, than they had done the last yere passed, wherethrough died many olde people, and specially priests, so that a great number of parishes were vnserved, and no curates to be gotten, and much cogne was lost in the field for lacke of workemen and laborers. Quartaine agues raged sore.

In the beginning of this yere, corne rose to foureteene shillings the quarter, and wood wared scant in London, and was sold for thirteene and foureteene shillings the thousand of billets, and coles at ten pence the sacke, by reason of the great death and sicknes the last summer for lacke of helpe and cariage. Corne and wood deare.

King Philip being absent out of the realme (as ye haue heard) and Queene Marie being dangerously sicke, ended her life at her manor of Saint James by Charing crosse the seventeenth of Nouember, in the yere 1558. when she had reigned five yeres, foure monethes and odde daies. The same day deceased cardinall Poole at Lambeth, and a little before, two of her physicians, besides diuerse bishops and noble men. Queene Marie was buried at Westminster, and cardinall Poole at Canterburie.

LIZABETH our most gracious and soueraigne Lady, borne at Greenwich, second daughter to king Henry the eight, to the great comfort of England, was with full consent proclaimed Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. on the 17. of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord God 1558. Forthwith the ports and hauens were stopp'd, and none suffered to passe out of the realme without licence. Proclamation was made, forbidding all men to preach, save such as

The Queene cometh from Hatfield.

The 19. of Nouember, Queene Elizabeth came from bishops Hatfield in Hertfordshire, unto the lord Northes house in the late dissolved Charterhouse of London, the Sherifes of London meeting her grace at the farther end of Barnet towne within the shire of Middlesex, and so rode before her, till she came to the Charterhouse gate next Aldersgate, where her grace remained.

The Queene remooueth to the towre.

On monday the eight and twentieth of Nouember, about two of the clocke in the after noone, Queene Elizabeth rode from the lord Northes house along by the Barbican in at Creeplegate, then along by the wall to Bishopsgate, which gate was richly hanged, where the waites of the city plaid, and ouer against the kings-head tauerne, a scholler of Paules schoole made a short oration to her maiesty in Latin verses, the company of Mercers standing in their railes next the scholler, & so all the other companies of the city in order from thence to Hart lane end next unto Barking church in tower streete, the lord maior of London riding with maister Garter king at armes, bearing a scepter before her maiesty, which lord maior met her at the Charterhouse gate next Aldersgate, where maister Recorder saluted her grace in the name of the lord maior and the whole city, and so with lords, knights, and gentlewomen richly apparelled, brought her to the tower of London: but when her grace entered at Hart lane, a peale of guns began to be shot off at the tower, which continued almost halfe an houre.

The fift of December, the Queene remooued by water from the towre to Somerset place neare to the Strand.

Sir Thomas Cheney treasurer of the household and lord warden of the cinque ports, diseased the 8. of December.

Sir Nicholas Bacon Attourney of the court of wards, was made lord keeper of the great seale of England the 20. of December.

Queene Mary, buried.

The 13. of December, the corps of queene Mary was honorably conueyed from Saint James to the abbey of Westminster, and there placed vnder a rich heart decked with penons, banners, and scutchions of the armes of England and Fraunce, where she remained that night, and on the morrow after the masse of Requiem, and a sermon preached by Docteur White bishop of Winchester was ended, she was buried in the chappell of king Henry the seventh on the north side.

The foure and twentieth of December, was sollemne obsequie kept in the abbey of Westminster for Charles the first late Emperoz, which deceased in Spaine in the month of September last past: Queene Maries hearse yet standing, altered with the armes of the Emperoz, and richly hanged with a rich pall-cloth of gold lying on the hearse, the Emperors ambassadoz being chiefe mourner, with other peers and Lords of England assistant with him, &c.

The twelfth of Januarie, the Queenes maiestie remooued from her place of White hall to the Tower by water, the lord maior of London and his brethren the aldermen in their barge, and all the Craftes of the citie in their barges richly decked with targets and banners of euerie mysteric. The batchelors of the maiors companie in their barge, with a foyst, hauing three tops, trimmed and richly decked to waite on them, which shot off guns all the way: all these awaited on her Maiestie, who tooke her barge about two of the clocke in the after noone, the lord maior following after, and euery company in order with great melodie of muscalle instruments, till her grace was through London bridge, and landed at her priue staire of the tower wharfe, and then the maior after leave taken and thanks of the queene, returned through the bridge with the floud, and landed at the three cranes wharfe in the binetree.

The 13. of Januarie were created in the tower of London, these noble men following, sir William Per knight was created marques of Portsmouth, Edward Seymour was made viscount Beauchamp & earle of Hertford, lord Thomas Howard viscount of Wyndon, sir Oliuer Saint Iohn knight, lord Saint Iohn of Bletfall, Sir Henry Carew knight, lord Carew of Hundisdon.

The fourteenth of Januarie, at which time the Londoners had made sumptuous provision of pageants and otherwise, as hath bene accustomed, the queenes maiestie passed through the city of London to her palace at Westminster: the next day she was crowned by doctor Oglesborne bishop of Carlile.

Coronation.

The five and twentieth of Januarie, began a parliament at Westminster, before the states whereof, doctor Coxe late come from beyond the seas, and some times schoollmaister to king Edward the first, made a learned sermon.

house, that the Quenees maiesty might be sued vnto, to graunt her graces licence to the speaker, knights, citizens and burgesses to haue access vnto her graces presence, to declare vnto her matter of great importance, concerning the state of this her graces realme. The which petition being mooued to her grace, she most honourably agreed and consented therunto, and assigned a day of hearing: when the day came, the speaker and common house resorted vnto her graces pallace at Westminster called the White hall: and in the great gallery there, her grace most honorably shewed her selfe ready to heare their motion and petition. And when the speaker had solemnly and eloquently set forth the message, the speciall matter whereof was, to moue her grace to marriage, whereby to all our comforts we might enioy the royall issue of her body to raigne ouer vs, &c.

The Quenees maiesty after a little pause, made this answer following. I shal haue good cause so do I giue you all my hearty thanks for the good seale and louing care you seeme to haue, as well towards me, as to the whole estate of your countrey: your petition I perceiue, considereth of thre parts, and mine answer to the same shall depend of two.

And to the first part I may say vnto you, that from my yeares of vnderstanding, sith I first had consideration of my selfe, to be borne a seruitor of almightie God, I happily chose this kind of life, in the which I yet liue, which I assure you for mine owne part hath hitherto best contented my selfe, and I trust hath bene most acceptable vnto God. From the which, if either ambition of high estate offered to me in marriage by the pleasure and appointment of my Prince, whereof I haue some records in this presence (as you our treasurer well know) or if eschewing the danger of mine enemies, or the auoiding of the perill of death whole messenger, or rather a continuall watchman, the princes indignation, was no little time daily before mine eyes, by whose meanes, although I know, or iustly may suspect, yet I will not now vtter, or if the whole cause were in my sister her selfe, I will not now burthen her therewith, because I will not charge the dead: if any of these, I say, could haue drawne or dissuaded me from this kind of life, I had not now remained in this estate where in you see me, but so constant haue I alwaies continued in this determination, although my youth and words may seeme to some hardly to agree together: yet is it most true, that at this day I stand free from any other meaning, that either I haue had in times past, or haue at this present, with which trade of life I am so thoroughly acquainted, that I trust God, who hath hitherto therein preserved and led me by the hand, will not of his goodnesse suffer me to go alone.

For the other part, the manner of your petition I do well like, and take it in good part, because that it is simple, and containeth no limitation of place or person, if it had bene otherwise, I must needes haue misliked it very much, and thought it in you a very great presumption, being brutting and altogether vnmett for you to require them that may command, or those to appoint, whose parts are to desire, or such to bind & limite, whose duties are to obey, or to take vpon you to draw my loue to your likings, or to frame my will to your fantasie: for a guardon constrained, and gift freely giuen can neuer agree together. Neuerthelesse, if any of you be in suspect, that when soeuer it may please God to incline my heart to another another kind of life, you may well assure your selues, my meaning is not to do or determine any thing, wherewith the realme may or shall haue iust cause to be discontented. And therefore put that cleane out of your heads, for I assure you, what credit my assurance may haue with you, I cannot tell, but what credit it shall deserue to haue, the sequels shall declare, I will neuer in that matter conclude any thing that shall be preiudiciall to the realme: for the weale, good and safety whercof, I will neuer thinke to spend my life. And whom soeuer my chance shall be to light vpon, I trust he shall be such, as shall be as carefull for the realme and you, I will not say as my selfe, because I cannot so certainly determine of any other, but at the leastwise by my good will and desire, he shall be such, as shall be as carefull for the preservation of the realme, and you as my selfe. And albeit it might please almighty God to continue me still in this mind to liue out of the state of marriage, yet is it not to be feared, but he will so worke in my heart and in your wisdomes, as good prouision by his helpe may be made in conuenient, whereby the realme shall not remaine destitute of an heire, that may be a fit gouernour, and peraduenture more beneficiall to the realme, then such of-spring as may come of me. For though I be neuer so carefull of your well doings, and inuind euer so to be, yet may illue grow out of kind, and become perhaps vngenerous. And in the end this shall be for me sufficient, that a marble stone shall declare, that a Queene hauing reigned such a time, liued, and died a virgin. And here I end, and take your comming vnto me in good part, and giue vnto you all such thanks my hartie thanks, more yet for your zeale and good meaning then for your petition.

The seventeenth of Februarie, one of the queenes takers of fresh fish, for abusing his authority, was set on the pillory in Cheape, where he stood three market daies, from nine of the clocke till twelue of the clocke, which punishment with more (whercof I write not) was by commandment of the Queene by her owne mouth, as a good example of iustice.

In the Easter holidays, preached at the Spittle, doctor Bill the queenes almoner, doctor Cox, & maister Horne, the two last came lately from beyond the seas.

On Low Sunday, the 2. of Aprill, maister Samepson, lately come from beyond the seas, made the rehearsal Sermon at Pauls crosse: but when the Lord Maior and aldermen came to their places in Pauls Churchyard, the pulpet doore was locked, and the key could not be heard of: whereupon the lord Maior sent for a smith to open the locke, which was done, and when the preacher should enter the place, it was found very filthy and vncleane: moreover, the Clerger that had the key of the place where the bishops and prelates use to stand to heare the sermon, could not be found: whereupon certaine gentlemen, with a forme brake open the doore. This disorder chanced by reason that since Christmase last past, there was not a sermon preached at Pauls crosse, for an inhibition had bene sent from the counsell vnto the bishop of London, that he should admit no preacher, because of the controuersie betwixt the bishops, and them of the clergie that were newly returned into the realme from beyond the seas.

The last of March, the parliament yet continuing, a conference was begun at Westminster, concerning articles of religion betwixt the bishops and other of the clergie, clergy on the one part, and certaine learned preachers, of whom some had bene in dignity in the Church of England, before that time on the other part. The declaration of the proceeding wherein, and the cause of the breaking up of the same conference by default and contempt of certaine bishops, part of the said conference was published in a treatise printed by Richard Iugge and Iohn Cawood, printers to the Queenes maiesty as followeth.

The Queenes most excellent maiesty, hauing heard of diuersity of opinions in certaine matters of religion, amongst sundry of her louing subiects, and being very desirous to haue the same reduced to some goodly and Christian concord, thought it best by the aduise of the lords and other her priuy counsell, as well for the satisfaction of persons doubtfull, as also for the knowledge of the very truth in certaine matter of difference: to haue a conuenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, to conferre together their opinions and reasons, and thereby to come to some good and charitable agreement. And hereupon by her maiesties commandement, certaine of her priuy counsell declared this purpose to the Archbishop of Yorke (being also one of the same priuy counsell) and required him that he would impart the same to some of the bishops, and to make choise of eight, nine or ten of them, and that there should be the like number named of the other part: and further also declared to him (as then was supposed) what the matters should be: And as for the time, it was thought meete to be as soone as possible might be agreed vpon. And then after certaine dayes past, it was signified by the sayd archbishop, that there was appointed by such of the bishops to whom he had imparted this matter, eight persons, that is to say, foure bishops, and foure doctours, who were content at the Queenes maiesties commandement to shew their opinions, and as he termed it, render account of their faith in those matters which were mentioned, and that specially in writing, although he sayd they thought the same so determined, as there was no cause to dispute vpon them.

It was hereupon fully resolved by the Queenes maiesty, with the aduise aforesayd, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for auoiding of much alteration in words, and that the sayd Bishops should, because they were in authority, of degree superiours, first declare their minds and opinions to the matter, with their reasons in writing: and the other number being also eight men of good degree in schooles, and some hauing bene of dignity in the church of England, if they had any thing to say to the contrary, should the same day declare their opinions in like manner. And so each of them should deliuer their writings to the other, to be considered what were to be improued therein, and the same to declare againe in writing at some other conuenient day, and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters: all this was fully agreed vpon with the archbishop of Yorke, and so also signified to both parties. And immediatly hereupon diuerse of the nobility and states of the realme, understanding that such a meeting and conference should be, and that in certaine matters, whereupon the court of Parliament consequently following, some lawes might be grounded: they made earnest meanes to her maiesty, that the parties of this conference, might put and read their assertions in the English tongue, tongue, and that in the presence of them of the nobility, and others of the parliament house, for the better satisfaction and inhabling of their owne iudgements, to treat and conclude of such lawes as mought depend thereupon. This also being thought very reasonable, was signified to both parties, and so fully agreed vpon, and the day appointed for the first meeting to be the friday in the forenoone, being the last of March, at Westminster Church, where both for good order, and for honour of the conference, by the Queenes maiesties commandement, the Lords and others of the priuie counsell were present, and a great part of the Nobilitie also: and notwithstanding the former order appointed and consented vnto by both parties, yet the bishop of Winchester, and his colleagues, alleaging they had mistaken that their assertions, and reasons should be writtten, and so onely recited out of the booke, layd their booke was not readie then writtten, but they were ready to argue and dispute, and therefore they would for that time repeat in speech that which they had to say to the first proposition. This variation from the order, and specially from that which themselves had by the sayd archbishop in writting before required, adding thereto the reason of the Apostle, That to contend in words is profitable to nothing but to subuersion of the hearer, seemed to the Queenes maiesties counsell somewhat straunge, and yet was it permitted without any great reprehension, because they excused themselves with mistaking the order, and agreed that they should not faile but put it in writting, and according to the former order, deliuer it to the other part, and so the said Bishop of Winchester and his colleagues appointed Doctor Cole Drane of Paules to be the utterer of their minds, who partly by speech onely, and partly by reading of authorities writtten, and at certaine times being informed of his colleagues what to say, made a declaration of their meaning, and their reasons to their first proposition, which being ended, they were asked by the priuie Counsell, if any of them had any more to be said: and they said no. So as then the other part was licensed to shew their mindes, which they did according to the first order, exhibiting all that which they meant to be propounded in a booke writtten, which after a prayer and inuocation made most humble to almighty God, for the enduing of them with his holy spirite, and a protestation also to stand to the doctrine of the Catholike Church, builded vpon the Scriptures, and the doctrine of the Prophets and the Apostles, was distinctly read by one Robert Horne Bachelor in Divinitie, late Drane of Duresme. And the same being ended with some likelihood, as it seemed, that the same was much allowable to the audience, certaine of the Bishops began to say contrarie to their former answer, that they had much more to say to this matter: wherein although they might haue bene well reprehended for such maner of cauillation, yet for auoyding of any mistaking of orders in this colloquie or conference, and for that they should utter all that which they had to say: it was both ordered and thus openly agreed vpon of both parts in the full audience, that vpon the monday following, the Bishops should bring their minds & reasons in writting to the second assertion, and the last also if they could, and first read the same, & that done, the other part should bring likewise theirs to the same. And being read, each of them should deliuer to other the same writtings.

And in the meane time the bishops should put in writing, not onely all that which Doctor Cole had that day uttered: but all such other matters as they any otherwise could thinke of for the same, and as soone as they might possible, to send the same booke touching that first assertion to the other part, and they should receive of them that writing which maister Horne had there read that day, and upon monday it should be agreed what day they should exhibite their answers touching the first proposition. Thus both parts assented thereto, & the assembly quietly dismissed. And therefore upon monday, the like assemblie began againe, at the place and houre appointed, and there, upon what sinister or disordered meaning is not yet knowne (though in some part it be vnderstanded) the Bishop of Winchester and his colleagues, and especially Lincolne, refused to exhibite or read, according to the former notorious order on friday, that which they had prepared for the second assertion. And thereupon by the Lord keeper of the great seale, they being gently and fauourably required to keepe the order appointed: and that taking no place, being secondly as it behooued, pressed with more earnest request, they neither regarding the authoritie of that place, nor their owne reputation, nor the credite of the cause, utterly refused that to doo. And finally, being againe particularlie euerie of them apart distinctly by name, required to vnderstand their opinions therein, they all sauing one (which was the Abbot of Westminster, hauing some more consideration of order, and his duetie of obedience than the other) vterlie and plainelie denied to haue their booke read, some of them as more earnestly than other, some so also, some other more indiscreetelie, and vnreuerently then others. Whereupon, giuing such example of disorder, stubburnesse and selfewill, as hath not bene seene and suffered in such an honourable assemblie, being of the two Estates of this Realme, the Nobilitie and the Commons, besides the presence of the Queenes Maiesties most honorable priue Counsell, the same assemblie was dismissed, and the godly and most Christian purpose of the Queenes Maiestie made frustrate. And afterward for the contempt so notoriously made, the Bishops of Winchester and Lincolne, hauing most obstinately both disobeyed common authoritie, and varied manifestly from their owne order, and especially Lincolne, who shewed more folly than the other, were condignly committed to the Tower of London, & the rest (sauing the Abbot of Westminster) stood bound to make dayly and personall apparance before the counsell, & not to depart the citie of London and Westminster, vntill further order were taken with them for their disobedience & contempt.

The three propositions, whereupon conference was determined to haue bene at Westminster.

1 It is against the word of God, and the custome of the ancient Church, to vse a tongue vnknowne to the people, in common prayer, and the administration of the Sacraments.

2 Euery Church hath authoritie to appoint, take away and change ceremonies and ecclesiasticall rites, so the same be to edification.

3 It cannot be proued by the word of God that there is in the Masse offered by a sacrifice propitiatorie for the quicke and the dead.

Lord Wentworth arraigned and quit.

The 22. of Aprill, Willm lord Wentworth late deputie of Calcis, was arraigned at Welsminster vpon an inditement of treason found against him, in the late Q. Maries daies, for the losse of Calcis, but he was acquit by his peeres, the lord Harqueste of Northampton, sitting that day as chiefe steward of England: so he was deliuered presently vnto his house, without returninge to any prison.

The 8. of May, the parliament brake vp, in which parliament, besides other things before recited, a subsidie was graunted to the queene of two shillings eight pence the pound of mooueable goods, and foure shillings of lands to be paid at two seuerall payments of euery person, spirituall and temporall.

Church service in the English tongue

The 8. of May being Whitsunday, the seruice in churches began according to the booke of common prayer, set forth and established by this last parliament, corresponding to that of king Edwards time.

Citizens of London mustered at Greenwich.

The 2. of July, the citizens of London had a muster afore the Ducenes maiestie at Greenwich in the parke, of 1400. men, whereof 800. were pikemen all in fine corselets, 400. harquebuts, in shirts of maille, with morirs, and 200. halberters in alman riuets, which were furnished and set forth by the companies of the citie of London: they had to euery hundred two wiffelers richly apparelled, and twelve wardens of the best companies riding in coates of blacke velvet to conduct them with drums and fifes, and six ensignes, all in ierkins of white byrdges latten, cut and lined with blacke larsenet, with caps, holts, and skarfes according, the captaines Robert Constable and maister Saunders, brought them in battell ray afore the Queene, euen as they should haue fought, which made a goodly shew before her Maiestie, the emperours and French kings ambassadours being present.

Bishops deprined.

In the moneth of July, the old bishops of England then living, were called and examined by certaine of the quenes maiesties counsell, where the bishops of Yorke, Ely, and London with other, to the number of thirteene or fourteene, for refusing to take the oth touching the Ducenes supremacie and other articles, they were deplued from their bishopricks. And likewise were diuerse deanes, archdeacons, parsons, and vicars, deprined from their benefices, and some committed to prison in the tower, Fleet, Marshalsea, and kings bench.

Commissioners.

Commissioners were likewise appointed for the establishing of religion through the whole Realme. For London were appointed sir Richard Sackuile knight, Doctor Horne a Deuine, Doctor Huicke a Ciuillian, and maister Saluage, who called before them diuerse persons of euery parish, and swore them to enquire and present vpon certaine inuincions.

Inuincions.

Houses suppressed.

Also the houses of Religion crested by queene Mary, as the priorie of S. Iohn of Ierusalem by Smithfield, the nunnes and brethzen of Sion and Sherne, the blacke friers in Smithfield, and the friers of Greenwich were all suppressed: the abbot and monkes of Welsminster were put out, a deane, prebends, and canons placed there, and so named the colledge of Welsminster, founded by Q. Elizabeth.

Church images burned.

On the euen of Saint Bartholomew, the day and the morrow after, &c. were burned in Paules church yard, Cheape, and diuerse other places of the citie of London, all the roodes and other images of Churches, in some places the coopes, vestments, altar clothes, bookes, banniers, spulchers, and rood lofts were burned.

The 5. of September there fell a three houres tempest at London in y<sup>e</sup> forenoon in the end whereof a great lightning with a terrible clap of thunder, strake the spire (being stone) of the steeple of Whallowes Church in Bredstreete, about a ten foote beneath the top, out of the which fell a stone that slew a dogge, and ouerthrew a man playing with the same dogge, and not long after the same spire was taken downe by the Church wardens, to save the charges of repairing. And at the same instant, by the same tempest, one of the south doozes of S. Diones Church in Fanchurch streete, with the dooze of the reueltrie of the same Church, were both stricken through and broken.

Churches in London stricken and broken by tempest.

The 8. and 9. of September. a solemne obsequie was kept in Paules Church at London, for Henrie the second of that name King of France, who decessed about the 10. of July last past, of a wound received the 29. of June, in running at tilt in solemne Jousts holden at Paris, in honor of the mariage celebrated betwixt his sister the lady Margaret of France, and Philibert Duke of Savoy. He was stricken on the bise with a lance, as he ranne against the Counte Montgomerie: the spiltis entring by the sight of his head peece, and piercing through his cie into his head, so perished his braine, that there was no meane to save his life. The obsequie for him was kept in very solemne wise, with a rich hearse made like an imperiall crowne, susteyned with eight pillars, and covered with blacke velvet, with a balence fringed with gold, and richly hanged with scutichions, penons, and banners of the French Kings armes, without any lights. And on the beere was laid a palle of cloth of gold, with a coate armour of the armes of France, and a crest with an imperiall crowne standing vpon the beere. Doctor Parker Archbishop of Canterburie elect, Doctor Barlow bishop of Chester elect, and Doctor Scory bishop of Hereford elect, executing at the dirige of the evening song in English, they sitting in the Bishops of Londons seate, in the upper quire in surplices, with doctors hoods about their shoulders. The chiefe mourner, was the Marquess of Winchester Lord Treasurer, assisted with ten other Lords mourners, with all the heraults in blacke, and their coate armours uppermost.

Obsequie for the French king.

On the morrowe being the 9. of September, a Sermon was preached by Doctor Scorie in place of Doctor Grindall Bishop of London. After the Sermon, sixe of the Lords mourners received the Communion with the Bishops, which bishops were in copes on their surplices, onely at the ministracion of the said Communion. Which being finished, there was a great dinner kept in the Bishop of Londons palace by Paules, where the mourners apparelled them, and so ended the solemnities of the said obsequies.

About the last of September, John Duke of Finland, second sonne to Gustavus King of Swethen, was sent by his father to treat a marriage for his eldest brother Ericus, with the Queenes Maiesie of England, he arrived at Harwich in Essex, and was there honorably received and enterpayned by the Earle of Orford: which said Earle, and the Lord Robert Dudley, with a goodly band of gentlemen and yemen, conveyed him to London, where he was received of divers knights and gentlemen of the Court, on the 5. of October, and was with his traine of about the number of 50. persons well hoysed, conveyed to the bishop of

The Queenes maiestie with aduice of her graces counsell, considering of this waightie businesse, and withall, foreseeing the malicious purpose of her aduersaries, and how the Queene of Scots was in Fraunce married and gouerned, so as she was not able to vse the libertie of her crowne, did thinke it best to prevent such mischiefs as might ensue, if timely remedy were not vsed, to displace such dangerous neighbours the Frenchmen, that began to nestle themselves thus strongly so neare at hand. Hereupon was a power raised and sent forth, both by sea and land, the duke of Norfolk being appointed Generall, and sent into the North for the direction thereof. And first maister William Winter appointed vice Admirall of the Queenes nauie, Northwards made saile towards Scotland, and waiting along the coast, in the moneth of Januarie, came into the Forth, and so to the rode of Lieth, and there cast anchor, as well to impeach y<sup>e</sup> landing of such Frenchmen as might happily be sent forth of Fraunce against the Scottissh lords of the congregation, as also to keepe them that lay in Inlceith from victuals: moreover after that the army by land was come together into the North parts and had sojourned a while at Berwicke, and thereabouts, the Lord Grey of Wilton being appointed Generall of the said armie, departed with the same, and marched to Coltingham, where they encamped that night.

The 30. of March, sir James Croft, & sir George Howard, departed fro Berwicke to the armie, with all the launces and light horsemen, containing the number of 1250. horses. The number of footmen, more then 6000. The chiefe gouernors of which armie were these: The lord Gray of Wilton lieutenant Generall, sir James Croft assistant with him in that charge, the lord Scrope lord Marshall, sir George Howard, generall of the men at armes and demilances, maister Barnaby fitz Patricke his lieutenant, sir Henry Percie generall of the light horsemen: Thomas Huggens esquire, prouost marshall, Thomas Goner maister of the ordinaunce, maister William Pelham captaine of the Pioners, Edward Randell esquire sergeant maior, maister Thomas Borrough, maister Curbett Vaughan, maister Williams, and maister Cornewall corporals, this day at night the armie encamped at Dunglas, and thereabout.

The last of March, the army marching by Dunbar, there issued out of the towne certaine horsemen and footmen, offering to skirmish, towards whom certaine of the English launces and pishetts, with certaine harquebusiers made forwards, but they kept themselves within their strength, two of the enemies horsemen, and one footman were slaine. This done the army marched on to Linton bigges, where the footmen encamped that night. The horsemen lay at Haddington and in diuers other small townes, sir James Croft lay at Clarkington west of Haddington, at the lord of Cockburnes house. The first of Aprill, the camp remooued to Salt Preston, and there incamped: this evening, sir James Croft, with diuers of the captaines in his company, met with the earle of Arraine, the lord James prior of Saint Andrews, the maister of Maxwell, sir William Kirkcaldy lord of Orange, and diuers other of the Scottissh nobilitie with three hundred horse in their traine.

After they had saluted each other, they rode together to Salt Preston, where the lord Grey lord lieutenant met them, where they entred into communication, and and after departed. The 2. of Aprill, the lord Grey, sir James Croft, y<sup>e</sup> lord Scrope, sir George Howard, with other capitaines rode to Huskelborough church, whither came to them the duke Chateau le Reault, with his sonne the earle of Arraine, the earles of Arguile, Glencarne, Southerland, Wentithe, and Rothus, the lord James prior of Saint Andrewes, the lord Ruythuen alias Riuer, the lord Ogletree, the lord Boyde, the maister of Hartwell, the L. of Dunsstone, the maister of Lindsey, the bishop of Galloway, the abbot of Saint Colines Inch, the abbot of Culros, the lord of Pettitrow, the lord of Cunningham head, y<sup>e</sup> lord of Grange and other, about 200. horse, there they late in counsell and departed for that night.

On the 3. of Aprill, the lord Grey, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, sir George Howard, sir Henrie Percy, and diuerse other capitaines and gentlemen, rode vnto Pinkey, a house of the abbot of Dunfernes, where the earle of Arraine and the lord James Steward, with diuerse other noble men of Scotland meeting them, did conduct them into the said house, where they had long conference together, and after dinner they returned with the lord lieutenant vnto Salt Plesson.

The fourth of Aprill, five young gentlemen appointed to passe into England for pledges, their names were, lord Claude Hamilton, fourth sonne to the duke Chateau le Reault, Robert Dowglas, Archebald Cambell, lord of Longhennel, George Gream second sonne to the earle of Wentithe, James Coningham, sonne to the earle of Glencarne.

The sixt of Aprill, the campe raised from Salt Plesson and marched forwards, halfe a mile from Yesterike, beneath a Cragge called Arhurs scate, the duke of Chateau le Reault, the earle of Arraine, the earle of Arguile, the lord James prior of Saint Andrewes, and the rest of the noble men of Scotland, accompanied with two hundred horsemen, and five hundred footmen, staid for the coming of the English armie, whereupon the lord Grey, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, sir George Howard, and sir Henry Percie repaired to them, & had conference there with the duke, and other the Scottish lords that were in his company.

In the meane while the army staid, but yet at length the horsemen, the vanguard and battell, were commaunded to march forth, who accordingly passed along by the place where the duke and Scottish lords stood, untill they approached nere to Yestericke: There came Trombull, the Queene Regents trumpet, to the lord lieutenant, and brought with him a safeconduct, given vnder the hand and seale, for the safe repaire of sir James Croft, sir George Howard, and six other to accompany them. Whereupon, they preparing themselves, departed towards Edenborough, where the said Queene as then lay within the castle. There went with them maister Sommerlet, maister Peihain, and foure other gentlemen. Whilest they were in conference with the Queene, the Frenchmen to the number of nine hundred or a thousand shot, backed with five hundred corslets and pikes, and about fiftie horsemen, were come forth of Lieth, vnder conduction of maister Doylell, and the countie Martigues coronell of the French footemen. The Lord Grey vnderstanding thereof, came vp to the hill, appointed an officer at armes called Rouge Croft: to go vnto them, with commandment from him, that they should retire their forces forth of the field into the towne of Lieth: for if it were not for the promise which he had made to the queene Dowager, he would cause them to depart. The herault doing his message, receiued answer, that they were vpon their maister and mistresse ground, and therefore meant not to remoue from it. Rouge Crosse returning with this answer, was sent againe, to commaund them estoons to go their way backe to Lieth, for if they did not, they should be sent away with a mischiefe. But bineth had the herault done this second message, when the French men stepping forth, discharged a whole bolie of their shot into the field against the Lord Grey and his companie. Hereupon, the Englishmen and they fell in skirmish, which continued for the space of foure houres and more, so hote and earnestly mainteyned on both parts, that the like had not lightly bene scene long time before: yet at the length the Englishmen droue the French footemen ouer the hill, and wan the Crag from them, and put them from a Chappell, where they had stood a great while, vsing it for a couert from the Englishmens shot. Then the enemies that were in Lieth shot off diuers peeces of their great artillerie out of the Towne against the Englishmen, who on the other part brought forth two field peeces, and covered them with a troupe of horsemen, and hauing planted them to some aduantage, discharged the same among the enemies, who perceiuing that, gaue place, and sodainly the English demulances gaue a charge on them, brake in amongst them, and slue diuerse of them, whereby they were forced to retire backe into Lieth, being followed well-neere to the gates of the Towne. There were slaine in this skirmish of the French about 140. beside them that remained prisoners. Of the Englishmen there were also diuerse slaine, and many hurt. The same day sir James Croft and sir George Howard returned from the D. Regent, after they had spent a long time in talke with her.

The seuenth of Aprill, a new french was cast beside the Crag, and thereon two peeces of ordinance planted. The eight of Aprill, the Frenchmen shot at the English campe very sore out of Saint Nicholas steeple, where were planted two great peeces of ordinance, although they did no great hurt: but the same night the Englishmen cast a trench beyond the Crag, and placed in the same trench certaine small peeces of artillerie, which went off the next day against the enemies, and they likewise shot off against the English. The twelfth of Aprill, a bullet of a great peece of ordinance, being shot out of Lieth, did light in the camp and slue three men: but they were answered againe with our Canons. The foureteenth day of Aprill, being Easter day, the Englishmen shot off their great Ordinance, and the Frenchmen answered them againe all that day. The footemen also skirmished, so that diuerse were hurt on both parties. The same day the pile of Blacknesse was surrendered to maister Winter. The same day, 9. French men apparelled like woomen came forth of Lieth, and counterfeiting some light demeanour, trained one of the English scowts within their danger, whom they tooke, and chopped off his head, which they set vpon the toppe of one of their Church steeples. The sixteenth day of Aprill, a fittie horsemen, and about five hundred harquebusiers, who making to the new trenches, were vpon the English men that warded vpon such a sodaine, that they slue and wounded no small number, and possessing the trenches awhile, stopped the touch holes of three peeces of the artillerie, tooke maister Mawrice Barkeley prisoner, and his ensigne:

to the English.

Brian

Brian Fitz Williams was sore wounded, &c. The alarme being brought to the campe, sir James Croft and other repaired towards the trench with all expedition, and perceiuing the French men to be maisters of one of the trenches he commanded captaine Vaughan with his band to enter the trench, and to relecue those that were hardly beset of the Frenchmen, which was done with such manhood, that the enemies were expelled, and sixtene of them slaine: captaine Sommerlee and captaine Reade with their bands followed them, as they retired, and maister Arthur Grey with certaine demulances, and charging them with great courage, draue them into the towne, and made of them great slaughter, but Arthur Grey was shot through the shoulder. The 16. of Aprill, a supply of 2200. footemen came to the campe, ouer whom was captaine sir Andrew Corbet, sir Rowland Stanley, sir Thomas Heskeith, sir Arthur Manwering, sir Laurence Smith, maister Francis Tunstall maister Edward Littleton, captaine Caruell, Philip Shurley, and David Morris. They were garded with 500. horsemen, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Francis Leake, sir Iohn Foster, and sir Nicholas Strange, hauing charge to see them safely conducted, who after they had brought the past all danger of enemies, left the in safety by the way, and were come a day or two before them to the campe.

The 17. of Aprill, Maister Winter caused diuerse of the ship boats, being well manned, to giue a great alarme at the side of the towne towards the water, discharging many ballies and harquebusers of croke into the towne, during which time there was a piteous cry made by the women and children within the towne. The 20. of Aprill, many peeces were shot off out of the trenches into the towne. There issued out at the gates one hundred shot, to haile such of the Englishmen as came forth to offer skirmish, the pioneers both Scots and English were occupied in making of a new trench neare to the towne.

The twentieth of Aprill, the Bishop of Valence, accompanied with sir Henry Percie, and thye hundred horsemen, came to Lleslericke, the Lord Lieutenant, sir James Croft, the lord Scrope, and sir Raffe Sadler, met him at the further end of the ward. After they had receiued him with salutations, he was conducted by Rouge crosse from the campe vnto Edenborough, and so vp to the castle to confer with the Queene Dowager. He was no sooner in the castle, but there issued forth of Lieth the number of two hundred Frenchmen, and began a hot skirmish, which continued two houres, at which diuerse were slaine on both parts. The same night, nine peeces of ordinance were planted in the new trench, so that the next day the same peeces were shot off toward the steeple of S. Anthonies Church, whereby the peeces of ordinance that lay in the same steeple, were dismounted by them, and likewise those that lay in the steeple of Saint Nicholas Church, where a Gunner was slaine that stood at one of them, the peece and the gunner tumbling downe both together: a great peece of this church was beaten downe, and the steeple defaced. The Bishop of Valence after he had talked with the Queene, returned to commune with the Lords of the congregation.

The 23. of Aprill, the Pioners Scottish and English, were busied in casting of trenches.

On the 24. of Aprill, there issued out of Lieth seauentene horsemen, who offered the skirmish, and vnder the place called little London, 300. or 400. of their shot were were placed, at length certaine of the English Launces gaue a charge vpon their horsemen, who therewith retiring drew the Englishmen within danger of their shot, but the French were forced to retire, without any great hurt done to the Englishmen.

The 25. of Aprill, the Pioners finished the new fort, named Mount Pelham, to the gard whereof Captaine Vaughan was appointed gouernor with 1200. souldiours. This fort was raised on the south side of the towne, the plot whereof was cast square with foure bulwarkes at euery corner, and 12. battering peeces planted in places conuenient. This day, there issued out of Litch on the East side, 70. or 80. horsemen, and 200. harquebussiers offering the skirmish, towards whom certaine of the English light horsemen made, and charging them, drew the backe to their footemen, who with their shot receiued the light horsemen so sharply, that they were forced to retire: in the which retire Iames Hamilton a Scottissh man was taken prisoner. This day captaine Perich, and captaine Hayes, hauing charge of a troupe of light horsemen, vnder sir Henry Percy, and the lord of Gange, were taken prisoners before Dunbar, and to the number of 20. or 30. other were likewise taken or slaine. The same night also 2000. footemen with the pioners, were sent to the other side of the towne, beyond the Canon milles, where the pioners cast a trench for the safe lodging of the army, which remooued the next day from Yellericke downe into the valley by the said Canon milles, called the red Braies. As the army was incamping, certaine of the enemies horsemen and footemen skirmished with the English Launces and light horsemen a long time, there were two Frenchmen slaine with their horses also. In time of this skirmish, two Canons were conueyed and planted in the new trench, which discharged diuers shot at the enemies.

The seuen and twentieth of Aprill, the great artillerie was planted aloft on the hill aboue the campe, within lesse than a curiours shot of the towne walls, and the pioners were set a worke to cast new trenches, from the place where the same ordinance was lodged vnto Mountpelham, drawing so neere vnto Litch, as the harquebussie might reach them that watched and warded within the great bulwarke. The French kept the same day a trench which they had made without the towne, continually shooting at the English men in the campe, but the same night the English men won that trench from them, slue diuers of them therein with their shot, which being done, they gaue a great alarme to the towne both by land and water, the ship-boates shooting off against the towne very hotly, and they within the towne likewise at the English men. The same night was the great ordinance planted, and maister Markham hurt. The 28. the said great ordinance went off, and shot continually the more part of the day. The bishop of Valence departed the same day towards Bartwike, and this night sir George Howard, that had bene sent backe to Bartwicke, to signifie to the D. of Norfolk the estate of the siege, returned with sir Richard Lee, being conducted with 500. horsemen.

The 30. of Aprill, the great artillerie were shot off very hotly, and the French likewise shot off theirs, and comming forth of the towne, skirmished with the Englishmen: this night the pioners made new trenches towards the South bulwarke. The last of April, a sodaine fire was raised within the towne, which hugely encreased and continued the most part of the night following: at the beginning

When it first appeared, the English ordinance was shot off to the place where the fire was, which shot together with help of the wind that was very great did marvellously augment the same fire: neuertheless the French at that present time offered a skirmish, & continued the same neare the space of two houres. It was appointed, that certaine bands should make alarme to the towne, in so much that capitaine Vaughan, with diuerse other souldiers of Mountpelham entered the ditch, and approached the walls, but retired without receiving any great hurt. The first of May, the Frenchmen early in the morning set by their may-poles in certaine bulwarkes and 14. ensignes, the which being discovered of them in the campe, they saluted them with a peale of great ordinance, and likewise the French answered them againe, and so continued the most part of that day.

The second of May, the pioneers made the trenches for the artillery to be planted in batterry. The night following they placed the artillery in the new trench, and the next morning, the same batterry went off, and continued all that day. The night ensuing, the pioneers made a trench by the Citadell, wherein they might lodge some shot, and capitaine Vaughan with diuerse of the bands in Mountpelham, gave two fierce assaults to the towne, entered the ditches, and viewed the flankers: whercupon the French shot off the same flankers, and munning their walls, shot off two or three bolies of their final artillery, slaying and hurting to the number of twenty Englishmen, among other little Norton was one.

The fourth of May, there were three ensignes appointed to gard the new trenches, and towards night the Frenchmen that were in the trench vnder the Citadell, made a sally vpon the Englishmen that garded the layd trench, but could not preuaile. The same night the Englishmen conueyed two culuerings ouer the water to scoure the mills, and before the break of the day they had brent one of the same mills. The fift of May, 4. souldiers belonging to our great ordinance set fire & brent the other mill. This day also, as French gentlemen came forth to discover the English trenches, capitaine Reade commanded one of his souldiers to shoot at them, but through misshap his peece burst, and a shiuer thereof brake the arme of the sayd capitaine.

The sixt of May, the English ordinance on the further side the water, began to shoot off against the enemies very hotely. This day the earle of Arguile, and diuerse other noble men of Scotland, came to Edinburgh with two thousand horsemen and footemen, who shewed themselves in order of a muster on the hill vnderneath the castle, which being perceiued of the French within Lieth, they shot of three great peeces of artillery at them, but hurt them not. The night ensuing, the great ordinance in the English mens trenches and bulwarkes, continued shooting on euery side: and herewith commandement was giuen by the lord lieutenant and the counsell, that the whole army should be ready armed by midnight. In the morning by two of the clocke, diuerse bands passed forth towards the towne, and entering the ditches offered to scale, other capitaines with their men approached the bulwarkes, and other were appointed to enter beside the milles. Beside the English bands, there were a thousand Scots ioyned with them, wherof five hundred with capitaine Vaughan and other were commanded to attempt the bulwarke next to Mountpelham, and other five hundred went with such English captaines as were commanded to assault the breach.

Moreover, as well the lances as light horsemen, were assigned to guard the fields: sir George Howard with the lances keeping betwixt the fort of Mountpelham and the sea westward, and sir Henry Percy with the light horsemen, betwixt the campe and the sea eastward. The rest of the footmen that went not to the assault, were also appointed to guard the trenches and field, in such wise as was thought expedient, and upon warning given by captain Randall sergeant major, such as had bin commanded to give the assault in their severall appointed places, pressed with courage, & boldly adventured to climbe the walls, and enter at the breaches, but yet their attempt wanted the wished successe: for what through the policy of the french, in stopping the currat of the river that night, & what by reason of the unfitness of the ladders, being too short, the assailants were repulsed, & were forced to retire with the losse of 7. or 8. score englishmen, or more, which were slaine outright, besides those that were wounded, being at the least two or three hundred.

The 8. of May, sir George Howard and sir Richard Lee departed toward Barwike with certaine companies of horsemen for their safe conduction.

The ninth of May, the frenchmen wrought within the towne to fortifie and repara the breaches. The same day also the french had manned to the sea-wards a bote fraught with fifty harquebusiers, meaning to convey them over to Insketh, but the English ships discovering them, prepared certaine botes to encounter the, whereof they being aware, returned.

The 10. of May, maister Ingleby, captain Pickman, and captain Browne came to the campe from Barwike with a supply of foure hundred & fifty souldiers.

The twelfth of May about midnight, the frenchmen to the number of two hundred sallied forth of the towne, minding to give a camulado to the Englishmen that kept watch in the trenches at the west side of Mountpelham, but they were detected and repulsed.

The fifteenth of May, sir Francis Leake came to the campe with a supply of five hundred men from Barwike.

The one and twentieth of May about seven of the clocke at night, there issued forth of Lieth six horsemen and a hundred footemen harquebusiers, marching toward Mountpelham to offer skirmish: whereupon captain Vaughan went forth to them very orderly, and skirmished with them a prety while, in the end the frenchmen were drinen to retire. The same night maister Francis Sommerlet and other captaines were appointed to keepe a fort built about the campe, and tooke the name of him being captain thereof, & was called Sommerlets mount. The 22. sir Peter Carew came to the campe, being sent from the court. The 24. of May at night about seven of the clocke, the french sallied forth to the number of 200. footmen and 20. horsemen, meaning, as it appeared, to haue worne the trenches from the Englishmen, whereupon a fore skirmish followed, diuers slaine, and many hurt on both parts: yet in the end the french were drinen home by force. The same day the frenchmen of Dunbarre tooke an English hoy laden with beere, beefe and bacon.

The eight of June sir Iohn Newill with three hundred men, captain Bridges, and captain Drewry, with other three hundred, set from Barwike towards the campe, where they arrived on the 10. of June, on which day the queene Dowager departed this life.

The thirteenth of June, sir William Cicill principall secretary to the queenes maiesty, with sir William Cordall, and doctor Worton deane of Canterbury and Pojke came to Barwicke, appointed commissioners on her said maiesties behalfe to treat of an accord with the countie de Randon, and the bishop of Valence commissioners sent for that purpose from the French king and his wife Mary queene of Scots.

The fourteenth of June a certaine number of Frenchmen came forth of Lieth to gather cockles on the sands towards Mountpelham, whercof the Englishmen perceiving, set vpon them, slue 70. and tooke 16. of them prisoners.

The sixteenth of June, the forenamed commissioners came to Edeborough, and as maister Secretary and the other passed the English forts and campe, they were saluted with a gallant peale of harquebusiers.

The seventeenth of June about eight of the clocke, an abstinence of warre was concluded; warning being given by the discharging of two peeces of ordinance out of the castle, and then the Frenchmen shewed themselves vpon their rampiers.

The 22. of June, the abstinence of warre was broken off.

The 4. of July about 3. of the clocke in the afternoone, the French came out of Lieth to gather cockles, whereupon the lord lieutenant bring at that present in Mountpelham, sent a drum vnto monsieur Doysell, to signifie vnto him, that his souldiers had gone further without their bounds then they might do by the order taken by the commissioners of both parts: Doysell answered, that they were no souldiers, but poore people which went to gather cockles for their releefe and sustentance. The drum layd, that if they kept not themselves within their appointed limits, the lord lieutenant meant to send them backe not greatly to their ease: whereunto Doysell replied, that if he so did, he would do the best he could to ayde the: hereupon the English horsemen and footmen of Mountpelham gaue a charge vpon them, and slue of them to the number of 50. and tooke certaine prisoners.

The first of July issued put of Lieth foureteene horsemen, and a hundred footmen, which offered the skirmish, but vpon the shooting of the great artillery from Mountpelham, they retired home againe into the towne. The night following about twelue of the clocke, one Scatargood an English man that was a gunner, and had fained himselfe to flee from the English campe for manslaughter into Lieth, and was received of the frenchmen, beleewing that he had meant no deceit, came out of the towne, after he had remained there about seven dayes, in which meane while he had vnderstood fully the state of the towne, and now vpon his returne, made relation thereof as he knew.

The first of July, the lord Grey lord lieutenant, sir William Cicill secretary, and sir Ralph Sadler about three of the clocke in the after noone, gaue order, that there shold no pece be shot, nor shew of hostility made until seven of the clocke the same night: and herewith sent Gerueys Clifton vnto all the souldiers that watched in the trenches and bulwarkes on the west side of Lieth, to command them to obserue the like order, and sir Iohn Neuill was sent with like order vnto the souldiers that lay in Somerset mount.

The

The peace now being concluded, on the seventh of July, Sir Francis Leake, and Peace concluded in Sir Gerueis Clifton, accompanied with two French gentlemen were sent to the towne of Lieth, to signifie unto monsieur Doyfell, the bishop of Amiens, Labrof- Scotland, se, Martignes, and other the French lords and captaines, that they were come thither by commaundement from the commissioners to cause the peace already concluded, to be proclaimed, which accordingly was done in manner following:

The most mightie princeesse, Elizabeth by the grace of God, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. And the most christian king Francis and Mary, by the same grace of God king & queene of Fraunce and Scotland, haue accorded vpon a reconciliation of a peace and amitie to be inuolably kept betwixt them, their subiects, kingdomes and countries, and therefore in their names it is straitly commaunded to all manner of persons borne vnder their obediencies, or being in their seruice, to forbeare all hostilitie either by sea or land, and to keepe good peace each with other from this time forwarde, as they will answer thereto at their bittermost perils. Immediately after this proclamation was ended, Sir Francis Leake, and Sir Gerueis Clifton were brought to monsieur Doyfells lodging, where was prepared for them a banquet of thirtie or fortie dishes, & yet not one either of flesh or fish, saving one of a powdered horse, as was aduouched by one that auouched himselfe to haue tasted thereof.

Articles of the peace, thirteene in number, were to this effect.

1 First, the French king and queene do not onely relinquish the stile, title and armes of England and Ireland, but do also bind themselves from henceforth to forbeare any more to vse or beare the same, and shall forbid their subiects the using of the same stile, in what sort soeuer it be, within any of their countries or dominions, forbidding also as much as in them lyeth, the wearing or quartering any manner of waikes the armes of England with those of Scotland or France.

Articles of peace at the siege of Lieth.

2 All such letters patents, or other writings as haue bene heretofore made, wherein the said title is mentioned, or whereunto any stile concerning the said armes is annexed, shall be reformed, and new made, without putting to them the title or armes of England or Ireland, and that all manner of writings or instruments concerning the said title, and being sealed with the said armes, not being renewed or reformed within sixe moneths after the publication of this treatie, shall be void and of none effect.

3 Scotland shall be gouerned by a counsell of twelue of the noblest of that country, which nobilitie shall be taken out of foure and twentie, to be first chosen by parliament, by the three estates there, and of those twelue, seven shall be named by the Scottish queene, and five by the lords of the parliament.

4 All things passed there since March 1558. shall be ouerpasse and forgotten, and by parliament the surety of the same shall be confirmed, and euery man restored to his office in that realme.

5 No French man shall haue any office in Scotland.

6 Sixe score French men souldiers only shall remaine in Scotland, viz. thre score in Dunbar, & 3. score in Inskith, & those to be monthly mustered, and payed by the counsell of the realme, and to be iustified by the lawes of Scotland.

7 No munition nor victuals shall be brought into Scotland, but from sixe moneths moneths to fire moneths, and then onely for those places, and for the said number of fire souldiers.

8 No forraigne ships or men of warre shall be from hencefoorth brought into Scotland, but by the consent and will of the Scots.

9 Lieth shall be demolished by the victo of the Quenes maiesties commissioners, and in such sort as they shall thinke convenient.

10 The new buildings of Dunbarre shall also be rased.

11 Matters of religio in Scotland be overpassed in silence without any alteration.

12 The league betweene the Quenes maiestie and the nobilitie of Scotland is also passed over without any reuocation.

13 Finally, in the treatie betweene her highnesse, and the said French king and queene, the said king and queene, are by the speciall clause bound to her highnesse to performe and keepe the said covenants that touch the Realme and subiects of Scotland.

After that this peace was then fully established, the French men were embarked at Lieth in English vessels, those onely excepted that were appointed to remaine as pledges with the English men till the ships came backe againe, and a few other that were permitted to passe through England into their country.

Houses
blowne vp.

The first of July, through shooting of a game which brake in the house of one named Adrian Arren a Dutch man in Crooked lane, and setting fire on a firen barrell of gun powder, foure houses were blowne bp, and diuerse other were shattered, nine men and women were slaine, and diuers other were bruised.

The third
fall of the base money.

On Michaclmas euen before noone, was published by proclamation, that the tesson coyned for twelue pence, and in the raigne of king Edward the first called downe to fire pence, should now forthwith (of the best sort, marked with the port-culcis, be taken for foure pence halfe peny, the second, marked with the greyhound for two pence farthing, the third and worst sort, not marked as afore, not to be taken for any value: the groate should be taken for two pence, the two peny peece for a peny, &c. And shortly after, her grace restored to her subiects fine sterling money, for their corrupt and base coine, calling the same to her maiesties mints, according to the rate before mentioned.

New coine

The 9. of October the French crovne that went currant for 6. shillings foure pence was proclaimed to be fire shillings.

schoole.

The one and twentieth of March, a notable grammar schoole was founded by the maister, wardens, and assistants of the worshipfull companie of the merchant Tailors of London, in the parish of Saint Laurence Pountney in the same city: Richard Hills late maister of that company having giuen five hundred pound toward the purchase of an house, called the Harroze of the Roole, sometime the duke of Buckingham, wherein the schoole is kept.

Wil. Geffrey
whipped.

The 10. of Aprill was one William Geffrey whipped from the Marshalsea in Southwarke to Bedlem without Bishops gate of London, for that he professed one Iohn Moore to be Christ our Saviour: on his head was set a paper wherein was writt as followeth: William Geffrey a molt blasphemous heretik, denying Christ

Christ our Sauour in heauen. The sayd Gessiey being stayd at Bedlem gate, John Moore was brought forth, before whom William Gessiey was whipped till he confessed Christ to be in heauen. Then the sayd John Moore being examined, and answering ouerthwartly, was commanded to put of his coate, dublet and shirt, which he seemed to do very willingly, and after being tied to the cart, was whipped an arrowes shoote from Bedlem, where at the last he also confessed Christ to be in heauen, and himselfe to be a sinfull man: then was John Moore sent againe vnto Bedlem, and William Gessiey to the Marshalsea, where they had laine prisoners nigh a yere and a halfe, the one for professing himselfe to be Christ, the other a discipule of the same Christ.

A false christ
whipped.

This yere was such a scarcity of wheate and other graine, that sir William Chester maior of London, and other the principall magistrates of the city, were forced to make prouision for wheate & rie from beyond the seas, to a great quantity, which was a releefe, not only to the citizens, but also to the countreies neare adioyning.

On Wednesday the fourth of June, betweene foure and fise of the clocke in the afternoone, the steeple of Paules in London, being fired by lightning, brast forth (as it seemed to the beholders) two or three yards beneath the foote of the crosse, and from thence bent downe the sphere to the stone woрке and bels, so terribly, that within the space of foure houres, the same steeple, with the roofes of the church so much as was timber, or otherwise combustible, were consumed, which was a lamentable sight, and pitifull remembrance to the beholders thereof.

Paules steeple on fire
by lightning.

The length of Paules church in London is twelue score Taylors yards, which is seven hundred and twentie foote: the breadth thereof is one hundred and thirty foote: the height of the steeple was fise hundred and twentie foote, whereof the stone woрке is two hundred and sixtie foote: and the spere which now is burnt, was likewise two hundred and sixtie foote: the height of the body of that church is one hundred and fiftie foote.

After this mischance, the Q. maieslie being much grieved for the losse of so beautifull a monument, directed her highnesse letters to the Maior of London, willing him to assemble the citizens, to take some order for speciall ayde & helpe for the repairing againe of the same, and she of her most gracious disposition, to giue a comfort vnto other, for the furtherance thereof, did presently giue and deliuer in gold 1000. marks, & a warrant for 1000. load of timber to be taken out of her maiesties woods or elsewhere. And the citizens of London granted one beneuolence, & three sixtiens to be forthwith paid. And the cleargie of England vnder the prouince of Canterbury granted to giue the fortieth part of the value of their benefices, being charged with first fruits, & not being charged with first fruits, to pay the thirtieth part. And the cleargie of the diocesse of London granted to giue the thirtieth part of their benefices, being in first fruits and the 20. part being out of first fruits. And immediately by the commandement of her maieslie, her priue counsell tooke order, that fise citizens of London, and two of the cleargie of the church of Paules had charge to ouersee, and set forward this woрке, who made such expedition, that within one moneth next following the burning thereof, the same was covered with boords and lead, after the manner of a false rooffe: and the greatnes of the woрке dispatched in so short time could scarcely be credited of any but such as saw the same. And the cause of this great hast, was for feare of raine which might haue perished the vaults, to the destruction of the whole church: and before the said yeare was fully ended, all the five stes of the said Church were framed of new and maine timber, and couered with lead, and fully finished. And the same yeere also the great rooffe of the west end was framed and made of new and great timber in Porskeshire, and brought to London by sea, and set vp and couered with lead, and fully finished. And in like manner within the said yeere, the whole rooffe and frame of the east end of the said church was made in Porskeshire, and brought by sea to London, and after set vp as the rest of the roofes, but the roofes of the north and south ends of the same church remained couered with boords till 1564. that the bishop (as I am informed)ooke vpon him the charge of repairing them, and for the same laid out 720. pound, and so that woork ceased to proceed any further.

New coines.*

The sixteenth of November, the Queenes maiestie published a proclamation for diuers small peces of siluer money to be currant, as the six pence, foure pence, three pence, two pence, and a penny, three half pence, and three farthings: & also forbad all foraine coines to be currant within the same realme, as well gold as siluer, calling them into her maiesties mints except two sorts of crownes of gold, the one the French crowne, the other the Flemish crowne: whereupon for the space of halfe a yeere, was weekly brought into the Tower of London, 8000. 10000. 12000. 16000. 20000. 22000. pound of siluer plates: & as much or more in pistolets, and other gold of Spanish coines, & one weeke in pistolets and other Spanish gold 2500 pound, all these to be coined with the queenes stamps.

The 26. of December, sir Ambrose Dudley knight, called lord Ambrose Dudley second sonne of Iohn late Duke of Northumberland, was created baron Lisle, and afterward the same day earle of Warwick at Westminster.

Monstrous
birthes.

This yeare in England were many monstrous birthes: in March a mare brought forth a foale with one body, and two heads, and as it were a long taile growing out betweene the two heads. Also a sow farrowed a pigge with foure legges like to the armes of a man child, with hands and fingers, &c. In April a sow farrowed a pigge with two bodies, eight feete, and but one head, many calues and lambs were monstrous, some with collers of skin growing about their neckes, like to the double ruffes of shirts and necker-thicks then vsed. The foure and twentieth day of May, a man child was borne at Chichester in Suffex, the head, armes, and legges whereof, were like an Anatomie, the breast and belly monstrous bigge from the navel, as it were a long string hanging: about the necke a great collar of flesh and skin growing like to the ruffe of a shirt or neckerchiefe, comming vp about the eares pleyting and folding, &c.

Declaration of her maiestie, causes
why to arme her subiects aGainst France.

The realme of France being in great trouble about this season, by means of ciuill dissension and warres that rose amongst themselves, the queenes maiestie and her honorable priuy counsell being enforeced thereof, first published a booke entituled, A declaration of the Queenes Maiestie, containing the causes which haue constrained her to arme certaine of her subiects for defence both of her owne estate and of the most christian king Charles the ninth her good brother, and his subiects. The booke folloiweth thus:

Although the miserable and afflicted estate of the realme of France is to be lamented of all christian princes and nations, and requireth some good remedy, not onely for preservation of the king there, with the queene his mother, and the subjects of that realme from danger and ruine: but also for the stay of the rest of christendome in peace, and to be free from the like ciuill warre, into the which, as it appeareth by these strange dealings in the sayd realme, it is meant the same shall fall: yet there is no prince that hath more iust cause to haue regard hereunto, nor that hath more indifferently and earnestly intended the recovery of quietnesse, and accord therein, then the queene maieesty of this realme of England, both by her owne gracious disposition, and by aduise of her counsell. For as the matter is now plainly disclosed to the world, and as her maieesty hath proued the same sufficiently by her owne late experience, she is not onely touched as other princes ought to be, with great compassion and commiseration for the vnnaturall abusing of the french king her good brother, by certaine of his subjects, the danger of his person and his blood, the lamentable and barbarous destruction, harocke and spoile of so many christian innocent people beyond all measure: but her maieesty also euidently seeth before her eyes, that if some good remedy be not by Gods goodnesse prouided in season, the very fire that is now kindled and dispersed there, is purposely meant and intended to be conueyed and blowne ouer to midaine this her crowne and her realme. Which great perill, although it be so plainly seene to all wise and prouident men both at home and abroad, that they cannot mislike her care and prouidence to remedy the same in time, yet hath her maieesty thought not vnnecessary to notifye some part of her dealings herein, so as it shall well appeare how sincerely her maieesty hath both hitherto proceeded with her neighbours, and how plainly and vpright she is determined to continue.

The queene of England nearest touched with the French troubles,

First, it hath bene well seene to the world how well disposed her maieesty was euen at the beginning of her raigae, to the restitution of peace to christendome, that for leue thereof, was contented to forebear for certaine yeeres the restitution of a portion of her ancient dominion, when all other parties to the same peace, with whom and by whose alliance her crowne sustained losse, were immediately restored to the most part of their owne in possession: and yet it cannot be forgotten within how short a space, or rather no space after, and by whom, and vpon how great euident and iust causes as well by meanes of force and armes first taken, as by other open attempts against her M<sup>ty</sup>. She was constrained to prepare like armes of defence onely, euen for her whole crowne and kingdome, and to unity therewith for the safetie of her next neighbors from a plaine tyrannie. And also how sincerely her maieesty proceeded therein: first by sundrie requestes and meanes made, to forebear their attempts: next, by open declaration of her intent to be onely for defence of her selfe, and by the whols handling of the matter: and lastly, by the euent and issue of the cause, all the world hath cleerely vnderstood.

The proceedings for the quietnesse in Scotland. 20. April 1560.

After which dangerous troubles pacified the Q. of Scots at her returne to her country, feeling the great commoditie hereof following, both to her selfe and her realme, a vnderstanding the sincere dealing of the Q. maieesty in all her former actions, did by diuers means giue signification to her maieesty of a great desire to enter with her into a straighter kind of amitie: whereunto her maieesty being of her owne nature much enclined, readily accorded. And how far and prosperously they both proceeded therein by many and sundrie mutuall offices of friendship, alswell the good will shewed by her maiestie to the Queene of Scots vnles, the Guiles, and to all her friends and ministers passing and repassing through this her realme, as also the accord of the enteruiues intended betwixt them both this last sommer, hath well declared.

But in the midst of these her M. quiet and peaceable determinations, she hath bene to her great griefe utterly disappointed, and constrained for her owne interest to attend and intermeddle in the pacification of these great troubles in France nere to her realme, the same being stirred by by such as both were her last manifest great enemies, and haue also they know how continued the cause of mistrust till this day, by manifest arguments of iniustice, which her maiestie is content to conceale, for the great affection that she beareth to the Scottish M. First her maiestie at the beginning, doubting by the increase of these French troubles, that not onely that realme should fall into danger of ruine by diuision, as it now is, but also, that the rest of christendome, and specially her owne realme, both for the necessitie thereto, and for the respects of them which were the principall authozs and parties in these troubles, should be also disturbed and brought to danger: used all the meanes that might be by messages, by solicitations, by aduise, yea by a speciall ambassade of a person of good credit, to haue some mediation made betwixt these parties being at controuersie. But such was the policy and violence of the one partie in hastily proceeding euen at the first, as no mediation could be heard of or allowed. And yet could not her M. discontinue her good intent, but seeing the cruelties increase, the bloodshedding and murders continued: yea, which was most perilous, the young king and the M. his mother being sodainly assailed, and found without force, were directed & dratone altogether by the very authozs of the troubles, to suffer their name & authoritie to be abused, euen to the killing of the kings owne vnarmed innocent people, the spoyling of his rich towne, the breaking of his best aduised Councillors, the persecuting of his own blood and his nobilitie, the destroying of his faithfull approoued seruants, with many such other heapes of mischiefs: and all these for no other cause but for the particular appetites of some and to breake with violence the ordinances of the realme, specially those which were lately deuised by the long and great councill of the realme, both for quietnesse in matters of religion, and for the reliefe of the Kings estate diuers waies.

And finally, her M. vnderstanding very certainly of an open destruction & subuersion there put already in vze, & likewise intended against all states and persons professing the gospel abroad, her maiestie thought it very needful to thinke of some other meanes of more efficacie, to induce the authozs of those troubles, to giue eare to some reasonable motions of accord, & not to adventure the ruine of a realme for their particular appetites: and therefore determined to send a solenne ambassade of a certaine number of personages of her councill, being of great authoritie, experience, & indifferencie, to repaire into France, to assay how some way might be reasonably deuised for these extremities, by preserving of both parties indifferently, to the seruice of the K. their soueraigne, according to their essays of birth and calling.

But this manner of proceeding also could no wise be liked nor allowed, neither could could answer be had hereunto from the good young king, nor the timorous queene his good mother, without the only direction of that part, which both began and continued the troubles from the beginning.

And whilst her Maiesty was thus well occupied, meaning principally the weale and honour of the king her good brother, and secondly, well towards both the parties being at division, without the preiudice of either: a plaine contrary course and proceeding was vsed against her Maiesty, by the which was made manifest what was further meant and intended by them that had so oftentimes refused to heare her Maiesty speake for mediation and accord. All her Maiesties subiects and marchants as well of her cities of London and Exeter, as of other port towne in the west parts of the realme, being at that very time in diuers parts of the country of Britaine, resorting thither only for trade of marchandises, and ready to returne to their owne ports, were in the same time apprehended, spoiled miserably imprisoned: yea, such as sought to defend themselves, cruelly killed, their ships taken, their goods and marchandise sealed, and nothing sayd nor deuised to charge them, but only furiously calling them all Hugonots, a word though very strange and foolish to many of the honest marchants and poore mariners: yet fully sufficient to declare from whence these commandements came, and what their intent is to prosecute, when their time shall serue them: neither were these spoiles small or few, but in value and number great and many: neither done by priuate fury, but by publike officers who were also maintained by gouernours of the countries: yea none of her maiesties subiects were spared that could be taken, though some escaped with great hazard. Well, heretofore complaint was made where it ought to be, but therein hath bene as small regard had, as was before for robbing of her maiesties owne messengers with her letters from her ambassador, and yet the fact unpunished without any satisfaction for the same: wherein her maiesty surely noteth and pitieth the lacke rather of authority, then of good will in the King or the queene his mother, or the king of Spaine his lieutenant: but seeth manifestly by this and by all other proceedings, in what hard termes the estate of the young king is set, that can neither be permitted to preserue his owne people and seruants, his owne lawes and ordinances, neither to answer to other princes and people in forme of iustice, that which he ought to do.

Upon these and other former dangerous enterprises against her maiesty and her crowne, may it well appeare to all persons of indifferent iudgement, how these violent proceedings in Fraunce, conducted at this time by the duke of Guise and his adherents, do touch the queenes maiesty, much nearer for her state and realme then any other prince of Christendome. Wherefore seeing the authority of the king & the queene his mother with their quiet good counsellors, cannot at this time haue place to direct their affaires neither towards their owne people, nor towards their neighbours, neither can any mediation sought by her maiesty for concord be allowed: but contrariwise, the tender persons of the king and the queene his mother be manifestly abused, and dangerously caryed about for the particular pleasures onely of a few persons, and specially those of Guise, to wast the kings countries, to sacke and spoile his rich and great towne, to kill and murder the multitude of his good and true subiects: and seeing also the quarrell manifestly manifestly published and prosecuted both by writing and otherwise by them, is to subuert the whole profession of true religion through Christendome by force, without mercy, and thereby to stir vp a ciuill bloody lamentable war in all Christendome. Lastly, seeing they which be the authors and maintainers of all these diuisions, are well knowne to the world to be the same, that when time serued them, bent their whole endeouours to offend and diminish the crowne and dignity of this realme of England, and of late time for the exaltation of their particular house, deuised vniuersally to assaile the whole crowne of England by sundry waies, though by Gods goodnesse their practises and counsels turned for that time to their owne confusion: As by the same goodnesse they shall at all times hereafter.

How may her maiesty, without note of manifest unkinnesse to her deare young brother and confederate, of unmercifullnesse to her next neighbours his subiects, of uncarefullnesse to the common quiet of Christendome: and lastly, which is nearest to her selfe, of meere negligence to the surety of her owne estate, her country and people, suffer these few trouble some men first to destroy and shed the blood of a number of Christian people, whose blood by nearnesse of place to her maiesties realme may be stopped, or some wayes saved, next to surpriue & take such townes and hauens, whereby their former long intended and manifest practises against the crowne of this realme, may be most easily for them and dangerously for this realme, put in vze and execution? Wherefore for these reasonable, euident, urgent, and necessarie considerations, and not without the lamentable and continual request of the French kings subiects her maiesties next neighbours, crying to her maiesty onely for defence of themselves, their ports and townes from tyranny and subuersion, during this their kings minority, or at the least during this his vnhabilitie to pacifie these troubles: Her maiesty hath put certaine numbers of her subiects in order both by sea and land, to saue some part of her good brothers innocent people from this tyranny, slaughter and ruine, and to preserve some speciall townes and ports of importance, for the king her good brother, that they come not into the possession of them: who if they had them, might more easily thereby prosecute their old particular practises against this realme, as in times lately past they did manifestly attempt, whereby of necessitie they must needs endanger the perpetuity of the peace betwixt the French king and her maiesty, and so consequently, though against the meaning of the king, deprive her maiesty of her good right to her towne of Caleis and the members thereof: Whereof it behooueth her maiesty, as things be handled to gaue good regard. And in this sort her maiesty doubteth not, but the sinceritie of her doings, tending onely to procure Christian quietnesse by saving of Christian blood, shall well please almighty God, content the king her good brother, when he shall be in estate and liberty to ponder the same indifferently, and serue also for the iust and naturall defence of her selfe, her peoples and countries: and finally by Gods grace shall establish the continuance of some more assured peace and concord betwixt both their maiesties and countries, so as either of them may quietly enjoy and rule their owne. And in the meane tyme, her maiesty assurcth the sayd king, the queene his mother, the king of Nauarre, and all his good counsellours and subiects, that whatsoeuer any malicious or discontented person shall sinisterly report of her intent and doings: Her M<sup>ty</sup>. meaneth nothing herein, but sincerely, & as y<sup>e</sup> necessitie of the time & cause requireth, without usurping any thing, or doing wrong or violence towards any the french kings subiects, protesting before God and all the world, that her meaning is for a necessarie defence onely of the true and good subiects of the french king, which otherwise apparantly in this troublesome time should be violently killed or destroyed: and so consequently her M<sup>ty</sup>. intendeth by all manner of meanes possible, to keepe and continue good peace with the said king and all his countries, and to neglect no reasonable meanes that may procure libertie to himselfe, & quietnesse betwixt his subiects, which then shall succede when it shall please almighty God to giue to the first and chiefe authors of these troubles, grace to content themselves with their owne estates, and to liue within the compasse of their degrees like quiet subiects and fauourers of the common peace and tranquillitie of Christendome. A matter more necessarie at this time to be sought for, rather by coniunction of Christian princes and states in vnitie of mind and loue of peace and concord, then in this sort by sword and fire, by private deuises and secret factions to stir a diuision and ciuill warre in Christendome, vnder the cloke and pretence of religion.

These causes thus published at the request of the French themselves, namely, monsieur de Vidame then capitaine of Petoehauen, the bailife of Roane, the treasurer of Diepe and other, profering the foresaid townes whereof they had charge, vnto her maiestie (if it would please her to further their proceedings of the Gospel, for that her maiestie was true inheritor not onely to those townes, but to all the whole kingdome of Fraunce, as they themselves confessed. In the moneth of September, her maiestie sent a band of her subiects to the towne of Petoehauen in Normandy: who were embarked at Portsmouth, because that haven is most apt for transportation to that place, vpon whose arriuall the townes-men and inhabitants ioyfully surrendered themselves and their towne into the possession of the Queenes maiestie, which was kept by Englishmen from this moneth of September in Anno 1562. vnto the 29. of July then next following in the yeare 1563, as more at large shall be shewed. For the conduction of such forces as were to be sent ouer, her maiestie ordained the lord Ambrose Dudley earle of Warwick to be her principall lieutenant, capitaine generall, chiefe leader and gouernour of her said subiects, that should in such wise passe ouer into Normandy. Hereupon the said earle the 17. of October, tooke shipping at Portsmouth in the haven there, being aboard himselfe in the Queenes ship called the New barge, and setting forward sailed all that afternoone, and the night following directly towards Petoehauen: but in the morning when he was within twentie miles of the towne of Petoehauen, the wind suddenly changed contrarie to his course, so that being driuen to returne, about the next midnight he arriued in the Dotones, and there remained at anchor till the next morning, and then was set on land by boate at Sandon castle besides Deale, and the same day at night came to Douer, and there lay till the 28. of October, and then taking ship againe sailed forth, but finding the wind nothing prosperous to his course, after he had lien all that night and day following, tolling on the seas, he was constrained backe againe to the haven of Douer, where he remained till the 28. of October, and on the 29. he landed at Newhauen, where he was most ioyfully receiued with a great peale of artillerie. The 30. of October, there came to Newhauen from Diepe 50. light hoſemen Scots, brought by one of maiſter Killigrewes ſeruants. The laſt of October, the earle of Warwikes commiſſion was proclaimed in Latin, Engliſh, and French, by Blew Mantell purſuant at armes, which being ended, his lordſhip went into the church, & there ſir Adrian Poinings knight Maſhall, gaue him his oth, and then my lord gaue the ſaid ſir Adrian his oth, and after him were ſworn Cuthbert Vaughan controller, Iohn Fiſher knight poſter, William Bromfield maiſter of the ordinance, William Robinſon, Walter Bailiffe, and captaine T. Wood clarke of the counſel. The ſecond of Nouember, the earle of Warwike with the knight maſhall and the controller, rode out of Newhauen to Hauteuille, and ſo towards Mondouille accompanied with all the hoſemen Engliſh and Scottiſh, and a thouſand footmen. The Scottiſh men and Montgomeries band paſſed ſooth and ſkirmiſhed with them of Mondouille, and the Scots brought away with them a bootie of 300. ſheepe, but in the moyning they were returned backe againe by commaundement of the earle of Warwike. Maiſter Controllers ſouldiers went as far as Harſlew, and there ſkirmiſhed with them of the garrilon, but without any hurt to either part. The 4. of Nouember, a barke of Newhauen belonging to Francis Clarke, brought into the hauen of the ſame towne 4. Britains laden with Caſcoine wine to the quantitie of 200. tuns, which they meant to haue brought to the enemies, but was diſcharged in Newhauen, and ſtood the Engliſh in good ſtade. The 6. of Nouember, a great alarme was raiſed in the towne of Newhauen, for vpon the hills on the north ſide of the towne, the Keingraue & other ſhewed themſelues with 2000. footmen, & 500. hoſemen: and therewith the Keingraue ſent a trumpet to the towne, to aduertile the L. lieutenant, that he was there on the hills, & that if it might pleaſe him to promiſe vpon his honour & by the faith of a gentleman that he might come and go ſafe, he would be glad to come and ſee him, and talke with him. Wherevpon y lord lieutenant taking with him certaine captains and gentlemen, rode ſooth of the towne, and ſent beſore him ſir Adrian Poinings the maſhall with Stephen Medcalfe her maiſties trumpeter, vnto y Keingraue, who talking with him, returned and met with the lord lieutenant, who therewith paſſed forward, and meeting with the Keingraue, they embraced each other, and conferred together: and the Keingraue told the lord lieutenant, that he was come to be his neighbour, with ſuch other merry ſpeech, and after taking leaue each of other, they returned. The countie Montgomerie and monſieur Beauuoys had ſome talke alſo with the Keingraue, caſting out bitter words in reprooſe of the duke of Guife, and other whom they hated. The Keingraue comming backe to his army, forayed all the countrie, and dyoue away the more part of all the cat-tell that they could find, and comming to the church of Hauteuille, where an hundred and ſiftie of Montgomeries band lay, they ſkirmiſhed with them, and in the end Montgomeries ſouldiers were forced to retire, and abandon the place, & came to Newhauen: but the next morrow they returned, tooke the church, and kept it againſt the enemies as afore.

The 11. of Nouember, a proclamation was made in the name of the lord lieutenant, lieutenant, as well for good orders to be kept by the soldiers against the French inhabitants of the towne, & reforming of certaine greivances whereof the French had made complaint, as also for their comming to church to heare common praier and preaching at due times, for the avoiding of unlawfull games, &c. The 12. of November, there went out of Newhaven towards Hartlew three bandes of French men, containing about sixe hundred footemen, and suddenly they were beset by the Almains & French men of the garrison of Hartlew, so that the French men of Newhaven were driven to take the village of Graule, where they maintained the skirmish for the space of two howers, till the lord lieutenant sent forth with the controller the number of one thousand footemen, and all the English and Scottissh horsemen, and maister Beauvoys with diuerse French horsemen who comming before Hartlew, fell in skirmish with the enimies, to whose succour there issued forth of Hartlew a great number of the Almains both horsemen and footemen: but the Englishmen behaved themselves so valiantly, that they deate them out of the field into the towne: and the Englishmen returned to Newhaven with honoꝝ, hauing not lost past eight of their soldiers, that were slaine, and six hurt.

The 13. of November, a pinnesse of the French men that belonged to Newhaven, being gone forth the night before, brought into the haven a ship laden with Rochell wine five and twentie tuns, that was bound to the enemies. The 14. of November, another ship fraught with twentie tuns of Calcoune wine was brought in as a prise, taken by a barke of Newhaven. The 17. of November, a proclamation was made concerning orders taken by the lord lieutenant, that no English man nor French man should shoote off any harquebut within the towne, nor that any French man, except monsieur Beauvoys, or monsieur Briquemaule, or their companies should be out of their lodgings after nine of the clocke at night till the next morning on paine of death, except in alarmes.

The 23. of November, the Reingraue was scene on the north hills of the towne with fower score horsemen, wherupon the Scottissh horsemen and three bands of footemen issued out, marched vp towards the same hills in hope to meete with the enemies, but they were retired towards Hondcuille, and so nothing was done.

The 25. of November, a soldier was hanged in the market place in Newhaven, and therewith proclamation made that none should take any thing forcibly from the French, on paine of death. The same day came into the haven hoves and boates laden with wine, cider, parris, wheate, becke, bicker, meate, &c. The same day also there landed at Newhaven sixe hundred soldiers under the leading of Auerie Darcie, Reignald Higate, and William Twedie. The same day the Queenes ship called the Hare comming from Portsmouth, arrived at Newhaven, and in her came sir Iohn Portinarie, a man of great experience in fortification, they were by the way assailed by a French ship of ninie tuns and better, but they that were aboard the Hare banquished the enimies, tooke the same ship, and brought her with them, being laden with wines. The same day sir Iohn Moore landed at Newhaven, bringing ouer with him five hundred soldiers for a supply of the garrison.

The 8. of December, monsieur de Beauvoys, capitaine Francis Somerset, and capitaine captaine Edward Horley, with diuers other captaines and gentlemen, rode to the Reingraue, lying at a faire house not far from Mondouille, where they dined with him, had great cheere, and returned to Petowhauen. The Reingraue sent for a present to the earle of Warwike a great horse, very faire, with saddle and bridle, effeemed to be well woorth an hundred pound. The same day at night, the double Rose with other boates passed out of the haven, Edward Dudley and captaine Iohn Warde, being aboard with other to the number of an hundred good soldiers, sailing downe the riuer, landed besides Tankerville, and lay close all that night in a wood: in the morning monsieur Bimarre ensigne-bearer to the countie Montgomerie, with six or seauen French men vnarmed went to the castle gate, & there fell in talke with monsieur Dimence, that was captaine of that fortresse, hauing about him ten soldiers. Whilst they were thus in talke, the English men and French men comming forth of the wood that was there at hand, reared up their ladders at the breach, which was made the summer before, and entering by the same, came downe into the base court. Which thing when the French soldiers that kept talke at the castell gate perceiued, the captaine beholding as good as three score armed men within the castell at his backe, he suddenly yeilded himselfe, and in this sort was the castell taken, and the captaine brought prisoner to Petowhauen. The 12. of December, the earle of Warwike, monsieur de Beauuois & monsieur de Bricquemault, with all the horsemen, and 3000. footemen, passed forth of Petowhauen vnto Hartlew, out of which towne issued 700. Reisters of the retinue of countie Reingraue, & 300. footemen, who fell in skirmish with the French & English very hotly, but the English drave them to the gates of Hartlew, & slue them there, and vpon the walls of the towne: yet was there not slaine past seuen of the English part. The 17. of December, the countie Montgomerie and sir Hugh Paulet arrived at Petowhauen in one of the Quenes ships called the Aide.

Whilst things passed thus in Normandy, there ended his life at home the honourable baron and famous captaine, William lord Grey of Wilton, knight of the most noble order of the garter, at that present gouernor of Barwike, & warden of the East marches against Scotland, he deceased the 25. of December at Cheshunt in Hertfordshire.

The 26. of December, the county de Montgomerie tooke shipping at Petowhauen rode, accompanied with fouer hundred harquebussiers Frenchmen, and sailed to Diepe there to be gouernor of that towne.

The first of January, were apprehended captaine Blondell, captaine Moucombel, monsieur de Mainie, and Vitanua, with others, for some conspiracy or traiterous practise which they went about and had contriued.

The same day captaine Edward Horley with 200. souldiers, and captaine Francis Blunt with 100. tooke shipping at Petowhauen rode, and sailed to Diepe, there to remaine with the county Montgomerie.

The ninth of January, a great tempest of wind and thunder happened in the towne of Leicester, which vncovered 411. baires of houses, and ouerthrew many.

The sixteenth of January, the castle of Tankerville was surrendered to the Reingraue, after he had laine about it eight dayes, with two thousand horsemen and and footemen. The 19. of Januarie, there landed at Newhauen capitaine Tremaine with sixtie horsemen very well appointed to serve there. The 24. of Januarie, Francis Clarke Frenchman arrived at Newhauen with two tall ships of his owne, right well appointed for the wars, bringing with him three rich prizes.

The fift of Februarie, two ships of Britaines laden with Calcoine wine, butter, becon, salt, and other victuals, were brought into Newhauen by a shalop of Billebeuf, that was resiant with other Frenchmen in Newhauen, and had taken these two vessels as they were going to victuall the enemies. The first of Februarie, three mightie ships of war belonging to Francis Clarke, brought into Newhauen three rich prizes laden with leeks, bassards, sugar, oranges, graines, and other marchandises. This Clarke had not bene forth past five weekes at this time, and yet he had got aboute 18. prizes well worth the summe of 50000. pounds. The 7. of Februarie, was Hundeto summoned by an herault sent from the french admirall, monsieur de Chatillon, The 8. of that moneth, the said admirall came before Hundeto with 6000. horsemen, Keisers, and other of his own retinues, beside footemen, and 1000. horsemen of the countries thereabout, and about five of the clocke at night, there was a great peale of ordinance shot off at Newhauen for a welcome to the said admirall.

Prizes brought into Newhauen.

The 12. of Februarie, the french galliasse of Newhauen passing forth and working about Hundeto to seeke adventures in hope of luerie, by reason the lord admirall of France lay thereby at Tonque, roade at an anchor, whilest some that were aboard in her went aland to gaine somewhat of the enemies, but they within Hundeto perceiuing this, made out their great galliasse with 50. mariners and soldiers, who coming upon the galliasse of Newhauen, put her in great danger of taking, but waiping anchor drew toward the shore, tooke in the rest of their companie, and stood at their defence, behauing themselves so well, that continuing in fight aboute a long hower, at length they ouercame their enemies, slew 7. of them, wounded 37. tooke their galliasse, and brought her to Newhauen with thirtene bels, diuers coapes and church ornaments, sterpe, and other spoiles which they had got abroad in the countrie, together with 43. prisoners, and the artillerie of the galliasse. The fourteenth of Februarie, there came from the lord admirall of France lying then at Tonque, monsieur de Roben and monsieur de Grandemont a knight of the order, monsieur Telegnie the admirals sonne in law, & diuers other french gentlemen to confer with the lord lieutenant, who received them right gladly, and made them great cheere: they remained there till the 18. and then departed and went to Cane, whither the said lord admirall was remooued, and had entred the towne, preparing to besiege the castell. The same day monsieur Briquemaul and sir Nicholas Throckmorton knight arrived at Newhauen. The admirall Chatillon kept the castell of Cane besieged, within the which was the marques Dalbeuf, there were sent vnto him from Newhauen the sixe and twentieth sir Nicholas Throckmorton, monsieur Brique-maul and monsieur Beauvoys with a thousand souldiers french, and as many English: so wit, capitaine Zouch, capitaine Twedie, capitaine Higate, each of them two hundred, capitaine Iohn Warde, capitaine Parkenson, capitaine Saule, and ma-

Montgomery taketh a shalope, he goeth to Cane.

The castle of Cane surrendered to the admirall.

The French appointed to depart from Newhauen.

Mr Wheeler, capitaine Fisher lieutenant with his band, each of the with his hundred, and capitaine Pelham with the labozers, were embarked in the roade of Petowhauen, and sailed forth towards Cane to come to the siege, which the Admirall of France had layd to the castle there. The same day, as county Montgomerie had embarked at the hauen of Diepe in an English vessell, and was coming towards Petowhauen, there came from thence three shalops, by the appointment of the Reingraue, which made towards Montgomerie, whose meaning when he perceived, he set upon the strongest of the same shalops, so that there followed a sharpe conflict betwixt them, but in the end the victory fell to Montgomerie, the shalope being taken, the capitaine and master slain, and three English兵 soldiers rescued, which the said shalops had taken. Montgomerie here with arriving at Petowhauen, and bringing with him his wife was ioyfully received, and went aboard againe, and sailed to Cane there to conferre with the admirall. The first of March, they began to batter Cane in such wise, that about foure of the clocke in the after noone they within the towne began to parley, but it took no effect. And then went off the artillery againe till night, and in the morning, the battery esloozes began, and before that two tires of the sayd artillery had gone off, they within offered againe to parley, and finally agreed by composition to yeeld, and so that same day the castle was surrendered unto the French admirall, and the marques Dalbeuse and other that had kept that place departed.

The third of March, the towne of Bayeur was yeelded to the admirall, and on the morrow following, Falaise, and after Saint Lo, with diuerse other townes and castles yeelded unto him.

The 10. of March, the great galley and the foysles were sent from Petowhauen with a canon, and shot powder, &c. to Hunkew, where they met with Monsieur de Mouy, that came thither with a faire company of horsemen, and diuerse footemen, French: and of the Englishmen, capitaine Tutie with his two hundred, and capitaine Fisher with his hundred. The canon was immediately planted, and shot off a fire times. Whereupon they within began to parley, and in the end agreed to yeeld by the castle unto Monsieur de Mouy with condition: and so left the castle unto Monsieur de Mouy, whereby his souldiers as well English as others gained greatly by the spoile: whereas Monsieur de Beauuoy had by the admirall Chatillons commandement, charged by proclamation, all strangers, foreigners, and French souldiers to depart the towne of Petowhauen by the 23. of March last past: and that all other, hauing their wiues and families, should depart with them, or within foure dayes after, to giue ayde for the keeping of the townes of Hunkew, Cane, Bayeur, Falaise, Saint Lo, and other places, lately brought under the obedience and authority of the prince of Condy, vnder paine for making default, to be taken as good prisoners of warre, to those that should apprehend them. Proclamation was also thereupon made in the lord lieutenants name, the 26. of March, that it should be lawfull to the queens maiesties subiects to apprehend and take as their good and lawfull prisoners, all such as contrarie to the former proclamation should remaine in the towne of Petowhauen after five of the clocke after noone of the day next following (those persons onely excepted whose names were enrolled, remaining with the lord lieutenants Secretarie.

The 7. of April the Keingraue with 400. horsemen, and about 500. footmen, came downe the hill, betwixt Saint Adolphes and Englefield, where sir Hugh Pawlet knight met with him, by appointment of the lord lieutenant, accompanied with 40. horsemen, and 1000. English footmen, and after they had talked together, sir Hugh Pawlet returned into Petowhauen, and the Keingraue to Mondouille.

On Easter euen, two souldiers that serued vnder captaine Parkenson were hanged in Petowhauen, for running away to the Keingraue.

The first of May, Garter king at armes, arrived at Petowhauen, bringing with him the garter to Ambrose earle of Warwike the lord lieutenant, chosen on Saint Georges day last past, to be one of that most noble order.

The 17. of May, proclamation was made, that all manner of furniture and apparell, appertaining to ships, within the garrison, haue, or roade of the towne of Petowhauen, should be brought in, or a note to be given thereof in writing to the lord lieutenant and counsell there.

The 22. of May, about one of the clocke in the morning, the Keingraue with 500. horsemen, and 22. ensignes of footmen, came downe to a village called Theure, neare vnto the new fort, which by order of the lord lieutenant was lately before begun to be built. The enemies meaning was, to haue taken the same fort by a sudden assault, but the English scouters gaue intelligence to the lord lieutenant thereof, who incontinently going to the bulwarke Ryall, set out by the Posterne captaine Ward with his 100. souldiers, and captaine Parkenson with his 100. to passe to the fort, there to be an ayde and defence to them that lay in the same. About thre of the clocke in the morning the Keingraue suddenly with his bands of horse and footmen, gaue them in the fort a hot alarme, and immediately the earle of Warwike came in charge to captaines, Read, Appleyard, Tutty, Souch, Antwilell, Warde, Morton, and Parkenson, hauing with them 1000. footmen and 200. horsemen, to set vpon the enemies in the village of Theure, neare adioynning vnto the said new fort, where the English souldiers beat backe their enemies, slue and tooke of them to the number of an hundred, besides thirty faire horses, and an ensigne, and set fire on the towne, because the enemies should not come to encampe therein as their purpose was.

Alarme giuen to the new fort by Newhauen.

The 26. of May, the Frenchmen in number aboue three thousand horsemen and footmen, came downe towards the wind-mills, neare to the bulwarke called Saint Adolphes, against whom the English horsemen and footmen issued forth of the towne, giuing them a hot skirmish, where were slaine two hundred of the French, besides two hundred and aboue that were hurt. Amongst the English, captaine Tremayne and about some twelue persons more were slaine: but the French were diuised to retire. The first of June, at seuen of the clocke at night, the Keingraue having layd in the village of Theure an ambush of fire hundred horsemen, and fiftene hundred footmen, there came downe also betwene the abbey and the village called Englefield towards the towne, the number of a thousand footmen, which began a very hot skirmish, first at the new fort, comming euen hard to the ditches, where the Englishmen manfully encountered them. Herewith also, the Keingraue

The 7. of June, the first canon-shot light within the towne of New-hauen, neare to the bulwarke of Saint Andrewes. The ninth of June, arrived at New-hauen three Captaines with their bands of an hundred the peece, being of the garrison of Warwike. Also the same day landed there Edward Randoll, appointed to be knight Marshall. For you must vnderstand that sir Adrian Poinings being knight Marshall, vpon his returne into England went not backe againe: and then was sir Thomas Finch of Kent appointed to go ouer to supply the roomth of knight Marshall, who making his prouision readie, sent ouer his brother Erasmus Finch to haue charge of his band, and his kinsman Thomas Finch to be prouost marshall, whilst he staying till he had euery thing in a readinesse to passe ouer himselfe, at length imbarqued in one of the Quenes shippes, called the Greyhound, hauing there aboord with him besides three score and five of his owne retinue, foure and fortie other Gentlemen, two of them being brethren to the Lord Wentworth, to wit, Iames Wentworth, and Iohn Wentworth with diuerse others, who in the whole (accounting the mariners) amounted to the number of two hundred persons and byward: and as they were on the further coast towards New-hauen, they were by contrarie wind and foule weather diuen backe againe toward the coast of England, and plying towards Ric, they forced the captaine of the shippe a very good sea-man, named William Maline, and also the maister and mariners, to thrust into the hauen before the tyde, and so they all perished, seuen of the meaner sort onely excepted, whereof three dyed shortly after they came on land. After this mischauice, Edmond Randoll was appointed knight Marshall.

The 15. of June, the captaines Richard Saunders, and William Saul, with their bands of an hundred souldiers a peece, and captaine Drurie with two hundred arrived at New-hauen, and the next day after arrived captaine Roberts with an other hundred souldiers. On the seuenteenth day sir Francis Knowles, vice-chamberlaine to the Quenes maiesties house, landing at New-hauen, sent to victuall the state of the towne.

The 18. of June, two souldiers were executed for drawing weapon against their captaine.

The 28. of June, the French men came downe to the village of Theure, and there very neare to the fort, beganne a skirmish with the English men: there were of them tenne ensignes of footemen, and two hundred horsemen, this skirmish lasted three houres, and yet not past foure persons slaine. The night following, they placed five canons betwixt the Towne and the bricke-billes, and likewise other peeces of Artillerie at the foresaid Village of theire, so that they shot both into the towne and fort. The first of July about midnight, they issued forth of their trenches, and skirmished with the English scouts, drove them under the bulwarke of Saint Adressle, and there perceiving that the Englishmen had provided to sally out, after a long skirmish they retired. About the third of July, there landed nine hundred soldiers well appointed all in yellow clokes, and blew, Captaine Sanders was hurt in the legges whereof he dyed. The twelfth of July, about foure of the clocke in the morning, the French laid batterie to the Bulwarke of Saint Adressles, continuing the same all that day. They also dismounted the same day the Ordinance in the steeple of Newhaven, and beat downe the great bell, cleane defacing the steeple: the same evening, was William Robinson squire, baylife of Newhaven, slaine with a shot, and William Bromfield, maister of the ordinance hurt, whereof he died shortly after.

The 14. of July, sir Hugh Pawlet knight landed at Newhaven, bringing with him eight hundred soldiers. The same day came downe the Frenchmen to the number of 3000. even hard to the gates of the towne, beating the English men out of their trenches, but in the end they were forced to retire, and not past twentie English men slaine, and about an hundred hurt: but the French lost (as was thought) about foure hundred horsemen and footmen. The same day, the little Galliasse called the Fore, went out of Newhaven, fraught with fire men, to flanke alongst the shore, and to beate the French men with her shot, but a line-slope fell into a barrill of powder and set it on fire together with the vessel, so that she suddenly sunke, and all that were aboard in her were lost, saving sixteen that saved themselves by swimming.

The 21. of July, the Constable of France, and many other lords of France came to the abbey of Grauille, where the marshall Brissac was lodged, who had the generall charge in the army, before the comming of the laid Constable.

France came

The 23. of July, the Constable came to the trench that was cast over against the bulwarke of Saint Adressle, alongst by the sea side, and sent his trumpet to summon the towne. The Lord lieutenant appointed sir Hugh Pawlet to go forth and make the answer in his name, which was in effect, that the Queens maiestie had appointed him and others to keepe the Towne, and therefore they meant not to deliver it to any other person, without her Graces commaundement. The English men were no sooner departed, but that the enemies having planted eight canons in batterie against the castle and bulwarke of the haven, caused the same to be shot off, continuing the batterie untill the eight and twentieth of July.

The 28. of July, the prince of Condy, and the duke of Montpensier, came to the campe and alighted at the Constables lodging, went from thence to the trenches to relieue the marshall Montmorancie, and to supplie his roomth, whilst he might in the meane time goe to suppe with his father, and so to take his rest: Monsieur Desree, and the other that had charge about the planting and ordering of the artillerie, used such diligence, and were so earnestly called vpon and encouraged by the prince of Condy, continually remaining in the trenches, that on the 27. in the morning, the artillerie beganne to batter the bulwarke of Saint Adressle and other places. This was not done without great daunger of the pioners and men of warre that guarded them: for as the French desperately made these approches, they were made by the English gunners to tell the bitter fruite thereof: but such was the multitude of the French men that were now assembled in hope to recouer that towne, (which being possessed by the English, cut off all trafique from Roane, Paris and other places) that with their generall ayde, and drawing the water downe to the sea, the marishes were made passeable and firme ground, which to men of great experience was thought a thing impossible. The Castle, the walls, and other defences of the Towne, were battered, breaches made, and the trench, which before the coming of the Constable, was but brought to the point over against the bulwark of Saint Adressle, was now within fower daies advanced neere hand the space of two miles, vpon the cauley or breach which was all of stone, without any earth to couer them, so that they were driuen to make the best shift they could with wool-lackes, sand-bags, baskets, and fagots. Yet all this had neuer come to passe, without infinite slaughter, and farre more losse of French blood, if the great mortalitie of pestilence (which entred the Towne about the beginning of Sommer) through a venimous infection, had not so greatly increased, that it slue daily great numbers of men, so that the streets lay euē full of dead corpes, not able to be remooued, by reason of the multitude that perished. And now the shot of the canon, lying within a fere an twentie paces of the Towne, was so terrible, as the like had not bene lightly heard of, and sundrie breaches there were, which were already made, namely, two verie great and easie to be entered: All these dangers and miseries notwithstanding the Earle of Marwicke with his Capitaines and souldiers, in couragious order, stood at those severall breaches, ready to defend the same, if the enimies had presumed to haue giuen the assault, which when the Constable perceiued, he caused a trumpet to sound the blast of emparley, that talke mought be had for the concluding of a composition betwixt both the parties, to auoyd the imminent slaughter and effusion of blood: which offer seeming not vnnecesse, both parties concluded that parley should be had. The eight and twentieth of July therefore, the Constable came to the end of the trenches next to the towne, where sir Mawrice Denis, treasurer of the towne, sir Hugh Pawler, capitaine Horley, capitaine Pelham, capitaine Iohn Shute prouost marshall, and Nicholas Malby Secretary to the lord Lieutenant, came forth and passed ouer the haue to commune with him, and during the parley betwixt them, a truce was accorded, and assented to by both partes. But the Constable tooke vpon him to haue onely authority to accept or refuse such conditions as should be offered or agreed vpon by the English commissioners in this treatie: and so at length they passed certaine articles in forme as followeth. First, that the earle of Marwicke should render the Towne of Newhauen into the hands of the Constable of France, with all the artillerie and munitions of warre then being in the Towne, belonging to the French king and his subiects. Item, he should leaue the ships that were in the Towne at that present, belonging to the king or his subiects, with all their their furniture, and generally all such merchandize and other things, being at that present within that Towne, as either belonged to the king or his subiects. Item, the said Earle should presently deliuer into the hands of the Constable, the great Tower of the said haven, so that the souldiers thereof enter not into the Towne: and that the said earle should deliuer fower such hostages as the said Constable should name. Item, that the next day by eight of the clocke in the morning, the said earle should withdraw his souldiers from the fort, to deliuer it immediately into the hands of the said Constable, or his deputies, at the said houre. Item, that all prisoners should be deliuered on either side, without paying any ranfome. Item, that the Constable should for his part suffer the said Earle of Warwike and all those that were in garrison in the said Newhaven to depart, with all things whatsoever that belonged to the queene of England or her subiects. Item, that for the departure aswell of the said Earle, as the removing of his souldiers and other things: the said Constable agreed to give them five dayes, to begin the twentieth nine of July, during the which they might frankly take and carie away the said things. Item, the said Constable did likewise permit, that all the ships and English vessels appointed for the portage and conveying away of the said things, should safely and freely passe in, to, and fro the said haven, without any stay or impeachment, either by the French or other. The former hostages were appointed to be maister Oliver Maners, brother to the Earle of Rutland, Captaine Pelham, Captaine Horsey, and Captaine Leighton. In witness whereof, the said Lords, the Constable of France, and Earle of Warwike signed these articles, the eight and twentieth of July. The last of Julie, the most part of the Englishmen tooke ship and departed homewards: for glad was he that could get soonest out of that burtholsome ayre: manie sick persons yet were left behinde, impotent, and not able to helpe themselves a shippe boorde, the miserie whereof Edward Randolph esquier, high marshall of the Towne (who was appointed to tarrie and see the buttmost of the composition accomplished) perceiving, mooved with naturall pittie of his countreyemen relinquished without comfort, caused the said sick persons to be caried aboord, not sparing his owne shoulders, at that time feeble and full of the plague, himselfe and his men still bearing and helping the poore creatures on ship boord: a rare fact, worthy reward, and no doubt in remembrance with God, the true recorder of mercifull deserts. Beside the meaner sort of those that died at Newhaven of the pestilence, during the siege, I finde noted as chiefe, Cuthbert Vaughan Comptroller of the Towne, Francis Somerset cousin to the Earle of Worcester, Auerie Darcie brother to the Lord Darcie, John Zouche, brother to the Lord Zouche, Edward Ormesby, Thomas Drurie alias Poignard, Richard Croker, John Cockson, Thomas Kenish, John Prowde, William Saule, Wilfride Answell, these of the plague. There were diuerse also that were slaine in the fildes, as both the Tremaynes brethren, Nicholas and Andrew, Captaine Richard Saunders, with master Robinson and master Bromfield, also one Leighton a gentleman, and diuers other.

As yee haue heard, the plague of pestilence being in the Towne of Petowauen, through the number of soldiers that returned from thence into England, the infection therof spread into diuers parts of this realme, but especialy the citie of London was so infected, that in the same whole yeere, that is to say, from the first of Januarie, 1562. till the last of December, 1563. there died in the City and liberties thereof containing, 108. parishes of all diseases, 20. M. 3. C. 72. and of the plague, (being part of the number aforesaid) 17. M. 4. C. 4. persons. And in out parishes adioyning to the same citie, being 11. parishes, died of all diseases in the whole yeere, 3. M. 2. C. 88. persons, and of them, of the plague, 2. M. 7. C. 32. persons so that the whole number of all that died of all diseases, as well within the Citie and liberties, as in the out parishes, was 23. M. 6. Tempest at London.

The 8. of July, in the morning, hapned a great tempest of lightning & thunder, wherethrough a woman and three kine were slaine in the Couent garden neere to Charing crosse. At the same time in Essex a man was toyne to peeces as he was carrying hay, his barne was bozne downe, and his hay bzent: both houses and trees were rent in many places.

The counsell of king Philip at Burels commanded proclamation to be made in Antwerp and other places, that no English ship with clothes should come into any places of their low countries: their colour was (as they said) the danger of the plague, which was that time in London, and other places of England: notwithstanding, they would gladly haue gotten our woollens: other causes they alledged, as the raising of imposts as well vpon goods inwards as outwards, as well vpon Englishmen as vpon strangers, &c. Also for that in the first parliament of the Queenes maiestie, by a statute then made, diuers wares and commodities were forbidden to be brought into this Realme out of Flaunders or other places being wrought there, which was done to the end to let our subiects a worke heere, as by the statute doth appeare, for that no man English or stranger might ship out any white clothes vnderest. being of the price aboue fower pound, without licence, &c. but the Queenes maiestie through sute of our marchant aduenturers, caused the wooll fleete to be discharged, and our cloth fleete was sent to Em-den in east Friseland about Easter next following, in Ann. 1564.

the poore Citizens of London.

Forasmuch as the plague of pestilence was so hot in the citie of London, there was no Terme kept at Michaelmasse: to be short, the poore Citizens of London, were this yeere plagued with a three fold plague, pestilence, scarcitie of money and dearth of victuals: the miserie whercof were too long heere to write, no doubt the poore remember it, the rich by flight into the countries made shift for themselves.

Earthquake.

An earthquake was in the month of September in diuers places of this realme, specially in Lincolne and Northamptonshire.

Lightning and thunder.

From the first day of December, till the 12. was such continuall lightning and thunder, especially the same 12. day at night, that the like had not bene seene nor heard by any man then liuing.

In the month of December, was driuen on the Shore at Grimsbie in Lincolne-shire, a monstrosous fish, in length 19. yardes, his taile fifteene foote broad
and

and five yards betwene his eyes, twelue men stood vpright in his mouth to get the oyle.

For that the plague was not fully ceased in London, Hillarie Terme was kept at Hertford castell besides Ware.

This yecre an honorable & ioyfull peace was concluded, betwixt the Queenes Maiestie and the French King, their Realmes, Dominions, and Subiects, which peace was proclaimed with sound of trumpet, before her Maiestie, in her Castle of Windlesore, then being present the French Ambassadors. Also the same peace was proclaimed at London on the 13. day of Aprill. And shortly after the Queenes Maiestie sent the right Honorable sir Henrie Carie lord Hunsdon, accompanied with the lord Strange, besides diuers knights and gentlemen vnto the French king, with the noble order of the Garter, who lying then at Lyons, he there presented vnto him the said order, and Garter king at armes vntied him therewith, obseruing the ceremonies in that behalfe due, &c.

The plague (thanks be to God) being cleane ceased in London, both Easter and Midsummer Terme were kept at Chelshminster.

Through the earnest sute of the Armourers there was on the vigile of S. Peter a watch in the citie of London, which did onely stand in the highest streets, as Cheape, Cornhill, and so forth to Aldgate, which watch was to the commons of the citie as chargeable, as when in times past it had bene commendable done.

The 5. of August, the Queenes maiesty in her progresse came to the University of Cambridge, and was of all the students (being inuested according to their degrees taken in the Schooles) honourably and ioyfully receiued in the kings Colledge, where she did lye during her continuance in Cambridge. The daies of her abode were passed in scholasticall exercises of Philosophie, Physicke, and Diuinity: the nights in Comedies and Tragedies let forth partly by the whole University, and partly by the students of the kings Colledge.

The marques of Baden returneth.

Certaine houses in Cornhill, being first purchased by the citizens of London at their charges for certaine thousands of pounds, were in the moneth of February cryed by the bel-man, and afterward sold to such persons as should take them downe and carry them from thence, which was so done in the monethes of April and May next following. And then the ground being made plaine at the charges also of the city (hauing cost them one way and other, more then five thousand pound) possession thereof was by certaine aldermen in name of the whole citizens, giuen to the right worshipfull sir Thomas Gresham knight, agent to the Queenes highnesse, there to build a place for marchants to assemble in at his owne proper charges, who on the seuenth of June layd the first stone of the foundation, being bricke, and forthwith the workemen followed vpon the same with such diligence, that by the moneth of Nouember in the yeare of our Lord 1567. the same was couered with slate.

The Burse in Cornhill.

And on the 22. day of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1568. the marchants of London, left their meetings in Lombard streete, at such times as they had accustomed there to meete, and this day they came into the new Burse, builded by sir Thomas Gresham, as is afore shewed.

The commissioners before named appointed for the matters of slaunders, keeping their diet at Byrges agreed to referre the whole matter to the princes on both sides, and if they could not agree, then the marchants to haue forty dayes to repaire home with their merchandise, and in the meane time, all things to stand as they were then. Our commissioners departed from Byrges about the 26. of June.

The 31. of August, the Queenes maiesty in her progreffe came from Woodstocke to the Uniuersity of Oxford, and was of all the students, which had looked for her comming thither two yeares, so honorably and ioyfully receiued, as either their loyalty towards the Queenes maiesty, or the expectation of their friends did require. Concerning orders in disputation, and other academicall exercises, they agreed much with those, which the Uniuersity of Cambridge had vsed two yeares before. Comedies also and Tragedies were played in Christs Church, where the Queenes highnesse lodged. Among the which, the Comedy entituled

Missfortune at Oxford.

Palemon and Arcet, made by maister Edwards of the Queenes chappell, had such tragicall successe as was lamentable: for at that time by the fall of a wall and a paire of staires, and great pzeale of the multitude, three men were slaine.

The sixt of September, after disputations, the Queene at the humble sute of certaine of her nobilitie, and the king of Spaines Ambassadors, made a briefe oration in Latine to the Uniueritie, but so wise and pithe, as England may reioyce that it hath so learned a pynce, and the Uniueritie may triumph, that they haue to noble a patronesse.

The sixt of September after dinner, her grace coming from Christs Church ouer Carfax, and so to Saint Maries, the scholiers standing in order according to their degrees, euen to the east gate, certaine doctors of the Uniueritie did ride before in their scarlet gownes and hoodes, and maisters of Art in blacke gownes and hoodes. The Maior also named maister Williamus with certaine of his brethren, to the number of fourteene or fiftene, did ride before her in scarlet to the ende of Magdalen bridge, where their liberties ended: but the doctors and maisters went forward still to Shot-ouer, a mile and more out of Oxford, because their liberties extended so farre, and there after Orations made, her highnesse with thanks to the whole Uniueritie, bade them farewell, and rode to Ricote to maister Norrice house an eight miles from Oxford.

Shane Oneale, who had most traiterously rebelled against the queenes maiestie in Ireland, and had done many great outrages in the parts of Ulster, was this yeare with his great losse manfully repelled from the siege of Dundalke by the garrison thereof, and afterward through the great valiancy of sir Henry Sidney knight of the order, and lord deputie of Ireland, he was so discomfited in sundry confus'ds, with the losse of 3500. of his men, that now foreseeing his declination to be imminent, he determined to put a collar about his necke, and disguising himselfe, to repaire to the lord deputy, and patiently to require his pardon to haue his life. But Neil Mackeuer his secretary, who had incited him to this rebellion perswaded him first to trie and treat the friendship of certaine wild Scots that then lay incamped in Clan Iboy, vnder the conducting of Alexander Oge and Mee Gilliam Buske, whose father and vncle Shane Oneale had lately killed in an overthrowe giuen by the Scots: neuertheless, he well liking this perswasion, went to the layd campe the second of June, where after a dissembled entertainment, and quaffing of wine, Gilliam Buske burning with desire of reuenge of his fathers and vncles death, and ministring quarrelling talke, issued out of the tent, and made a fray vpon Oneales men, & then gathering together his Scots in a thong, suddenly entered the tent againe, who there with their slaughter swords, betwix in peeces Shane Oneale, his secr. tary, and all his company, except a very few which escaped by flight.

Maximilian
the emperor knight of the garter.

Maximilian Emperour the second of that name, being elected into the most honorable order of the garter, the honourable Thomas earle of Suffex, &c. knight of the same order, was appointed by the Queenes maiesty to go vnto the sayd emperour with the sayd order of the garter, who being honorably accompanied with Roger lord North, sir Thomas Mildmay knight, Henry Cobham esquire, one of the pensioners, and others, departed from London the 25. of June vnto Douer, and there embarked, landed at Calais, and his traine at Dunkerke, and so passed through the Low countries to Antwerpe in Brabant, where he was honorably receiued by the English marchants and others, there he visited Madame de Parma regent of the said countries, then resident within the sayd towne. And from thence he passed vnto Colein, where his lordship & traine tooke the riuer of Reine, passing by the city of Herts vnto Oppenham, and from thence by land through the countrie by the city of Alorues and Spirens til he came to Ulmes, standing on the riuer Danow, where he arrived on the 21. of July, and the 23. his lordship rode in post to Aulspurge, nine dutch mules from Ulmes: from thence he departed the 25. of July, & met with his traine at Donewert, being come downe by the said riuer of Danow. From thence he kept his iourne by Ingollstade Reinspurge, by Passaw and other townes, till he came to Linz, where his Lordship staid the first, second and third of August, by reason of high waters, and on the fourth of August passed by Stoaanne and Cronz, by the sayd riuer of Danow, and so arrived at the city of Vienna the fift of August, where he was receiued of the lord Smackoms, hauing twelve horses ready with their footclothes for his lordship and the best respected of his traine, and so brought to the Emperour, by whom he was right honourably receiued, and after ward conducted to his lodging, where all provision was made at the Emperours charges: and here his Lordship continued vntill the 14. of January. In the which time of his abode, the Emperour very often had the sayd earle forth with him vnto such pastimes of hunting the hart, boare, and such like, as that countrey yeeldeth. After this, vpon the Queenes maiesties letters brought out of England by maister Henry Brooke alias Cobham, one of her maiesties gentlemen pensioners, the sayd earle of Suffex vpon Sunday the fourth of January in the afternoone, presented and deliuered vnto the Emperours

Aug. reg. 10.

Emperours maiestie in his chamber of presence, the habiliments and ornaments of the most noble order of the Garter, Sir Gilbert Dethike knight, alias Gatar principall king at armes, & officer for the said order, and William Dethike then Rouge Crosse also officer of armes giuing their attendance in their coates of armes. And the Emperour at his inuesture of: he said habiliments, gaue unto the said Gatar his Moyst gotone, and vnder garment, furred throughout with Lusernes, and then proceeded thence into a great chamber, adorne in forme of a chappell, where as all the other ceremonies belonging to the said order were accomplished, and the same night the said Earle supped with the Emperours maiestie, both being in their robes of the said order. And shortly after his lordship with certaine of his companie taking leaue of the Emperour, departed from Vienna the fourteenth of Januarie vnto Perussat, and so through the countrey of Stire vnto Grantz, the chiefe citie of Carinthie, where he tooke leaue of the archduke Charles, and from thence returning passed those parts of the Alpes, vnto Siltzburg, where he met with the other parts of his traine, and so by iourneies came againe into England vnto the Quenes maiestie, about the later end of March.

After a drie sommer followed a sharpe winter, with such a scarcitie of fodder and hals, that in diuers places the same was sold by weight, as in Yorkshire, and in the Peake, hay was sold for five pence the stone: there followed also a great death of cattell, especially of horse and sheepe.

In the month of Januarie, the Quenes maiestie sent into the narrow Seas three of her ships, named the Antelope, the Swallow, and the Tide, and one Barke named the Phenix, the which were manned with five hundred men: and her highnesse appointed the charge of those ships and men, to maister William Holstoke esquier, Comptroller of her highnesse ships, who had commandement to staie the subiectes of king Philip. and according to his duety & charge, he vsed such diligence, that on the 11. of March next following, he met with eleuen saile of Flemish Hoies, vpon Boloigne, which came from Roane, and in them fortyer hundred and odde Tuns of Calcoigne and French wines, which they intended to haue conuied into Flaunders, but William Holstoke stayed all the said Hoies, and sent them to London, where they made their discharge, and the Flemings disappointed.

Moreouer, on the 28. of March, the said William Holstoke seruing in the Antelope at that present admirall, in his companie being William Winter the yoonger, (at that time Viceadmirall) seruing in the Tide, and I. Basing Captaine of the Swallow, and Thomas Geuerley Captaine of the Phenix, met in the narrow Seas with fourtene saile of great Hulkes, which were come out of Portingale, and bound to Flaunders, their chiefe lading being Portingale salt, and yet had good store of Spanish Riads of plate, and also great store of spices, the which fouretene Hulkes did maintaine their fight for the space of two houres, and after that they did perceiue they could not preuaile, the said William Holstoke and his companie tooke 8. of the same hulks, whereof 6. were sent into the riuer of Chamis, and the admirall and vizadmirall of the said Hulkes, being two great ships, which W. Holstoke himselfe did take, were conuied to Hartwich, and there discharged.

On Monday the fourteenth of Nouember, Thomas Percie Earle of Northumberland being at Copcliffe, receiued the Queenes maiesties letters to repaire to the Court, and the same day at night, certaine conspirators perceiuing the said Earle to be wauering and vnconstant of promise made to them, caused a seruant of his called Bekewich, (after he was laid in his bed) to bustle in, and to knocke at his chamber doore, willing him in hast to arise and shift for himselfe, for that his enemies (whom he termed to be sir Oswold Viltrop, & maister Vaughan) were about the Parke, and had beset him with numbers of men, whereupon he arose, and conueyed himselfe away to his keepers house: in the same instant, they caused the bels of the towne to be rung backward, and so raised as many as they could to that purpose.

The next night, the Earle departed thence to Branpith, where he met with Charles Neuill Earle of Westmerland, and other their confederates, after which time, by sundrie proclamations, they abusing the Queenes subiects, commanded them in her highnesse name to repaire to them in warlike manner, for the defence & suretie of her Maiesties person, sometimes affirming their doings to be with the aduise & consent of y nobilitie of the realin, who indeed were wholly bent (as manifelly appeared) to spend their liues in dutifull obedience, againſt them and all other traitors, ſometimes pretending for conſcience ſake to ſeek to reforme religion, ſometimes declaring that they were driuen to take this matter in hand, leſt otherwiſe foraine Princes might take it vpon them, to the great perill of this Realme.

their minds being ſuddely altered, by report they heard that ſir George Bowes had muſtered within the Biſhopricke, and Richmondſhire, and leuied great bands. On the Wednesday they returned againe to Wetherby: on Thursday to Northalerton: on Friday to Richmond: on Saturday Weſtmerland went to Rabies his owne houſe: on Sunday at night the Earle of Northumberland came to him there. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, they muſtered in all Richmondſhire and the Biſhopricke, beſtowing their footmen in bands vnder captaines leading: and the ſame day, which was the laſt of Nouember, they beſieged Barnard or Barne caſtell vpon Teſe, builded by Barnard Baylioll, about Anno Domini 1174. which caſtell was valiantly defended by ſir George Bowes and Robert Bowes his brother, the ſpace of eleuen daies. In the meane ſpace, the Earle of Weſtmerland and his ladie went to Durham with ſeuen or eight hundred horſe, where they remained till the thirteenth of December, in which ſpace, to wit, the ſeventh day of December, ſir John Foſter Warden of the middle marches, accompanied with ſir Henry Percie, did giue to the ſaid Earle a great ſkirmiſh. The ſixt of December, ſir George Bowes put forth of the caſtell two hundred horſemen, whereof two perſons were ſlaine, and thirtie taken by the Rebels. The tenth of December, ſir George Bowes deliuered the ſaid Caſtell, vnder compoſition to depart with armour, munition, bagge and baggage, and forthwith marched with his gariſon towardes Poſke. In this meane time, to wit, on the foure and twentieth of Nouember, the queenes Maieſtie had cauſed the ſaid Earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland to be proclaimed traitors, with all their adherents and fauourers, and forthwith prepared an armie to be ſent out of the South for their ſuppreſſion. Scrope Scrope Warden of the west marches, had called vnto him the Earle of Cumberland, and other Gentlemen of the countrey, and they kept the citie of Carlile. Thomas Earle of Suffex the Queenes maiesties Lieutenant generall in the North, had on the seventeenth of Nouember there published the like Proclamation (in effect) as after was published by her Maiestie against the said Rebels, and also sent out to all such Gentlemen as he knew to be her Maiesties loving subiects vnder his rule, who came vnto him with such number of their friends, as he was able in five daies to make about five thousand horsemen and footemen, and so being accompanied with Edward Earle of Rutland his lieutenant, the lord Hunsdon Generall of his horsemen, William Lord Eure, who had the leading of the Rearward of the footmen, and sir Ralph Sadler treasurer, who all came to Yorke with their seruants, on Sunday the eleuenth of December, they marched from Yorke towards Topcliffe: the twelfth they tarried at Seday, where sir George Bowes with his power coming from Barnards Castell (as is aforesaid met him, and was made Marshall of the armie: then they went to Northalton, to Smerston, to Croftbridge, and so to Aclay, on the which day the Rebels fled from Durham (having called their company Christopher Neuill from Hertlepoole, who were fortifying there) to Erham, where they abode three daies.

The earle of Suffex the Queenes lieutenant generall in the North against the rebels.

The Earle of Suffex Lieutenant with his power, went from Aclay to Durham, then to Newcastle, and the twentieth of December to Erham, from whence the Rebels were gone the night before to Naworth, where counselling with Edward Dacres concerning their owne weaknesse, as also how they were pursued by the Earle of Suffex and his power of seven thousand, men almost at their heeles: and moreover, that the earle of Warwike, the lord Clinton, lord Admirall of England, and Walker lord Ferrers, Viscount Hereford, with a greater armie of 12000. out of the South, whereof the said earle of Warwike was Generall, was not farre behind them at Boro'-bridge.

The earle of Warwike sent against the rebels.

The next night, the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, with sundrie of their principall gentlemen, unknowne to their associates, fled to Berlaw in Scotland: the other Rebels were shortly after taken by the Earle of Suffex and his power, without any resistance.

The Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland fled.

The fourth and fift of Ianuarie, did suffer at Durham to the number of threescore and six Constables and other, amongst whom, an alderman of the towne named Struwar, and a priest called parson Piomtree were the most notable: then sir George Bowes Marshall, finding many to be faultors in the foresaid rebellion, did see them executed in euery market towne and other places, betwixt Newcastle and Wetherby, about 60. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, as himselfe reported vnto me.

On good Friday, the 27. of March, Simon Digby of Alketoe, Iohn Fulthorpe of Helbecke in the Countie of Yorke Esquires, Robert Peneman of Stokesley, Thomas Bishop the younger of Poklinton in the same Countie of Yorke Gentlemen, were drawne from the Castell of Yorke to the place of execution, called Knaues-mire, halfe a mile without the Citie of Yorke, & there hanged, headed, and quartered, their foure heads were set on the foure principall gates of the Citie, with foure of their quarters: the other quarters were set in diuerse places of the countrey: Oscolph Glesby was with them drawne to the gallows, and returned againe to the castell.

Earle of
deceased.

William Harbarr Earle of Pembroke, baron of Cardife, knight of the Charter, one of the priuie counsell, and lord steward of the Queenes maiesties household, deceased at Hampton Court on the fiftenth of March, he gaue great gifts to the Queene, to the Earle of Leicester, to the household, and diuers other, and was buried in Saint Pauls Church at London the 18. of Aprill: the blacks giuen at his buriall came to the value of 2000. l. and a sumptuous monument was raised for him on the North side the quire in Pauls, at the foote of Iohn of Gaunr, duke of Lancaster.

The Earle of Suffex made a iourney into Scotland.

The 17. of Aprill, the Earle of Suffex Lieutenant generall in the North, with the Lord Hunsdon Lord gouernor of Barwicke, and Warden of the east marches, and maister William Drewry high marshall of Barwicke, with all the garrison and power of the same, began a iourney into Scotland, & the same night came to Marke, twelue miles from Barwicke, and so the next morrow entered into Tiudale, and marching in warlike order, they bent, ouerthrew, rased and spoyled all the Castles, Townes, and villages of their enimies, till they came to the castell of Holle, standing in a strong marish belonging to the lord of Bucklugh, which likewise was rased, ouerthrowne and bent, and so marched forward and bent the whole countrey before them, till they came to Craling. The same day, Sir Iohn Foster Warden of the middle marches, with the garrison and force of the same, entered likewise into Tiudale vpon Erpes gate, 16. miles from Marke, where in like order they bent, rased, and spoyled the countrey before them, till they came to a strong castell called Craling, in the possession of the mother of the lord Fernherst, which likewise they ouerthrew, rased, and bent. There both the armies met, and so marched by the riuer of Tiuite, rasing, burning, and spoiling Castles and pyles along the riuer, till they came to Geddoorth, where they both lodged, and were courteously receiued. The next day the lord Ch. Ford Warden of the middle marches of Scotland, came in with all the principall men of his kintred to the lord Lieutenant, and did submit themselves, and were assured, for that they had not receiued the English rebels, ayding or assisting them, neither had made any inuasion into England. The nineteenth, the armie deuided into two parts, the one part whereof passed the riuer of Tiuite, and bent the Castell of Fernherst, and all other Castles and Townes belonging to the Lord of Fernherst, Huntill and Bedzell, and so passed to Hint, where both the armies met againe, and so bent on both sides the riuer, till they came to a great towne called Hawicks, where they intended to haue lodged, but the Scots had vnthatched the houses, and bent the thatch in the streets, and themselves fled with most part of their goods, but by the industrie of the Englishmen, the timber was also burned with the thatch, sauing one little house of stone of Dunlanrikes, wherein my lord lay that night. The 20. day, the armie marched forwards to a house of the lord of Bucklugh, which they ouerthrew with poulder, and then marched Northward to the riuer of Tiuet, where they bent and spoyled such Castles, pyles and townes, as belonged to the lords of Fernherst and Bucklugh, their kinsmen and adherents, and that night returned to Gedwozth. The one and twentieth day, part of the armie went to the riuer of Bobwent, vnder the leading of the said marshall, where maister George Heron, keeper of Ciuidale and Ridsdale, with them of that countrey, met with him, and toyning together, rode on, burning and spoyling all on both sides of the riuer, and the other part marched to the riuer of Trile, where they wasled and bent all on both sides the riuer, and returned to Kilsley, where the lord Lieutenant lodged of purpose to besiege Hwome Castell in the night, and the Lord Gouvernor with his companie went to Warke, to bring the ordinance from thence in the morning, which was disappointed by the negligence of such as were put in trust for those matters, who suffered the carriage horses to returne to Barwike the day before, which should haue drawn the same, the lacke whereof caused the Lord Lieutenant with the whole armie, to returne to Barwike the two and twentieth of Aprill, in which time there was neuer any shew by the Scots made, to resist or defend their countrey.

The lord Scrope Warden of the west marches, entered Scotland the eighteenth of Aprill, bent and spoyled those parts almost to Dornfrees, he had diuers conflicts, gaue sundrie ouerthrowes, tooke many prisoners, and returned safely. During all these inuasions, the marches of England in all places were so guarded by the Lord Eucers, sir George Bowes, and other of the Bishoppicke, as the Scots durst not once offer to enter into England, so that not one house was burned, nor one coeue taken out of England. There were raised, ouerthrowne, and bent in this iourney, aboue fiftie strong Castles and pyles, and aboue three hundred Townes and Villages, so that there be verie few in the countrey, that either haue received our English Rebels, or inuaded England, that either haue castell, pile, or house for themselves or their tenants, besides the losse of their goods. The 26. the lord Lieutenant accompanied with the lord gouernor, the marshall and diuers lustie gentlemen, captaines and soldiers, to the number of three thousand, set forward to Warke, and so to Hwome Castell, which Castell they besieged till the same was yielded, the lord Gouvernor, the Marshall, and diuers other, tooke possession for our soueraigne Ladie the Queenes maiestie, and expelled the Scots that were therein, to the number of 168. persons, in their apparell on their backs onely, without armoz, weapon, bagge or baggage, among whom there were two Englishmen, one Hiliard the Earle of Northumberlands man, and a bagarant person named William Godfwher, which both were carried to Barwike and there executed the 24. of May. The L. Lieutenant placed in the castell Captaine Wood, and Captaine Pikeman, with 200. souldiers, and so returned to Barwike the 29. of Aprill, where he rested

The fourth of May, he sent maister Drewry Marshall with the number of two thousand, to take Faulst Castell, which at the first coming was deliuered to the Marshall, who expelled the Scots in number ten, and placed 14. of our Englishmen against all Scotland, it is so strong a place, and so returned to Barwik. The eleuenth of May, the lord Lieutenant made foure knights, viz. Sir William Drewry, sir Thomas Manners, sir George Care, sir Robert Constable. And the same day, sir William Drewry being Generall, set forth toward Eckenborough with diuers footbands with shot, armed pikes, and pieces of great ordnance, to ioyne with the earles of Leunor, Herton, Glencarne, and Harre, and other of the kings power of Scotland, in pursuing of the English rebels, and such of the Scots as supported them as the Duke Hamilton, and other who were in armes at Lithcor, twelue miles from Eckenborough, to defend their cause. The foresaid new knights with their bands came to Eckenborough, the thirteenth of May, and there rested three nights, and departed from thence to Lithcor, where the Regent was slain. The 17. the footemen marched to Faulkirke, five miles from Sterling, and sir William Drewry with the horsemen, marched to Starling to see the King, whom they found so perfect in all things as age and nature could permit. The 18. they departed to the footbands, and so together marched to Glasco, where the lord Hamilton had besieged a house of the kings, but hearing of their coming, he fled with dishonor, and the losse of nine & twentie of his men. The 19. the generall with other horsemen and some shot, passed to Dumbarton, to view the straites of the castell there, being kept by the lord Fleming, the bishop of Saint Andrewes, and other his adherents, to the Queene of Scots use. Our generall sent his trumpetor to require a parley with assurance safely to returne, wherunto the lord Fleming subtilly consented, and minding so to wound him into his danger, conuied certaine shot, and armed men into a secret place, so that our generall coming alone to haue parley, his trumpetor not returned, they shot at him, meaning to haue slain him, but he bestowed his pistolets as freely at them as they at him, and returned to his companie and so to Glasco: from whence sir George Care, being maruellouslie offended with the subtil dealing of the lord Fleming, wrote a letter of challenge to combat with him body for body, which the lord Fleming by his letter of answer refused, wherupon sir George Care wrote a sharp and pithie reply, &c.

The one and twentieth day, our generall accompanied with the gentlemen and horsemen, went to Dunbittion againe to parley with the lord Fleming, vpon his promise that he would meete him three miles from the said castell, but the place of parley being viewed, was found to be subiect to the shot of the castell, & therefore our general required another place, which would not be grated by the Lord Fleming.

The 22. the lord of Leunor, the lord Glencarne, & the Lord Simple, with their friends and tenants, came to our generall, & mustered before Glasco, to the number of foure thousand horsemen and footemen.

The 23. our generall with the whole army marched toward the castell of Hamilton, & there had parley with the captain; whose name was Arthur Hamilton, but but he would not deliuer the castell, whereupon, our ordinance being placed, was shot very sore, but did no great harme, for that they were field peeces.

The fourte and twentieth day, our generall gaue commons to the said castell which would not yeeld, whereupon he sent to Starling for bigger ordinance for the batterie, and so went from thence, accompanied with the earles of Leinor and Mortaine, with the horsemen and certaine shot, marched in the country to a faire house of the Abbots of Kelwing nere adioyning whose name was Gawyn Hamilton, which house they burned, & utterly spoyled, with seauenteene houses more of good countenance of that name, whereof one was the lord Lanhampe, which had married with the sister of James Hamilton of Sidwylhough, which slue the Regent. There was burned seauen other faire houses therabouts, not of that name, but of alie: besides those, there were diuers of their kindred & alie, that came in with humble submissio, & assured themselves, promising their obedience to their king, &c.

The 25. of May in the morning, was found hanging at the bishop of Londons palace gate in Pauls church-yard, a Bull, which lately had bin sent from Rome, containing diuerse horrible treasons against the Queenes maiesty for the which one Iohn Felton was shortly after apprehended, and committed to the Tower of London.

The 28. sir George Care with the horsemen came to Lithco, where the whole army met. This day, a very faire house, with the whole towne of Hamilton was burnt. The 29. they burnt an house of the dukes called Kempell, and another at Lithco, the whole towne, and diuerse other faire houses was yeilded to our generall, who returned to Edebrough, and so to Barwike the third day of June.

A conspiracy was made by certaine gentlemen and other in the country of Porffolke, whose purpose was on Midsummer day, at Harlesons faire, with sound of trumpet and drum, to haue raised a number, and then to proclaim their diuclish purpose, under pretence against strangers and other. This matter was uttered by Thomas Kete one of the conspiracy, vnto Iohn Kenley, who forthwith sent the same Kete with a Constable to the next Justice, before whom and other Justices, he opened the whole matter, whereupon maister Drewry immediately apprehended Iohn Throgmorton, and after him, many gentlemen of the city of Porffolke, and the county of Porffolke, who were all committed to prison (and at the next Sessions of gaile deliucry at the castle of Porffolke, the seauenteenth of July, before sir Robert Carlin knight, Lord chiefe Justice, Gilbert Gerard the queenes Attourney generall, and other Justices) ten of them were indicted of high treason, and some others of contempt, diuerse of them were condemned, and had iudgement the one and twentieth of August, and afterward three of them were hanged, bowelled and quartered, which were Iohn Throgmorton of Porffolke gentleman, who stood mute at his arraignment, but at the gallows confessed

The 23. of January, the queenes maiesty accompanied with her nobility, came from her house at the Strand called Sommerfet place, and entered the city of London by Temple barre, Fleetstreete, Cheape, & so by the north side of the Burse, to Sir Thomas Greshams in Bishops gate street, where she dined. After dinner, her grace returning through Cornhill, entered the Burse on the south side, and after her highnesse had viewed euery part thereof about ground, especially the Pawne, which was richly furnished with all sorts of the finest wares in the city. She caused the same Burse, by an herault and a trumpet to be proclaimed, the Royall Exchange, so to be called from thenceforth, and not otherwayes.

Royall Exchange.

The seuenteenth day of February, at a place called Minnastone, neare Martech hill in the county of Hereford, was seene the ground to open, and certaine rockes with a peece of ground, remooued and went forwarde the space of foure dayes, making at the first a terrible noise as it went on the earth: it remooued it selfe betwene six of the clocke in the euening and seuen the next morning, forty spaces, carrying great trees and shepccotes, some shepccotes with three score sheep in them, some trees fell into the chinkes other that grew on the same ground, grow now as firmly on a hill, and some that stood east, stand west, and those that stood west, stand east. The depth of the hole where it first brake out, is thirty foot, the breadth of the breach is eight score yeards, and in length about twenty score yeards. It ouerthrow Kingstone chappell. Also, two high wayes be remooued nigh one hundred yeards, with the trees of the hedge-rows. The ground in all is six and twenty acres, and where tillage ground was, there is pasture left in place, and where was pasture, there is tillage ground gone vpon it. The ground as it remooued, draue the earth before it, and at the lower part ouerwhelmed the ground, so that it is growne to a great hill of twelue fadome high. It remooued from saterday till monday at night following, and so staid.

A strange kind of earth moving.

In the moneth of february, Sir Thomas Sackeuile baron of Buckhurst was left in ambassade from the Queenes maiesty to Charles the ninth French king, as well to congratulate for his marriage with the daughter of the emperor Maximilian, as for other weighty affaires. And as his ambassage was great, so was his charge no lesse in furnishing himselfe and his traine accordingly, being both in number and furniture, such in euery point as did appertaine: and his receiving and entertainment in Fraunce by the king and others, was agreable thereto, for he was receiued vpon the coast by the gouernours of the fortified townes right honourably, by order from the king. Among other, the Bournoisell was one, who being very well mounted and appointed, left not his lordship before he came to the court, and from thence accompanied him backe untill his embarkement homewards. In the maine countries, he was accompanied with the gouernours and nobles of the places about: and in the good townes where he passed, he was presented by the chiefe magistrates, though his lordships rewards ouer valued their presents.

Sir Thomas Sackeuile sent into France.

At his approach neare to Paris, he was encountred on the way by two Marqueses of Trans and Saluces, this being of the house of Sauoy, and the other of the family of Foix. These wanted not such as accompanied them, euen of the best sort, fort. At the lord ambassadors first audience, which was at the castle of Madrid or therwise called Boloigne neare Paris, where the K. the lay, the queenes Amaine coaches very brauely furnished were sent to Paris for him, in one of the which his lordship with the marquesse of Trance rode toward the court, very narrowly escaping from a shewd turne, by reason the same coach was ouertrothome, by the duche wagoners their negligence, who in a brauery galloping the field, made an ouer short turne, wherewith the marques was sore bzused. The lord ambassador at his arrivall, was very honorably receiued, he was banqueted by diuerse, and that very sumptuously, which by him was not vnrequited, but his reward at the kings hand was onely a chaine, waying one thousand french crownes. At this present, the riuer of Sayne, that runneth through the city of Paris, was not passable with vessels, by reason of the great frosts, and thereby not onely all kind of victuals but also hay and wood was hard to come by, and not to be had but at exorbitant prices, the countrie thereabouts hauing bene sore harried and spoiled by the ciuill tumults: by reason wherof, not onely the lord of Buckhurst for the space he remained there, but also sir Henry Norrice, and maister Francis Walsingham her intellies Ambassadors, liegers successiuelly, were diuven to an increase of expences, paying for euery thing they bought an higher price then had bene accustomed. After that my lord Buckhurst had bene feasted and banqueted by the king, and others of the french nobilitie, and had accomplished the points of his ambassage, he tooke leaue of the king, and departed homewards, arriuing here in England a little before Easter.

A parliament. The second of April, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the queenes maiessty (toward her great charges, in repressing the late rebellion in the North, and persuing the sayd rebels and their fautors, which were fled into Scotland (by the cleargy, a subsidy of 6. s. in the l. and by the temporality two fifteenes, with a subsidy of 2. s. 8. d. in the l.

Iustices at Westminster The first, second, and third of May, was holden at Westminster before the Queenes maiessty, a sollemne Iust, at the tilt, turney, and barriers. The challengers were Edward earle of Orford, Charles Howard, sir Henry Lee, and Christopher Hatton esquier, who all did very valiantly, but the chiefe honour was giuen to the earle of Orford.

Doctor Story executed. The first of June, Iohn Story a doctoz of the cannon law, who before had bene condemned of high treason, was drawne from the tower of London to Tiborne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered, his head set on London bridge, and his quariers on the gates of the city.

A combate appointed at Fuchill. The 18. of June, in Trinity tearme, there was a combate appointed to haue bene fought for a certaine Honour and demaine lands belonging thereunto, in the Isle of Hartie, adioynning to the Isle of Sheppey in Kent, Simon Low and Iohn Kyme were plaintiffs, and had brought a writ of right against Thomas Paramore, who offered to defend his right by battell, wherempon the plaintiffs aforesayd, accepted to answer his challenge, offering likewise to defend their right to the same Honour and lands, and to prooue by battel that Paramore had no right nor no good title to haue the same.

Hereupon the sayd Thomas Paramore brought before the Judges of the common place at Westminster, one George Thorne, a bigge, broad, strong set fellow, and and the plaintifs brought Henry Nailor maister of defence, and seruant to the right honorable the earle of Leicester, a proper slender man, and not so tall as the other: Thorne cast downe a gauntlet, which Nailor tooke vp. Upon the Sunday before the battell should be tried on the next morow, the matter was stayed, and the parties agreed, that Paramore being in possession should haue the land, and was bound in 500. pound to consider the plaintifs, as vpon hearing the matter the Iudges should award. The Queenes maiesty was the taker vp of the matter, in this wise: It was thought good, that for Paramores assurance, the order should be kept touching the combat, and that the plaintifs Low and Kime should make default of appearance, but that yet such as were sureties of Nailor, their champions appearance, should bring him in, and likewise those that were sureties for Thorne, should bring in the same Thorne in discharge of their band, & that the court should sit in Tuthill fields, where was prepared one plot of ground one and twenty yeards square, double railed for the combat, without the west square, a stage being set vp for the Iudges, representing the court of the common pleas. All the compasse without the lisses, was set with scaffolds one above another, for people to stand and behold. There were behind the square where the Iudges sat, two tents, the one for Nailor, the other for Thorne. Thorne was there in the morning timely. Nailor about 7. of the clocke came through London, apparelled in a dublet and galeysgascogne breeches, all of crimolyn latten cut and raced, a hat of blacke velvet with a red feather and band, before him drums and fifes playing: the gauntlet that was cast downe by George Thorne, was borne before the sayd Nailor vpon a swordes point and his basson (a staffe of an elle long, made Taper-wise, tipped with borne) with his shield of hard leather, was borne after him, by Askam a yeoman of the Queenes gard: he came into the pallace of Westminster, and staying not long before the hall doore, came backe into the kings streete, and so along through the sanctuary, and Tuthill streete, into the field, where he stayed till past nine of the clocke, and then sir Ierome Bowes brought him to his tent, Thorne being in the tent with sir Henry Cheiney long before. About ten of the clocke, the court of common pleas remoued, and came to the place prepared: when the Lord chiefe Iustice with two other his associates were set, then Low was called solemnely to come in, or else he to lose his wit of right. Then after a certaine time the sureties of Henry Nailor were called to bring in the sayd Nailor champion for Simon Low, and shortly thereupon sir Ierome Bowes leading Nailor by the hand, entred with him the lisses, bringing him downe that square by which he entred, being on the left hand of the Iudges, and so about till he came to the next square iust against the Iudges. and there making curtesie, first with one leg, and then with the other passed forth till he came to the middle of the place, and then made the like obersance and so passing till they came to the barre, there he made the like curtesie and his shield was held vp aloft ouer his head: Nailor put off his neather stockes, and so bare foote and bare legged, saue his silke scauilionions to the anckles and his dublet sleeves tied vp aboue the elbow, and bare headed, came in as is afore sayd. Then were the sureties of George Thorne called to bring in the same Thorne. and immediatly sir Henry Cheiney entring at the upper end on the right hand of the Iudges, used the like order in coming about by his side, as Nailor had before on that other side, and so coming to the barre with like obeisance, held up his shield, proclamation was made in forme a followeth: The Iustices command in the Quenes maiesties name, that no person of what estate, degree, or condition that he be, being present, to be so hardy to giue any token or signe, by countenance, speech, or language, either to the proouer or to the defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other: and no person remooue, but still keepe his place: and that euery person and persons keepe their staues and their weapons to themselves: and suffer neither the sayd proouer nor defender to take any of their weapons or any other thing, that may stand either to the sayd proouer or defender any auail, vpon paine of forfeiture of lands, tenements, goods, chattels, and imprisonment of their bodies, and making fine and ransom at the Quenes pleasure.

Orde of the proouer.

Then was the proouer to be sworn in forme as followeth: This heare, you Iustices, that I haue this day neither eate, drinke, nor haue vpon me either bone, stone, ne grasse, or any inchantment, sorcerie, or witchcraft, where-through the power of the word of God might be increased or diminished, and the diuels power increased: and that my appeale is true, so helpe me God and his saints, and by this booke.

After all this sollemne order was finished, the lord chiefe Iustice rehearsing the manner of byping the writ of right by Simon Low, of the answere made thereunto by Paramore, of the proceeding therein, and how Paramore had chalenged to defend his right to the land by battell, by his champion George Thorne, and of the accepting the triall that was by Lowe, with his champion Henry Nailor, and then for default in appearance in Lowe, he adiudged the land to Paramore, and dismissed the champions, acquitting the sureties of their bands. He also willed Henry Nailor to render againe to George Thorne his gantlet, whereunto the said Nailor answered, that his lordship might commaund him any thing, but willingly he would not render the said gantlet to Thorne except he could win it: and further, he chalenged the said Thorne to play with him halfe a score blowes, to shew some pastime to the lord chiefe iustice and the other there assembled: but Thorne answered, that he came to fight, and would not play. Then the lord chiefe Iustice commending Nailor for his valiant courage, commanded them both quietly to depart the field, &c.

An. reg. 14.

Earle of Kent.

The thirteenth of December, Reynold Grey was by the queenes maiestie restored earle of Kent.

The thirteenth of January, deceased William Peter knight, who for his iudgement and pregnant wit, had bene secretary and of priuy counsell to foure kings and queenes of this realme, and seuen times lord ambassado: abroad in foraine lands: he augmented Creter colledge in Oxford, with lands to the value of an hundred pound by yeare: and also builded ten almes houses in the parish of Ingershorne for twenty poore people, ten within the house, and ten without the house, hauing euery one two pence the day a winter gone, and two loads of wood, and among them, feeding for six kine winter and sommer, and a chaplaine to say them service daily.

1572.

Sir William
Peter deceased.

The sixteenth day of January, the Lord Thomas Howard duke of Norfolkke was arraigned in Westminster hall, before George lord Talbot earle of Shrotonbury high steward of England for that day, and there by his peeres, to wit, nine earles one viscount, and sixteene barons, found guilty of high treason, and had iudgement accordingly.

Duke of
arraigned.

The eleuenth day of february Kenelme Barney, and Edmond Mather were drawn from the Tower of London: and Henry Rolfe from the Marshalsea in Southwarke, all thre to Tiboyne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered for treason: Barney and Mather for conspiracy against some of her maiesties priuy counsell, and Rolfe for counterfeiting the Queenes maiesties hand.

Mather, Barney, & Rolfe
executed.

The Queenes maiesty hearing credibly by report, that certaine lewd persons, vnder pretence of executing commissions for inquiries to be made for lands concealed, contrary to her maiesties meaning, chelenging lands, stockes of monney, plate, &c. lettng not also to make pretence to the bells, lead, and other such things belonging to parish churches or chappels: Her maiesty meaning speedily to withstand such manner of vnlawfull practises, commanded, that all commissions then extant, and not determined, for inquisition of any manner of concealments, should be by Superfides out of her cheschequer reuoked. And also appointed speedy remedy to be had against such extortioners, as more at large appeareth by a proclamation, concluding thus: finally, her maiesty would her Iustices of assise to haue some speciall care, not onely to the premises, but also to the reforming of certaine couetous and iniurious attempts, of diuerse that of late time by other colour then for her maiesties hse, had taken away the lead of churches and chappels, yea and bells also out of steeple, and other common goods belonging to parishes, an example not to be suffered unpunished nor vnrformed. And so her maiesty chesones charge her Iustices of her assise to provide seuerer remedy, both for punishment and reformation thereof. Dated at Westminster the thirteenth of february, the fourteenth yeare of her raigne.

Conueyers of bells, lead, and other Church goods are to be punished to the example of their followers.

The

Sir William Powlet lord
treasurer.

The tenth day of March, deceased sir William Powlet knight, lord Sent-Iohn earle of Wiltshire, marquisse of Winchester, knight of the honourable order of the garter, one of the queenes maiesties priuy counsell, and lord high treasurer of England, at his manor of Basing in Hampshire. This worthy man was boine in the yeare of our Lord 1374. in the fourteenth yeare of king Edward the 4. at Filderton de la Noxe in Wiltshire on Whitsonday, and liued about the age of ninety and seauen yeares, in fire kings and queenes dayes. He serued fire kings and queenes, Henry the seventh, Henry the eight, Edward the first, queene Mary, and Q. Elizabeth. All these he serued faithfully, & of them was greatly fanoyed. This man in his time passed many offices, for in the time of the late K. Henry the 8. he enioyed successiue the roomes of maister of the wards & liueries, controller, treasurer, lord chamberlaine, and lord steward of the kings howthold, and lastly, lord treasurer of England in the time of king Edward the first, which he continued about one and twenty yeares: he was aduanced to sundry honours for by the said king Henry the eight he was created lord Sent-Iohn of Basing, and knight of the garter, and by king Edward the first he was aduanced to be earle of Wiltshire, and marques of Winchester. Himselfe did see the children of his childrens children growne to the number of one hundred and three: a rare blessing giuen by God to men of his calling.

Pikemen & shot trained vp in Londō.

The five and twenty and fire and twenty of March, by the commandement of the queenes maiesty her counsell, the citizens of London assembling at their seuerall halls, the maisters chose out the most likely and aduise persons of euery their companies, to the number of three thousand, to whom they appointed to be pikemen and shot, the pikemen were forthwith armed in faire cossets and other furniture, according therunto: the gunners had euery of them his caliuier, with the furniture, and murrians on their heads. To these were appointed diuerse valiant captaines, who to traine them by in warlike seates, mustred them thise euery weeke, sometimes in the artillery yard, teaching the gunners to handle their peeces sometimes at the Hiles end, and in Saint Georges field, teaching them to skirmish. In the which skirmish on the Hiles end the tenth day of Aprill, one of the gunners of the goldsmithes company, was shot in the side with a peece of a scowring sticke left in one of the caliuers, whereof he died, and was buried the twelfth of Aprill in Saint Pauls churchyard, all the gunners marching from the Hiles end in battell ray, shot off their caliuers at his graue.

Muste at Greene-
wich.

On May day they mustred at Grenewich before the queenes maiesty, where they shewed many warlike seates, but were hindered by the weather, which was all day showing, they returned that night to London, and were discharged on the next morrow.

Earles of Essex and Lincolne created.

The fourth of May, Water Deuereux, lord Ferrers of Chartley, and viscount of Hereford, was created earle of Essex: And Edward Fines lord Clinton and Say, high Admirall of England, was created earle of Lincolne, at Grenewich.

Barons made.

The eight of May, the parliament began at Westminster: and that same day in the parliament by the Queenes maiesties writs, sir Henry Compton knight, lord Compton in the Hoke, sir Henry Cheyny knight, lord of Tudington, sir William Pawlet knight of Basing, and sir Henry Norrice knight, lord of Ricote, were were called barons into the higher house. In this parliament, for so much as the whole realme of England was exceedingly pestered with rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars, by means wherof daily happened divers horrible murders, theses, and other great outrages, it was enacted, that all persons above the age of foureteene yeres, being taken begging, vagrant, and wandring misorderly, should be apprehended, whipped, and burnt through the grille of the right eare, with a hot yron of one inch compasse for the first time so taken.

Rogues burned through the eare.

The foure and twentieth of May, Martin Bullocke was hanged on a gibbet by the well with two buckets in Bishops gate streete of London, for robbing and most shamefully murdering of a merchant named Arthur Hall, in the parsonage of Saint Martine by the said well. This Martin had procured the said Arthur Hall to come to the said parsonage, to buy of him certaine plate: but after the said Arthur had well viewed the same, he said, this is none of your plate, it hath docto Gardeners marke, and I know it to be his: that is true said Martin Bullocke, but he hath appointed me to sell it, &c. After this talke, whiles the said Arthur was weighing the plate, the same Martin fetcht out of the kitchin a thicke washing beetle, and coming behind him, strake the said Arthur on the head, that he felled him with the first stroke, and then strake him againe, and after tooke the said Arthurs dagger, and sticked him, and with his knife cut his throat, and after would haue trussed him in a Danske chest, but the same was too short: wherupon he tumbled him downe a paire of staires, and after thinking to haue buried him in the cellar, his legges being broken with the first fall, and stiffe, he could not draw him downe the cellar staires being winding, wherefore he cut off his legges with an hatchet, and in the end, trussed him with straw in a dytch, and saying it was his apparell and bookes, caused the same to be carried to the waters side, and so shipped to Ric. But as God would haue it, there was suspicion gathered against the murder, wherby he was examined before Alderman Branch one of the Sheriffes of London, but seemed so innocent and guiltlesse in that case, that one Robert Gee a cloth-worker, being of good credit, undertooke for his fourth-comming: wherupon Bullocke slept away, first to Westminster, where taking boat, he was rowed by the riuer westward till he came to Oakingham in the forest 8. miles beyond the towne of Windsoze: from whence (by Gods providence) he came backe againe unto London, where he lodged at the red lion in Holborne. In the meane time Robert Gee, vpon knowledge had that Bullocke was slept asleepe, was not only had in suspicion, but also committed to ward, albeit so, as he had libertie to send abroad such as should make sure after Bullocke, & amongst other, one of his seruants was sent to Ric, after the dytch, & coming thither, the same dytch was opened, where the mangled corps of Hall was found, wherby the truth of the matter came to light, & by the will of God, Bullocke was at the same time discouered at the place in Holborne afore mentioned, & there apprehended, receiued, as ye haue heard, due punishment for his wicked fact.

Martin Bullocke hanged.

The 26. of May, the right honorable earle of Lincolne, departed from London toward France ambassador, being accompanied with the lords Gregory lord Fines lord Dacres, the lord Rob. Rich, the lord Talbot, the lord Sands, and Hen. lord Clinton, sir Arthur Chamberowne, sir Ierom Bowes, and sir Edw. Hastings

The 18. of November in the morning, was scene a starre northward very bright and cleare in the constellation of Cassiopeia, at the backe of her chaire, which with three chiefe fixed stars of the said constellation, made a Geometricall figure losenge-wise, of the learned men called Rombus: this star in bignesse at the first appearing seemed bigger then Iupiter, and not much lesse then Venus when she seemeth greatest: also the said starre neuer changing his place, was carried about with the daily motion of heauen, as all fixed starres commonly are, and so continued (by little and little, to the eye appearing lesse) for the space of almost sixteene moneths, at what time it was so small, that rather thought by exercise of oft viewing might imagine the place, than any eye could iudge the presence of the same: and one thing is herein chiefly to be noted, that by the learned skill and consent of the best and most expert Mathematicians, which observed the state, proprietie, and other circumstances belonging to the same starre, it was found to haue bene in place celestiallyl farre above the moone, otherwise then ever any comet hath bene scene, or naturally can appeare. Therefore it is supposed, that

Erle of Worcester sent into France.

The twelfth of Januarie, William lord Howard baron of Effingham, lord priue seale, knight of the noble order of the garter, and one of the priue counsell, deceased at Hampton court.

The eighteenth of Januarie, William lord Sommer set earle of Worcester, began his iourney towards France to the chusing of the kings daughter there. in stead of the Queenes maiestie of England, who sent with him a font of gold for that purpose, weighing 326. ounces. The said earle with many of his company were robbed vpon y sea by pirates of much of their baggage & 3. or 4. of their men slaine.

aine. In France he and his traine were honorably receiued. At the christening he gaue the child to name Elizabeth, & returned into England the 27. of February.

In the moneth of February, through sundry haynous complaints, brought to the Quene's maiesty and her counsell, of pirates that kept the narrow seas doing many robberies, as also the robbing of the earle of Worcester (as is aforesayd) her highnesse, by the aduise of her honourable counsell, tooke order with the lord admirall of England, that he should send to the seas ships and men to scoure the narrow seas, and to apprehend so many pyrats ships as might be met with: and for the better doing thereof, it pleased her maiesty to send one of her owne ships named the Swallow, to be the admirall, vnder the charge of William Holstocke of London esquire, controller of her highnesse ships, who had with him the Gillian, the barker Garret, and the barker of Parmouth, and 360. able mari-ners, gunners and souldiers in the sayd three ships, and one barker which scow-ered the narrow seas, from the northfore-land as farre westwards as Falmouth in Cornewall, and tooke twenty ships and barkes of sundry nations, viz. English, French, and Flemings but all pirates and in fashon of war. He apprehended in those ships and barkes to the number of 900. men of all nations, and sent them to ward, to Sandwiche, Douer, Wlight, and Portsmouth, whereof three of them that robbed the earle of Worcester, were shortly after executed at Wlight: also the sayd William Holstocke did rescue and take from the abovesayd pirats ships fifteene other marchants ships, laden with marchandise, that were their prizes, be-ting of sundry nations, & set at liberty the sayd fifteene marchants ships & goods, which done, he returned to Portsmouth, and there ended his voyage in March.

Peter Ramus in his commentaries of the wars of Fraunce writeth thus. The earle of Worcester passing into Fraunce, certaine Frenchmen and Flemings set vpon him, tooke from him one of his ships, and killed certaine of his men: where- vpon the Queene of England taking displeasure, sent the lord Admirall (saith he) wherein he mistooke the matter, for maister William Holstocke was sent (as is aforesayd) who set vpon all the ships French and Flemings, tooke and caried a- way what so came to hand, so that twenty of Montgomeries ships were lost, who was going to Rochell with the number of fiftie ships well furnished out of En- gland, with money there borrowed (but neuer repayed) thus his naue being di- minished of those twentie ships, when he sawe the kings naue neare to Rochell, he directed his course another way, landed at Bel Isle, and tooke both the Isle and Castle.

The fourth of March, a man was hanged in chaines in Saint Georges field beyond Southwarke of London, for murdering the gailor of Hortham in the same field.

The 17. of March deceased Reinold Grey of Ruthen, earle of Kent at Berne- ley, and was buried at Saint Giles without Creeplegate.

About the same time died Edmond lord Chandois.

The 25. of March being Wednesday in Easter weeke, and the feast of the An- nunciatio of our Lady, George Browne cruelly murdered two honest men neare unto shooters hill in Kent, the one of them was a wealthy marchant of London, named George Sanders, the other Iohn Beane of Woolwich: which murder was committed in manner as followeth.

On Tuesday in Easter weeke (the foure and twentieth of March) the sayd George Browne receiuing secret intelligece by letter from mistresse Anne Drewry, that maister Sanders should lodge the same night at the house of one maister Barnes in Woolwich, and from thence go on foote to Saint Mary Cray the next morning, lay in waite for him by the way, a little from Shooters hill, and there slue both him and Iohn Beane, seruant to maister Barnes: but Iohn Beane hauing ten or eleuen wounds, and being left for dead, by Gods prouidence reuiuied againe, and creeping away on all foure, was found by an old man and his maiden, & conueyed to Woolwich, where he gaue euident markes of the murtherer.

Immediately vpon the deed doing, Browne sent mistresse Drewry word thereof by Roger Clement (among them called trusty Roger) he himselfe repaired forthwith to the court at Greenwich, and anon after him came thither the report of the murther also. Then departed he thence vnto London, and came to the house of mistresse Drewry, where, though he spake not personally with her, after conference had with her seruant trusty Roger, she provided him twenty pounds that same day, for the which she layd certaine plate of her owne, and of mistresse Sanders to gage. On the next morrow being thursday (hauing intelligence, that Browne was sought for) they sent him five pounds more by the same Roger, warning him to shift for himselfe by flight, which thing he foresawed not to do: neuertheless the lords of the queenes maiesties counsell, caused so speedy and narrow search to be made for him, that vpon the eight and twentieth of the same moneth, he was apprehended in a mans house of his owne name at Rochester, and being brought backe againe to the court, was examined by the counsell, to whom he confessed the deed, as you haue heard, and that he had oftentimes before pretended and sought to do the same, by the instigation of the sayd mistresse Drewry, who had promised to make a marriage betwene him and mistresse Sanders (whom he seemed to loue excessively) neuertheless he protested (though vntuly) that mistresse Sanders was not priuy nor consenting thereunto. Vpon his confession he was arraigned at the the kings bench in Westminster hall the eighteenth of Aprill, where he acknowledged himselfe guilty, and was condemned as principall of the murder, according to which sentence, he had iudgement, and was executed in Smithfield on Monday the 20 of Aprill, at which time also vntuly (as she her selfe confessed afterwards) he laboured by all means to cleare mistresse Sanders of committing euill of her body with him, as also of procuring or consenting to the murther of her husband, and then beginning to sing a Psalm, O Lord turne not away thy face, &c. he flung himselfe belides the ladder, and so shortned his owne life: he was after hanged by in chaines neare vnto the place where he had done the fact.

In the meane time mistresse Drewrie an her man being examined, as well by their owne confessions, as by falling out of the matter (and also by Brownes appachment thought culpable) were committed to ward. And after mistresse Sanders being deliuered of child, and churched (for at the time of her husbands death she looked presently to lye downe) was vpon mistresse Drewries mans confession, and other great likelihoods, likewise committed to the Tower, and on Wednesday the sixt of May arraigned with mistrisse Drewrie at the Guild hall, the effect of whose inditement was, that they by a letter writtten had bene procurers of the sayd murther, and knowing the murther done, had by money and otherwise releued the murderer: whereunto they pleaded not guilty, howbeit, they were both condemned as accessaries to mistris Sanders death, and executed in Smithfield the thirteenth of May, being Wednesday in Whitson weeke, at which time they both confessed themselves guiltie of the fact. Trustie Roger mistrisse Drewries man was arraigned on Friday the eight of May, and being there condemned as accessary, was executed with his mistris at the time and place aforesayd. Not long after, Anthony Browne, brother to the fornamed George Browne, was for notable felonies conveyed from Newgate to Forke, and there hanged.

Anne Sanders, Anne Drewrie, and trustie Roger hanged.

This yeare the Queenes maiesty of England, being moued by the Regent of Scotland, in the behalfe of the young king of Scots her cousin, sent a power of 1500. Englishmen to the siege of Edenborough castle, sir William Drewry knight marshall of Barwoike, to be generall of her forces there, with captaines as follooweth, sir Francis Russell knight, captaine Reade of Barwoike, and these folloowing also, captaine Yaxley, captaine Wood, captaine Brickwell, captaine Pike-man, captaine Gamme, captaine Cace, captaine Carew, captaine Erington poynt marshall, captaine Atoll, captaine Sterlee captaine of the pioners, and captaine Barton also of the pioners. Diuerse other gentlemen also went thither to serue of their owne free wils, as sir George Carie knight, sir Henry Lea knight, maister Thomas Cicill maister Michael Carie, maister Henrie Carie, maister William Knolles, maister Thomas Sutton, maister Cotton, maister Kelway, maister Diar, maister Tilney, maister William Killigrew, maister William Selby, and other. Sir William Drewry with the captaines, gentlemen, and number of souldiers before mentioned, passed from Barwoike to Lieth, from whence on the 25. of Aprill they marched on to Edenborough, entered the towne, and the same day summoned the castell in forme as follooweth:

Aide sent in to Scotland against the castle of Edenborough.

Sir William Kirkaudie, sometime of Gange knight, for as much as the Queenes maiesty your soueraigne lady, upon the earnest request of her deare cousin the king of Scots, your soueraigne lord, made to her highnesse by his regent, nobility, & states of this realme, after all good meanes vled to haue reduced you to dutifull obedience of his authoritie by treaty, which hitherto you haue not duly harkened vnto, to the onely hinderance of the vniuersall peace in this realme, by withholding that his highnesse castle, meaning as it seemeth, to reserue the same for a receptacle of foraine forces, to the manifest daungers both of this realme and of my soueraignes, and therefore necessarie to remoue so perillous a daunger to both the realmes, for which consideration her maiesty hath sent her aide & succors of men ordnance and munition, binder my charge & leading, for the repugnation & recovery of the sayd castle, to the said kings use and behalfe, and therfore according to her maiesties commandement and commission, this shall be in due manner to warne, requite, and sommon you, that you render & deliuer the sayd castle, with the whole ordnance artillery, munitions, iewels, household-stuffe, and such other implements within the same, to me & the use and behalfe of the king your soveraigne, & his regent in his name, immediately after this my letter of sommons, or knowledge of the same, shall come to you: which if you obey, as of duty you ought, then shall I in her maiesties name interpone my seife to trauell with the regent, counsell, and nobility here for the safety of your liues, &c. Otherwise if you continue in your former obstinacy, abiding the canon, then no further to looke for grace or favor, but you and the rest within that castle to be pursued to the uttermost, and holden as enemies to her maiesty, your owne soveraigne and country. Given at Edenborough by me sir William Drewry knight, generall of her maiesties forces now in Scotland, this 25. of April, 1573.

Thomas Churchyard.

The Lord Grange captaine of the castle, notwithstanding this sommons, refused utterly to yeeld the castle, who thereupon received such answer from the generall, as stood not to his contentation. Whereupon were the pioners set in hand to cast trenches, and to raise mounts in places convenient to plant the ordnance upon. And then began the siege of the castle in five places, where were erected five mounts. The first was for the regent, called the kings mount. The second for sir William Drewry generall there. The third was governed by sir George Carie. The fourth by sir Henry Lea. The fifth by maister Thomas Sutton maister of the ordnance in the north part of England. There was at this siege as is reported 1500. Englishmen, and of Scots five hundred, or rather 1500. there was also one with another peeces of artillery 30. to wit, 6. canons nine halfe canons, nine culverings, sixe sakers. They within spared not to bestow such as they had, as well at the pioners as souldiers, in so much that diuerse were hurt, and some slaine, before the trenches and mounts might be brought to perfection, but they within escaped not free, especially after that the trenches & mounts were brought in state to defend the assailants, who watching and warding in the trenches, answered them within the castle very roughly. On the 17. of May began the battery of the castle, so that there were thirty canons shot off against the same, and so well bestowed at Davids tower, that by the ruines thereof then and after, the force of the English canons were easie to be scene. The 18. 19. and 20. of May, the canons and demy canons were not idle, but the one and twenty the whole battery began on each side the castle from the trenches and mounts very hotly, & still they within ceased not to make answer againe with their artillery, killing and hurting diuers both English and Scots, but such was the diligence of the English gunners, that they displaced the ordnance in the castle, and strooke one of their chiefe canons iust in the mouth, whereby the same was broken in peeces. The 26. of May, the assault was given at seven of the clocke in the morning to the Spurre, which by the hardy manhood of the assailants was won, and was no sooner entered by the Englishmen, but that the generals ensigne was set and fixed upon the front and top thereof, to the great discomfort of them within the castell. In the meane time whilst these were appointed to give the assault thus to the Spurre, there were certaine English men and Scots commaunded to make a countenance of an assault at the west side of the castell, whereby those that assaulted the Spurre might the more easily obtaine their purpose, but they rashly adventuring further than they had in commaundment, were beaten backe and repulsed, with 28. or 30. of their company slaine and hurt. The same day toward night, they within the castell by a drumme demaunded parley, which being graunted, with assurance of all hostilitie from that houre vnto the 28. of May, the lord Peterroe was let downe by a rope from the castell, and afterward the lord Grange himselfe capitaine of the castell, and Robert Melvin came likewise downe to talke with the Generall, and such other as were appointed to accompanie him: hereupon at length, to wit, the said 28. of May, the castell was surrendered into the hands of sir William Drewrie, and so it rested in his possession for the time, and his ensigne was set vp and spread during the same time in sundrie places of the castell, and afterwards to the great honour of England, by him it was deliuered vnto the vse of the king of Scots, and part of the spoile of the castell was given to the soldiers, the canons and artillerie, with certaine other instruments, left to the king. If the English men by force had taken it, it was decreed that they should haue had the whole spoile except the artillerie, & so should haue enioyed it by the space of three daies.

Edinburgh
castell yeelded to the Englishmen.

Causes of deliuerie of the castell were these :

1 Lacke of water: the well within the castell was stopped and defiled by the ruines of the castell : the other well without the castell could not serue them, for that there was a mount made to hinder them. Another water there was which was unknowne to them which were without, and was taken from them when the Spur of the castell was taken, out of the which they were wont to haue a pint a day for every souldier.

2 Diuerse sickes.

3 Diuerse hurt.

4 Not many to maintaine the castell, which had no space to take any rest they were splitted and overwearing.

5 Diuerse diuided in opinion.

6 Some were no souldiers.

7 No aide was to be looked for.

The 16. of June, the prisoners were deliuered by the said sir William Drewrie in presence of sundry Scots and Englishmen, vnto the regent, and that done, the same day the said sir William Drewrie with his power departed toward Barwicke. The names of the prisoners were these, sir William Kerkaudie lord of Grange, and Capitaine of the castell of Euenborough, the lord Hume, the lord Ledington Secretarie, the Lord of Peterroe constable of the castle, the countesse of Arguile, the ladie of Ledington, the ladie of Grange, with others: in all to the number of men, one hundred fiftie foure, women thirtie foure, boyes ten.

Hawkins.

The 11. of October, Peter Burchet gentleman (of the middle Temple) with his dagger, suddenly assailed, cruelly wounded, and meant to haue murdered a seruiceable gentleman named Iohn Hawkins esquire, as he with sir William Winter and another gentleman rode towards Westminster, in the high streete neare to the Strand beyond the Temple bar of London, for which fact the said Burchet being apprehended and committed to the tower, was after examined cocerning the fact, who answered that he tooke the said maister Hawkins for another gentleman, to wit, sir Christopher Hatton: and being further examined, he was found to hold certaine erroneous opinions, for the which he was sent to the Zollards tower, from thence being called into the Consistorie of Pauls church, before the right reuerend father Edwin bishop of London, and other, and by them examined, he stood in his opinions, till the sentence of death, as an heretike was readie to haue bene pronounced against him on the fourth of November: but through the earnest perswasions of diuers learned men, who tooke great paines in that matter, it was said he renounced, forswore, and abiured his opinions for erroneous and damnable, promising neuer to returne to them, and also willingly to do and performe all such penance as the bishop his Domaric should impose him, but nothing was done, wherefore on the ninth of November by commandement of the Counsell, the said Peter Burcher was remooued from the Tollards tower to the Tower of London, where on the next morrow about noone, whilst one of the twaine that had by appointment kept him company was gone to some, and locked the doore after him, leaving the other with him, called Hugh Longworth, who stood at a window reading in the Bible, the said Burcher walking vp and downe in the chamber, tooke a bullets end out of the fire, and knocked the said Longworth on the head, and left not till he had stricken him starke dead: and then drawing him behinde the chamber doore, he awaited the coming vp of the other, likewise to haue dispatched him, but the other opening the doore, and missing his fellowe from the window where he left him: taking good regard, espied him lying behinde the doore, which he clapped to, ran downe for more helpe, and returning found his fellowe murdered as is aforesaid shewed. For the which fact on the next morrow, he was arraigned and condemned at Oldeshemster, and from thence returned to Somerslet house at the Strand, where he remained that night. And the next morrow being the 12. of November, he was brought out to a gibbet, set vp for that purpose, nigh the place where he wounded maister Hawkins, he had no speech, nor shewed signe of repentance, but was by force and strength of men partly drawing, partly boine and thrust vp to the gibbet, where after his right hand being stricken off, and nayled to the gibbet, he was hanged.

Peter Burcher abiured his heresie. Peter Burcher submitted himselfe to do penance as it was said.

A monstrous fish.

The ninth of July, at five of the clocke at night, in the isle of Thanet besides Ramelgate in the parish of Saint Peter vnder the clift, a monstrous fish or whale of the sea did shoot himselfe on shore, where for want of water, beating himselfe on the sands, he died about sixe of the clocke in the next morning, before which time he roved, and was heard more then a mile on the land. The length of this fish was two and twentieth yards, the neather iaw twelue foote the opening, one of his eyes being taken out of his head, was more then sixe hogies in a cart could draw, a man stood byright in the place from whence the eye was taken, the thickest from the backe whereon he lay, to the top of his belly (which was upward) was fourteen foote, his taile of the same breadth, betwene his eyes twelue foote, three men stood byright in his mouth, some of the ribs were sixteen foot long, his tounge was sixteen foot long, his liuer two cart loades, into his nostrils any man might haue crept: the oile being boyled out of the head was parmacetic, the oile of his body was whitish, and sweet of tast.

Obsequie at Paules for the French king.

The sixteenth of August, a solemne obsequie was kept in Saint Pauls church at London for Charles the ninth king of Fraunce, who being poisoned, deceased on the thirtieth of May last before passed.

Peter Ramus Agnes Bridges and Rachel Pinder at Paules crosse for counterfeiting to be punished.

The sixteenth of August being sonday, Agnes Bridges a maid about the age of twenty yeares, and Rachel Pinder a wench about the age of 11. or 12. yeares, who both of them had counterfeited to be possessed by the diuell, (whereby they had not onely maruellously deluded many people, both men and women, but also diuers such persons as otherwise seemed to be of good wit and understanding) stood before the preacher at Paules crosse, where they acknowledged their hypocriticall counterfeiting, with penitent behauiours, requiring forgiveness of God and the world, and the people to pray for them. Also their severall examinations and confessions were there openly read by the preacher, and afterwards published in print, for the further posteritie hereafter to beware of the like deceiuers.

A lad of 18. yeares old drowned in a chanell at London.

The fourth of September in the afternoone, such a storme of raine happened at London, as the like of long time could not be remembred, wherethrough the channels of the citie suddenly rising, ranne with such forcible course towards the common shores, that a lad of the age of 18. yeares, minding to haue lept over the chanell neare vnto Downegate, was borne ouer with the streame, and by the same carried from the conduit there towards the Thamis, with such a swiftnesse, that no man with stauces or otherwaies could stay him, till he came against a cart wheele & stood in the water gate, afoze which time he was drowned & stark dead.

Termes adiourned, Two tides in one houre.

Michaellmas terme, which had bene adiourned by proclamation, began at Westminster on the first of Nouember. The same first day in the morning there happened two great tides at London in the Thamis, the first by course, the other within one houre after, which overflowed the marshes, with many baulks and fillers neare adioyning.

The fourteenth of November being Sunday, about midnight following, divers strange impressions of fire and smoke were seen in the air, to proceede forth of a blacke cloud in the north towards the South, which so continued till the next morning that it was day light. The next night following, the heavens from all parts did seeme to burne marvellous ragingly, and over our heads the flames from the horizon round about rising did meete, and there double and roll one in another, as if it had bene in a cleare forname.

Firey impressions.

The eighteenth day at night, were very stormie and tempestuous winds out of the south (I have not knowne the like out of that quarter) especially at midnight till the next morning that it was day light. These are to be received as tokens of Gods wrath readie bent against the world for sinne now abounding, and also of his great mercie, who doth but onely shew the rod wherewith we daily deserve to be beaten.

Tempest of wind.

This yeare at London after harvest, the price of wheate began by little and little to fall from seven shillings to three shillings the bushell, at which price it stayed little or nothing rising or falling all the yeare after, but bay salt was raised from three shillings to foure, five, and six shillings the bushell, the like whercof had never bene seene or heard within this realme.

Bay salt deare.

The foure and twentieth of Februarie, the feast of S. Marthie, on which day the faire was kept at Cokenburie, a strange thing happened there, for after a flood which was not great, but such as thereby the meadows neare adioyning were covered with water, in the afternoon there came downe the river of Tuon great numbers of flies and beetles, such as in sommer evenings use to strike men in the face, in great heapes, a foot thicke above the water, so that to credible mens judgement, there were seene within a paire of but-lengths of those flies about an hundred quarters. The muls thereabouts were damned by with them for the space of foure daies after, and then were cleansed by digging them out with shovels: from whence they came is yet unknowne, but the day was cold and a hard frost.

Flies in Februarie, the number strange.

The 26. of Februarie, betweene foure and six of the clocke in the afternoon, great earthquakes happened in the cities of Yorke, Worcester, Gloucester, Bristow, Hereford, and in the countries about, which caused the people to run out of their houses for feare they should have fallen on their heads. In Tewkesburie, Wydon, and other places the dishes fell from the cupboards, and the bookes in mens studies from the shelves. In Dorseton chappell the people being on their knees at Evening prayer, the ground moving, caused them to runne away in great feare that the dead bodies would have risen, or the chappell to have fallen: part of Rotherham castle fell downe, with certaine brick chimnies in gentlemen houses. The bell in the stire hall of Denbigh was caused to toll twice by shaking of the hail &c.

Earthquake.

On Easter day, which was the third of Aprill, about nine of the clocke in the forenoone, was disclosed a congregation of Anabaptists Dutchmen, in a house without the barres of Aldgate at London, whercof seven and twentie were taken and sent to prison, and foure of them bearing fagots recanted at Pauls crosse on the sixteenth day of May, in forme as followeth:

Anabaptists bare fagots at Pauls crosse.

Whereas I I. T. R. H. being seduced by the diuell the spirit of error, and by false false teachers his ministers, haue saue into certaine most detestable and damnable heresies, namely :

- 1 That Christ tooke not flesh of the substance of the blessed virgine Mary.
- 2 That infants of the faithfull ought not to be baptiz'd.
- 3 That a christian man may not be a magistrate, or beare the sword or office of authority.
- 4 That it is not lawfull for a christian to take an oath.

Now by the grace of God, and through conference with good and learned ministers of Christ his Church, I do vnderstand and acknowledge the same to be most damnable and detestable heresies, and do aske God here before his church, mercy for my sayd former errors, and do forsake them, recant and renounce them, and abiure them from the bottome of my heart, professing that I certainly beleue,

- 1 That Christ tooke flesh of the substance of the blessed virgine Mary.
- 2 That infants of the faithfull ought to be baptiz'd.
- 3 That a christian man may be a magistrate, or beare the sword and office of authority.
- 4 That it is lawfull for a christian to take an oath.

And further I confesse that the whole doctrine and religion established & published in this realme of England as also that which is receiued and preached in the Dutch church here in the city, is sound, true, and according to the word of God, whereunto in all things I submit my selfe, and will most gladly be a member of the sayd Dutch church, from henceforth utterly abandoning and forsaking all and euerie Anabaptistieall error.

Archbishop of Canterbury deceased.

The 17. day of May, about midnight following the right reuerend father in God Matthew Parker, doct<sup>r</sup> of diuinity, archbishop of Canterbury, deceased at Lambeth, and was there honorably buried.

This reuerend father examined thoroughly the English translation of the holy Scriptures, wherein he partly vsed the helpe of his brethren bishops, and other doct<sup>r</sup>s, and caused the same to be newely printed in the largest volume, for the furniture of many churches then wanting. Also making diligent search for the antiquities of the Byttons, and English Barons, to the end those monuments might be carefully kept, he caused them to be well bound and truely covered and such whereof he knew very few examples to be extant (among the which was Matthew Paris, Matthew Florilegus, Thomas Walsingham & other, all which he receiued of my hands) he caused to be printed. The famous palace of his see at Canterbury, first builded by Stephen Langton one of his predecessors, & since by long continuance decayed, and in Thomas Crammers time consumed with fire, he reuined builded, and fully restored with the charges of more then 14.000 £.

He founded a grammar schoole in Kichdale in the county of Lancaster.

Item, he gaue to the outward and inward library of the sayd colledge, a goodly company of printed bookes, and a great number of written bookes, of great antiquity and much value.

Item,

Item, he procured to the sayd colledge, the patronage of Saint Mary Church in London.

Item, he hath founded two fellowships in the sayd Colledge, and procured one Charter of Mortmaine to the sum of 100. l. by yeare.

Item he hath giuen to the same Colledge of silver plate double gilt, 309. ounces, 3. quarters, and surrendered to them a lease with the imprisonment of 14. l. 8. s. yearly for 17. yeares.

Item, 100. l. to the maintenance of a fire in the hall, from Halamas to Cardenas and by his last will and testament, 500. l.

Item, to diuerse schollers chabers within the sayd Colledge, diuerse bedsteds, with sufficient bedding and bookes to remaine for euer.

Item, he hath founded for euer five sermons to be preached in diuerse places of Norfolk every yeare in rogation weeke, and 40. s. to be deuoted at Norwich to the poore and other.

Item, to the city of Norwich one basin and ewer of silver and double gilt 173. ounces.

Item, to the towne of Hattal in Norfolk for euer an annuity of 50. s. to be deuoted to the poore, with a sermon in Rogation weeke.

Item, to Gurnal and Calus Colledge one schollership, with a standing cup & a pot of silver double gilt 55. ounces 3. quarters, and one nest of goblets with a couer silver and gilt with a number of good bookes to their library.

Item, to Trinity hall one schollership, a standing cup and a pot of silver & gilt, 53. ounces, a nest of goblets silver and gilt with a couer, & bookes to their library.

Item, to the Uniuersity library sixtie old auncient written bookes, and 50. printed bookes, &c.

The 21. of May being Whitson-euen, one man and ten women Anabaptists dutch were in the consistory of Pauls condemned to be bent in Smithfield, but after great paines taken with them, onely one woman was conuerted, the other were banished the land.

The 12. of June, stood at Pauls Crosse 5. persons Englishmen of the last term The family of Loue, who there confessed themselves viceroy to detest as well the author of that sect H. N. as all his damnable errors and heresies.

The 22. of July, two Dutchmen Anabaptists, were bent in Smithfield, who died in great horror with roaring and crying. The 30. of July in the afternoone was a great tempest of lightning & thunder. wherethrough both men and beasts in diuers places were stricken dead. Also at prime fell great abundance of hail, whereof the stones in many places were found to be 6. or 7. inches about.

The fourth of September, being Sunday about leuen of the clocke in the morning, a certaine glasse house which sometime had bene the Crossed friers hall, neare to the tower of London, brast out on a terrible fire, whereunto the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffes with all expedition repaired, and praesid there all means possible by water-buckets, hookes, and otherwise to haue quenched it, all which notwithstanding, whereas the same house in a small time before had consumed great quantity of wood by making of fine drinking glasses, now it selfe hauing within it neare eight thousand billets of wood, was all consumed

Frobishers first voyage for the discovery of Cataya.

The 15. of June, Martin Frobisher, being furnished of aduenturers, with two small barkes and one pinnelle departed from Blacke mall, vpon his voyage for the discouerie of a passage to Cataya, by the North-west seas. Vpon the 1. of July he had sight (as he iudged) of Frisland, but durst not approach the same, by reason of the great ice that lay alongst the coast: not far from thence he lost his pinnelle, & one of his barks, who mistrusting the danger of tempests returned home, with report y<sup>e</sup> their Generall Martin Frobisher was cast away, which captaine notwithstanding continued his course North-west beyond any man y<sup>e</sup> hath heretofore discovered, & the 20. of July had sight of a high land, which he named Q. Elizabeths Foreland: and after that another Foreland with a great passage, deuinding (as it were) the two maine lands asunder, this place he named Frobishers Straies. After he had passed firtie leagues further, he went on shoare, found the same to be inhabited with sauage people, caught one of them into his Barke, and returned into England in the moneth of August following: one of his company brought from thence a peece of blacke stone, much like to a sea-cole in colour, which being brought to certaine goldfiners in London, to make assay thereof, found it to hold gold, and that very richly for the quantity as they affirmed, but other sayd the contrary, and so it prooued.

The 29. of July, a woman was brent at Tunbridge in Kent, for poisoning of her husband: and two dayes before, a man named Oxley, was hanged at Maidstone for being accessarie to the same fact.

A strang-

A strange peece of worke, and almost incredible, was brought to passe by an Englishman borne within the city of London, and a cleark of the Chancery named Peter Bales, who by his industry and practise of his pen contrived and writ within the compasse of a peny, in Latine, the Lords prayer, the Creede, the ten Commandments, a prayer to God, a prayer for the queene, his polie, his name, the day of the moneth, the yeare of our Lord, and the raigne of the queene: And at Hampton court he presented the same to the queenes maiesty in the head of a ring of gold, covered with a Chisell, and presented therewith an excellent spectacle by him deuised for the rather reading thereof, wherewith her maiesty read all that was writtten therein, and did weare the same vpon her finger.

A strange writing writt in the compasse of a peny.

Also about the same time Marke Scalliot black-smith borne in London, for triall of workmanship, made one hanging locke of yron, Steele, and brasse, a pipe key filed three square, with a pot vpon the shaft, and the bow with two flcs, all cleane wrought, which weyed but one graine of gold or wheate corne: he made also a chaine of gold of 43. linkes, to the which chaine the locke and key being fastned and put about a fleas necke she drew the same, all which locke, key, chaine and flea, weyed but one graine and a halfe, as is yet to be seene vpon Coync-hill by Leaden hall, at the sayd Marks house.

The moneth of August, many complaints being brought to the Queenes maiesty and her counsell vpon the fluslingers, for great spoyle and robberies by them daily committed vpon her highnesse subiects, her maiesty gaue order to put foure good ships, and two barkes of her owne to the seas, vnder the charge of maister William Ho' Stocke esquire, comptroller of all her highnesse ships, with 1100. men, bisualled for six weekes, in which time was by them taken eight fluslingers ships and barkes, prizes, and 220. sea rousers in them, who were sent on land to sundry prisons.

Pyrats and sea rousers taken, and sent to prison.

Walker Deuereux earle of Essex, and earle marshall of Ireland, knight of the order of the garter, falling sicke of a lakke on the 21. of August was grievously tormented by the space of 22. dayes, and deccased on the 12. of September at Ducliu in Ireland.

Walker Deuereux earle of Essex died

The 10. of Nouember, in the city of Worcester, a cruell and vnnaturall brother (as another Caine) murdered his owne naturall and louing brother, he first smote out his braines with an axe, then cut his throte, and after buried him vnder the harty of a chimney, thinking thereby (though wrongfully) yet quietly to haue enioyed his brothers goods long before in his possession, but not long after this secret murder conuining to light, the murderer was rewarded according to his deserts.

A murderer of his brother hanged.

An. reg. 19.

The 17. of March, through a strange tempest which hapned in the North neare to a towne called Richmond, not onely cottages, trees, barnes, and haystackes, but also the most part of a church called Patrike Brumton, was ouerthrowne, with most strange sights in the ayre both terrible and fearefull.

The 26. of March, the new Conduit neare vnto Oldborne, and a standpart with one cocke at Oldborne bridge, were begun to be founded by William Lambe, sometime gentleman of the chappell to king Henry the eight, now citizen and clothworker of London, the water whereof is conueyed in pipes of lead from from diuerse springs to one head, and from thence to the said conduit and standart more then 2000. yards in length, all which of his owne costs and charges, amounting to the sum of 1500. pounds, was fully finished the 24. of August in the same yeare more of his charitable acts, I haue set downe in my summaries of the Chronicles.

Tower on London bridge taken downe.

This yeare in the moneth of Aprill, the decayed stone house, called the tower vpon London bridge, was begun to be taken downe, and the heads of traitors being remooued thence, were set on the gate at the bridge foot towards Southwarke. And on the 28. of August next following, sir Iohn Langley lord Mayor of the citie of London, laid the first stone of a new foundation of a tower in the same place, which tower was most beautifully finished in the moneth of September, in the yeare of Christ 1579.

Second voyage to Cataya.

The 31. of May, Martin Frobisher with one ship and two barkes furnished for that purpose, sailed from Harwich in Essex, towards Cataya by the north west seas, & entered his straits, beyond Queene Elizabeths Foreland about 30. leagues, where he went on shoare, and finding store of gold ore, as it was vntuly said, fraught his ship and barge, caught a man, woman and child of that countrie, and then on the 24. of August returning from thence, arrived at Milford haue in Wales on the 20. of September next following, but neither the man, woman, nor child liued long in this countrie, nor his ore proued gold but dross.

Strange sickness at Oxford.

The 4.5. and 6. daies of July, were the assises holden at Oxford, where was arraigned and condemned one Rowland Tenkes for his seditious tongue, at which time there arose amidst the people such a daunce, that almost all were smothered, very few escaped that were not taken at that instant: the Iurores died presently. Shortly after died sir Robert Bell lord chiefe Baron, sir Robert de Olie, sir William Babington, maister Weneman, maister de Olie high Sherife, M. Dauers, M. Harcourt, M. Kirlie, M. Pheteplace, M. Greenwood, M. Foster, M. Nashe, Sergeant Baram, maister Steuens, &c. there died in Oxford 300. persons, and sickned there, but died in other places 200. and odde from the 6. of July to the 12. of August, after which day died not one of that sickness, for one of them infected not another, nor any one woman or child died thereof.

Tempest in Suffolke.

On sonday the 4. of August, betwene the houre of 9. and 10. of the clocke in the forenoone, whilst the minister was reading of the second lesson in the parish church of Blithborough a towne in Suffolke a strange and terrible tempest of lightning and thunder brake through the wall of the same church into the ground almost a yard deepe, brake downe all the people on that side aboue twenty persons, then rent the wall by to the Westrie, clef the doore, and returning to the steeple, rent the timber, brake the chimes, and fled toward Bongey six miles off. The people that were stricken downe, were found groueling more then halfe an houre after, whereof a man more then forty yeares, & a boy of fifteene yeares old were found stark dead, the other were scorched. The like flash of lightning and cracks of thunder rent the parish church of Bongey nine miles from Norwich, working in sunder the wiers and wheelles of the clocke, slue two men which late in the bell-frey when other were at procession, and scorched another which hardly escaped.

And here I thinke good to set downe a declaration sent by the Queene's maiestie of England vnto the King of Spaine, containing a iustificacion of her proceedings with the States of the low countries.

The Queene's maiestie being giuen to vnderstand of diuerse most slanderous and false brutes given out touching her proceedings and dealings with the States of the Low countries, tending as it were to make her the authour and principall nourisher of the ciuill troubles in the said countries: and doubting that the sowers and spreaders abroad of the said brutes, to seek by all meanes they may to induce her good brother the king of Spaine to beleue the said false and malicious surmises to be true, with meaning thereby to breed a breach & interruption of the good amitie betweene them: her Maiestie hauing therefore nothing more in recommendation then her honour, and to be reputed a Prince that desireth to maintaine and continue good amitie with the Princes her neighbours (whatsoever hath bene giuen out maliciously to the contrarie) being able to iustifie her whole actions before God and the world, aswell towards him as other Princes her neighbours, hath thought it very expedient for the earnest desire she hath to satisfie the said king, to set downe in writing a declaration (such as she will maintaine to be true in the word of a Prince) of her proceedings with the States, to the end the said King being truly informed therein, such causes and scruples of suspicion, as might any way hinder the good amitie betweene them, might be remooued, and the same restored to as great perfection and integritie as hath bene heretofore betweene any their progenitors, which said declaration, tending to that good end aboue mentioned, her Maiestie also hath thought meete to accompany aswell with an aduise vnto the said king, what way in her opinion were most fit for him to take for the continuance of the said countries vnder his obedience, and the restoring of the vnto their former quietnesse and repose, as also with her resolution in those cases of the Low countries, in case the said king shall not condescend to take some way of pacification, according to her Maiesties most sincere and friendly aduise.

A declaration sent by the Queene to the king of Spaine.

And first touching her proceedings with the States, she doubteth not but that if the king shall resort to his owne knowledg: and call to remembrance how often silence the first breaking out of the ciuill dissention in those countries, her Maiestie hath mooued him by sundrie ministers, sent as well vnto himselfe as vnto his vnder-gouernours in the said countries; forwarning both him and them of the mischicks presently then fallen out, and aduised him to take some speedie way for the prevention of the same, he cannot but in honour and conscience confesse, that her Highnesse hath therein discharged the dutie of a faithfull friend, and good ally in that behalfe. Of which aduise if it might please him to haue taken profite, those his countries being presently in a most perplexed state, had bene stayed from the ruine and destruction they are now apparantly running into, his people and subiects preserved from slaughter and bloodshed, his rich towncs continued vnspoiled, and the whole gouernement kept from perill of alienation: and if herein for her

G g g g

Maiesties

Maieslies iustificacion, neither these friendly offices, nor the word and faith of a Prince may suffice, yet her owne accounts themselves may serue to iustifie her in the eyes and sight of all the world: That she hath sought to continue those countryes vnder the Kings obedience, and hath not at any time intended to impatronize her selfe of any part of them, a matter which perhaps other Princes hauing like aduantages offered by some part of his people, would not haue refused, and therefore may thinke her selfe euill dealt withall, in case so rare an example should be so hardly or rather unfriendly interpreted. And as her Maieslie hath not left any good office vndone towards the King and his ministers tending to pacification, and the perswasions of those countries vnder his obedience: so on the other side, she hath not omitted by sundrie messengers sent both to the Prince of Orange and the States, aswell to perswade them to cease their ciuill warres, and to take some way of peace and agreement amongst themselves, as also to continue their auncient obedience vnder the said King their naturall Lord and soueraigne, being prouoked thereto vpon secret, but yet verie true and certaine aduertisements giuen her of great offers made vnto them by some (whom she forbeareth to name for good respects) to haue withdrawen them from their obedience. And herein it besides many perswasions vled by messengers sent of purpose to aduise them to continue their obedience to the King, her Maieslie had not furnished them in the time of their necessitie with a portion of money, aswell to serue them for the speedy execution of the pacification then in Treatie betweene Don Iohn and them, as for the keeping of them from a desperate putting off themselves into the hands of other princes, it did manifestly appeare that the pacification and accord had not bene so soone made, and that they for lacke thereof should haue bene diu-en for their defence, to haue deliuered some part of those countries, to the possession of such as would not haue bene remooued without the spending of many millions, and the losse of many thousand mens liues. Of the true cause of this support, her Maieslie is the more willing to make mention, for that she is insourued, that notwithstanding her good and sincere meaning in that behalfe, other wrong and sinister interpretations haue bene made of the same, as the like also hath bene done of other her proceedings. Amongst the rest, her Maieslie hath thought it expedient to answer one calumnie contained in a letter fathered on Don Iohn, and published in a booke lately set out by the States in their Iustificacion, by the which her Maieslie is charged to haue encouraged the Prince of Orange not to stand to the pacification, and withall did for his better encouragement, offer vnto him any assistance she could yeeld (a matter most slanderous and vntue) for that her Maieslie being giuen to vnderstand by the Viscount of Gaunt, sent vnto her from Don Iohn, how he found himselfe greued with the Prince of Orange, for that (as he affirmed) the said Prince did not obserue the said pacification, her Maieslie did immediatlie dispatch an expresse messenger vnto the said Prince, both to charge him with Don Iohns accusation, as also to aduise (and that most effectually) to obserue duely the said pacification, vling towards him some threats in case he should seek to violate the same, wherein she could find no other other disposition, but that he was most desirous to keepe all the parts of the said pacification, as the onely meane of the ending of the long ciuill warre. The like aduise did she also giue to the States, receiuing no lesse contentment of the pacification, being ratified first by Don Iohn, and then afterwards by the King, then they to whom the benefite thereof did most properly and peculiarly appertaine. Her Maiesties proceedings and dealings with the Prince and States hauing bene such as hath bene before allcaded and deduced, she doth appeale to the King himselfe, who she thinketh will truly and fully looke into the truth of the matter, and also to all others that shall not be transported with passion, whether the said proceedings are not to be maintained to be both iust and honourable, whatsoeuer hath bene maliciouslie giuen out to the contrarie. And herein hir Maiestie is perswaded, that hardly any other Prince that hath some waies bene so unfriendly dealt withall, and found so little account made of her aduises giuen both to the King and to his gouernours of those countries, would haue dealt in such friendly sort as she hath done: notwithstanding the said discouragements, her Maiestie thinketh it honourable for her, and meete for the place she holdeth, being the ancients allie that the Kings progenitors as Dukes of Burgundy haue, to continue still her former course in giving friendly counsell vnto the King. can not but proceede to the second point aboue mentioned, which is to yeeld her aduise, what way in her opinion, is to be taken for the appeasing of the present troubles, and the continuing of them vnder his obedience.

First, it is apparant that the pacification is broken, and as great hostilitie increased on both sides as may be, whereof she is heartily loze: the end, if it go on, will be an bitter desolation of the countries, or the lesse or alteration of them from the kings obedience, for helpe whereof her maiestie thinketh the best and expedientest remedies to be, that it would please him to receiue his subjects to his grace and fauour, that he would permit them to continue in their auncient liberties & charters, that he would commaund the due and iust execution of the pacification, and that he would appoint such a gouernour of his owne blood, as might like him and be gratefull to them, whereby they with great contentation might yeeld to him all due obedience, continue in their religion according to his pleasure, and do all things accorded in the pacification: which by reason of the great distrust growne on both sides, betwene Don Iohn and them, can neuer take effect, so long as Don Iohn shall remaine gouernour, for it seemeth they haue put on a determination, that rather then they will endure y<sup>e</sup> hard dealing which they think themselves assured they shall receiue by his gouernment, they will throw themselves into the protection of any other prince. They charge him with the breach of the pacification: he on the other side offereth to stand to his iustificacion, charging them with the said breach. Her Maiestie hauing heard the allegations of the ministers sent hither, both from Don Iohn, and the States, meaneth not to be a iudge betwene the, hauing rather a greater desire to reconcile the if she could, & to do them both good, than to discourse the faults & blemishes of either party. To reconcile the she findeth it impossible, and therefore for the stay of the troubles and of those mischiefs that otherwise are like to ensue, the onely way of remedie will be to make choise of some other tied to him by proximity of blood to be substituted vnder him in that gouernment, by which temperate course the troubles may well be appeased, the great effusion of blood auoyded, and the countries continued vnder his obedience, which otherwise are like to be alienated from him. If he shall like to follow this aduise, she seeth no disposition in the people to change their king, being dutifully minded towards him, with intention (in this behalfe they may be reckoned) to innouate nothing, but to maintaine, and duly obserue the late pacification made at Gaunt.

And like as for the contentment of the States and the appealing of the troubles she wisheth Don Iohns renouation: so considering how euill affected he sheweth himselfe toward her, alwell by letters intercepted, as by secret practises and dealings with the Queene of Scots, a matter very dangerous to the good quiet of her state, as the bearer can more amplie informe him touching diuerse particularities in this behalfe: she can not but in respect of the continuance of the good amitie which she wisheth to be betwene the King and her Maiestie, be the more earnest to presse the King therein, looking for no continuance of good amitie and good neighborhood, so long as a minister so euill affected towards her shall reside there, and being desirous that such ministers might be employed on both sides, as would desire rather to increase the amitie than to hinder it.

This her aduise tending to none other end, but to preserve those countries vnder her obedience, and the continuance of good amitie betwene them, she hopeth the King will accept in no lesse friendly part then it is by her sinceritie meant. And in the meane time untill his minde be knowne in this behalfe, her maiestie fearing the great forces prepared by Don Iohn, with the assistance of the French already marching towards him, will driue her auncient friends the states of the low countries, to the one of these two extremities: either to be overcome by foraine forces, and so endangered to foraine seruitude: or else constrained for the withstanding thereof to giue themselves ouer to some other prince, both which can not but be perillous to the king presently, dangerous to her Maiestie hereafter, and an vtter destruction to the whole countrey. Her highnes therefore for the benefit of the said King, & the auoyding of her owne perill (vpon promises and assurance giuen by the said states, to yeeld the king his due obedience, & make no further innouation in matters of religion, but to obserue the pacification of Gaunt) hath promised for the causes & respects aboue mentioned, to yeeld them a support of money and men, onely to stay them from further danger of alienation, or else their ruine.

Which proceedings of hers, if the King shall not be induced to like of, whereby her Maiestie shall discouer that his intention is by force of armes to alter and dissolue the ancient forme of gouernment, and by taking away their ancient lawes and liberties, to make it a land of conquest, and to people it with garrisons of men of warre. And that the end and scope of his intention should tend to that which is discouraged by Elconedoes letters, wherein he writeth that the enterprise of England is of more facility then the enterprise of the Isles, whereby her Maiestie shall perceiue the disposition of so ill a neighbor to her and her royall estate, then her Maiesties resolution is to employ all the power she shall be able to make for the defence of her neighbors, and preservation of her owne estate.

As on the contrary side, if he shall incline to their reasonable demand in giving them such a gouernor as they can better like of, then of Don Iohn, and they notwithstanding shall go on in disobedience against him, & make other innouations contrary to the promises they haue giuen and professed to her, she will turne her face against them, and in assistance of the king yeeld him the best ayde she can to bring them to reason and conformitie. And in the meane season, untill she may be thoroughly informed hereof, she hath thought good, for auoyding of effusion of christian blood, and for many other good and necessary respects, to deale both with Don Iohn and the States for a surceance of armes which if he shall refuse to yeeld vnto, and the States shall be willing, because she seeth it manifestly, that it concerneth the Kings honor, and profite of his countrey, she will not cease to go on with like offices towards them, as she hath begun. Thereby onely to defend them from foraine tyrannie, to keepe them in the kings obedience from aliening themselves to any other potentate, and to defend her selfe and her dominions from the perils that thereby she seeth manifestly to ensue.

The seuenteenth day of Januarie, Simon Pembroke dwelling in Southwarke, being a figure singer, and vehemently suspected to be a coniuier, by commandment of the ordinarie Judge of those parts, appeared in the parish Church of Saint Sainour, at a court holden there, which Simon being busied in entertaining a Proffor, and hauing money in his hand, leane his head vpon a pewe, wherein the proffor stood: which after he had done a certaine space, the proffor began to lift vp his head, to see what he ayled, and found him departing out of life, and straightway the said Simon fell downe ratling a little in the throat, and neuer spake word after: this was done euen as the Judge came into the church, who said it was the iust iudgement of God towards those that bled sorcerie, and a great example to admonish other to feare the iustice of God. After his clothes being opened, there were found about him five diuelish Bookes of coniuration and most abhominable practises, with a picture of time of a man hauing three dice in his hand, with this writing, Chaunce Dice fortunately, and diuise papers of such like matters, as he had dealt in for men, such as are mentioned in Leuiticus the twentieth Chapter and the sixt verse: If any soule turne himselfe after such as worke with spirits, and after soothsayers, to go a whooring after them: (saith the Lord,) I will put my face against that soule, and will cut him off from among my people.

And on the 31. of July, after many attempts, & sundry times being put backe by Islands of ice in his streights, he recovered his long wished port, & came to anchor in the Islands, newly by her maiesty named Meta Incognita, where (as in the yeare before) they freight their ships with the like pretended Gold ore out of the mines, & then on the last of August returning thence, arrived safely in England about the first of October, but their Gold ore after great charges proved worse then good stone, whereby many men were deceived, to their bitter bewoings.

Cassimere
receiued.

The 22. of January, about 7. of the clocke at night, John Cassimere Count Palatine of Rhene, duke of Bauare, landed at the Tower of London, was there by diuerse noblemen and others honourably receiued, and conueyed by candle light, and torch light to sir Thomas Greshams house in Bishops gate streete, where he was receiued with sounding of trumpets, drums, fifes and other instruments of musicke, and there both lodged and feasted till Sunday next, that he was by the nobility fetched to the court at Westminster, where he talked with her maiesty, and after lodged in Sommerset house. In the weeke following, he hunted at Hampton court. On Monday the first of February, he beheld a valiant Jussling and running at the Tilt at Westminster: on the next morrow he saw them fight at barriers with swords on horsebacke. On Tuesday he dined with the Lord Maior of London: On Wednesday with the Dutches of Suffolke, at her house called the Burgokening or Barbican, by red crosse streete: On Thursday at the Stillyard, &c. On the 8. of February, the queene made him knight of the garter, by deliuering to him the collar, and putting the garter on his leg at White hall: and on the 14. of February, he departed from London homewards, with great rewards given by the queenes maiesty, the nobility, men of honor, the maior of London, and the citizens of that city.

Deepe snow.

The 4. of February, and in the night following, fell such abundance of snow, that on the first in the morning, the same was found at London to lye two foote deepe in the shallovell, and otherwise, being driven by the wind, very boysterous in the North-east, on banks, an ell or yard and halfe deepe, in the which drifts of snow in the countries, many cattell, and some men and women were ouerwhelmed and lost: it snowed till the 8. day, and freazed till the tenth. Then followed a thaw with continuall raine a long time after, which caused such high floods, that the marshes & low grounds being drowned for the time, the water rose so high in Westminster hall, & after the fall thereof, some fishes were found there to remaine.

That the new Testament and Gospell of Christ are but mere foolishnesse, a fable of men, or rather a mere fable.

Item, that man is restored to grace by the mere mercie of God, without the meane of Christs blood, death and passion.

Item, that Christ is not God, nor the Saviour of the world, but a mere man, a sinfull man, and an abhominable Idoll.

Item, that all they that worship him are abhominable Idolaters: And, that Christ did not rise againe from death to life by the power of his Godhead, neither, that he did ascend into heauen.

Item that the holy ghost is not God, neither that there is any such holy ghost.

Item, that baptism is not necessarie in the Church of God, neither the vse of the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. For the which heresies, he was condemned in the consistorie, and sentence was read against him by the bishop of Norwich, the 14. of Aprill, and thereupon deliuered to the Sheriffes of Norwich, and because he spake words of blasphemie against the Queenes maiestie, and others of her counsell, he was by the Recorder master Sergeant Windham, and the Maior sir Robert Wood of Norwich, condemned to lose both his eares, which were cut off the thirteenth of May in the market place of Norwich, where he confirmed his blasphemous speeches against our Saviour Iesus Christ for the which on the twentieth of May he was bent in the raffell ditch of Norwich.

one

one Thomas Appletree a young man and seruant to maister Henry Cary, with two or three children of her Maiesties chappell, and one other being in a boate on the Chamis, rowing vp and downe betwixt the places aforesaid, the aforesaid Thomas Appletree had a caluer of harquebuse, which he had three or four times discharged with bullet, shooting at random very rashly, who by great misfortune shot one of the watermen, being the second man next unto the bales of the sayd barge, laboring with his oare (which fate within fire foote of her highnesse) cleane through both his armes: the blow was so great and grievous, that it moued him out of his place, and forced him to cry and scritch out piteously, supposing himselfe to be slaine, and saying he was shot through the body. The man bleeding abundantly, the queenes maiesty shewed such noble courage as is most wonderfull to be heard and spoken of, for beholding him so maimed, she neuer basted thereat, but bad him be of good cheere, and sayd he should want nothing that might be for his ease, &c. For the which fact the sayd Thomas being apprehended, and condemned to death: was on the 21. of July brought to the water side, where was a gibbet set up, directly placed betwene Deford and Greenwich, & when the hangman had put the rope about his necke, he was by the queenes most gracious pardon deliuered from execution.

Floods.

In September and October fell great winds and raging floods in sundry places of this realme, wherethrough many men, cattell, and houses were drowned. In the towne of Newport the cottages were borne downe, the coyne lost, pasture ground ouerwhelmed, and cattell drowned. In the towne of Bedford the water came vp to the market place, where cupboards, chests, stools and founnes swam about the houses, their ferrell, coyne and hay was wrackt and borne away. Also the towne of Saint Edes in Huntingdonshire was ouerflowed suddenly in the night, when all men were at rest, the waters brake in with such a force, that the towne was almost all defaced, the swans swam downe the market place, and all the towne about, the boats did floate. Gornamchester was suddenly suppressed, their houses floden full of water when men were at their rest, their cattell were destroyed: about the 14. of October, the sea did swell, the marchants lost their goods, many were drowned, which were after found in great numbers.

Earthquake.

The 6. of Aprill being Wednesday in Easter weeke, about 6. of the clocke toward euening, a suddē earthquake hapning in London, & almost generally throughout England, caused such amazednes of the people as was wondrous for the time, & caused them to make their earnest prayers vnto almighty God. The great clocke bell in the palace at Westminster, strake of it selfe against the hammer with shaking, as diuerse clockes & bells in the city & elsewhere did the like: the gentlemen of the Temple being at supper, ran from the tables, and out of their hall with their kniues in their hands, a peece of the Temple church fell downe, some stones fell fro Pauls church: And at Christs church in the sermon while a stone fell from the top of the church, which killed out of hand one Thomas Grey an apprentice, & another stone also brused his fellow seruant named Mabel Eueret, so that she liued but 4. dayes after: diuerse other were sore hurt with running out of the church: diuerse chimnies in the city, part of the fell downe, the houses were so shaken. The earthquake continued, in or about London not passing one minute of an houre, & was no more felt: but eastward in Kent and on the sea coast it was felt thre times: as at Sandwich at five of the clocke, the land not onely quaked, but the sea so foamed, that the ships tottered. At Dover also at the same houre was the like, so that a peece of the cliffe fell into the sea, with also a peece of y<sup>e</sup> castle wall there: a peece of Saltwood castle in Kent fell downe, and in the Church of Hode the bells were heard to sound. A peece of Suttin church in Kent fell downe, the earthquake being there both heard and felt. And in all these places and other in east Kent, the same was felt thre times to mooue, to wit, at five, at nine and at eleven of the clocke.

The 19 of Aprill the ferry at Lambeth was drowned with five men & foure horses, other two men and five horses swam to land, and were saued.

Earthquake
in Kent.

The first of May, after 12. of the clocke in the night, was an earthquake felt in diuerse diuerſe places of Kent, namely at Aſhford, great Chart, &c. which made the people there to riſe out of their beds, and run to the churches, where they called vpon God, by earneſt prayers to be mercifull vnto them.

This yeare were many monſtrous birthes, and ſtrange ſights to beſeene, which I ouerpaſſe in this place, for that I haue partly touched them in my ſummaries.

Francis Drake his voyage round about the world.

Alſo this yeare maſter Francis Drake returned into England, hauing ſailed round about the world (as is affirmed) thus it was begun: on the 13. of December, in the yeare of Chriſt 1577. he ſet ſaile from Plimoth with a ſcette of 7. ſhips to wit, the Pellicane admirall, the Harigold, the Elizabeth, barke Benedick, and a pinnace: he ſell with the cape Canbine on the coaſt of Barbary the 25. of y ſame moneth, and ſo coaſting along, the 27. of December found an Iſland called Hog: adoy, lying one mile diſtant from the maine: in this Iſland the generall erected a pinnace, which he had with three other brought ready framed out of England, which being finiſhed he departed the laſt of December. On the 17. of January he arrived at cape Blank, & left the ſame on y 22. of that moneth, & on the 27. ſell with cape de Verde: on the 30. of January he ſell with an Iſland called Saint Iago: hauing put off cape de Verde in the beginning of February, they ſaw no more land vntill the ſixt of April 1578. that they ſell with the coaſt of Braſill, in the latitude of 33. degrees beyond the line, and with much ado entred the riuer of Plate: from whence departing he ſell with the ſtraite of Magelan the 20. of Auguſt, and paſſed through with three ſhips onely, hauing call off the other two as impediments, where, after they had bene toſſed many daies to and fro, in the night the ſixt of October the Harigold, wherein maſter Iohn Thomas was captaine, parted from the generall, and was no more heard of. And ſhortly after, the other wherein maſter Iohn Winter was captaine parted alſo, who hauing loſt his company, came home againe through the ſtraites. The golden Hind (or Pellicane I thinke) held on her courſe to Chily, Lima, Coquimbo, Arica, Panama, & ſo all along the backe ſide of America to the line-ward, and paſſed the line the ſixt day of March, and the ſixteenth of March being on land at the Ile of Caones, he paſſed ſouth north-ward till he came to the latitude of fortyſeuen, thinking to haue come that way home: but being conſtrained by fogges and cold winds to forſake his purpoſe, came backward to the line-ward the tenth of June 1579 and ſtayed in the latitude of thirty eight to graue and trim his ſhip, vntill the five and twenty of July: and from thence ſetting his courſe ſouthweſt, he ſell the thirde of October with an Ile 8. degrees from the line northward, and the 4. of Nouember he ſell with Ternate one of the Iles of Moluca, where being curioſly entertained of the king, he tooke in certaine tun of cloues, and came homeward to a little Iſland, where he ſtayed to trim his ſhip 26. daies, where he furniſhed himſelfe with wood, and erected a ſmiths forge for to make ſuch yron worke as was needfull for the repairing of his ſhip: and from thence the 12. of December he went toward Malaca, but not able to continue his courſe weſtward for the wind, was conſtrained to recouer the north of the Iles of Selchers: after this the ninth of January comming towards Iaua maior they ran themſelues vpon ground, and ſtucke faſt twenty houres, not looking but for death, but eſcaping that danger, they continued their courſe ſtill weſt, & came to Iaua maior alſo named, and there touching they bent their courſe ſouthweſt to y cape of Sona Speranca, the after they kept their course north west, and fell with the coast of Ginea, from thence bending their course north north west, they came to the line, and then shaping their course north and by west, they came to the height of Azores, where finding the wind westerly, they came home into England in the yeare 1580. And in the yeare next following, to wit, 1581. on the fourth of Aprill, her maiestie dining at Deptford in Kent, after dinner entered the ship which captaine Drake had so happily guided round about the world, and being there, a bridge that her maiestie had passed over, broke, being upon the same more then 200. persons, and no man hurt by the fall, and there she did make captaine Drake knight in the same ship, for reward of his service his armes were given him, the world in a ship, which ship by her maiesties commandement is lodged in a pocke at Deptford, for a monument to all posterity of that famous and worthy exploit, whereof a worshipfull gentleman maister William Borough in his preface to a booke intituled, A discourse of the variation of the compasse, or magneticall Needle, hath these words: So now at length (saith he) our countryman sir Francis Drake, for valourous attempt prudent proceeding and fortunate performing his voyage about the world, is not onely become equall to any of them that liue, but in fame farre surpassing.

Sir Francis Drake knighted, and his commendation.

On the tenth of October (some say on the seuenth) appeared a blasing star in the south, bushing toward the east, which was nightly scene dimunishing of his brightnesse untill the 21. of the same moneth.

Blazing starre.

The 17. day of October were made eight sergeants at law, to wit, first William Fleetwood Recorder of London, the second, Edward Flowerdew, the third, Thomas Snagge, the fourth, William Periam, the fift, Robert Halton, the sixt, Iohn Clench, the seuenth, Iohn Puckering, the eight, Thomas Walmesley, maister Snagge was sicke, and therefore had a writ directed to two maisters of the chancery to take his oath, and so was swoyne in his chamber at Greys Inne, the other seven were swoyne at Westminster, and yeld their feast in the new Temple at London.

Sergeants feast.

The 19. of October proclamation was published at London for the apprehension and seuerer punishing of all persons suspected to be of the family of loue.

Proclamation against the family of loue.

There arriued vpon the west coast of Ireland certaine companies of Italians and Spaniards, sent by the Pope to the ayde of the earle of Desmond in his rebellion, which fortified themselves strongly neare Smertwicke, in a fort which they call Castle del oze, there erecting the popes banner against her maiestie, which when the lord Grey of Wilton deputy of Ireland vnderstood, he marched thitherward, & the 6. of Nouember hearing of the arriual of the Swifeshure, the Tigar, the Tide, the Herlion, and other of the queenes maiesties ships, and also of three barkes fraughted from Limericke and Roike with victuals, on the morrow after marched towards the fort, vnto the which he gaue so hotte an assault, that on the ninth of Nouember the same was yeilded. all the Irish men and women hanged, and more then foure hundred Spaniards, Italians, & Biscayes put to the sword, the colonell, captaines, secretary and other (to the number of twenty) saved for ransom. In which fortresse was found good store of money, basket, bacon, oile, wine, and diuerse other provisions of victuall, sufficient for their company for halfe a yeare, belesse any more powder, shot, & other furniture for 2000. men and bywards.

Proclamation
on against Iesuites.

About the twelfth of Januarie, proclamation was published at London, for the revocation of sundry the Quenees maiesties subiects remaining beyond the seas, vnder colour of study, and yet liuing contrarie to the lawes of God and of the realme. And also against the retaining of Iesuites and massing priests, sowers of sedition, and other treasonable attempts, &c.

Parliament
at Westminster.

The 16. day of Januarie, the lords & barons of this realme began to sit in the parliament house at Westminster: and on the twentieth day of Januarie the Quenees maiestie went from White hall to the parliament house by water. Whereas a great challenge of iustes was signified by way of deuise before her maiestie on Twelke night last past, to haue bene perfoymed the fifteenth day of Januarie, her maiesties pleasure was, for diuers considerations the same should be deferred untill the two and twentieth day of the same moneth: on the which day the same was most couragiously accomplished in the accustomed place at Westminster, where many stauces were broken, but through the great concourse of people thither repairing, many of the beholders, as well men as women, were sore hurt, some maimed, and some killed by falling of the scaffolds overcharged.

Mice deu-our the grasse in Daneley.

About Hallowtide last past, in the marishes of Daneley hundred, in a place called Southminster in the countie of Essex, a strange thing hapned: there suddenly appeared an infinite multitude of mice, which overwelming the whole earth in the said marishes, did there and gnaw the grasse by the rootes, spoiling and raiuing the same with their venomous teeth, in such sort, that the cattell which grazed thereon were smitten with a murreine, and died thereof, which vermine by policie of man could not be destroyed, till at the last it came to passe that there flocked together all about the same marishes, such a number of owles, as all the shire was not able to yeeld: whereby the marsh-holders were shortly deliuered from the veration of the said mice.

Banqueting house at Westminster

This yere (against the coming of certaine ambassadoys out of France) by her maiesties appointment, on the five and twentieth day of March in the morning being Easter day) a banquetting house was begun at Westminster, on the south west side of her maiesties palace of White hall, made in manner and forme of a long square, 332. in measure about, 30. principals made of great mass, being 40. foote in length a peece, standing vpright, betweene euery one of the mass, ten foote asunder and more, the wals of this house were closed with canuas, and painted all the outsidies of the same most artificially, with a worke called ruslike much like stone. This house had two hundred, ninctie and two lights of glasse. The sides within the same house was made with 1. heights of degrees for people to stand vpon: and the top of this house was wrought most cunningly vpon canuas with workes of iwie and holly, with pendants made of wickar rodde, and garnished with with Bay, Rue, & all maner of strange flowers garnished with spangles of gold, as also beautified with hanging tofeans made of hollie and iuie. with all maner of strange fruits, as pomegranates, oranges, pompions, cucumbers, grapes, with such like spangled with gold and most richly hanged: betwixt these tooles of haies and iuie were great spaces of caruies, which was most cunningly painted, the clouds with flarres, the sunne and sun-beames, with diuerse other coats of sundry sorts belonging to the queenes maiesty, most richly garnished with gold. There weres of all maner of persons working on this house, to the number of 175. Two men had mischances, the one broke his legge and so did the other. This house was made in three weekes and thre dayes, and was ended the 18. of Aprill, and cost 1744. l. 19. s. 6. d.

On the 16. day of Aprill, arrived at Douer these noblemen of Fraunce (commissioners from the French king to her maiesty) Francis Burbon prince Dolephine of Auergne, Arthur Coslaie marshall of Fraunce, Lodowic Lutignian lord of Laneoc, Trauerkins Caercongin county of Tillir, Bertrand Salingurons lord Moihfenelon, monsieur Manaislour, Barnabie Brislen president of the parliament of Paris, Claude Pinart, monsieur Marchemont, monsieur Veraic, these came from Grauesend by water to London, where they were honourably receiued and entertained, and shortly after being accompanied of the nobility of England, they repaired to the court, and banquetting house prepared for them at Westminster as is aforesayd, where her maiesty receiued them, and afterward in that place most royally feasted and banqueted them. Also the nobles and gentlemen of the court desirous to shew them all curtesie possible, prepared a triumph in most sumptuous order, vpon Whitson monday and tuesday: the chiefe challengers of which attempts were, the earle of Arundell, Frederike Lord Willinsse, Philip Sidney, Foulke Girell, and other: the defendants to the number of one and twenty, all which of them ranne fire courtes against the former challengers, who performed their parts valiantly. On the tuesday they went to the tourney, where they did very nobly, and after that to the barriers, wherewith they fought courageously, &c. as moze at large I haue set downe, in the continuance of Reine Woolles Chronicle.

Noblemen of France arrived in England.

Justing, turningey and barriers.

The one and twenty of June in the night, certaine young men, drawing ropes thwart the streete, on both sides the crosse in Cheape, to stop the passage, did then fasten ropes about the lowest Images of the layd crosse, attempting by force to haue plucked them downe, which when they could not do, they plucked the picture of Christ out of his mothers lap, whercon he late, and otherwise defaced her, and the other Images by striking off their armes. Whereupon proclamation was made, that who so would browze the doers should haue forty crowones. But nothing came to light, for euery one of them kept others counsell, till their dying dayes.

Crosse in Cheape defaced.

Thomas Burcher brewer (for that he & others on the 27. of June had congregated themselves in west Smithfield of London, and in other places, in maner of rebellion) was on the 30. of June whipped from Newgate to west Smithfield, and was there rescued, taken from the bedles, and sent away to shift for himselfe:

The thirteenth of July, Richard Coxo Doctor of Diuinitie, sometime schoole-maister to king Edward the first, deane of Westminster, and of Christs college in Oxford, and since bishop of Ely, deceased and was buried at Ely.

This yeare were to be seene in London, two Duchmen of strange staturs, the one in height seuen foot and seuen inches, in breadth betwixt the shoulders three quarters of a yard and an inch, the compasse of his breast one yard and halfe, and two inches: and about the wast, one yard, quarter, and one inch, the length of his arme to the hand a full yard: a comely man of person, but lame of his legges (for he had broken them with lifting of a barrell of beere.) The other was in height but three foot, had neuer a good foot, nor any knee at all, and yet could he daunce a galliard, he had no arme, but a stumpe to the elbowe or little more on the right side, on the which singing, he would daunce a cup, and after tolle it about three or foure times, and euery time receiue the same on the said stumpe: he would shoote an arrow neare to the marke, flourish with a rapier, throw a botole, beate with a hammer, beu with an ale, sound a trumpet, and drinke euery day ten quarts of the best beere if he could get it. In my life on the seauenteenth of July sawe the taller man sitting on a bench bareheaded, and the lesser standing on the same bench, and hauing on his head a hat with a feather, was yet the lower. Also the taller man standing on his feete, the lesser (with his hat and feather on his head) went bynight betwene his legs and touched him not.

Monsieur
D. of Anio.

An. reg. 24.

The eighteenth of July, Euerard Haunce a seminarie priest, was in the sessions hall in the old Baily arraigned, where he affirmed that himselfe was subiect to the Pope in ecclesiasticall causes, and that the Pope hath now y same authoritie here in England that he had an hundred yeres past, with other trayterous speeches, for the which he was condemned to be beheaded, hanged, botwelled and quartered, and was executed accordingly on the last of July.

At the same sessions were brought from the Fleet, the Gate-house at Westminster, Newgate of London, and the Counters, hundrie prisoners indicted for refusing to come to the church, all which being consulted by their owne confession, had indgement accordingly to pay twentie pounds for euery moneth of such their wilfull absence from the church.

The thirtieth of October were arraigned at Westminster hall Iohn Stubbes, Hugh Singleton, and William Page, these were all three condemned to lose their right hands, for writing, printing, and dispersing a libell, which they intituled, the Gaping Gulph, against monsieur Francis Duke of Anio the French kings brother. And on the third day of Nouember they were all led to Westminster, where Iohn Stubbs, and William Page lost their hands by chopping off, but Hugh Singleton had his pardon.

The first of Nouember, monsieur Francis Duke of Anio, the French kings brother, and other nobles of Fraunce (hauing lately arrived in Kent) came to London, and were honorably receiued, and retained at the court with banquetting and diuerse pleasant shewes and pastimes, &c.

On the 20. of Nouember, Edmond Campion Jesuit, Ralfe Sherwine, Lucas Kerbie, Edward Rishon, Thomas Coteham, Henrie Orton, Robert Iohnson & James Bosgraue, were brought to the high bar at Westminster, where they were severally, and al together indicted vpon high treason, for that contrary both to loue & duty, they forooke their native country, to liue beyond the seas vnder the Popes obedience, as at Rome, Rheimes, and diuers other places, where (the Pope ha- uing with other princes praised the death and depriuation of our most gracious princeesse, and viter subuersion of her state and kingdome, to aduance his most ab- hominable religion) these men hauing bowed their allegiance to the Pope, to obey him in all causes whatsoeuer, bring there, gaue their consent, to aide him in this most traiterous determination. And for this intent & purpose they were sent ouer to seduce the harts of her maiesties louing subiects, and to conspire and praide her graces death, as much as in them lay, against a great day, set and appointed, when the generall hauocke should be made, those onely reserued that ioynded with them. This laid to their charge, they boldly denied, but by a iurie they were approued guilty, and had iudgement to be hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

The first of December, Edmond Campion Jesuit, Ralfe Sherwine, and Alex- ander Brian seminarie priests, were drawne from the Tower of London to Cle- boyne, and there hanged, bowelled, & quartered. Lookt more in my continuation of Reine Woolfes chronicle.

The first of February the Quences maiestie with her whole court, accompa- nied the monsieur Francis Duke of Anio, from Westminster to Canterburie, where, when she had sealed all the french nobilitie, either tooke leaue of other, & her maiestie returned. The 6. of the same month the D. lodged at Sandwich, & on the next morning tooke the sea, bring accompanied of the earle of Leicester, the lord Hunsdon, the lord Howard knights of the garter, the lord Willowby, Lord Windfore, L. Sheffield, L. Howard and lord Audley, M. Sidney, sir George Cary, M. Iohn and Robert Carie, all three sonnes of the said Lord of Hunsdon, M. William Howard, brother of the said lord Howard, sir T. Sherley, sir T. Perot, sir Will. Russell, sir Will. Drury and sir George Bowser knights, & a great num- ber of Gentlemen, so as the whole traine that attended on the earle was 100. gen- tlemen, and more than 300. seruing men. The lord Hunsdon had of gentlemen and other to the number of 150. and the lord Howard had as many, all which sailed in fiftene ships to Flushing in Zeland. where the prince of Orange, & the States of the low countries receiued the Duke, and our English nobilitie with great ioy, conducing them from thence to Middleborough, & then to Antwerpe, where before the twentieth day of the same moneth, the States with great solem- nitie created the said Monsieur Duke of Anio, Duke of Lothar, Brabant, and marquesse of the sacred empire, and prince of the low countries, &c. And our nobi- lity returned into England.

Iohn Paine priest, being indicted of high treason for words by him spoken to one Eliot, was arraigned and condemned at Chelmsford on the last of March, and was there executed on the second day of Aprill.

The nineteenth of July, certaine ferkins of gunpowder (to the number of sixteen) and as many or more ferkins of surgeon, laden in a carre vpon Gally key, neare vnto the tower of London, some small portion of the same powder being shed on the ground, the horse in the said carre stroke fire with his foote, and fiered all together, wherethrough the surgeon was blowne out of the carre, some into the Chamis, some else where, one ferkin was driuen through a loamed wall that was boorded ouer, into a house there by. The Crane on the wharfe with the houses neare adioyning were sore broken, many men and horses sore blasted, so that three men and seuen horses died thereof.

Tempest in Norfolke.

The twelfth of August there rose a great tempest of lightning, thunder, whirlwind and raine, with hailstones fashioned like to the rowels of spurres, two or three inches about in the countie of Norfolke, betwene y<sup>e</sup> townes of north Walsham and Worsted the towne wherein the making of worsted, commonly called Norwich worsted, was first practised and tooke there beginning, which tempest beat the coine flat to the ground, rent vp many great trees, and shiuered them in peeces, or wound them like withs. At Denning, more then a mile from Worsted, the west doore of the church, weighing more then 300. pound waight, was lifted off the hookes, and throwne ouer the font within one yard of the chancel doore, the top of the church was riuen bp, and the lead as it were blowne cleane away, five webs of lead were ruffled bp together, like as they had bene cloths of linnen cloth, and blowne into the field without the churchyard. Also at east Ruffen were many barnes blowne downe, and houses incrouered.

Terme kept at Hartford.

This yeare Michaelmas terme was returned from the Vias thereof, untill the fourth returne of the same called Menle Michaelis, & from the said return, untill the the returne commonly called Craftino animarum next ensuing, and then recoured from Westminster to the castle of Hartford in Hartfordshire, there to begin in the said Craftino animarum, and to be continued till the end of the said terme, which was done accordingly.

This yeare Peter Morris a Dutch man, but a free denison having made an engine for that purpose, conveyed Thamis water in pipes of lead ouer the steeple of S Magnus church, at the north end of London bridge, and so into diuers mens houses in Thamis streete, new Fish streete, and Gasse streete by vnto the northwest corner of Leadon hall (the highest ground of the citie of London, where the wall of the first maine pipe ran first this yeare 1582. on Christmasse euen: which maine pipe being since at the charges of the citie brought by into a standerd there made for that purpose, and diuided into foure severall spoutes, ranne foure waies plentifully seruing to the vse of the inhabitants neare adioyning that will fetch it, and also cleansed the chanel of the streetes north toward Bishops gate, east towards Aldgate, south towards the bridge, and west towards the Stocks market: no doubt a great commoditie to that part of the citie, and would be far greater, if the said water were maintained to run continually, or at the least at euery tide some reasonable quantitie, as at the first it did.

Now to returne to Monsieur his successe after the great dignities, authorities, and titles bestowed on him, as ye haue partly heard (but is set downe at large in a particular treatise thereof, which I haue placed in Reine Woolles chronicle.) Francis of Valois, the kings onely brother, Duke of Lothere, Brabant, Lim-bourg, Gelders, Anio, Alanson, &c. earle of Flanders, Holland, Zelant, &c. marquesse of the sacred empire, lord of Friseland, &c. hauing now indifferently well with his good succelles had in the victualling and reinforcing the sieges of Cambray and Lochem, and winning the towncs of Alast and Endonan) gotten the hearts of the people, and by that meanes placed his Frenchmen in Dunkerke, Winneburgh, Dinmide, Dermond, Chino, and other places, thought now be-sing young and euill counsell) to make himselfe a more absolute Prince, according to the titles giuen him, and not to rule with the aduise of the States of the countries. Wherefore hauing come to him out of Fraunce the Marshall Byron, with great troups of Swissers, and Frenchmen, he now causeth them all at one time, to wit, on the seventh of Ianuarie, to inuade so many towncs as they could make themselves maistres of, which with them tooke effect in the aboue named towncs, but at Bruges they were put out. And at Antwerpe on the said seauenth day, vnder the pretence to muster his army without the towne, by-on the very noone time of the day when the Citizens were at dinner, he causeth two gates (as vncertaine by which he would go) to be opened for him, and the chaines ouerthwart the streets to be unchained, which (for some suspition had of the Frenchmen without) were locked: then he issued out with all his Court and a great number of gentlemen, very braue, mounted on great horses about 200. many of them being secretly armed vnder their garments, and comming to S. James gate, at the bridge without met him certaine of his companies of horsemen, and footemen, who staid themselves on both sides the way, making as it were a lane for the Duke to passe by with a few of his: who being past them, made token to the with his cap, to invade y city: wherupon his men killed y watch, with y Colonel Viereendell y stood bare headed, to ſee their prince paſſe. Then entered y gate 17. enſignes of footmen, & foure colonels of horſemen the Swiſſers following, & the duke crying to the march, march, La ville eſt gagnée, mais ne pillons point. being thus ſtrongly entered they cried, Ville gagnée, vive la meſſe, and tooke in on both ſide the Bulwarkes, turned the ordinance towarde the city, and came by diuerſe ſtreets almoſt to the miſt of the city. The citizens at their dinners hearing the alarum, very furioſly iſſued out, with ſuch weapons as firſt came to their hands, and ſet vpon them, firſt by the by lanes, and other ſome chayned vp the ſtreets, and ſo barred them from going any further. They turne all againſt the ſouldiers that were entered the city with moſt violent ſhot. In the meane ſpace the citizens neare and about the gate with their harquebules beſtove their ſmall ſhot as thicke as haile out of windowes vpon the gate, where firſt they killed a horſe, and then diuers men entering, which troubled the other following, y a great number was euen in the very gate killed, & ſo heaped one vpon another that the gate was ſtopped, whereby all that were entered within the city, in leſſe then in one houres ſpace were killed or taken priſoners. Wherein the citizens behaved themſelues ſo valiantly, & ſo manly, that many for lacke of leade pellets tooke their monney out of their purſes, bowed it with their teeth, and put it in ſteed of pellets in their harquebules. In this ſkirmiſh of ſo liſtle ſpace, were ſlaine about 1530. freſh horſemen, and footmen, told at the burying, and more then 2000. priſoners taken, amongſt the which were the earle of Fernaugus, the biſhop of Conſtance, and many other notable perſonages. And amongſt the dead were the earle of S. Agnau, & his ſon, the earle of Challeaurouille, the ſon of the marſhall of France Biron: monſieur de Saiſonnall gouernor of Milnoy, the ſon of the L. Mirabeau, and others. A marvellous act of citizens in their defence without any ſouldiers againſt old ſouldiers & tried men of armes, and number of ſo great nobility. The prince of Orange with others had reſuſed to go forth, and his danger was not ſmall, with other gentlemen more, and lords of the religion. The prince Dolphin, the earle of Linnall and others were with the duke lookers on, and interceſſours for their friends, whom they reckened dead. After that ſaſt, the duke with his campe was forced for lacke of victuals and neceſſaries, to retire him with his army toward Machlin, and from thence with great difficulty, paſſing great waters, with loſſe of many a man, got to Doornond, where he was kept in by the generall Norris, with 23. enſignes Engliſhmen and Scots, ſo that he lacked victuals, and neceſſaries, whereby he was forced, as alſo to haue his priſoners reſtored, to enter into a treaty with the ſtates, to ſurrender all the towneſ by his men poſſeſſed, and to retire him to Dunkirke: where further with the ſtates, by interceſſion of princes was hoped a reconciliation to be made. But he ſeing the countrey unwilling, and finding himſelfe ſicke (through melancholie as was thought) retired from Dunkirke toward Fraunce. And ſo loone as he was retired, the Prince of Parma for King Philip, cauſed Dunkirke to be beſieged, ſeue Frenchmen left within it. And as the ſtates generall, and the prince of Orange would haue ſent thither to reſcue the towne, the marſhall Biron with his Frenchmen and Swiſſers, the Flemings, chiefly they of Gaunt, partly for hatred of the French,

French, and partly that many now were become Spanissh, would not suffer him to come ouer into Flaunders, whereby Dunkerke was forced to surrender: and this losse being imputed to the Duke, increased his sicknesse, so that he died at Chateau Thierie the 10. of July. Anno 1583. and was royally buried at Paris, and now to our matters at home.

The thirtieenth day of Januarie, in the parish of Armitage, in a place called Blackmoze in Dorsetshire, a peece of ground containing three acres, remooued from the place where it was first planted, and was carried cleane ouer another close, where Alder and Willow trees grew, the space of fortie goads (euery goad containing 15. foote) and hath slopt vp a high way that directed totowards the market towne of Cerne, and yet notwithstanding the hedges wherewith it was inclosed, inuironed it still, and the trees stand thereon bolt vpriight, sauing one Oake that is well nigh twenty goads remooued: the place where this ground had his being, is left like vnto a great pit.

The same 13. day of Januarie being sonday, about foure of the clocke in the afternoone, the old and underpropped scaffolds round about the Beare garden, commonly called Paris garden, on the Southside of the riuer of Chamis ouer against the citie of London, ouercharged with people, fell suddenly downe, whereby to the number of eight persons men and women were slaine, and many others sore hurt and bruised to the shortening of their liues. A friendly warning to such as more delight themselves in the crueltie of beasts then in the works of mercie, the fruits of a true professed faith, which ought to be the sabboth daies exercise.

The third of Februarie being sonday, William Bruister Haberdasher (a man of more then 60. yeares old) being lodged ouer the southwell porch of Saint Brides church in Fleetstreete, with a woman named Mary Breame (whome the same Bruister had bailed out of Bridewell) were both found smouldered to death, in manner as shall be shewed. On the same sonday in the morning a wedding being celebrated in that church, a strong sauer was smelt, which was thought to be the burning of old shoes, or such like in some gentlemans chamber neere thereabouts, but in the afternoone before eurning prayer, the parishioners espied a smoke to issue out of Bruisters chamber, and thereupon made hast to his doore, which they found fast locked on the inside, and were forced to breake it open, and yet could not enter till they had ripped vp the lead and rooffe of the chamber, to let out the smouldering stench: which being done, they found Bruister dead, sitting on a settle by the beds side (in his apparell and close trussed) his right thigh and right arme vp to the elbow bent with the fire of a small pan of coales that stood before him. The woman also lay dead ouer the pan, so that her armes were bent, with the neather part of her bodie before to the breast, and behind to the shoulders, and nothing else in the chamber bent but the bottome of the settle wheron Bruister sat. Marie Breame had bene accused by her husband to be a nice woman of her bodie, but her husband being a bad man, and hauing spent faire and large possessions and all whatsoeuer, hauing but two pence left in his purse, hung himselfe on a tree, against a stone wall at Harten abbey in Surrey about Whitson-tide, in Anno 1592.

The 16. of Aprill in the morning, Thomas Worth and Alice Shephard were

To Hagdalen colledge in Cambridge, he gaue five. l. by yeare for one scholer to be taken out of his said schoole. To Christs colledge in Cambridge plate 45. ounces. To the 8. little poore almes houses in Croydon 50. l. to be bestowed in land for their reliefe. To the citie of Canterburie 100. l. to be employed vpon a stocke to set the poore on worke, which stocke (as I am informed) was neuer put to so good an vse.

Bernard Randolph esquire, senior sergeant to the citie of London, deceased on the 7. of August. This man in his life time deliuered 900. l. of good and lawfull money of England to the company of fishmongers in London, and bequeathed by his testament 1000. pounds more, all to be employed in charitable actions, as I haue set downe in my summarie, and in Reigne Woolles chronicle.

In the moneth of Iune, were sent to the seas a ship called the bark Talbot, and a small bark, both manned with 100. men vnder the charge of the worshipsful W. Borough esquire, cleark of her maiesties nauie, for apprehending of certaine outrageous sea-rouers, who for y they were many in number & wel appointed, so boldly behaved themselues, as y shortly after it was confidently bruted, y they had vanquished in fight the said ship & bark: but within few daies after, beyond all expectation, they were by the said W. Borough & his company discomfited & taken to y number of ten saile (whereof three were prizes, & some of the chiefe pirats, namely, Thomas Walton, alias Purser, Clinton, Ackinson, Wil. Ellis, Wil. Valentine, alias Bigh, Tno. Beuen, John Pollard, Edm. Copinger, Ro. Woodman, & John Euans, who on y thirtieth day of August were hanged at Wlapping in the Wlose besides London. Walton as he went toward the gallies rent his venetian breeches of crimosin taffata, and distributed the same to such his old acquaintance as stood about him, but Ackinson had before giuen his murrey velvet doublet with great gold buttons, & his like coloured velvet venetians laid with great gold lace apparell too sumptuous for sea rouers which he had worne at the seas, and wherein he was brought vp prisoner from Corfe castell in the isle of Porbeck to London) vnto such friends as pleased him.

Sea rouers apprehended and executed.

wich brent.

The same 13. of December, through negligence of vndiscrete persons betwix in the towne of Nantwich, the fire being carelesly left, upon some light matter, & so burst forth to the roofes of the house, and in short time increased, that from the west end of the towne the flame was disperfed so furiously into the towne, that in short space a great part of the towne was burned downe to the ground, & there was consumed about the number of 200. houses, besides brew houses, barnes, stables, &c. in all about 600. houses.

Someruill, Arden, and other arraigned.

About this time, John Someruill a furious young man of Elsworth in Warwickshire, of late discovered and taken in his way comming with full intent to kill the queenes maiesty, whom God long prosper to raigne ouer vs, confessed the treason, and that he was mooued therunto in his wicked spirit, by certaine trayterous persons his kinsmen and alics, and also by often reading of certaine seditious bookes lately published, for the which the sayd Someruill, Edward Arden a squire in Parkhall in Warwickshire, Mary Arden his wife father and mother in law to the sayd Someruill, and Hugh Hall priest, being with other before indicted at Warwicke, were on the 16. of December arraigned in the Guild hall of London, where they were found guilty and condemned of high treason. On the 19. of December, John Someruill, and Edward Arden, being brought from the tower of London to Newgate of the same city, & there shut vp in seuerall places: within two houres after, Someruill was found (desperatly) to haue strangled himselfe.
And on the morrow being the 20. of December, Edward Arden was drawne fro Newgate into Smithfield, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered: whose head with Someruills head was set on London bridge, and his quarters on the gates of the city, but the body of Someruill was buried in the Mooresfields neare vnto the windmills.

1584.
Carter executed.

On the 10. of January, at a sessions holden in the Justice hall in the Old bailey of London, for gaole deliuey of Newgate, William Carter of the city of London, was there indicted, arraigned, and condemned of high treason, for printing a seditious and trayterous booke in English, entituled, A treatise of schisme: and was for the same (according to sentence pronounced against him, on the next morrow drawne.

drawne from Newgate to Tiborne, and there hanged, botwelled, and quartered. And forthwith against slanderous reports spread abroad in seditious bookes, letters, and libels thereby to inflame our countrey men, and her maiesties subiectes, a booke was published, intituled, A Declaration of the fauorable dealing of her maiesties commissioners, &c. which booke also I haue caused to be set downe in the Continuation of the chronicle, first collected by Reigne Wolfe, and finished by Raphaell Hollenshed.

The 22. of Januarie John Watson bishop of Winchester deceased at Wolsley, and was buried at Winchester on the 12. of Februarie.

The tenth of Februarie, were arraigned at Westminster John Fen, George Haddock, John Munden, John Nutter, and Thomas Hemerford, all five found guilty of high treason, in being made priests beyond the seas, and by the Popes authoritie, since a statute made in Anno primo of her maiesties raigne, and had iudgement to be hanged, botwelled, and quartered: which were all executed at Tiborne on the 12. of Februarie.

The 21. of May, Francis Throckmorton esquire was arraigned in the Guild hall of the citie of London, where being found guilty of high treason, he was condemned, & had iudgement to be drawen, hanged, botwelled, & quartered. The 10. of July next following, the same Francis Throckmorton was conveyed by water from the tower of London to the Blacke friers staires, and from thence by land to the sessions hall in the Old bailey without Newgate, where he was deliuered to the sherifes of London, laid on a hurdle, drawne to Tiborne, & there executed according to his iudgement. A discovery of whole treasons, practised & attempted against the Quenes maiestie & the realme, were in the moneth of June published and printed in a booke intituled, A true and perfect Declaration of the treasons practised and attempted by Francis Throckmorton &c. And the same I haue set downe in the continuation of Reigne Wolfes chronicle.

The 19. of July, Robert baron of Denbigh, the onely son and heire of Robert earle of Leicester, departed this mortall life, being then of the age of thre yeares & somewhat more, at Wansted in Essex, whose funerail was there honorably kept on the first of August, and after his body was conueied to Warwike, and there in the chappell of Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike, honorably interred on the 20. of October. The 12. of Nouember, the quenes maiestie (returning after her progresse) came to her manor of S. James, where the citizens of London to the number of 200. the grauest for in coats of velvet, & chaines of gold on horse backe, and 1000. of the companies on foote (hauing with them 1000. men with torches ready there to giue light on euery side, for that the night drew on / receiued and welcomed her: And on the 24. day of the same moneth, her maiestie and the lords rode to the parliament, which was that day begun at Westminster.

In the moneth of January deceased Edward Fines lord Clinton, earle of Lincoln, and lord admirall of England, knight of the garter, and one of her maiesties priuy counsell, a man of great yeares and seruite, as well by sea as by land, he was buried at Windsoꝝ.

On the 26. of January, the earle with his traine passed from London to Grauesend, where taking post horses, they rid to Sittingborne, and from thence to Dover, where they embarked & landed at Calais on the 1. of february. On the 3. of february, y<sup>e</sup> earle with his whole traine went from Calais to Boloigne to bed, where they were very well entertained. On the 4. of february, they rid to Montreuil, on the 5. to Abbeuil, where they were met with 150. shot of harquebusiers. On the 6. they tooke their iourney to Amiens, where of monsieur Creuicure accompanied with 100. gentlemen, & best citizens, they were met halfe a mile without the towne, y<sup>e</sup> night the sayd Creuicure presented the earle with great store of very large & good fresh water fish, and the towne with wine of diuers sorts, the day following being Sunday, the sayd Creuicure invited the earle to dinner, which dinner was highly commended. After dinner, the earle with his traine went to Bethnill to bed, the next night to Cleremount, where he staid tuesday and wednesday: the tenth of february he went to Luzarch. On the 11. to S. Denis, where by the way he was met by sir Edward Stafford, her maiesties ambassador resident with the french king, who brought with him diuerse gentlemen of England, to the number of thirty horse, and so accompanied him to Saint Denis, where they kept company all the day following being Friday. On Saterday, his honor made his entry into Paris about two or three of the clocke at afternoone, there being of the lord ambassadors traine more then two hundred horse, and mid way betwene S. Denis and Paris, there met with them sent from the king, the duke of Montpensier a prince of the blood, the lord of Caignie, le Chapell aux Vifius, countie de Lude, de Piennre, de Malicorn, de la Mothienilon, who had sometimes bene ambassadour ligger in England, Destrie, Dabin, de Fontaines, de Cornillon, the marques of Curton, the countie de Grignan, all counsellors to the counsell, and knights of the holy Ghost. The duke of Tremouille, the countie Brisac, de Creance, Sancerne, Sancerre, and of Lazure, with a great number of lords and barons, gentlemen of the chamber. These did accompanie the earle of Darbie unto Hostell de Longe-neuill sometime called the Hostell of Aniou, there was his lordship with the other lords and gentlemen lodged, where was three tables very sumptuously furnished for them, all of the kings cost, the one table in the great chamber, for the lords and gentlemen servants to her maiestie, the other in the hall for the earle of Darbies gentlemen and the third in a gallerie beneath for gentlemen servants, besides liuerie into euery chamber, both of ware, wood, wine, and such like, in as great plenty as could be desired. On Sunday the 14 of february, y<sup>e</sup> said earle betwixt the houres of two & thre in the afternoone, went from his lodging by a posterne through the garden, accompanied with the said lords, De la Moth Fenelon, de Curton, and Grignan, together with other, and found the capitaines of the regiment of the kings garde, making two ranks on either side of the streete, beginning from the posterne to the Louure gate, who welcommed him in the kings behalf. Without the gate of the said Louure, he was receiued by the Lieutenants of the great Prouost of France and his archers. At the Louure gate by the tier de Montegnie, capitaine thereof to his maiestie, and his archers, which archers together with those of the great Prouost made two ranks from the said gate of the Louure, to the foote of the staires: from which foote, his Lordship was receiued by the tier de Perdillon, the French Lieutenant of the Smithers of the Kings guard, which from the foote of the said staires to the doore of the hall made two ranks, for his lordships passage. At the entrie of the hall, his lordship was receiued by the tier de Chasteau Vieux knight of the holy ghost, and capitaine of the archers of the Kings guard, who likewise from the said doore vnto the doore of the antichamber, made two ranks: from the doore of the antichamber, his lordship was receiued by tier de Combault of the holy ghost, chiefe maister de Hostelle to his maiestie, and by his gentlemen waiters: and there in the said antichamber, all the said earle of Darbies officers and gentlemen wearing liueries, were appointed to stay, and the Queenes seruants that proceeded next, went still forward: at the entrie of the chamber of estate, his lordship was receiued by the tier de Liencourt knight of the holy ghost, chiefe esquire of the kings esquire, and the other esquires of the esquire, together with the lieutenant of the hundred, gentlemen of his Maiestie, who made two ranks from that chamber doore to the chamber of audience, euery of them hauing halbarts in their hands. At the entrance of the antichamber, his Lordship was receiued by the Duke Ioieulx, accompanied with the gentlemen of the kings chamber ordinarie, who made two ranks from that chamber doore to the doore of the chamber royall. Into the said chamber royall first entred all the Gentlemen the Queenes Maiesties seruants, the lords that had receiued and accompanied the said earle and Lords: and the said Duke de Ioieulx accompanied the said earle of Darby vnto the bars that stood about the hall pace, or mounting floore in the said chamber, where the king stood at his beds feete, accompanied without the said barriers, on his right hand with the Cardinals of Bourbon, Vandome & Ioieulx, & on the left hand with the lords, y<sup>e</sup> princes of Contie, the countie de Soissons, & D. Montpensier, princes of y<sup>e</sup> bloud: the dukes of Brucers, Delbeuse, de la Tremouille, de Retz, Monsieur le Châcellor,

The ſaid earle with the L. ambaffador ordinarie of England, aloneely entred within the ſaid haltpace within the barriers vnto his maieltie, of whom they were receiued with great curteſie, & as amiable countenance as could be, & the earle deliuered the Duchenes maielties letters vnto the king with great reuerence, & then making rehearfall of that he had in charge to ſay, the ſaid ambaffador preſented vnto the king the lords Sands and Windſore, and other the Engliſh knights and gentlemen, which all one after another mounted vpon the haltpace, kiſſed their hands, & did their reuerence vnto the king. Then the earle tooke his leaue, and was conducted by all the lords and captaines vnto the place where they had firſt receiued him. Afterward he went to ſalute the queene mother, & at the entrance into her chamber, he was receiued by Monſieur de Lanſac knight of the holy ghoſt, & knight of honor vnto the ſame queene, whom he found accompanied with her neece the princeſſe of Loraine, ſtanding at her beds head, the princeſſe of Condie and Fontie, and the duches of Peuers ſtanding at the beds feete, the duchelles of Dufe, and of Re, and other ladies & gentlewomen in great number. From thence his lordſhip was conueyed to the queene regents chamber, at the entrance whercof he was receiued by the countie de Fieſque knight of the holy ghoſt, and her knight of honor, finding her accompanied with the duchelles of Montpenſier & Loieulx, who ſtood at her beds feete, the lady of Roideu her lady of honor, and other ladies & gentlewomen in great number, & then returned to y<sup>e</sup> ſaid hoſſel de Longueuille. On monday the 15. of february, the K. by Monſieur le Mothſenelon ſold the lord ambaffador his mind, touching the receit of y<sup>e</sup> order, that he intended to receiue it on Thursday following in the after noone, at y<sup>e</sup> Auguſtine friers, which was done accordingly, with a mantle of blew velvet, and a hood, & collar of the order, with a booke of the ſtatutes of the order, which all were inueſted vpo the king, in a place called Hailon de nauralles, but y<sup>e</sup> oth was miniſtered vnto the king in y<sup>e</sup> friers church, Magnificat being ſung. On the 28. of february, y<sup>e</sup> ambaffador with his traine tooke their leaue, at whoſe returne fro y<sup>e</sup> court to his lodging, he was preſented y<sup>e</sup> night with a rich cupboord of plate, worth 1200. l. at the leaſt: & vnto maiſter Clarenceaux was giue a chaine of gold, worth 120. l. & better, of 236. links, to maiſter Somerſet a chaine of 150. links, worth 100. marks, & to Thomas Milles a chaine of the ſame value. On Thursday next, the earle with his traine ſet forthward homewards from Paris vnto S. Denies, & ſo were lodged all the way, in the ſame lodgings that beſore they had bene receiued in, and arrived proſperouſly in England, from Bolotigne to Douer the twelfth of March, & on the Tueſday following were brought to the queenes maielties preſence at Greenwich, who graciously welcomed them home.

This yere sir Walter Mildmay knight, Chancelor of the Exchequer, and one of her maiesties priuie counsell, founded a colledge in the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, bp:n the houle and ground of the late frier preachers Dominiks, or blacke friers, in the preachers streete, and named it Emanuell colledge.

Emanuell
Colledge
founded.

The 29. of March, the parliament was dissolved, at the breaking vp whereof, the Queenes maiestie made an Oration in the Parliament houle, to such effect as followeth. My Lords and ye of the lower houle, my Silence must inuie the owner so much, as to suppose a substitute sufficient to render you the thanks that my hart yeeldeth you : not so much for the safe keeping of my life for which your care appareth so manifest) as for the neglecting your priuate future perill, not regarding other way then my present state, no prince herein (I confesse) can be surer tied or faster bound then I am, with the linke of your good will, and can for that but yeeld a hart and head to seeke for euer all your best : yet one matter toucheth me so nere as I may not ouerskip : religion, the ground on which all other matters ought to take roote, and being corrupted may mar all the tree : and that there be some faultfinders with the order of the clergie, which so may make a slander to my selfe & the Church, whose ouer-looker God hath made me, whose negligence cannot be excused, if any schismes or errors hereticall were suffered. Thus much I must say, that some faults & negligences may grow & be, (as in all other great charges it hapneth) & what vocation without ? all which if you my lords of the clergie do not amend, I mind to depose you, looke you therefore well to your charges, this may be amended without heedles or open exclamation. I am supposed to haue many studies, but most philosophical: I must yeeld this to be true, & I suppose few & be no professors) haue read more. And I need not tel you & I am so simple & I vnderstand not, nor so forgetfull, & I remember not, & yet amongst my many volumes, I hope gods booke hath not bene my seldomest lectures, in which we find & which by reason (for my part) we ought to beleue, & seeing so great wickednes & griefes in & world, in which we liue but as way-faring pilgrimes, we must suppose & God wold neuer haue made vs but for a better place, & of more comfort then we find here. I know no creature & breatheth, whose life standeth hourly in more perill for it then mine own, who entred not in any state without sight of manifold dangers of life & crown, as one & had the mightiest & greatest to waile with. Then it followeth, & I regarded it so much, as I left my selfe behinde my care. And so you see, that you wrong me too much (if any such there be) as doubt my coldnes in that behalfe : for if I were not perswaded that mine were the truth of Gods will : God forbid I should liue to prescribe it to you. Take heede lest Ecclesiastes say not too true: They that feare the hoie frost, the snow shall fall vpon them. I see many ouer-bold with God Almighty, making too many subtil scannings of his blessed will, as lawyers do with humane Testaments: the presumption is so great, as I may not suffer it (yet minde I not hereby to animate Romanists, which what aduersaries they be to mine estate, is sufficiently knowen) nor tolerate new-fanglednesse. I meane to guide them both by Gods true rule : in both parts be perils, and of the latter I must pronounce them dangerous to a kingly rule, to haue euerie man according to his own censure to make a doome of the validitie and priuie of his princes government, with a common baile & cower of Gods word, whose followers must not be iudged but by primate mens exposition, God defend you from such a Ruler that so euill would guide you. Now I conclude, that your loue & care neither is nor shall be bestowed vpon a carelesse Prince, but such as for your good will passeth as little for this world as who careth least, with thanks for your free subsidie: a manifest shew of the abundance of your good wills, the which I assure you, but to be employed to your weale, I could be better pleased to returne then receiue. Thus much her Maiesties Oration. In this parliament a subsidie of 2. s. 8. goods, and 4. s. lands was granted, and two fifteenes by the laitie.

4000. Londoners trayned vp with shot, &c.

In the month of Aprill about the 14. day, by commandement of her Maiesty, the citizens of London appointed out of their companies of the same citie, to the number of 4000. men, with armes, ensignes, drums, fises, and other furniture for the wars, the greater part whereof were shot, the other were pikes, and halberds in faire coslelets: all those to be trayned by vnder expert capitaines, with sergeants of the bands, wisers, and other necessary officers, mustered, and skirmished dayly at the Hiles end, and in Saint Georges field: and on the 18. of May (having ouer night set forward out of S. Georges field) mustered in the parke at Grenewich, and skirmished before the Queenes maiestie, who gaue to them great thanks for their aduinitie and paines.

Earle of Arundell sent to the Towre. Earle of Northumberland found to haue murdered himselfe.

The 25. of Aprill, Philip Howard earle of Arundell was brought prisoner into the towre of London, for attempting to haue passed y<sup>e</sup> seas without licence, &c.

Copie of the inquisition by the crowner.

The 21. of June, Henrie Percy earle of Northumberland, prisoner in the Tower of London, vpon vehement suspicion of high treason, was there found dead, and also of his owne diuelish intent, and of his malice before pretended, to haue murdered himselfe, as moze at large may appeere, by inquisition made by a substantiall Iurie, taken before the crowner of London, as followeth verbatim with the record.

Verdit of the Iurie.

An inquisition taken at the citie of London, that is, within the Tower of London, in the parish of Alhallowes Barking, in the wards of the Tower of London, on Monday being the 21. day of June, in the yere of the raigne of our Soueraigne Lady Elizabeth by the grace of God, Queene of England, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. the 27. before William Squire Gentleman, Coroner to our said Soueraigne Lady the Queene within the Citie of London and the liberties of the same, vpon the view of the body of Henrie Percie knight, late earle of Northumberland, late prisoner there within the Tower of London aforesaid, for suspition of high treason by him supposed to be done, there lying dead, and slaine: by the othes of Nicholas Wheeler, Simon Horsepoole, T. Gardener, William Leaufson, Owen Morgan, Henry Lodge, William Abraham, William Horne, Thomas Russell, Iohn Porter, Robert Dowe, Anthony Hall, William Curtis, Thomas Wood, Matthew Dolman, Thomas Martin, Richard Slesford, Iohn Trot, Philip Smith, Thomas Tailor, and Henrie Bowdler, of good & lawfull men of the same ward, and of thre other wards to the same ward next adioyning, as the manner and custome is in the citie aforesaid, to inquire how, in what manner, and when the said Henrie Percie late earle of Northumberland came to his death. Which Iurie do say vpon their othes, that on the 21. day of this instant moneth of June, in y<sup>e</sup> yere of the raigne of our soueraigne lady Elizabeth by the grace grace of God queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. The 27. aforesayd, and long before the foresayd Henry late earle of Northumberland prisoner in the tower of London situate in the parish of Alhallowes Barking aforesayd, in the ward of the tower of London aforesayd, for suspicion of high treason aforesayd, by him against our soueraigne Lady the Queene supposed to be committed, and the aforesayd earle so remaining prisoner, and being placed in a certaine chamber within the tower of London aforesayd; there prisoner remaining imagining and intending himselfe diuellishly and feloniously to kill & murder before the aforesayd 21. day of June: that is to say, the 16. day of June in the 27. yeare aforesayd, did prepare a certaine bag of iron & Steele of the value of 10. s. & with certaine bullets of lead, & a certaine quantity of gunpowder, contained in a small box, & caused the aforesayd gun, the bullets of lead, and the gunpowder to be brought into the foresayd chamber unto him the sayd earle of Northumberland, & to be deliuered to the same earle then and there by the hands of Iames a Price yeoman to execute his diuelish and felonious purpose and intention, which bag aforesayd, the foresayd earle caused secretly to be hidden in a certaine matresse vnder the bolster of his bed in the chamber aforesayd, and then and there, the foresaid 21. day of June in the 27. yeare aforesayd, betwene the houres of twelue and one in the night of the foresayd 21. day of June, thinking and intending to prosecute and follow his diuelish intention and purpose aforesayd, did bolt the doore of the aforesayd chamber, and the inner part of his sayd chamber towards himselfe, lest any man should foresee or withstand his diuelish, felonious, and malicious intent: and the sayd doore of his foresayd chamber being so bolted, the same earle then and there into his bed himselfe did lay, and vpon this afterward, that is to say, the foresaid one and twentieth of June, in the seauen and twentieth yeare aforesayd, about the houres aforesayd, within the tower of London aforesayd, situate and being in the parish of Alhallowes Barking aforesayd, in the ward of the tower of London aforesayd, not hauing the almighty God or his feare before his eyes, but being moued and seduced by the instigation of the diuell, of his malice aforesayd, pretended, did take vp into his hands the foresayd dagge of yron and Steele, then and there made ready, charged with gunpowder and three bullets of lead, and the aforesayd dagge to the left part of his breast neare vnto the pappe of the same part of his breast, then and there feloniously and diuellishly did put, and vpon the same part of his breast the foresayd dagge did discharge, by reason of the violence of which gunpowder, and of the aforesayd three bullets of lead, the foresayd earle into his body and heart, and through his chine bone, euen into his right shoulder, himselfe then and there with the aforesayd bullets of lead, feloniously and voluntarily did strike, giuing vnto himselfe then and there one mortall wound of the depth of twelue inches, and of the breadth of two inches: of which mortall wound aforesaid, the foresaid earle within the tower of London aforesaid, the day and yeare, parish and ward aforesayd, instantly died. And so the Jury doth say vpon their oathes aforesayd, that the foresayd earle, the day and yeare, and place aboue writen, of his diuelish intent aforesayd, and of his malice before pretended, feloniously and voluntarily himselfe did kill, and murder in manner and fourme aforesayd, against the peace of our soueraigne lady the queene, her crowne and dignity. But what goods and chattels the aforesayd earle in the time of the felonie and murthre of himselfe aforesayd committed, had, or as yet hath, the Jury know not, &c. in witnesse whereof, &c. This was the verdict of the Jurors, whereby it remained to prouide for the bestowing of his wretched carcasse, which on the 23. day of June was buried in S. Peters church within the sayd towne of London. This was the end of that earle, the mawer of whole murder, and part of his treasons are dilated, as the same was publickly deliuered in the Star-chamber, and after published in a booke intituled: A true and summarie report of the declaration of some part of the earle of Northumberlands treasons, deliuered, &c. And are set downe in my continuation of Maister Reine Woolfes Chronicle.

Entertainment of the deputies for the States of the Low countries.

On the 26. of June arrived at London, deputies for the States of the Netherlands, or Low countries, who were lodged about the tower streete, and had their diet for the time of their abode here very worshipfully appointed (all at the charges of her maiesty) in the clothworkers hall in Wyndhorne lane, neare to the sayd tower streete. These on the 29. of June, being the feast of the Apostle Peter and Paule, repaired to the court, then at Greenwich, where by vertue of their commissions from the united countries, they presented to her maiesty the sovereignty of those countries, to wit, of Brabant, but the commission (for the siege) of Antwerpe not full authorized, of Guelder, of Flaunders, of Holland, of Zeland, of Utrecht, and of Friseland: for Brabant, Iaques de Grise great baily of Bruges, counsellor of the Frankes for Enclerre Rotger of Barfoll gentleman: for Flaunders, Noell de Garlie lord of Shonewalle: for Holland, Iohn Wanderdoelt, lord of Portwaite: Iosse de Menin pensionarie of Dordrecht, Iohn of old Barmelt, pensionarie of Rotterdam, and D. Francis Maelo: for Zeland, Iacob Dales counsellor and pensionarie of Tergoest: for Utrecht, Paulus Buis, D. of the lawes: for Friseland, I. Fritzma gentleman, H. Ansona president of Friseland, and Lads Iangema gentleman. All these falling on their knees before her maiesty, and so remaining for a long space, one of them, to wit, Iosse de Menin counsellor and pensionary of Dordrecht, one of the commissioners for Holland, made to her maiesty this oration in french: Madam, les Estates des Prouinces Vnies des pais, &c. as I haue set downe in Reine Wolfe, with also the same in English thus: Madam, the States of the united prouinces of the Low countries, most humbly thanke your maiesty for the good affection and fauour, which it hath pleased you to shew to the sayd countries in their necessity, and to confirme the same with so many testimonies, and that lastly, after the execrable assault committed vpon the person of the late prince of Orange, at what time it pleased your maiesty to let the sayd States vnderstand by your Ambassadors maister Davison, what care you had of our defence and preservation, and also by Segnieur de Cris, the great displeasure which your maiesty conceived, to see the States frustrated of the hope which they had founded vpon the treatie of Fraunce. But since the care which your maiesty hath alwayes had ouer our good and conseruation is not thereby any whit diminished, but hath more plentifully increased, according as the the necessitie of our affaires required, for which the said countrie in generall, and euery of vs in particular remaine perpetually bound to your Maiestie, and acknowledge the same with all fidelitie and obedience. And as the said States (Madame) did consider that since the decease of the Prince of Orange, they haue sustained the losse of diuerse of their holdes and good towncs, and that for the preservation of the layde Countrie it is needfull for them to haue a Prince and Soueraigne ruler, which may warrant and defend them against the tyrannie and vniust oppression of the Spaniards and their adherents, which daily more and more enforce themselves, by their greater power, and all other meanes to destroy and overthrow the layde Countreies, and reduce this poore people into perpetuall seruitude, worse then that of the Indians, vnder the importable yoke of the detestable Inquisition of Spaine. Considering also that the bodie of the Townes and Communalities of the aforesaid Countreies haue a firme hope that your Maiestie will not see them perill, according to the desire of their enemies, which make this long and cruell warre, all which outrages, the States of the layd Low countries (following the diligence and band which they owe to the Burgesses and citizens) are to sustaine, repell, and to turne from them, by reason of the manifest tyrannie and seruitude, which the Spaniards attempt to bring in and to lay vpon the poore people, thereby to preserve their liberties, rights, priuiledges, and franchises, with the exercise of the true Christian Religion, whereof your Maiestie by good right carrieth the title of Protectrice and Defendresse, against which the said enemies, and their associates alreadie haue and still do make many leagues, deuise many subtilties, treasons, and ambushes, not ceasing daily to practise and imagine them against the person of your Maiestie, and to the prejudice of the rest of your realmes and states, whom the good God hath preserved untill this present, for the wealth of the Christians, and sustentation of their Churches. Wherefore (Madame) it is so, that for causes, reasons, and other considerations, the said States haue assembled and concluded vpon a good and firme resolution, to haue recourse vnto your Maiestie, sith it is an ordinarie matter amongst all people, and oppressed nations, in their calamities and oppressions to craue support, and fauour against their enemies, of Kings and Princes neare vnto them, but especially of those who be endued with magnanimitie, pietie, iustice, and other princely vertues, to which effect the States haue appointed vs to come vnto your Maiestie, to present vnto the same, the Principallitie, Soueraigntie, and iust gouernment of the said Provinces, vnder certaine good and equall conditions, chiefly concerning the preservation of the exercise of the reformed Religion, and of the ancient priuiledges, liberties, franchises and customes, and next of the administration of the affaires, pollicie, and iustice of the warres in the said countrie. And although that these countreies haue sustained much hurt by these long and continuall warres, and that the enemy hath taken diuerse strong places and fortres in the same countreies: yet there is besides the same in the countreies of Brabant, Gelderland, Flaunders, Palmes, and Querset, many good towncs and places, which defend themselves against the force of the enemy, and the countreies, of Holland, Zeland, Vtrich, and Frisse, be yet (thanks be to God) entire

and whole: in which there be many great and strong towines and places, faire riuers, and deepe Ports and hauens of the sea, out of which your maiestie and your successors may receiue diuerse good seruices, fruites and commodities, wherof it is needlesse here to make any long recitall. Onely this amongst other matters deserueth good and especiall consideration, that the vnitng of those countries, of Holland, Zeland, Frisse, and the towines of Sluze, and Ostend in Flaunders, vnto the Realmes of your Maiestie, importeth so much as the absolute gouernment of the great Ocean sea, and by consequence, and assurance, and perpetuall felicitie for the subiects of your worthie Maiestie: which we most humbly beseech, that it will please the same to condescend vnto vs in the said points and conditions, and in that which followeth, which is, that you will for you and your lawfull successors in the crowne of England, be protectours of the reformed religion, as the principall iusticer and soueraigne gouernour of the said countries: and consequently to receiue the people of the same as your most obedient subiects vnder the protection and continuall safeguard of your Maiestie, they being a people assuredly so faithfull and louing to their princes and lords (be it spoken without haunting) as any other nation is throughout Christendome. In doing wherof (Madame) you shall preserve many goodly churches, which it hath pleased God to assemblie in these latter times in the same countries, at this present in many places grievously afflicted, and you shall deliuer the same countrie and people (of late before the vniust deedes of the house of Spaine) very rich and flourishing, through the great commoditie of the sea, ports, hauens, riuers, traffique, and marchandize, wherof they be naturally endued: you shall I say (Madame) deliuer them from ruine and perpetuall bondage of bodie and soule, being a worke right royall and most magnificient, acceptable to God, profitable to all Christianitie, worthie immortall commendation, answerable to the magnanimitie and heroicall vertues of your Maiestie, and ioyned with the assurance and prosperitie of your dominions and subiects. Whereupon we present vnto your Maiestie the said articles and conditions, reuerently praying the King of kings to preserve your maiestie from your enemies, to increase your glorie and felicitie, and for euer to keepe you in his holy protection.

This oration ended, and the summe thereof considered, it pleased the Queenes maiestie, by direction of her wise and politicke Counsell, to incline her heart to the ease and reliefe of the said oppressed people. And because her owne subiects should not be utterly vnacquainted with her highnesse doings in that case, there was published by authoritie a booke intituled, A declaration of the causes mouing the Quene of England to giue aide to the defence of the people afflicted and oppressed in the Low countries. Dated at Richmond the first of October 1585, and the 27. yeare of the raigne of our soueraigne ladie the Quene. This booke was printed in the Latine, Italian, and English tongue. And I haue let doونه the same in Reigne Woolles chronicle.

The fift of July, Thomas Awfield a seminarie priest, and Thomas Welley Aufield and Welley executed. diar, were arraigned at the sessions hall in the Old bailey, found guiltie, condemned, and had iudgement as felons to be hanged: for publishing of bookes containing false, seditious, and slanderous matter, to the defamation of our soueraigne lady the Queene, these were on the next morrow executed at Tiborn accordingly.

On the 16. of July, by the sudden fall of a bricke wall in Chamis streete of London neare unto Dowgate, five persons were overwhelped and slaine, to wit, a man and his wife, the wife being great with child, and two children, the one their owne, the other a nurse child, and a poore man that liued by charitie, having no knowne dwelling place. Five persons slaine by fall of a wall.

On the same sixteenth day of July, was sir Francis Russell knight, lord Russel, third sonne to Francis Russell earle of Bedford, slaine with a dag in the borders of Scotland beside Bartwike, by a Scot boine in those parts, as they met vpon a truce day. And on the next morrow, to wit, the 17. of July, Francis Russell earle of Bedford, knight of the garter, and one of her Maiesties privie counsell (father to the late named sir Francis lord Russell slaine on the borders of Scotland) deceased, and was honorably buried at Cheinies in Bedfordshire, on the eight of September next following. The earle of Bedford and his sonne deceased.

On the thre and twentieth of July, certaine souldiers were pressed in the severall wards of the citie of London, which souldiers being furnished for the wars, and clothed in red coates, all at the charges of the companies and citizens, let forth toward the seas on the thirteenth of August, and were transported over into Holland, Zeland, &c. as other the like souldiers out of other parts of the realme, before had bene transported to serve for the defence of the Low countries under generall Norris, and other approued captaines. Souldiers transported into the Low countries.

On the 4. of August, betwixt the houres of foure and five of the clocke in the morning, at the end of the towne called Motingham in Kent, eight miles from London, in a lane not farre from the houses, the ground began to sinke, three great clines being swallowed up, the tops falling downward into a hole with the rootes upward, turning round in the falling, and driven into the earth past mans sight: and before ten of the clocke that present day, the ground and trees were sunke so low that neither the one or other might be discerned, the hole being sometimes filled with water, and other whiles neither bottome, trees, or water may be perceived. The compasse of this hole was then about fourscore yards, and being sounded with a lead and line of fiftie fadomes, cannot therewith find or feele any bottome. Ground and trees sunke & swallowed vp.

This yeare on the fourteenth of September, sir Francis Drake knight, Generall as well by sea as by land, Christopher Carlile esquire lieutenant Generall, Edward Winkar, Martine Frobisher, Francis Knowles, with diuerse other gentlemen, captaines, and two thousand three hundred souldiers and sailers in five and twentie ships and pinnelles departed from Plimmouth, and passing by the Isles of Bayon and the Canaries, arrived at Saint Iago, which city they tooke and burned: after they sailed to Saint Domingo, which they spoiled and ransomed: from thence to Carthage, which they also with great valour and especiall daunger tooke, spoiled, and ransomed: and retiring homewards Sir Francis Drake his voiage to Domingo and Carthage.

raced, and burned the fort and citie of Saint Augustine in Terra Florida : and the seven and twentieth day of July in Anno 1586. arrived at Plimmouth.

On the 15. day of September, to the number of two and thirtie Seminaries, massing priests, and others late prisoners in the Tower of London, Mar-tinsale, Kings bench, and other places, were embarked in the Marie Martine of Colchester, on the southside of the Thamiz right over against S. Katherines, to be transported over into the coastes of Normandy, to be banished this realme for ever, by vertue of a commission from her maiestie before specified. These being safely transported over to Bologne, wrote their certificate thereof as followeth:

Certificate returned by the banished men.

Whereas upon your Honours commission directed unto Anthonie Hall, and Thomas Stockar, for the transporting of vs whose names are under written, into the coastes of Normandie, who accordingly tooke vs into a barke called the Marie Martine of Colchester, on the southside of the Thamiz, right over against that part of Saint Katherines next to London bridge, the fiftenth day of September 1585. according to the computation of England: our will is to testifie unto your good honours, that they the said Anthonie Hall and Thomas Stocker haue generally so well vsed vs in all respects, that we cannot but acknowledge our selues much beholding to so curteous and louing officers: neuertheless com-ming along the sea, and meeting with her Maiesties Admirall in the Dotonnes, who promising that we should not be disturbed in our course into the Prorince of Normandie, according to your Honours sayde commission, we had not from him departed two leagues, when as a Flushingier with his people suddenly entered vpon vs, being peaceably stowed vnder hatches, and in our quiet rest, with their drawne swords, their caluirs and their matches flered in their hands, to our great terrour and discomfort, the most of vs being very soze sea-sicke, expecting at that instant nothing but either the rigorous dint of the sword, or bullet of the caluier. Notwith, partly being had by our commissioners with them, they departed, after which time, we considering the generall daunger on the seas, besought with one consent your Honours commissioners to set vs on land at Calice: but they in no wise yeelding thereunto, at last by reason of our importunitie in such daunger and weakenesse, yeelded to set vs on shore at Boloigne, partly by reason of the feare we were then put in, and partly for that we feared afterward moze vnrasonable measure, but specially the greatest number of vs so soze sicke, that very tedious vnto vs it seemed to beare so long and dangerous a passage. In witnesse whereof to this our certificate we haue all subscribed our names, the nineteenth of September, 1585. William Gimler, R. Fen, Fredericke lord Windsor died at Westminster vpon the second of December.

In the moneths of November and December, many hozes and men were shipped at the tower wharfe, to be transported over into the Low countries.
And on the sixt of December, the right honorable Robert Dudley earle of Leicester, lord Lieutenant generall (after he had taken his leaue of her Maiestie and the court) with his traine (which was great) entered the towne of Colchester in Essex, where the bailifes and brethren in scarlet gowines
and

and multitudes of people met him, & so with great solemnitie entred the towne, where he lodged that night, and on the next morrow set forward to Hartwich into the which towne he was accordingly receiued and entertained. On the eight of December, the said earle accompanied with the earle of Essex, the lord North, the lord Audley, sir William Russell, sir Thomas Sherley, sir Arthur Bassett, sir Walter Waller, sir Geruais Clifton, & other knights, esquires and gentlemen, to the number of five or seauen hundred horse brauely appointed, all voluntaries and of his friends, followers and seruants, Captaines and souldiers, with his traine, to the number of fiftie sailes of ships and hories, set forward towards Flushing, with sound of trumpets and drummes, shoutes and prayers of the people for happie and fortunate successe. On the tenth day he arrived at Flushing, where with his whole traine guarded in his owne person by fiftie archers with bowes and arrowes, fiftie halbarders, and fiftie gunners, he was with the intertainment of souldiers, and shot of the Towne and his noble companie before him, entertained by sir Philip Sidney gouernor vnder her Maieslie of the same towne by Graue Maurice second sonne to the deceased prince of Orange, by her Maiesties ambassadoe ligier there, and by the States of the towne, passing honourably entertained, with ringing of bells, and making of bone-fires after their manner, which is to fire greate pitch barrells on the tops of high poles, and then to fire them. He was there feasted and lodged in the Ambassadors house, where according to his accustomed disposition he demeaned himselfe so humbly, that he purchased to himselfe no lesse loue and good liking than among the English. The next day after a Sermon had, and dinner ended, he tooke shipping, and sailed toward Middleborough: in the mid way betwixt Flushing and Middleborough standeth a strong sconce of Raunkens, furnished with English men, at the which he with some of his especiall traine landed, and viewed the same, who returning againe to their ships, were presented on the top of the wals in the front of the sea with fiftie pike men very brauely furnished, hauing their English ensignes displayed, with triumph of shot, sound of trumpets and drums neere two houres together. In the which honorabie triumphes, the whole flecte hauing good winde and faire weather, sailed along to Middleborough, where on the shore side at the landing place, were, vnder nine ensignes displayed with great store of shot, the best States of the countrie attending my lords landing:ouer the gates by the port was painted the red Crosse of England, her maiesties armes, & the States, through which gates the earle and his traine entring, he was thus from his landing to his lodging garded through a lane of musket shot with the ensignes borne before him, with trumpets and drums very royally, almost a quarter of a mile. In the middle of the market place were the English ensignes aduanced, and deliuered vnto him, with the which and the rest borne before him he came to his lodging, where at the intreatie of the States, he staid more than two houres at the gate to see the souldiers marching and their strengthes: after which, because it was neere night, he entred and made his dinner and supper all one. Three of those nine ensignes were new: In the first were her maiesties and the Emperors armes quartered: In the second the earle of Leicester and the prince of Oranges armes together: In the third were the seven provinces pecked into her maiesty, all very excellently emblaſoned. In a large table hanged over the gate of the English house in Middleborough, were emblaſoned the armes of her maiesty along about the rest, next vnder that the lord lieutenant's armes on the one side at large, hard by the which was set out the armes of the States and their houses: all which artificially by a chaine were linked together, and fastened to the English armes, vnder which was written at the foote of this frame, Quos Deus coniunxit, homo non separet. Thus with great ioy & continuall triumph was he entertained on their Christmas eues eue, after the Romish computation, which they in Zealand and Holland obserue in that order.

The Lord lieutenant feasted in the Christmas time, and first on Christmas eue, as followeth.

On Christmas eue, the States of the towne in the States house, which standeth in the midst of the towne or market place, feasted him sumptuously: In the first course of which feast throughout the table was nothing but boiled meates, all flesh most excellent dainty: In the second course was all roſt meates that could be thought, pigs serued on their feete, and wild foule part in the feathers: In the third course was all kind of baked meates, as foules in pies with their heads and failes unplucked all beset with pendants of her maiesties, the lord lieutenants, the countries, and diuerse English mens armes on the same. The fourth and last course was a rare banquet of incredible workmanship, as a castle of cristall founded on a rocke of pearle, about the which flowed silver streames, in which lay foules, fishes, and beasts of all kinds, some hurt, some slaine, and some gasping for breath, on the top of the which was a faire virgin lady leaning, and giuing her hands over the castle to succour them, very wonderfully wrought. There was wine in abundance, musick of all sorts, variety of all things, and wonderfull welcomes. This feast began at cleuen of the clocke before noone, and continued till siue in the after noone.

Lord lieutenant feasted the States on Christmas day.

The next day being Christmas day, the earle to requite the States cost, invited them all, whom he feasted very royally after the English fashion. On Saint Stephens day he feasted the widow princeſſe of Orange, with her second sonne countie Maunce, and their traines so sumptuously as beſeemed his and their honours. Here dispatching his weighty affaires he continued seven dayes, after which he determined to saile towards Dort, which by iudgement of the countrie is not past ten houres sailing at the most. On the 17. of December (after the account of England) with faire wind and weather, the whole flecte of Dutch hoies hoised by saile toward Dort, but on the sudden, being onward on their iourney, the ayre was so ouercast with mists, that they knew not how to saile for succour, neither backward nor forward: the reason was this: The riuer they had to saile through, was none other then an ouerflowne country, full of old foundations of houses, churches, and castles, so that the clearest aire did no more then safegard the hopes from daunger. The 20. day, my lord with some other landed at Williamſtate or Rag on hill, where he dined, and went aboard againe. On the one and twentieth of December, diuers ships of men of war and others, with the States of Dort in them, met our flecte on the water, where betwixt their ships and ours was at the meeting of the earle great triumphs with shot, in which came many small scouts of succor to hasten the traines to shore, where in good time they entered
Dort

Went very royally and triumphantly. On the port to gard his person was set his owne gard of archers, shot, and haibards. And ouer the gate of entrance was her maiesties, the earles and the States armes cimblasoned. When he was landed, & conducted by the States, he passed from the port through a lane of musket shot, all Dutch, braue and well appointed, with 8. ensignes displayed before him in the midst whereof was the English ensigne aduanced, whence with 800. shot he was brought to his lodging. After whose entrance they & the great shot continued triumphing an houre and moze: here he continued a day and two nights with singular entertainment, and verses which I ouerpasse. On the 23. of December, the earle tooke scouts to passe to Rotherdame by a riuer of fresh water very narrow, where the boates or scouts are some by men, some by horses dragged along the riuer: but in his passage the night being cleere, suddenly there arose so great a tempest, that it put the small vessels in great daunger, but after an houre the weather wared calme, and the night cleere, only a Dutch captaine and three or foure of his men were drowned: toward night he dyet to neare to the towne of Rotherdame, where on the water he was met with thre barges of pleasure, in euery of which was 12. sailers, the first all in blew ierkins and benetians, with red caps and whole cyppes white satire like. In the second 12. all in buffe. In the third 12. all in flagg thynnmed like very braue, with their oares red and white: in these boates were great stoe of fire workes and rockets to cast into the aire, and at the sterne of euery one were cressets, which towards night were lighted, and on the water made an excellent shew. Thus with trumpets sounding all the way, was he brought to Rotherdame by water to his lodging in the middle of the towne. On the other side of them, on the bankes stood ranks of souldiers all with musket shot, betwixt euery foure of them was placed a torch or cresset burning: & thus he entred his lodging, where the States accompanied him to supper that night. Here the inhabitants were ioyfull of the English mens coming, making much of the traine. The townes men had made very memorably in the middle of the market place, the whole proportion of Erasmus in a pulpet, as though he were preaching, holding a booke of the paraphrasis on the Gospels in his hand, vnder whom was written Erasmus Rotherodame. The earle made hast towards Delph, being from thence accompanied with the States, his barges of pleasure, & whatsoeuer was thought honorable. They came late to Delph, somewhat darke, but lighted by cressets along the narrow riuer, on the which many rockets & fire workes were used. On the landing port stood great stoe of musket shot, with many new ensignes like a lane for him to passe through, all which brought him to his lodging, which was the house wherein the prince of Orange was slaine, ouer the gate of which house were verses which I ouerpasse. On the 25. of December, the earle was feasted of the States very royally, and on the next morrow the earle feasted them, amongst whom was the princesse of Des, with a company of honorable ladies and gentlewomen: at the table was dutch musicke of all kinds. And it is to be noted, that the further the earle went vp into Holland, the brauer the countrey was, and the better was his lordship welcomed, as appeared by his excellent entertainment: from thence he remoued on the 27. of December to Donhage, where he determined to keepe his standing court. In the evening the earle by cresset light, torches, and deuises of fire worke, entred into the towne of Dunhage with his traine of English men, besides the states of Rotherodame and Delph, with those of Dunhage that met him on the water, with musket shot very many. At the entrance of my lord by water on the riuer met him certaine fisher men, which presented Peter, James, and Iohn at their harborough: by them Christ walking on the water, who commanding them to cast out their nets the second time, they drew in abundance, wherewith they made shew of presentment to the earle. for the which with thanks he passed by. Further on the riuer late the representation of Mars and Bellona, who uttered speeches vnto him as he passed. At his landing met him a troupe of horsemen, furnished and trapped antike in colours, before whom hauing fetched many courtes, they rode away. At the entrance of the fairest streete, there were on each side of the same galleries, raised a mans height each against other, all hung with blacke bairis, on both which galleries on each side stood fiftene virgins all clad in white, with branches of palme or bore wreathed about, wore candles light in their hands, euery of which did reuerence vnto the earle, these stood a speares length distant each from other. Betwixt euery one hung a looking glasse, and betwixt euery glasse vpon a pretie antike pearsh stood a ware candle burning, and at each end of the gallerie stood a champion, and a blacke Hooze, the one supporting the armes of England, and the other the armes of Holland. This shew was very proper: all the way as the earle passed through were artificially made gates raised of rageged stauies, and vpon euery snagge stood a small ware candle burning, by which hung the armes of diuerse craftes men of the towne. The streete all the way was hanged with broade clothes, vpon the which were placed store of red roses on sheets of paper painted. At the next turning he was entertained with this shew. Over a gate vpon a very high scaffold was a conceined battell fought betwene the English souldiers and the Spaniards, the English men still preuailling: vnder which were written verses to that effect. Passing forward, was a lofty scaffold very faire builded, with her maiesties armes at large placed: on the top stood seuen vergins, representing the seuen prouinces, euery virgin holding a speare, and the armes at large emblazoned, which prouince she did signifie, in the middell of them stood Minerva armed, incompassed about the body with the armes of England, vpon whom all the rest seemed to relie. All which were represented vnto her maiesty by necessity, an old Champion. The next was on the like scaffold, seuen persons presenting the seuen liberall sciences in their kinds, yeelded to the earle by desert: out of euery window hung lanthornes and candles, and euery streete was furnished with cressets, torches, and linkes light: one device that hung in the middell of the streete contained eight and thirty lanthornes and severall lights burning. Besides these, against my lords gate, a barber had on a wall placed threescore or more basons of bright copper, and in the middell of euery one a ware candle burning was placed, in the middell of all was painted a Rose and Crowne, this made a faire shew. Over the entrance of the court gate was placed aloft vpon a scaffold, as if it had bene in a cloud, Arthur of Britaine, whom they compared to the earle. within were hoboyes, cornets, and diuers kinds of musike: And thus they brought him to his lodging, and after he was entred in a great hall of that house, they discharged such bolies of shot as was wonderfull to heare. In y<sup>e</sup> night they used fire works of rockets, squibs, wheels, and bals of fire, with a dragon that continued casting out fire an houre, wonderfull artificially made. The next day, on the river adioyning to my lords lodging, they devised a running as it were at the tilt in boates, which was thus: From each end of the river came a boate running with fire oares, in the sterne of which on the top stood a man armed in a red wastcoate, with a staffe in his rest, having a but end of cozke: now each meeting other with these staues both fell into the water, where spare boates were ready to succour them, for away went their horses: this sport with fresh men they continued till the earle was weary of it.

On the third day of January, the earle with three hundred horses in their furniture very bravely with his retinue entred Leidon, where by the way he was met by the best of the towne, first by twelue Burgomaisters clad in long blacke gownes, and on their shoulders was the towne name in large letters of silver: next them twelue of the chiefest Burgesses, and then many on horsebacke, all in blacke velvet. At his entrance into the towne all over his head and downe to the ground on each side, was hanged with lay of diuers colours to his lodging, himselfe with a canopy carried over his head was brought to his seate, against the which was a stage, on the which stood two men like poets, who presented severall shewes, as first a woman representing the towne then famine assaulting her, then sicknesse, then Spanissh seruitude, then hope to be succoured, ayde promised, and at the last, liberty, victory, and triumph, verses, &c. And after the lord lieutenant had bene there feasted and banqueted, on the 5. of January he came from Leidon to Dunhage. The 10. he mustered part of his horsemen, to the number of 500. or more, & then pointed them into severall garrisons, & to severall gouernors, the earle of Essex was y<sup>e</sup> day made generall of the horses. The 11. day, the lord lieutenant came from Dunhage to Leidon. The 12. a generall fast was proclaimed through Holland, Gelderland, and Friesland, which was kept with great zeale, the lord lieutenant spent that day till night with hearing of preaching, reading, and singing of Psalmes: neither he nor his eating any thing till night. The 19 of January, he came from Leidon to Dunhage.

The 24. of January, the prince of Portingall came to Dunhage. The 25. the lord lieutenant was installed and swoyne, & likewise all the States swoyne to the queene. The maner of y<sup>e</sup> installing was thus: At Dunhage is a marvellous faire hall, at the upper end whereof are five or six large steps ascending, which do reach to a faire chamber, at the upper end whereof on high was placed a cloth of estate, in the midst whereof were the armes of England, and against them my lord was seated, on each side of him two steps descending, late twelue of the principall States, and below them late the residue, to the number of twenty, right before my lord, but fours or five steps descending. On the right hand of my lord did stand the prince of Portingall, next him the lord Morley, next maister Noris gouernour of Munster, next William Russell, and sir Robert Germin, with diuerse men of great account. On the left hand of my lord did stand the Graue Maurice, next the earle of Essex, sir William Stanley, sir Robert Stapleton, & sir T. Parrar, with diuerse other of great account. Thus being placed, a dutchman made a large oration in Dutch, declaring the cauſes of the matter in hand, with thanks to the Queenes Maieſtie, and the lord lieutenant. Then was read in Latine the covenants betwene the States, the Queene and my Lord: this done, the covenants were deliuered to my Lord, which he deliuered to the States, and the States deliuered an other vnto him: then was my Lord demanded to botwe the ſame by oath, who holding his hand to heauen did ſweare to the covenants. The like did the States, holding vp their hands botwe to performe. Then againe were the States ſwoorne to the Queene and my L. her lieutenant in thoſe affaires. This done my Lord gave to them ſeuerrall thanks, and they ſeuerrally did giue him the like, which being done, my Lord paſſed thorough to his chamber, the trumpets all ſounding before him. This day my Lord ſeaſed all the States moſt ſumptuouſlie, ſo that they had their fill both in their bellies, and heads. This day after dinner the ſouldiers of the Colone, which were three enſignes, came into the court furniſhed, and did there ſhew themſelues with drum and ſife: at night were aboue an hundred ſiers byent about my Lords houſe. The eight and twentieth of Januarie, companies muſtered by T. Digs, muſter maſter generall in Guelder, Frieſeland, and Holland, were as followeth: Maſter Norris colonell gentleman, 236. colonell Morgan two hundred & ninetie, Captaine Wotton a hundredeth thirtie ſixe, Captaine Powle a hundredeth and ſeauenteene, Captaine Baskerfield foureſcore, Captaine Yorke foureſcore and ſixe, Captaine Hunnings a hundredeth and eleven, Captaine Vdall ſeuentie ſeuene, Captaine Powell ninetie foure, Captaine Hart threeſcore and eight, Captaine Price a hundredeth twentieth three. Captaine Wilſon, a hundredeth fortye ſixe, Captaine Blunt a hundredeth twentieth ſeauen, Captaine Burrowes a hundredeth and ten, Captaine Harlow, a hundredeth twentieth foure, Captaine Shawe, foureſcore & foure, Captaine Enge threeſcore and nine, Captaine ſir Walter Wallar a hundredeth thirtie ſeauen.

The ſecond of February, Captaine Willowby died at Hage, and was three honozable buried. In the third of February, all the yemen of the garde, tooke their oath, whom reuniting to the conſcience of their charge, we purpoſe now to touch the peremptorie authoritie committed to the ſaid Lord lieutenant, by common conſent of the States, and ſo by degrees to deſcend to other occurrents concerning theſe Nether-lands.

A placcard containing the authoritie giuen by the States of the Lowe Countries, vnto the mightie prince, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Baron of Denbigh, &c. for the gouernement of the ſaid Lowe Countries: tranſlated out of Dutch into Engliſh as followeth.

The generall States of the vniued Provinces of the Lowe Countries, to all thoſe which ſhall ſee or heare theſe preſent writings, health and dilection. Euen as it hath pleaſed her Maieſtie of England mercifully to ſend ouer into theſe Countries the high and mightie prince and Lord, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Baron of Denbigh, and one of the priue counſell, knight of the noble order of the Garter, and not onely to admit and inſtitute his Excellencie, as chiefe head aboue all militarie ſouldiers, on hoſte or foote, which her Maieſtie hath ſent, or ſhall ſend ouer hereafter into theſe Countries, and to the end to aſſiſt vs
with

with counsell and aduise, according to his great experience, policie and wisdom in the direction of publike affaires of the land, as well touching the feates of warre, as otherwise, in conseruation of all that which most tendeth to the profite of the foresaid land, to bring backe and reduce the same into such good order and rule as it hath bene in times past, to the ende that so much the better and orderly, he may resist the force and tyrannie of our enimie, and to frustrate all his practises: but also beside this, to honor and enrich his foresaid Excellencie, with greater authoritie, might and commandement, about all her maiesties Admirals and Viceadmirals, and ships of warre, to command them all, and to imploy them to the seruice of these Countries, and in such order as his Excellencie shall find needfull for the same Countie: and that his Excellencie following her Maiesties commandement, desirous to shew the effect of the good will and affection which he beareth to these affaires, and to the preservation of the same, and also of the true Christian Religion, and hath imployed himselfe so willingly in the foresaid matters, that his Excellencie for that onely cause hath left and abandoned his native Countries and goods, and transported himselfe hitherto amongst vs: so that her Maiestie and his Excellencie could neuer haue done or shewed vnto vs a greater benefite than this. Therefore are we resolved with good and ripe deliberation, to certifie all men by these presents, that we haue desired, accepted, and authorised the foresaid mightie and honorable Prince Lord Robert Earle of Leicester, &c. to be our gouernor and generall Captaine ouer all the vniited Provinces, and associate Cities and members of the same. And we giue vnto his Excellencie, besides the authoritie of hir Maiestie giuen vnto him the highest and supreme commandement, and absolute authoritie above and in all matters of warfare by sea and by land, to execute and administrate the same to the resistance of the enemy, euen as his Excellencie shall thinke most commodious to the preservation of those Countries: and so further, to do all such things as appertaine to the office of a generall Captaine. And furthermore, we commit the administration and vse of policie and iustice ouer the foresaid vniited Provinces, and associate Cities and members of the same into his hands, to execute and administrate the same with such power and authoritie, as haue had in times past all the other gouernors of these Lowe Countries before him, and especially, as haue bene exercised, and lawfully administered in the time of Charles the first, reserved onely the Lawes and priuiledges of the foresaid Countries: also with especiall power to collect profits, and receiue, and administrate all the contributions, which are agreed and condescended, or shall hereafter be consented or agreed, to the maintenance of the warres: and also, that which is or shall be deliuered hereafter into his Excellencies hands: and this all according to the vertue of other letters and missiues written more at large touching the same agreement. All which former charge and commission, his Excellencie through our earnest desire hath accepted, and hath deliuered sollemne othe and assurance into our hands: first of all, for the preservation of the true Christian Religion, and maintenance of the priuiledges and rights of these lands and Provinces, members, and Cities of the same. We therefore ordaine and com-

maund all gouernours of Prouinces and cities, all Admirals, and Viceadmirals, all officers, Coloners, Captaines, their officers and souldiers by sea and land, and furthermore all other counsellors, officers, treasurers, receiuers, bailifes, Burgonasters, Marshals, magistrates, gentlemen, burgers, and other inhabitants and subiects of these lands, of what qualitie or condition soeuer, that they and euerie of them do acknowledge his foresaid Excellence in the qualitie of gouernment and captaine generall ouer the foresaid united prouinces, to honor, respect, and obey him as they ought to do, without making any difficultie in doing the same, vpon paine of falling in the displeasure and anger of his Excellence, and to be punished according to the heauinesse of the fault, and as reason shall require. And to the end that no body should pretend ignorance, we command expresse to make knowne these ordinances, to proclaime and publish them; where as men are accustomed to proclaime all publications, proceeding, and commaunding to proceede with rigor against all disdainers and neglectors of the same, according to the order of punishment before mentioned, without any fauour or dissimulation to the contrarie, because we haue thought the same to be expedient for the preservation of the Countrie. Given in our congregation and assemblie in the Hage, the 6. day of Februarie, 1586. by ordinance of the foresaid generall States.

This placard thus passed, the Lord lieutenant did ordaine certaine speciall men natiues bozne, of the counsell, to the intent that such affaires as chanced to secur, might by them be conueniently managed: the names of which counsellors with the places of their charge I ouerpass.

Having thus far discoursed of the lord lieutenants passing from place to place, and the manner of his entertainment: the obseruation of time doth vge vs ere we proceede any further, to deliuer a peece of seruice done by colonell Skinke, and then to proceede in the commemoration of the lord lieutenants entertainment in other places.

Skinke tooke
the towne of Warle.

On the 21. day of Februarie, Skinke not lying still from indanuning the enemye, did take the towne of Warle, and the castle thereto belonging, the manner wherof was thus: himselfe lying in Wendelo, a towne in part besieged, left his men with the Graue Maurice, charging the not to depart till such time as they heard from him, which they fulfilled: he came with two or three men from Wendelo to his men, no man knowing his enterpise, caused them in the morning to be ready, and so passed on till mid day at which time they were not far from Warle: Skinke espying a thirtie wagons, clad certaine of his men in the Bours apparell, sent them into the towne to sell the victuals, which they followed, and one of them brake his wagon in the gate, so that the gate could not be closed: One of them shooting off a dagge gave Skinke warning, and he sodainely entered the towne without resistance, and tooke both it and the Castell. This towne is thought not so strong as profitable, yet varie strong. In it are diuers saltpits which do make great store of salt, which salt doth serue a great part of the countrie to Cullen, and further altogether serued the enemye of salt, which now he wanteth. About the first of March he left the Towne, burning it and spoiling the Countrey, the cause was this. There was an armie coming to stay his passage, which which he hauing 300. horses did assaile, slue 1000. souldiers, tooke fine ensignes and sent to the lord lieutenant. Thus did balaunt Skinke, whom we will leaue and returne to matter of delight.

On the first of March, the lord lieutenant came from Hage to Leiden, and the third of March from Leiden to Harlem, whose entertainment there was with orations, representations, verses, shewes, &c. not inferior to those of other townes. On the fourth of March the Lord lieutenant, saw the Earle of Essex colonell, and Sir William Russell colonell muster and trayne by Harlem, to the number of two hundred horse. He was there feasted and banketted. And on the tenth of March he came from Harlem to Amsterdam, and by the way was met with diuers men of warre well shipped, which brought him by a long riuer that went into the Towne, ouer the which riuer were three strong bridges, plated full of armed souldiers, on the first bidge was planted ten or twelue peeces of ordinance, which after his honor was past, were shot off, the souldiers on euery bidge discharging by volies in braue manner: being past these bridges, he was met with two great pageants in this manner: two boates were made in monstrous greatnelle, on the one the shape of a horse swimming, on the other the likeness of a fish, on each of them a man riding, signifying the god Neptune: both these, one on the one side, and the other ouer the other side, did accompanie him to his landing, which was at the market place, where were planted great numbers of armed men with shot. Right before him where he landed was a scaffold, whereon was placed diuers shewes and representations, with verses, &c. The day and night following fire works, and afterward banketting, &c. The 20. of March, the Lord lieutenant came from Amsterdam to a castle called Mullen, 4. miles from Poerden, and there did dine, and from thence he came to Poerden to supper and to bed. On the 22. he came from Poerden to Utrecht, where his receiving was nothing inferior to most of the rest.

The Lord lieutenant came to Harlem.

The Lord lieutenant going to Amsterdam.

The Lord lieutenant came to Vtricht.

On the 26. of March, the Earle of Essex went to Leger with his horsemen, where he began a new worke. The 28. the Earle was feasted by Graue Maurice, on the which day in the morning there was charge giuen to all the English souldiers in the towne, that they should march from thence to Hage, which for that they wanted pay they refused, and raised a mutinie, for the which one of captaine Polles men was taken and put in ward, whereupon the rest of his followers seeing this, came to the gaole, burst the locks of the doores, and tooke out the prisoner, for the which there was fine apprehended, and three of them were hanged. On the same day was hanged the secretarie to the Countie Hollocke, which secretarie was a counsellor to the betraying of the Towne of Graue. The 30. of March, the Earle feasted the Nobilitie and Bourgeses of Utrecht, where there wanted nothing that might fill their bellies or their heads.

Earle of Essex went to Leger. A mutinie among the souldiers.

About the first of Apill, Generall Noris tooke the scone called Lite. On the fourth of Apill, was a sore conflict betwene the Male-contents & the English, the enimies being foure thousand were vanquished by Generall Noris with one thousand men, whereof he lost a great number, and slue 1200. Spaniards. The letter of Generall Noris to the L. lieutenant I haue set it downe in master Reine Woole and Holinshead.

The Feast of S.

George ob-

Vtricht.

W. Seager.

Martin Skinke
knighthed,

The three and fortieth of Aprill, the Earle of Leicester lieutenant, and gouernour generall of her maiesties forces in the Low countreies of the united prouinces, making his residence at that time in Vtricht (a great and goodly towne vpon the frontiers of Holland) kept most honourably the feast of Saint George therein, the proceedings whereof being so princely performed to the honour of our nation in the view of so many thousand straungers, I could not chuse (hauing gotten the true and faithfull description, by one William Seager alias Portciose, an officer at armes in that seruice) to make some briefe remembrance of the manner thereof, to wit: The streets of Vtricht being large and faire, were rankt and set with eight ensignes of Burgesses, richly appointed, wearing scarfes knit like roses white and red vpon their armes, betwene whom from the court of my Lord vnto the cathedrall Church called the Dome, the proceeding was on horse backe. First rode the trumpetters apparelled in scarlet, layd with silver lace, sounding their trumpets most royally, their banner roses being displayed, and richly lined with my Lords armes: then followed the Gentlemen, Captaines, Colonels, and her Maiesties swoyne men to the number of fortie horse, richly adorne in cloth of gold, silver, and silkes of all colours. After came sixe Knights, foure Barons, with the counsell of Estates, the earle of Essex accompanied with the Bishop of Cullen Prince Elector, and the Prince of Portingale rode by himselfe: next proceeded the Captaine of the gard, the treasurer, and controller of the house hold, bearing their white slaues: after whom followed two Gentlemen vthers, and Portciose herault in a rich coate of the armes of England: then came my Lord most princelike, inuelted in his robes of the order, garded by the principall Burgers of the towne, which offered themselves to that seruice, besides his owne gard, which were a sittle halbarders in scarlet clokes, garded with purple and white veluet. He being thus honourable brought vnto the Church, after due reuerence done vnto the Queenes Maiesties state, which was there erected on the right hand, he tooke his owne stall on the left, by certaine degrees lower: then began prayers, and a Sermon made by maister Knewstubs my Lords chaplaine, after which, my Lord proceeded to the offering, first, for her Maiestic, and then for himselfe, the which he performed with such decorum and Princely behauiour, that all generally spake most honourably of him. These solemnities being done, his Lordship returned as he came, leauing behind him the Earle of Essex, and certaine Gentlemen to accompany the Princes and the Ladies of the court. His court was a faire and large house, belonging in times past to the knights of the Rhodes, in which was a very great hall, richly hung with tapisserie: at the vpper end whereof was a most sumptuous cloth and chaire of estate for the Queenes Maiestic, with her armes and shiles thereon, and before it a table couered with all things so requisite, as if in person she had bene there: on the left hand, almost at the tables end, was my Lords trencher and stoole, for he would haue no chaire. The tables being couered, and all degrees assembled, my Lord before the state of her Maiesty, knighted a Dutch Gentleman, called Martin Skinke, for his manifold seruices done to his countrie, the which done,

done, the vssers marshalled the feast. At the table on the right side of the hall sate the yooing Prince of Portingall, the Prince elector and his wife, the Princes Simeie, the Earle of Essex, the Graue Mures and his Lady, and betwixt euerie Ladie was an English Lord, or knight placed. On the left side sate the States and chiefe Bourgers of the Towne, and the graund prior of Amersforde, (who came to see the feast) was by my Lords appointment placed vppermost at that table. Then began the trumpets to sound in the seruice which was most prince-like and abundant, serued on the knee, carued and tasted to her Maiesties trencher. The side tables being furnished all in silver plate, and attended on by Gentlemen, sundrie sorts of musickes, continued the entering of the first course, which done and auoyded, the trumpets sounded in for the second, which was all baked meates of beastes, and fowles, the beastes, as lions, dragons, leopards, and such like, bearing phaines or armes, and the fowles, as peacocks, swans, pheasants, turkie cocks and others in their naturall feathers spread as in their greatest pride, which sight was both rare and magnificent. This seruice being placed on hir Maiesties boord, the beastes on the one side, & fowles on the other, the lion lying couchant at her Highnes trencher, the vssers cried, a hall, which being made, with much a doo (by reason of the multitude) they brought vp betwene them, with three reuerences to the state, Portclove Herald, inuelted with the armes of England, who in Latine, French, and English, pronounced the Quenes Maiesties vsuall stile of England, France, and Ireland, defendresse of the faith, &c. crying three times, largesse. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the Dutch men to caroule to the health of her Maiestie, the welfare of my Lord, and to the prosperities of the vniued prouinces, and nothing wanted wherein either estate, magnificence, or ioy might be expressed. To be brieke the feast ended, and tables voyded, there was dauncing, vaulting, and tumbling, with the forces of Hercules, which gaue great delight to the strangers, for they had not seene it before, and thus they passed the time, till euensong and then departed. At supper being all assembled againe, great was the feast, and plentifull the cheere: and after supper began the barriers betwene challengers & defendants men of armes, wherein the Earle of Essex behaued himselfe so valiantly, that he gaue all men great hope of his noble prowesse in armes. The Barriers done, and either part retired with equall praise, (though not with equall blowes) there was a most sumptuous banquet prepared of Suger meates for the men of armes, and the Ladies: which banquet being finished, my Lord wishing them all good rest, tooke his leaue, and so this honourable feast brooke vp about twelue of the clocke at midnight.

who promised to shew Portclove 70. enignes that he had won in the field.

A sumptuous feast, and full of deuises.

On the 24. of Aprill, our English men that were in the enterprise before Graue retired, having set Graue in sufficiencie both of victuals and munition, and in their retracket set vpon a sconce called Knols sconce, which was yeilded vpon composition. The next day our men or some part of them came before Emple sconce, and presently won it without the losse of any man.

The 26. of Aprill, the lieutenant of sir Martin Skinke, his maister being with my Lords Excellencie, knowing of a companie of footemen Spaniards, he with certaine of his horse laid themselves in ambush, set vpon them, killed thirtie of them, them, and tooke 81. and caried them to their garrison.

The 4. of May, his Excellency did view all his horsemen, being in number about thirtene or fourteene hundred by Newkirke, on a great heath betwene Newkirke & Amersford. And this day his Excellencies gard being sent to Newkirke to keepe the towne; tooke a seuentie boozes, that were purposed to haue spoyled Newkirke. The seuenth of May, his Excellencie remoued from Amersford to Arname, and passed through Reine, and Wlagonet. Reine is a proper strong towne, situate on the riuer of Reyne, pleasant, and defensible, roundly compact together. Wlagonet standeth by a creeke of water comming to the Reyne, and within twentie score yeards of the Reyne, this towne is a strong towne, and stands most pleasant, wanting nothing but peace. Arnam is a faire towne, strongly enuironed with wals, rampiers, and other matter of strenght, it also standeth on the riuer of Reyne, on the one side of the towne the ground is most fertile and pleasant, on the other side is a great heath most barren, all the country is spoyled, abbeyes, faire houses, and doozes are all wasted, neither any house standing, nor any man there dwelling. Duert the Reyne against this towne is a sconce, onely for defence of the boozes, if the enemy come to destroy and take from them their cattell, to which sconce both the boozes runne, and also dyne their cattell. Within one mile of this towne is the sconce of Arnam, which our Englishmen won the last yeare, this sconce is wondrous strong, being compassed with such rampired wals, and deepe ditches, that it is almost inuincible. It standeth on the one side of the Reyne. At this sconce was captaine Henings a braue gentleman slaine at the winning of it, and there is buried: of other tozones I leaue farther to describe, and turne to the accidents. The 9. of May, the Prince of Parma with others, came to view the towne of Graue, which a canonicere saw, and discharged his canon, wherewith he tooke away the hinder part of his horse, and missed the prince but a little, so that he byuled him sore. The same day they of Graue shot fire bales into the greatest sconce of the enemy, and by good lucke one of them lighted among the powder in the sconce, set it on fire, which with such violence brake forth, that it blew vp the Spaniards most terribly, and layd the sconce flat. About this time the enemy battered the bafe towne of Graue, and presently vpon the battery entered, which the souldiers of the towne suffered, but in fine they set on them, slue 400. and purged the towne againe.

The 12. of May, sir Martin Skinke obtained a little peece of ground enuironed with water, neare vnto Pemegan, where he intrenched himselfe, so that the towne could not hurt him, and his ships of warre comming doونه to him, nothing could passe by the riuer of Reyne to the towne but he commaunded it. The 14. of May, our men lying at Pemegan sconce, there reuolted to them out of the towne two bozes. The sixteenth his excellency passed from Arnam to the campe at Pemegan: this day the castle of Lenow was yelded him, and the same day came fure bozes to our men from Pemegan. The eighteenth of May, the enemies entering Graue, lost 500. men.

Hemart, for his yelding of Graue, comming to Bonnell was there apprehended and caried to Ultricht, adiudged to dye, and was executed with two other captaines.

The

The 20. of May, early in the morning the strong fort of Pennegan was yielded to his Excellencie in this sort, to depart like souldiers, which was graunted, and they to the number of 156. souldiers very brave passed by his Excellencies lodging at Brankharst: there was in all at the siege of this sconce of Pennegan slaine about fortye souldiers and pioners, and twenty hurt. Now to returne to other accidents, such as in the meane time happened in England.

This yeare the Queenes maiestie tooke order for the propling and inhabiting of the countreys, late belonging to the earle of Desmond and his rebellious companions, to which end diuerse honorable and worshipfull gentlemen provided to be undertakers of signories there, whereof some went into the said countrie, others according to order taken, sent their people, amongst which were sir Christopher Hatton, sir Walter Rawlie, sir William Courtney, sir Richard Molinues, sir George Bourcher, sir Edward Fieton, sir Valentine Browne, sir Walter Luson, John Popham, her maiesties attorney generall and other.

The 19. of Januarie, Nicholas Deuorox was condemned for treason, in being made a Seminarie priest at Rhemes in Fraunce, since the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, in Anno primo of her Maiesties raigne, and in remaining here after the terme of fortye daies after the dissolution of the last Parliament.

Also Edmond Barbar being made priest as aforesaid, and comming into this realme after the said terme of fortye daies, was likewise condemned of treason, and both dyawne to Tiborne, and there hanged, bowelled and quartered on the 21. of Januarie. And on the same day a wench was burned in Smithfield for poisoning of her Aunt, and mistresse, and attempting the like to her vncke.

Seminarie priests executed.

On the feast day of the purification of our blessed Lady, Doctor Iohn Whitegill archbishop of Canterburie, William lord Cobham, warden of the five Ports, and Thomas lord Buckhurst, were chosen and taken to be of her Maiesties priuie counsell.

Archbishop of Canterburie called to be of the priuy counsell T. Louelace lost his eares for traitorously practising to enjoy the goods and lands of his nearest kinne.

The 11. of Februarie, Thomas Louelace was brought prisoner from the Tower of London to the starre chamber, against whom her Maiesties attorney did informe, that the same Louelace, vpon malice conceiued against Leonard Louelace, and Richard Louelace his cousin germanes, had falsely and diuellishly contriued and counterfetted a very trayterous letter in the name of Thom. Louelace (another brother of the said Leonard and Richard then resident beyond the seas) purposing, that the same Thomas should thereby incite and prouoke the said Leonard to procure the said Richard to execute her Highnesse destruction with other circumstances of treason. This letter he cast in an open high way, pretending thereby, that vpon the discouerie thereof, his said kinsmen Leonard and Richard should be dyawne in question for the treasonable matter against her Maiestie in that bill contained, euen in the highest degree, for which offence her maiesties attorney prayed, that the said Thomas then prisoner, might receiue condigne punishment. Whereupon the court adiudged that he should be carried on horsebacke about Westminster hall, with his face to the horse taile, and a paper on his backe wherein to be written: For counterfetting of false and trecherous letters against his owne kindred, containing most trayterous matter against her Maiesties person. And fro thence to be carried in y<sup>e</sup> manner, & set on y<sup>e</sup> pillory in the palace for traitorously practising to enjoy the goods and lands of his nearest kinne. Praise worthie iustice, the like whereof is to be wished to the like treacherous practiser, and libeller against his eldest brother, after he had defrauded him of his goods and leascs.

at WUestminster, and there to haue one of his eares cut off: also to be carried in like manner into London, and set on the pillorie one market day in Cheape, with the like paper. After that carried into Kent, and at the next assise there to be set on the pillorie with the like paper, and his other eare to be cut off. Also to be set on the pillorie one market day at Canterburie, and an other at Rochester in the like manner: and at euery the foresaid places, this order taken touching his offence to be openly read, the sentence whercof was duly executed in the pallace at WUestminster, in Cheape, &c.

Straunge sicknes and death at Excester through stench of the prison.

Powell.

The 14. of March, at the assises kept at the citie of Excester in Deuonshire before sir Edmond Anderlon, lord chiefe Iustice of the common pleas, sergeant Floriday, one of the barons of the exchequer, and other Iustices, there happened a strange sicknesse, first amongst the prisoners, and then amongst other persons, and besides the prisoners, many of all degrees died thereof, namely sergeant Floriday, sir Iohn Chichester, sir Arthur Bassier, and sir Barnard Drake knights, Thomas Carew, R. Caric, Iohn Fortescue, Iohn Waldren, and Thomas Risdone esquires, and Iustices of peace: of the common people died very many, Constables, Rues, Tithingmen, and Iurozs, and namely of one Iurie, they being twelue in number, there died 11. of them. This sicknesse was imputed to certaine Portugals then prisoners in the said goale. For not long before, one Barnard Drake esquire had bene at the seas, and meeting with certaine Portugals come from new found land, and laden with fish, he tooke them as a good prize, and brought them into Dorthmouth haven, and from thence they were sent, being in number about 38. persons, vnto the goale of the castle of Cron, and there were cast into the deepe pit and stinking dungeon. These men had bene before long time at the seas, hauing no change of apparell, nor lyen in bed, and now lyng on the ground without succour or reliefe, were soone infected, and all for the most part were sicke, and some of them died, and this sicknesse very soone after disperled it selfe among all the residue of the prisoners in the goale, of which disease many of them died, but all brought to great extremities and very hardly escaped. These men when they were to be brought before the foresaid Iustices for their triall, many of them were so weake and sicke, that they were not able to go nor stand, but were carried from the goale to the place of iudgement, some vpon handbarrowes, and some betwixen men leading them, and so brought to the place of iustice. The sight of these mens pitifull cases, being thought to be hunger starued, rather then otherwise diseased, moued many to pittie them, &c.

A straunge worm found in the heart of an horse.

The seuenteenth of March, a straunge thing happened, the like whercof before hath not bene heard of in our time. Maister Dorington of Spaldwicke in the countie of Huntington esquire, one of her maiesties gentlemen Pensioners, had a horse which died suddenly, and being ripped, to see the cause of his death, there was found in the hole of the heart of the same horse a straunge worme, which lay on a round heape in a kall or skinne of the likenesse of a toade, which being taken out, and spread abroad, was in forme and fashion not easie to be described, the length of which worme diuided into many greines to the number of fiftie (spread from the body like the braunches of a tree) was from the snout to the the end of the longest greine 17. inches, having foure issues in the greines, from the which dropped forth a red water: the bodie in bignesse round about was three inches and an halfe, the colour whercof was very like a makarell. This monstrous woyme found in manner aforesaid, crawling to haue got away, was stabbed in with a dagger and died, which after being dried, was shewed to many honorable persons of the realme.

The eighteenth of Aprill, in the assises holden at London in the Justice hall, William Thomlon alias Blackborne made priest at Rhemes, and Richard Lea alias Long made priest at Lions in Fraunce, and remaining here contrarie to the statute, were both condemned, and on the 20. day of Aprill drawne to Tyboine, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

The seuenteenth of May, Philip earle of Arundell was conueyed from the Tower of London to Westminster, and there in the Starre chamber, by the counsell condemned to pay 10000. pound fine for his contempt, and to remaine in prison at the Queenes pleasure.

Earle of Arundell condemned to pay 10000. pound.

A commission was directed from her Maiestie, tending to the ratifying of a firme league of amitie betweene her Maiestie and James king of Scots, which league being articulated, commissioners were appointed, Edward earle of Rutland, William lord Evers, and Thomas Randolph esquire, who with their traine came to Berwike on the 19. of June, where the ambassadors of Scotland being present, they accomplished the matter according to the commission, the articles of the said league in all and every part sufficiently confirmed on the first of July: which being done, the said earle of Rutland with his traine returned home, maister Randolph went into Scotland to take his leaue of the king, and returned into England about the 15. of August.

Services in Ireland by sir Richard Bingham against the Burkes.

This yeare (as in the last proceeding) fell great troubles in Ireland in Connaght, which because they are memorable, and no lesse happily then valiantly appeared, I will set downe the causes and foundations thereof, with all the particular services and successes, as I have received them, confirmed under the hands and testimonies of diuerse captaines and gentlemen employed in the said service.

All Connaght quiet through sir R. Bingham good government

In the moneth of September, in Anno 1585. at a sessions holden at Doonemony in the county of Mayo, within the prouince of Connaght by sir Richard Bing. knight, chiefe commissioner and gouernour of the said prouince (sir Nichol. White Maister of the rols then being present, and employed with him for the perfecting of the last composition made within y<sup>e</sup> said prouince) the countie of Mayo, and the whole countie stood then in generalitie, through the good and politique government, and the iust and vpright dealing of the said sir Richard Bingham on peaceable and quiet termes, without any face of alteration. And the most part of y<sup>e</sup> gentlemen and freeholders of that countie resorted to the said sessions before: nevertheless, when now by meanes of this composition & agreement betweene her M. and them, they perceiued y<sup>e</sup> the names, titles and superiorities of their chiefe L. and specially of M. W. the chiefe of the septs of that countie should cease, extinguish, & for ever after be determined: it did not a little grieue them, although some of them not long before had expostulated y<sup>e</sup> like refoymation. The plot of this composition was deuised by sir R. of purpose, to take away the greatnesse of the Irish lords, with their names of Macs & Oes, that the inferiour subiect might be freed from their Irish customes, cuttings and vnrasonable exactions, & (by knowing what was their owne) be dratone to depend euer after vpon the state, & not on those Irish lords or gentlemen: which also might not only much auail her Maestie in time of any stirs or reuolts (by drawing the common people from following the great & chiefe lords, but also bring a more certaine yearly rent, or reuenuue into her highnes coffers then formerly was accustomed. When the people perceiued these their old customes & vblages like to take end, they deuised with themselves for the preventing thereof, and according to their old customed manner, euer by them vsed in all their discontentments, they tooke by their weapons, armed them against the state, thinking by sirs and boyles to winne the reuocation of this settled and determined resolution, and so to be left againe in their old customes and vblages.

The Irish
into rebellio when they are discon-sented.

This their purpose appeared in one Thomas Roe Burke, a chiefe gentleman of that sept, who at this very instant, during the sayd sessions at Doonme-mouie, kept himselfe within a strong castle of his, standing in an Island on Loghe make, euen within the sight of the gouernour and the other commissiōners, refusing to come at them, albeit they had severall times sent for him. Sir Richard Bingham perceiuing that the coales of troubles were now layd together, and would shortly after kinde and become an angry fire, if the same were not politickely and warily preuented (dissembling the matter as if it were of no moment) he betthought him of the best and safest remedy to meete with this inconuenience. And knowing well that those Burks had euer bene very bad and loose people, such as very hardly continued themselves two yeares together with in a due course or compasse of obedience, he saw that the onely way to stop this gap, was either to cut off or to apprehend and lay vp in durance as pledges two or three of the best of that sept, such as were most dangerous for the inciting of sturs, and the drawing of others into action. And therefore vpon his returne out of that county to Roscomon, he dealt with the Sherife of the county of Mayo, for the apprehension of the sayd Thomas Roe. The Sherife not long after sent his subsherife to put this matter in execution, who being resisted and hurt by the sayd Thomas Roe, and not otherwise able to apprehend him, wounded him in such sort as he thereof died. This Thomas Roe, being thus slaine was not much lamented, no not euen of his owne kindred, for he was an oppressor of them, and doubtlesse it was thought by wise men that the death of this man, and the hanging of two others of that surname at Roscomon, which had deuised for the drawing of Scots into the prouince, had preuented the sturs and troubles that after ensued, and at that time seemed to haue a beginning, had not some men depending on the state through enuy and malice to sir Richard Bingham & his good and happy gouernement, perswaded diuers others of that sept of the Burks to haue a care of themselves to be vpon their keeping, & to trust no officer, nor to come to any such till their pardons should be by them procured from the lord Deputy. These mens names I forbear to remember, because they haue since that time made it knowne before the lord Deputy and counsell of the realme, that in giuing such caueats to y Burks, they meant nothing lesse then to hartten them into rebellion against the state, and to attempt such bad actions as afterwards they did. Of this counsell y Burks (which of themselves were seditious inough, in whose minds did shl sticke the abolishing & taking away of their M.W. with their old Irish customes & cuttings) tooke hold and conuerted the same to an apt & commodious occasion offered them, for their better assembling together into a conuenient number. And moze effectually to win the hearts of many men to follow this their intended enterprise, they made the Clandonnells, the loies, & most of the countrey belceue, that sir R. Bingham hauing already taken from these men their ancient customes & libertie's, would also deliuer the like measure to them, & take from them also their liues, if they did not well looke vnto themselves. By this meanes they drew many vnto them, perswading themselves that they might safely assemble together in companies without feare of interruption, for by the friendship of their foresayd counsellors which were in Dublin, their assemblies should there be thought as a thing by the done for their defence & safety. They also knew that sir Richard Bingham being restrained from following them in this or other their actions, without direction fro Dublin, could not st p or prevent them in their first beginning, by reason whereof they would in short time draw together & ioyne to them the greatest part of the countrey, whereof some should be drawne to assist them in open hostility, and some others in secret and under-hand dealing, of which sort the latter should still seeme subjects & true as neare as they could in y<sup>e</sup> bosome of the state. And to make themselves the stronger, and to draw the whole p<sup>ro</sup>vince into action with them, they gaue it forth, y<sup>e</sup> their case was euery mans case within the same: And that as their ancient customes & liberties were infringed, and their liues sought to be taken away, so should it also fare with the rest of the said p<sup>ro</sup>vince. And here for an entrance into this rebellion, the sons of Edmond Burke of castle Barry being many (which Edmond was an old man, one of the competitors of y<sup>e</sup> M. Williamship, & a most bad affected member to the state, and his wife as bad as himselfe, together with Edmond Kerragh Burke, Riccard Burke y<sup>e</sup> Diuels Hookes sonne, Moyler Oge Burke, Walter M. Danie Bane, Cahir M. Connell, and diuers others, associating vnto them many idle persons, entred into a castle in Loghmaske called castle Pecalley, and manned the same together with Thomas Roes castle, whereof mention is made before, which castle after Thomas Roes death, was now in the possession of his brother Riccard Burke called the Pall of Ireland: which castles they kept in rebellious manner against the state, refusing to come at any of her maiesties officers. About this time sir Richard Bingham lay at the siege of Clanoenen in Thomond, a strong pile, manned and kept against her maiesty by Mahowne Obrian a most dangerous enemy to the state, a chiefe champion of the Popes, and a great praefiser with forein powers, for the inuasion of this realme of Ireland. At this siege sir Richard Bingham had but 100. English souldiers, and some few kerne of the countrey, by reason whereof he was driuen to no small paine in skirmishing, watching, and warding with so few men: neuerthelesse, within seven dayes after he won the castle and slue the sayd Mahowne Obrian & the ward within, and rased the said castle, without the furtherance of any great ordinance. After y<sup>e</sup> sir R. marched from this castle to castle Pecalley, within the which the traytors were and inclosed themselves. At his first coming thither he parled with them, aduising them to remember the obedience which they owed to her maiesty, and to yeld themselves to her maiesties mercie, assuring them that in so doing they should find that fauour in all respects that other her highnesse subjects did. But they (minding nothing lesse then to submit themselves, on any such conditions) sayd they would not do any hurt, but keepe themselves there in safety, for that they were fearefull to trust any Englishman, alleadging many frivolous and impertinent causes moouing them to stand vpon their gard. Whereupon sir Richard proceeded to besiege them in the sayd castle, which was a strong round fortresse erected farre within the Loghe, vpon a small compasse of ground, so scanty by the wall, that scarce a landing place was left vnto it. The siege was all by water in boates, and could not otherwise be attempted. Insomuch that sir Richard going about to burne a boate or two of theirs that they had docted and layd by vnder the castle wall, to the end they might not escape away, and that also he might watch and ward them with few men having but a small company there, and those also sore wearied, huzled with stones and galled with shot at the siege of Clanoven / was forced by the sudden rising of contrary weather, which much favoured the enemy, to leave the attempt with the losse of his boates, and two or thre of his souldiers, himselfe and others bring in the sayd boate, hardly escaped by the helpe of other boates, which other boates came not in time to his succour, through the negligence of such as he had put in trust with them, and appointed to come and ioyne with him. The boate which he lost the enemies got, in which and in another boate of their owne (before sir Richard could returne to charge them with a fresh supply from his camp lying on the shoate) they shipped themselves, and with great celerity escaped into the woods, fearing that at the next charge, sir Richard would haue won the castle. Captaine Mordant and others had the chase of them by water. These traytours being thus escaped to the woods and mountaines out of the castle Decalloy, their accomplices also fled out of the other castle. Both which and our strong pile of Farrowe M. Donnels, sir Richard rased to the ground, for that they were not fit or stood seruiciable to be kept by the English, and were very dangerous to be in the possession of the Irishie. Richard Burke alias the Pall of Ireland a man of no small account among his sept, and all the ill affected Irishie repaired to sir Richard at his first comming to castle Decalloy, being in deed the chiefe of their confederacy. This man under colour of dutifull subiection, intended to haue betrayed sir Richard and all his company: but (intelligence hereof being giuen, and many apparant proofes had of his trayterous intentions and desires) this Pall of Ireland was soone executed by marshall law: this man was assuredly the most dangerous member in all the county of Mayo, especially for the drawing in of Scots, a thing which sir Richard ever doubted, and which the Burkes undoubtedly intended.

Thomas Roe Burke would not come at the gouernour.

After this the gouernour sir Richard Bingham tooke order for the following of those Burkes to the woods and mountaines, which were now growne to be some fourescore swordes, he leuied some forces on the countrey, and with them and his owne company of an hundred souldiers, he so hunted them from bush to bush, and hill to hill, that in short time no newes was to be heard where any of them were. After this the gentlemen of the countrey which had not combined with them, seeing the rebels to be diuine to their holes and fastnesse in hiding manner, by meanes whereof the souldiers could do nothing vpon them, offered to sir Richard that if he would draw his forces out of the countrey, they would undertake the seruice against the rebels, and either kill them, or banish them at their owne cost and charges, without abating any peny of the composition rents due to her maiestie by them in lew thereof: hereunto sir Richard assented, finding it a good policy to set one of them against another. But here hauing these bad Burks at a great aduantage, & in a hard distressed case, when they were thus at y<sup>e</sup> lowest ebbe, sir Richard receiued speciall and strait charge and commaundement from the lord Deputy to protect them, & he receiued also a protection ready signed by the lord Deputy to that end, which thing, though the matter and manner of it much grieved him, he handled it in the best sort he could to saue the credit of the state and wrought deuises to diuine them to seeke their protections, which when they did,

Sir Richard Bingham frustrated of his purpose.

he granted it vnder his owne hand, and the scale of the prouince, as formerly was accustomed, and in such causes ought to be done. But although this was closely handled by the gouernour sir Richard Bingham, yet the Burks had intelligence that the lord Deputy had protected them, and commaunded the gouernour to per- forme it, which, as is to be gathered, they had learned from some well-willers of theirs out of Dublin: this made the gentlemen very high and hauty minded and was to them a foueraigne preparatiue, for to vnderstate new and greater stirrs and broiles then before they had begun. For the peace being such as the state offered it, and they sought it not, continued but a small time, although they had giuen in a simple pledge for the performance thereof. After the Burks were thus protected, sir Richard Bingham repaired to his dwelling house and from thence, vpon occa- sions) to Dublin, where he had not long stayed when the Burks roulded againe now the second time, ioyning vnto them the Clangibbons, the Clandonuels, and the Ioyes in farre greater number then before, which sayd Ioyes, the more to manifest their bad and trayterous intentions, and the better to assure their complices of their fast dealing in this combination, murdered certaine of the offi- cers of Yrconnaght and their men, to the number of fiftene or sixtene. About this time order came from the lord Deputy for the leuying of me within this pro- uince for the seruice in the Low countries. The hute thereof and the repaire hi- ther of Francis Barckley sent by the lord Deputy for the leuying of the sayd men, caused many idle men who had no zeale to serue beyond the seas, to ioyne them- selues with the sayd Burks then in action against her maiesty. And thus these Burkes, hauing had an enteruiew of peace and a pawling time to gather head a- gaine and increase their forces, stood on very lofty termes, and sayd they would haue a M. William, or else they would go into Spaine for one: also they would haue no sherie within that county, nor be subiect to answer in appearance at any assize or sessions. These points and termes they stood on, and articulated the same accordingly, with many other vnrasonable demaunds which they would haue to be granted, or otherwise they wold in no wise yeeld to haue peace with the state. At the beginning of this second revolt, for that the gouernor was willing to haue dyatone them to peace (if by any reasonable meanes he might haue done the same without any indignity to the state) he sent vnto the commissioners, viz. the L. archbishop of Tuam, the L. Bremingham baron of Athency, T. Dillon esquire chiefe iustice of the prouince, Gerrald Comerford esquire attorney of the same, & others to parley with them, and to examine the cause of those their insolent attempts: vnto whom they answered in effect, as is aforesayd, deliuering them the sayd articles in writing. And euen during the time of the commissioners abode in the coun- trey, they did not forbear to burne and spoyle the same. All which notwithstanding a tyme of peace was granted vpon conditions in a sort to their liking for eight dayes by the sayd commissioners, that in the meane time the lord Deputies pleasure might be signified to the gouernor how he would haue them to be proce- ded withall, and direction sent accordingly. But (after this also was granted them) the commissioners were no sooner departed out of those parts, then they be- gan to breake downe diuers castles, and to burne many townes in the plaine and champaigne baronies. And the more to make knowne their trayterous and wicked purposes purposes, they proceeded against her maiesty in most odious and vndutifull speeches, saying: What haue we to do with that Caligaghe, how vniwise are we, being so mighty a nation, to haue bene so long subiect to a woman? the Pope and the king of Spaine shall haue the rule of vs, and none other. Sir Richard (notwithstanding all this) did forbear to raise forces, and to serue vpon them (greatly to his disaduantage) for that he had receiued many and earnest cautions from the lord Deputy to forbear the beginning of any warre against them. But in the meane time the rebels grew to be very strong, and were now increased to the number of seuen or eight hundred men, and had also sent Edmond Kerragh Burke, and Iohn Iccleau brother to Walker Kiritagh Burke to practise with the Scots, and to draw them into the prouince to their succour and aide, aduertising the Scots by the sayd messengers, that the time was then to subdue Connaght, for the queene had few or no souldiers in the realme, they were all employed into the Low countries. This fire kindled and flamed in such sort that now it was high time to take in hand the quenching thereof: neuertheless sir Richard of himselfe durst do nothing against them for that he was aduised and willed by the lord Deputy to do nothing in that case without his lordships aduise & directiō, which (when he had long looked for) at length he receiued, although somewhat late, the effect whereof was, that the sayd lord Deputy & the counsell concurred in opinion with sir Richard, that the conditions which the Burkes required were so vnrasonable, as neither subiect ought to demaund them, ne yet the state without great indignity could yeeld vnto them, and therefore resolved and willed sir Richard to prosecute them with such forces as he had or could leaue, except he could find them to stand on more dutifull termes then afore is sayd. Hereupon the gouernor leued such forces as he thought might suffice to answer the seruice both effectually and speedily, for he found and saw that lingring seruice could not but greatly charge her maiesty, and much encourage the enemy: (a soft kind of warre that hath bene too too long vsed in this realme.) First, hauing taken order for the assurance of the countrey behind him, he marched towards the countie of Mayo, the 12 of July 1586. with his owne garrison forces which were 100. footemen and 50. horsemen, and came to Ballinroba the 14. day of the said moneth: here he spent sir or leauen daies, as well in parling with the said Burkes, as also in gathering of his whole forces together, hither came to him the earle of Clanrickard with 30. horsemen and one hundred kearne, also many gentlemen of the countrey came hither, namely the L. Bremingham lord baron of Athenrie, sir Hubbert M. Dany knight, Teig Okelley, and diuers others: hither also came in the supply of forces which he had leued within the prouince, viz. a hundred footemen of captaine Mordantes, a hundred footemen vnder captaine Merriman, and a hundred footemen vnder captaine Moltean, besides diuers companies of light kearne to the number of sir or seuen hundred: & then hauing employed the earle of Clanrickard, the archbishop of Tuam, the bishop of Kilmore, the lord Bremingham, Thomas Dillon in office of the prouince and others in parling with the Burkes one day, and finding that no reasons nor perswasions might win them to peace, he executed certaine of their pledges, which they before had put in for their loyaltie and good behauiour (for it appeared to this politike and wise gentleman sir Richard

Bingham, that the sparing of rebels pledges heretofore had done no small hurt in this realme, by encouraging the to ill actions, trusting vpon the accustomed mercy shewed to the like pledges: and then he marched to the Abbey of Ballenubbee, the two and twentieth of July: and from thence he sent his forces of footemen and kearne into the mountaines and woods to seeke the rebels in their fastnesse, which aforesaid forces was led by Captaine John Bingham, who had the charge of the garrison band, which behaued himselfe so well therein, that within the space of five or euen weekes they all submitted themselves to the state: himselfe with the earle of Clanrickard, and the hoshmen kept the champaigne and plaine country, as well for the defence of her maiesties good subiectes in those parts, as also to keepe the enemye from escaping away from the forces sent into their laide fastnesse. About this time there came an espiall out of Mounster, beinge sent, if it were as he said, as a messenger from those parts to Francis Barkley prouost marshall of Connaght. This espiall the more to encourage the traitors, and to animate others to ioyne with them, gaue it forth, that the earle of Leicester was slaine in the lowe Countries, and the most of the English forces ouerthrowne there: that there were 2. great armies of Spaniards landed in England, and that there was a great nauy of Spanish ships in Baltimore, that the king of Scots was in armes against her maiestie, and that her highnesse was sicke, and in great danger of death: vpon which vntrue seditious rumoz and report, sir Richard caused the Authoz and messenger thereof beinge a bad runnagate to be executed by martiall law. And now the footemen within the mountaines, and himselfe in the champaigne, so hunted the Burkes and their accomplices from place to place, that within the space of three weekes they began to be tame, and they had taken from them in that time the number of foure or fve thousand head of cattell, whereof sir Richard Bingham reserved towards the defraying of the extraordinary charges of the iourney the number of one thousand. All the rest were bestowed on the captaines and their companies, and the officers of the field as bootie, according to the custome in this country seruices, or else giuen to the kearne and light footemen as a consideration of their entertainments, which thereupon were discharged and dismissed from that seruice. Besides the depriuing these rebels of their cattell, as aforesaid, there were slaine of them about the number of fve or sixe score of all sorts. The rest in short time after diuided themselves, flying from caue to caue, and from one groue of wood to an other, where they might best hide themselves, sending in messengers to the gouernor to beseech him of mercie and pardon, and offering to submit themselves with all humblenesse. Whereupon it was when they were thus broken, that the gouernor discharged the kearne he had, as aforesaid, together with all Irish hoshmen of seuerall parts of the prouince, contenting all of them, either with some portion of the praies and booties gotten, or else with his owne money, his owne hoshmen and footemen, and the three bands of supplies aforesaid he staid from the seruice for a space, as well to refresh them, as also to giue time and leaue to the enemyes to come in freely without feare, which otherwise would haue possessed them, had the forces bene still vp and done in the woods. This beinge done they submitted themselves one after an other in sort following: Videlicet,

Ewster

Ewster M. Donnell chiefe of the Gallowglasses came in, submitted himselfe, & put in his sonne pledge for himselfe and his sept, the next Edmond Burke M. Richard Euerrine one of the strongest amongst them sonne to the last M. William faue one, came in and submitted himselfe, giuing in his sonne as pledge: after whom William Burke alias the Blind Abbot the chiefe of that surname, Edmond Burke of Castle Barry being dead, which claimed to be M. William, submitted himselfe very humbly, offering one of his sonnes as pledge. But (for that sir Richard liked not the sonne that he offered, but demanded his eldest sonne whom he knew to be a good pledge) he departed againe, yet within two dayes after, when he saw the gouernour would haue sent in his forces amongst them againe, he came to him, submitted himselfe, and brought his eldest sonne for a pledge: Moyler Oge Burke submitted himselfe. The loies did in like manner submit themselves, and also Riccard Burke alias the Diuels Hookes sonne, all these gaue in good pledges for the obseruation of the peace. These men upon their submission were so pined away for want of foode, and so ghaisted with feare within fewen or eight weekes, by reason they were so roundly folloved, without any interine of rest, that they looked rather like to ghosts then men. Edmond Burkes sonnes of castle Barry persisted still in the action. Their father was the man whom they sought to haue made M. William. till he was executed by course of the common law. This man was very old, yet was he put to death for these causes ensuing: he was a notable traitor, and the encourager of his sonnes to this action, during whose life, both they, and he, had a hope he should be M. William. To the end therefore they should be carried away no longer with the deceitfull twinges of this baine hope, and so the sooner dratwne to submission, he was indicted, arraigned, condemned and executed, as in like cases is accustomed. The gouernour might haue hanged him by martiall law, but rather made choice to haue it orderly done, as aforesaid, to the end her maiestie might haue his lands by escheat upon his attainder (for he had a good quantitie of land.) After this the said sonnes of Edmond Burke (seeing their father, and in him all their hope dead) offered to submit themselves, so as they might haue enioyed their fathers lands. But herein the gouernour referred them to the resolution of the lord Deputie and counsell to be further heard in that point, which they somewhat liked of, and then they offered the eldest brothers sonne as pledge: but the gouernour refused to take any child or other pledge, saving one of those brethren, which were in number five or seauen: but that they utterly denied to do: whereby it was well perceived they carried very bad intentions. At this time, whilst these men stood thus upon the pinch of submitting them, newes came to the gouernour, that 2000. Scots came ouer y<sup>e</sup> riuer of Barne toward Sligo with Edmond Kerragh Burke and Jo. Niclaue, who were sent by the Burkes their kinsmen, as you haue heard before, to dratw in those Scots for y<sup>e</sup> better defence of their quarell, which Scots were promised by the Burkes that they should inhabit the countie, so as they would banish out the Englishmen & defend the said traitors. These newes hindered a thorough pacification within the countie of Mayo: neuertheless this prouident & circumspect gouernour sir Richard B. n. ham, hauing already reduced and brought things there to so good a state, as before is said, dispatched the earle of Clanrickard

The rebels were so folloved, that they looked more like ghosts then men.

the prosecution of those few bad Burkes which yet continued in action against her Maestie: which being done in such good sort as the danger and necessity of that time could allowe, he then set forwarde towards Sligo, with a hundred footemen and five and twentieth horsemen that were remaining with him: but upon his setting forth, he had newes brought him, that the Scots were dravne through ORoweys countie into the Maowghery or plaines by Roscomon to pray and spoele the same, by meanes whereof he rode a great daies iourney, and came that night neere to Roscomon, and lay that night foure miles from it, from whence (vnderstanding contrarie that the Scots were betwene Sligo and Bوندزويس) he rode the next day to the towne of Sligo, being well-nigh threer score English mules, but the footemen he left to march away after him with as much conuenient speed as they might. His highway was to passe by the abbey of Boile, where he found sir Thomas Letrange, and other the risings out of the countie, whom he had appointed to lie there for the defence of the countie of Roscomon, he left them there for that time, and so came to Sligo the eight and twentieth of August. At his comming thither he was giuen to vnderstand that the Scotes lay still incamped at the Earne, some on the one side, and some on the other side, to the number of so many as he was before aduertised, with some increase of horsemen and footemen, for sir Arthure Oneale, and Hugh M. Gwyer had ayded them with some forces, so as their forces was now about 2000. as it was said, of able men, besides women, boyes, and churles, whereof they had great store. I take it neere as many more, with great store of carriages. The comming of sir Richard so soone to Sligo, and the newes of the pacification within the countie of Maio, made them stay long about the Earne and Bوندزويس, either to expect more forces to come and ioine with them, or some new broiles to be raised in the countie behinde the gouernor by their confederates, which might cause him to deuide his forces, which were then foure hundred English and Irish, and about threer score horsemen, besides the risings out of the countie which were about a hundred horsemen and two hundred kearne: A force far too weak to haue encountered with the Scots, except they might haue bene gotten in a champaine ground. To which like place of disadvantage they had no intention to come, for of the 400. the Gouernor had 300. which were Irish, and for the most part men but newly trained.
He wrote to the L. Deputie to send him 2. other bands of 50. horsemen, for that there was no trust in the Irish horsemen, which horsemen & footemen (if they had come sooner than they did) had either cleane discouraged or sufficiently withstood the Scots from comming into the prouince at all. Sir Richard lay at Sligo, & the foote

foote of the Curlewes with his said forces fronting the Scots, and withstanding their entrie into the countrey (expecting still a supply from the lord Deputy) the space of fourteene daies: the Scots drawing on by little and little through O Rowiks countrey upon mountaines, woods and bogs towards the Curlewes, with intention to passe that waies into Maio, encamped euer in such fallnesse as he could not by any meanes come at them, without great disadvantage. At the length although sir R. kept the passage straightly upon them (for the watching of which he was obligen to divide his companies into sundrie places far distant from each other) yet in an exceeding foule, tempestuous & darke night, they deceiued him, for after he had watched & waited for their comming till 10. of the clocke at night, hearing before night y they had remoued their campe, & were rather going backe againe then coming towards him, he left to watch abroad any longer, & bestowed himselfe and his companies in places of securitie, which he did, supposing that (by reason of the abundance of raine which fell that evening, their long absence till that time of the night, and the words of O'Connor Sigo. which assured him that the said Scots had incamped themselves againe for that night. But shortly after this, when the Scots, by reason of some espials of their owne, or some traitterous intelligence out of the gouernors camp, had vnderstanding that sir Richard and his companie had reposed themselves to rest, stole towards the bridge of Kiltowney, neare to which at a castell not far off sir Richard for the defence thereof had placed his footemen, and ffitie Irish horsemen, and so being come priuily to the bridge 3. or 4. hundred of them gate ouer the same before the English footemen came at them: who, as soone as they came in, beat the Scots backe and won the bridge. But here the Irish horsemen did no seruice at all: when the alarm was, sir Richard himselfe was at a place called Knockmullyn, about a mile from the bridge, being also an other passage, where it was thought the Scots would sooner haue passed ouer than at the bridge. At this place the bridge was the onely straight and passage that sir R. knew the Scots could find to passe ouer into the countrey by: but they contrarily waded ouer at a forde not far from the bridge, neuer before knowne by any of the countrey that had or would confesse the same to the English: sir Richard and the horsemen, upon the alarm halled with great speed to the bridge and rode ouer the same without danger both of the enemy and his owne companie (for the night was exceeding darke) and the bullets and arrowes flew to and fro, without regard of any man that might march or ride betwixt them, and hauing passed the bridge (although the ground were ill for horsemen to serue on) yet he charged the Scots, and killed and drownded about 40. or 50. of them. The most part of his horsemen here failed him, some, because they were far off, and the said Irish forces he remoued with his owne ordinary companies into the baronie of Tyeragh, which he chieflie did for to saue the pray of that countrey which was great: he left the great mountaines of Slougan on the left hand, which were before on his right, and marched downe 8. miles into the said baronie, consisting of plaine ground with some bog in it of twenty miles in length, lying all along by the sea. In the same he came to a towne or village called Ardglasse, where he camped the second night, & hauing intelligence by espials that the enemy lay on y other side of the mountaines, not far fro an Abbey called Banneda in maruellous fast and strong ground, he tooke with him good guideship, he passed the sayd mountaines with his forces, and encamped that night at Deconron a towne of the bishop of O Hartes. At his being here he gaue it forth in policy, that the enemy was marching vp through Callen toward the inner and ciuile countries, as the lord Breninghams countrey, and the county of Roscomon. And thereupon he hastned by great dayes march to a castle called Moygarry, which stood in a streight, and in a fit and apt place to answer the seruice vpon them, if they had passed into the sayd countries. Sir Richard did this, to draw the Scots into an assured beliefe of their owne security, to win such aduantage of ground of them, as afterwards was gotten, for vpon the newes of sir Richards returning backe, they grew somewhat carelesse, and perswaded themselves (as also they were informed) that he was returned home to Roscomon, and durst not by reason of his small forces encounter with them, as after shall appeare well. Lying at Moygarry, the monday at thre of the clocke afternoone, newes was brought him from his brother George Bingham, that an hundred footemen of maister vicepresident, vnder the conduct of lieutenant Hunt, had passed the Courlews, whereupon the gouernour dispatched messengers to them: whereupon they came vnto him the same night. The morrow after being tuesday, he remooued to a castle called castle More, in the barony of Costellogh 5. miles from Moygarry, and a place as commodious to answer the seruice as the other was. Here came in to him 100. footemen of sir William Sturles, vnder the conduct of lieutenant Iaques, & 50. of sir George Bowchers footemen vnder the leading of lieutenant Day, with 25. horsemen of sir Henry Haringtons, & 15. of maister Wingfields. These men were brought in by captaine Gren Omoloy, whom he had sent forth for that purpose fife or seuen dayes before. Lying here, sir Richard & his company were in some distresse for want of victuals, but he was supplied by captaine Woodhouse, who brought him some beecues out of the plaine and champion countries. At this place sir R. B. with his companies lay tuesday and wednesday till noone, for it was long before the beefe was killed and made ready to sustaine them. By that time the espials which were before sent forth to discover the enemy, returned, bringing newes that at their last remooue from Clannary, they tooke their way toward Trdnary, a castle neare to Tirawly, and standing on the riuer of Moine, thinking to passe that way into the barony of Tirawly. This being knowne, sir Richard dealt with his guide to bring him the nearest way he could thither. At 12. of the clocke at noone vpon wednesday aforesaid, he remooued fro castle More, & marched towards the abbey of Bauned, all vnder the high woods & mountaines, through a place called the Aitter, in the barony of Costellogh, & came to the sayd abbey two houres within night. This abbey stands two miles from the woods in a plaine and open place: here the guide whose name was Edmond Mac Costellogh found out a priest which had that day broken from the Scots, with whom he had bene prisoner. The priest the sayd Edmond brought to the gouernour, of whom he learned most assuredly, that the Scots were all encamped at Trdnary, and had there proclaimed, that all the countrey was theirs, that sir Richard was returned to Roscomon, and that all his forces had forsaken him, and therefore whosoever would willingly come vnto them, should be friendly receiued to their fauour, and haue no hurt.

Sir

Sir Richard dealt with this priest to be his guide to bring him where the Scots were: but the priest durst not undertake it, except a couple of horsemen of the O Haries which he named might be sent with him: the gouernor willed him to fetch those two gentlemen of the O Haries, which he did, and returned to him againe an houre after midnight. These two gentlemen sent away two espialles to discouer the Scots more certainly, and about three of the clocke in the morning when the moone gaue light, sir R. arose, and addresting himselfe and his company, marched towards Belcleare 4. miles from the Abbey in the highway towards the enemy: here one of the espials came in, bringing newes, that the Scots lay still incamped at Ardunary, which was 12. miles from the aforesaid Abbey of Baundea, and 8. miles from the Abbey of Belcleare. At his marching from hence the night forsooke him and his companie, and they forsooke the highway and marched ouer the mountaines both horsemen and footemen, with all their cariages, carying themselves in a hearse altogether, keeping the bottoms and low places by circumference waies, with as great silence as was possible. This mountaine was in breadth 4. or 5. miles, which sir R. with his forces past about nine of the clocke. And after he had marched a mile into the hard ground, and were not about two miles from the enemy, he made alte to draw all his forces together, & there gaue order & direction for the fight. From whence himselfe with his horsemen rode towards the enemy, and left the footemen to come after, with a speedy march. Sir R. with his horsemen being now come within halfe a mile of the Scots camp, sent out halfe a dozen horsemen as scouts aforesaid to discouer them, & the manner of their camp, which horsemen came euen amongst their cabbins, & gaue them a loud baine & fearefull alarum, & so retired to sir R. who that time came to the top of the hill neare to them, where he might take view of all the ground betwixt him & the castle where the Scots lay. Now he sent away post after post for the battell, and the loose shot to come in to him, for the enemy was risen and arrayed in battell, and made head towards him in their greatest brauerie: sir Richard entertained them with skirmishing to winne time, and draw them by higher to the hard ground till the footemen might come in, who approached with such silence that the Scots neuer suspected any such companies to be at hand: but when the shot began to approach them, sir Richard charged them roughly, and thoroughly with his horsemen, beate backe their loose wings to their battell, draue them to a little bogue, and killed many of them. After which he againe retired, and caused some of his shot on horse-backe to alight from their horses, and therewithall entertained them with a second charge, about which time his loose shot, and the whole battell of footemen came in, and then the footemen charged them in the foreward, and himselfe with his horsemen in the flanke, in such sort, that they soone discomfited and ouerthrew their whole force, and draue them to the riuers side, where he and his companie slue and drowned them all sauing 80. or thereabouts, which stripped themselves, and by swimming ouer the riuer of Moine into Tiratoly, saued themselves, leauing their weapons & apparell behind them. There were no more saued of all their forces; and of all sorts of them but these, and a 100. and od that went the day before into Tiratoly for a pray with some of the Burkes. But such as swam ouer the riuer, as aforesaid were afterwards killed in in their returne and flying towards the north in the county of Sligo by George Bingham esquire brother to the gouernour, being then chiefe of the county of Sligo, together with the helpe of the gentlemen of the countrey, diuerse also of them which were absent for this layd pray whilest the battell was fought, and certaine of their horsemen, which were then also foraging abroad for horsemeate, were afterwards slaine in their returne and flying homewards, euen by some such as when they came first forwarde and were strong, were their great friends. The number of fighting men slaine and drowned, as hath bene well knowne and tried out, were fourtene of fiftene hundred, besides horse and foote boyes, women, churles, and childen were as many more, so as in the whole there died of them that day and the day after in their flying homewards, three thousand persons, and of the English companies were not slaine past two persons, and these also through their otiose folly in being too forwarde for the spoyle, but many men and horses were hurt and galled. This day the chiefe leaders of them, James Mac Connellson, viz. Donnel Gocum, & Alexander Carrogh were slaine, together with all the rest of their leaders, and the chiefe Burks which dreyne them into the prouince. In this seruice was imployed vnder sir R. Iohn Bingham captaine of 100. footemen, Nicholas Mordant captaine of the like number, captaine Merryman of the like company, William Mollean captaine of the like number, besides the lieutenants afore rehearsed sent from the lord Deputy, and certaine leaders of horsemen. And besides captaine Woodhouse, captaine Greene, which had no charge, and maister Newton, and captaine Betaghe, which had charge of some horsemen, the whole company were in name about 600. footemen, and by poll about 500. besides 90. horsemen, whereof fifty were of the garrison of the prouince, and the other forty were sent by the lord Deputy. This ouerthrow was great, and the paines and policies therein taken and bled great, but the seruices in Sligo, the watching & trauels at the strights before the Scots came into the countrey was much more greater: but the wonderfull care and industry of sir Richard in those seruices, which continued out in it 13. or 14. weekes together, not once comming home to his house in that time, and faring hardly, and lying on the ground and on strato a great part of the sayd time was to be noted, and in him highly commended. Yea ouer and aboue all this, although he created three severall companies of footemen, each of them consisting of a hundred men with their officers, and certaine horsemen which continued in pay during all the sayd time, besides five or six hundred kearne, which also had pay ouer and aboue her maiesties allowance, yet he so handled the matter, with the goods of rebels, which by strong hand he got from them, and with 3. or 4. hundred pound of his mony, he defraied the extraordinary expences of the sayd seruices, not charging her maiesty with any one groate thereof, or any of the subiects of the countrey either for victuals or any other thing, other then some small matter, which the risings out brought, or which souldiers in comming to him or going from him ate, where they came for a night in a place: yea he charged himselfe in this case (that being granted of powder from her maiesties store in Dublin) he was driuen to furnish himselfe thereof, for his ready mony in Galway. Lastly, this seruice was such as drowned and cut off all the old beaten Scots which bled to haunt Ireland, insomuch that now (it is sayd) there are not forty such to beare such to beere by head in all that realme of Ireland to the great behoofe and comfort of the same, to the great ease and benefite of her Maiestie, and to the eternall commendations of this worthy gentleman sir Richard Bingham for euer.

In the moneth of July, diuerse trayterous persons were apprehended, and detected of a most wicked and detestable conspiracie against her Maiestie, and also of minding to haue stirred vp a generall rebellion throughout the whole realme: for ioy of whose apprehension, the citizens of London on the 15. of the same moneth at night, and on the next morrow caused the bells in the churches to be rung, and bonefires in their streets to be made, and also banquetted euery man according to his abilitie, some in their houses, some in the streetes with singing of Psalmes & praising God, for preserving her Maiestie and people of this land, which doings of the citizens were so well accepted of her Maiestie, as by her letters to them directed may appeare, the copie wherof being read openly in a great assembly of the commons in the Guild hall of that citie the 22. of August, before the reading wherof, master James Dalcroft one of y<sup>e</sup> Counsellers of that citie, in the absence of y<sup>e</sup> Recorder, made this speech hereafter following. of traitors.

To our right trustie and welbeloued, the lord maior of our citie of London, and his brethren the aldermen of the same.

Right trustie and welbeloued, we greet you well, being giuen to vnderstand how greatly our good and most louing subiects of that citie did reioyce at the apprehension of certaine diuellish and wicked minded subiects of ours, that through the great and singular goodnesse of God haue bene detected, to haue most wickedly and vnnaturally conspired, not onely the taking away of our owne life, but also to haue stirred vp (as much as in them lay) a generall rebellion throughout our whole realme: we could not but by our owne letters witnesse vnto you the great and singular contentment we receiued vpon the knowledge thereof, assuring you, that we did not so much reioyce at the escape of the intended attempt against our owne person, as to see the great ioy our most louing subiects tooke at the apprehension of the contriuerers thereof, which to make their loue more apparant, they haue (as we are to our great comfort informed) omitted no outward shew that by any externall act might witnesse to the world the inward loue and dutifull affection they beare toward vs. And as we haue as great cause with all thankfulness to acknowledge Gods great goodnesse towards vs, though the infinite blessings he layeth vpon vs, as many as euer prince had, yea rather, as euer creature had: yet do we not for any worldly blessing receiued from his diuine maiesty so greatly acknowledge the same, as in that it hath pleased him to incline the hearts of our subiects euen from the first beginning of our raigne, to carrie as great loue towards vs as euer subiects caried toward prince, which ought to moue vs (as it doth in very deepe) to seeke with all care, and by all good meanes that appertaine to a Christian prince, the conseruation of so louing and dutifull affected subiects: assuring you that we desire no longer to liue, then while we may in y<sup>e</sup> whole course of our government cary our selfe in such sort, as may not only nourish and continue their loue and good will towards vs, but also increase y<sup>e</sup> same: we thinke meete, that these our letters should be communicated in some generall assembly to our most louing subiects the commoners of that city.

By the Queene to the Lord Maior of
of London,
her letters.

Given vnder our signet at our castell of Windsor the 18. of August 1586. in the 28. yeare of our raigne.

Maister
James Dalton his oration.

Right worshipfull, my good countrie men and citizens of this most noble citie of London: Since the late bruite and report of a most wicked and traiterous conspiracie, not onely to take away the life of our most gracious Soueraigne, (whome God graunt long to liue and raigne ouer vs) but also to stirre vp a generall rebellion throughout the whole realme: the great and vniuersall ioy of you all of this citie, vpon the apprehension of diuerse of that most wicked conspiracie, of late declared and testified by many outward acts and shewes, hath brought in the Queenes most excellent maiestie such a gracious contentment, that it hath moued her Highnesse by her letters signed with her owne hand, to signifie vnto my lord maior of this citie and his brethren, her most noble and princely acceptation thereof, and that in such sort as thereby may appeare, that her Highnesse hath not moze, no not so much reioyced at the most happie escape of the wicked mischiefe intended against her owne person, as at the ioy which her louing subiects, and namely you of this citie of London tooke at the apprehension of the practisers of that intended treason. By occasion whereof her highnesse brought to a thankfull remembrance and acknowledging of Gods infinite blessings bestowed on her, comparable with any prince or creature in the world, no wooldly thing moze or like accounteth of, then of the heartie loue of her louing and faithfull subiects many waies and many times before now, but especially by this our great ioy in this sort at this time, and vpon this occasion shewed.

And that her exceeding great loue and acceptation of our reioycing may the moze appeare vnto you, it hath pleased her Highnesse in the same letters to declare, that she desireth not longer to liue among vs, then she shall maintaine, continue, nourish and increase the loue and good will of her subiects towards her. And this her Highnesse hath willed to be made knowne vnto you all, with this, that she will not faile with all care, and by all good meanes that appertaine to a Christian prince, to seeke the conseruation of you all so louing and dutifully affected subiects. This her maiesties pleasure in part now declared, and moze to be made knowne to you by her owne letters, which you shall heare read: my lord maior and his brethren haue required me to declare vnto you all, that they do highly reioyce and thanke God for the happie day of the good acceptation of this your great ioy, and my lord himselfe hath willed me to giue you all heartie thanks in his name, for that in the time of his seruice your dutifull behauiours haue gotten to the citie so noble and worthie a testimonie of dutie and loyaltie of so noble and worthie a Queene. Now for as much as Gods blessings wonderfully abound, and one ioy comes vpon another, let vs not be vnthankfull to God, but acknowledge his goodnesse, and attribute the same (as indeede we ought) to the sincere religion of Almighty God, most godly established by the Queenes most excellent Maiestie, which hath taught vs to know God aright, our dutie to our Soueraigne, and to loue our countrie, and hath made vs dutifull and obedient subiects, reioycing at all good things happening to her Maiestie, her realme, or to any in her noble seruice, the true effects of a true and good religion: whereas the contrinners thereof, and immoderate affecters of the Romish religion, and superstitions,

flons, being bothe of the true knowledge of God, haue declined from God, their allegiance to their prince, their loue to their countrie, and haue become inuention of mischiefs, hunters and spreaders abroad of false and seditious rumours, such as ioy at no good thing, but contrariwise reioyce at euerie euill successe, the banges and marks of their profession, who haue before this, in this realme and in other her highnesse dominions, stirred by rebellion, foraine inuasion, and many times practised the very death and destruction of the Queene her selfe, the ruine and subuersion of the whole realme, the proper effects of their Romish religion. We haue beheld all these things, and scene in our daies the ruine and mischiefs inuented against others, fall vpon the inuentours themselves: and haue knowne the wicked and violent hands of diuerse of them, diuellishly to kill and murder themselves, when most trayterously they would, and most happily they could not slay the Lords annointed. As we haue knowne all these things, so God be thanked, that by a better religion, hauing bene better taught, we haue bene no partakers of their wicked deuises, but haue put to our helping hands as occasion hath serued, and euer readie to ouerthrow the authours and deuilers thereof. And I haue no doubt, but we of this noble citie, who hitherto haue bene alwaies readie dutifully and faithfully to serue her Maestie vpon all occasions (her Highnesse now so graciously accepting onely of our reioicing at the apprehension of her enemies, euen the least part of the dutie of a good subiect to so good a Queene) will be readie every one with all that he can make, and with the uttermost adventure of all our liues, speedily to be reuenged vpon ail such as shall diuellishly and traiterously attempt or put in vze any mischiefe to her noble person, and in the meane time will haue a better eye and care to all suspicious and discontented persons, to their sayings and doings, to their false bruits and reports, to the places and corners of their haunt and resort, to their harboyers, companions, aiders and maintainers.

God vphold and continue his religion among vs, and increase our zeale therein, which hath made vs so louing and loyall, and so beloued and acceptable subiects to so worthie a prince, and roote out that wicked and Romish religion, that hath made so many disloyall and trayterous subiects: to whom is both odious and ieksome the long life and prosperous raigne of our most noble Queene Elizabeth. God confound all such traitors, and preserve her Highnesse long to liue and raigne ouer vs.

The 7. of September, certaine of these diuellish and wicked subiects were indicted: first, for intending treason against the Quenes owne person: secondly, for stirring ciuill wars within the realme: and thirdly, for practising to bring in foraine power to inuade the realme: seuen of them appeared at Westminster on the 13. of September, who all pleaded guiltie and were condemned, but had iudgement on the next morrow. On the 15. of September, other seuen were likewise arraigned, who pleading not guiltie, were found guiltie by 12 Jury, & had iudgment.

These traytors 14. in number, were executed in Lincolnes Inne fields on a stage or scaffold of timber strongly made for that purpose, euen in the place where they had used to meete and to confer of their trayterous practises, there were they hanged, boiuelled, and quartered, seuen of them on the 20. of September, to wit,

J. Ballard priest, Anthony Babington esquire, I. Sauvage gentleman, Rob. Barnwell gentleman, Chidioke Tichborne esquire, Charles Tuncy esquire, Ed. Abington esquire. The other seven were likewise executed on the 21. of September, to wit, Thomas Salisbury esquire, Henry Dun gentleman, Edward Jones esquire, John Trauerse gentleman, John Charnocke gentleman, R. Gage gentleman, Ierom Bellamie gentleman, &c. as I haue more at large set downe in Reigne Wolls and Holinsheds chronicle.

The Royall Merchant and other foure ships of London their victory against 13. gallies of Castile and Malta.

The merchants of London being of the corporation for the Turkie trade intending onely a merchants voyage, prouided and furnished with all things belonging to the seas, five tall and stout ships appertaining to London, to wit, y<sup>e</sup> Merchant Royall, the Tobie, the Edward Bonaenture, the William and John, the Susan: these five departing from the coast of England in the moneth of November, 1585. kept together as one fleet, till they came as high as the isle of Sicilie within the Leuant, where each ship tooke leaue of the rest, and separated themselves to particular ports, wherunto they were bound, one for Tripolis in Syria, and other for Constantinople, and the rest to other places: but before they deuised themselves they agreed, after the lading of their goods at their seuerall ports, to meete at Zante an yland neare to the maine continent of the west part of Africa. These accordingly (their businesse first performed, failed not to keepe promise, and arriued at Zante within the compasse of the time afoze limited, here they staid in this port till the necessities of each ship were supplied, and nothing wanted to set out for their returne. In this port the newes was fresh of two generall armies and fleets lying in await to intercept them, the one consisting of thirtie strong gallies, and that fleet howered about y<sup>e</sup> straits of Gibraltar. The other army had in it twentie gallies, whereof some were of Sicilie, and some of the yland of Malta, vnder the charge of Iohn Andreas Dorea a captaine seruing y<sup>e</sup> king of Spaine. The Merchant Royall was appointed admirall of the English fleet, & the Tobie vice-admirall, by whose orders the rest promised to be directed, and each ship bowed not to breake from the other. Thus in good order they left Zante, & committed themselves to the seas, and proceeded in their course without sight of any enemy, till they came neare to Pantalarra an yland betwene Sicilie and y<sup>e</sup> coast of Affrike, into the sight wherof they came the 13. of July, and the same day they descried thirtene sailles, 11. gallies, and two frigots lying in waite for them. As soone as the English ships had espied them, they made themselves readie to fight, the gallies more and more approached them, and in their banners the armes of Sicilie & Malta: they sent their frigots to our admirall, demanding of him whence they were: who answered, of England: they asked why they delayed to send or come to Don Pedro de Luna their Generall, to acknowledge their dutie to him in the name of the Spanissh king lord of those seas: our men replied, y<sup>e</sup> they ought no such dutie to him, nor would acknowledge any, &c. Whereupon in the end the fight began betwene them, and continued very hot for the space of five houres, what slaughter was made among the Spaniards the English men were vncertaine: but they supposed the same to be so great, y<sup>e</sup> they wanted men to continue y<sup>e</sup> charging of their peeces: wherupon with shame they withdrew themselves, and the Englishmen contented in respect of their deepe lading, rather to continue their voyage

borage then to follow the chace, ceased from further blowes, with the losse onely of two men slaine and one other hurt in the arme, whom maister Edward Wilkenlon captaine of the admirall, with his good wraod did so comfort, that he nothing esteemed the smart of his wound in respect of the honour of such a victorie, and shamefull repulse of the enimie. The English ships proceeded in their navigation as high as Algier, a port towne upon the coast of Barbarie, where they refreshed themselves, and tooke such supplie of fresh water and victuals as they needed, and put to the sea looking to meete with the second armie of the Spanissh king, which waited for them about the mouth of the streight of Gibraltar, which they were of necessitie to passe: but coming neare to the said streight, it pleased God to raise a very darke fog, so that one ship could not discerne another, by means whereof, together with the faire easterne winde that then blew, they passed with great speede through the streight: but yet the Spanissh gallies had a sight of them when they were come within thre English miles of the towne, & made after them in all hast possible, but in vaine: they shot off their ordnance in the sea, as if they had bene in the midst of them. But thus it pleased God to deride and delude all the forces that the king of Spaine had provided to distress the English, who notwithstanding passed through both his armies: in the one little hurt, and in the other nothing touched, and arrived at Cith the 18. of September, in the yeare of our lord, 1586.

Now to returne to the service in the Low countries done by his Excellencie & other under his charge, after the yielding of the strong fort of Rimegan which was on the 20. of May, as ye haue heard before: it followeth, that on the 21. of May his Excellencie returned to Arnam and there sojourned. On the 22. of May, there passed towards Barrikes hoofe 11. or 12. hundred men most bravely furnished of our English nation. The 25. of May, was brought before Barrikes hoofe sence two canons, which shot at the sence that day, & on the next morrow in the morning was the same sence yielded to his Excellencie. the soldiers putting themselves to his mercie, who pardoned them, & let them passe with life onely. In this sence were found alive about 60. persons, the rest were slaine in the siege. At the yielding of this sence count Hollocke found one of his cosins, to which when he beheld, he said, Ha villaine, art thou become a traitor to thy country & his excellencie? I avouch, & thou art none of my blood, & with his rapier thrust him in & slue him.

The 24. day of May, the enemy played before Graue with their ordnance, and presently assailed it, but they of the towne being led by the county Embrigh did repulse them so sufficiently, that the enemy lost neare a thousand men.

On Whitstunday, Peregrine Barrie, lord Willoughby of Erskbie lying at Berganapome, understanding of a great convoi that was coming to Antwerpe, let upon it, and tooke it, there were of wagons 480. laden with victuals, oyle, salt, and wine taken, which had to draw those wagons a thousand mares and horses, there were 200. men slaine by our horsemen and footmen, and 400. taken prisoners that were sent with the convoi to haue the defence thereof. The Lord Willoughby tooke a threescore wagons into his towne of Berganapome, and burned the rest, and for the salt, oile, and wine, he brake up the heads of the vessels, and let them be spoiled.

Bariks hoofs sconce ouer-throwne.

The 30. of May, sir Iohn Norris was sent to take order for the overthrowing of Bariks-hoof: sconce which was done, for that it was thought not meete to be kept with viem, his Excellency hauing the sconce at Nemegan that kept the river of Wall, and the sconce made by Skinke at Thelhouse kept both the river of Wall and the Reine, for that this sconce standeth at the entrance of these two great riuers: And for that his Excellency had Arman sconce at the ioyning together of Tell-Reyne, and Dowlsborough riuers. In this meane time to wit on the 26 of May, the enemy spared no kind of shot to annoy the towne of Graue, but thundered with canons at it as it had bene musket or caluice. He had at it 8. canons, 20. smaller peeces, as culuerings and demy canons, &c. The Graue of Embrike seeing the assault to be so hot, and fearing the event (although he had written to his Excellency that he should not care for Graue, but go about his other businesse on the 27. of May entred parley with the enemy, and presently let in his souldiers, which seeing certaine English men and others more faithfull then the rest, straight tooke a place of strength, and kept without victuals thre dayes in despite of the enemies and after seeing no way to be releued, they departed by composition. And thus was the strong towne of Graue lost by the county Embrough, who after came to Hudson, sent for foure of the burgesse of the towne, for what purpose was not knowne, but thought to perswade them to betray the towne, but 3. of them returned, the fourth not found, but thought to be with y<sup>e</sup> prince of Parma. As for the county Embrough as he was walking with 3. or 4. other captaines of Graue, he was with 4. other captaines surprisid by some of our side, & brought to his Excellency on the 2. of June to Wyndhurst, & were committed to prison.

His Excellency remoueth from Armen to Nemegan.

The last of May, his Excellency with his whole companies of souldiers and gentlemen passed from Armen to the campe before Nemegan, where his pavilion was pitched, and presently he sent a 2000. men toward Tille, to keepe the water from the enemies passage.

Tille and the Amon ther-of, his strage dealings with messengers.

The fourth of June, his Excellency first hauing sent Skinke and captain Williams, with diuers other cororats of horse and gentlemen, towards Wendelo (for that the prince of Parma had begun to besiege it) came from the legat at Nemegan to Tille where he rested that night. The gouernour of Tille, called the Amon being a man of great courage, and a protestant, vled the prince of Parma in this sort, the prince sending a trumpeter to parley with him, he straight wayes without any talke hanged him vp. The prince wondering he heard not of his trapper, sent a drumme to know what was become of him, vnto whom the Amon answered, your trumpeter is hanged, and thou shalt be downed, & so it was done without any more words. This towne is situate in the Betto, whose ground is the most fertile or onely place of fertility in Guelderland. The towne is strong, the one side the Amon may at his pleasure downe, the other is so strong with rampiers, wals, and fortres, that the Amon protesteth that he regardeth no prince or princes power in the world. He hath halfe a score ships of war at his appointment, wherby he commandeth all the waters about him, he hath alwayes shewed a singular loue to our nation, especially to his Excellency, inso much that he vowed to keepe the towne to his ble. so long as he liued.

The fift of June, his Excellency passed from Tille to Somell, there was the castle castle of the Warneborough, and for that he tooke part with the prince of Parma, his house was bent and spoiled. The beauty of the towne of Bomell is in two streets, crossing one the other, very large and faire, at the crossing of which streets, there is a very faire market place, the towne is strong though little, and sufficiently appointed with ordinance and munition. It standeth in an Island very fertile and sweete, having such store of orchards, gardens, and other pleasures, as it passeth all others: on the top of the steeple of the church in this towne, the country lieth so plaine about it, that one may see all these townes following, Pennegan, Maganin, Arnam, Keyne, Clucke, Colinborough, Utrike, Uiana, Surcom, Hudson, Fatinghamballe, Graue, Cille, Haole castle, and Baryn castle.

The 9. of June, his Excellency came from Bomell to Garcome downe the river Malle, leauing at Bomell a garrison of three hundred Dutchmen, with those of the towne, who at the first could hardly brooke the garrison, till they were perswaded by countie Hollocke passing toward the towne. There was fire of fouer ensignes of his Excellencies souldiers on the banke of the river, which did discharge braue volies of shot, then was there on each side the river a mightie sence full of souldiers, which gaue their volies of shot, then the ordinance of the towne went off: and entring the towne, he was entertained by the Burgesses, and passing thorough the towne, on both sides were placed souldiers in great number. On the next morrowe his Excellency went into the castle of the towne, which is marvellous strong. This towne is very rich, for there are many rich merchants, which passe to all parts of the world usuall. The river Malle runneth through the midst of this towne, and the rivers of Reine and Haze on each side. The towne is very strong, for that round about the countrey may be drowned. His Excellency with his whole traine were here marvellously welcommed, and well vsed, for victuall, lodging, &c. There is by this towne, another towne of great force, called Worcome, by the castle of Zulien, this Worcome is in greatnesse but a billage, but in situation and strength, a thing of great importance: it standeth in the same Island that Zulien standeth in. It is Graue Maurice his towne, and kept his garrison of souldiers.

Worcome.

The 10. of June, a post came to his Excellency, from coronell Skinke and captaine Williams, with letters: the effect whereof were, that the sayd sir Marcio Skinke, and captaine Williams, staying not farre from Uento (which the duke as then besieged) and longing to shew the zeale they had to the seruice of her maiesty of England, set out with their horsemen in the night, all the Dutch men for the most part forsaking them, so that with him was not about 160. horses, with these he set forward, killed the still watch, & passing farther killed also two courses of gard fully appointed, and entring by force the quarter that the prince of Parma was in, they killed a number of noblemen and gentlemen: but in the returne the enemy well appointed set on our men, and scattered them, to some losse, but the greater sort escaped: the skirmish being ended, and our men retiring, Captaine Williams was one of the hindmost of them all, and he cried (being yet in the enemies campe) where is Williams, where is Williams, and another answered, before before, and thus he escaped.

The 13. of June, his Excellency went to Dort with a small traine, where being come about five of the clocke in the afternoone, the Burgers made him such great cheere, as was thought to haue bene impossible for so short a time of prouision. The 14. he tooke ship towards Utrike from Dort, being waisted with an hoyle full of souldiers of the towne.

Verlo lost

The 22. of June, the enemy attained Venlo, a towne of great importance and strength: there was in this towne, not only the wife of Skinke, and his children, but also the treasure, hoyle, and (for the most part) the furniture that Skinke had, this towne had in it of souldiers, to the number of five or sixe hundred, all of Skinke men well appointed and braue souldiers.

The 23. of June, his Excellencie passed to Colingborough about nine english miles from Utrike, only to visite the Graue of Colingborough, where hee diued, viewed the towne, and returned to Utrike, taking with him the laide Earle of Colingborough.

Berganap-
lome.

The 29. of June his Excellencie passed from Utrike to Dort. The 30. of June, he remooued from Dort, to Williams state or Ragon hill. The same day Countie Hollocke ouerthrew a cornet of hoyle belonging to Breda, with the helpe of Maister Robert Sidneyes cornet, sir Philip Sidneyes cornet and other. The said Countie Hollocke practised to haue a conuoy passe from out of Brabant, to Berganaplome, which y<sup>e</sup> enemy being warned of by spies, that this conuoy was guarded but with some sixtene or twenty hoyle, the gouernour of Breda sent out his cornet or strength of hoyle to this exploit: but some few of them, being either afraid to meddle with our men, or doubting the true occasion that happened, staid behind the rest. Captaine Welch an english man, which a great time had serued y<sup>e</sup> enemy, had y<sup>e</sup> leading of y<sup>e</sup> hoyle at Breda, but passing to this exploit, countie Hollocke with maister Robert Sidneye beset them round, which the enemy no sooner perceived, but yielded, so there was taken captaine Welch and a thirty hoyle, & as many men. The 31. of June his Excellency early in the morning passed from Williams state to Berganaplome, & about thre of the clocke in the afternoone he arriued there, and presently passed to the strong castle of old Alaw: this towne is in the entrance of Brabant, 20. english miles from Antwerpe, upon the same riuer that Antwerpe standeth. It is a towne now almost ruined, though before in the prosperity of it it was not much inferior to Antwerpe, there are few people but souldiers, the Burgers forsaking their goodly builded houses, are gone to other places. This towne is subiect in two places to hills of firme ground, which are the places that make this towne far weaker then otherwise it would be, yet wonderfully rapped with bulwarks, wals, and flankers in all places. The L. Willoughby hath wonderfully enlarged the strength of this towne: further he hath made two very strong bulwarks in two places of the towne, at the haue of the towne, and from the towne a slight shot or more, are 2 mighty sconces, which stand by the riuer side, which indeed are of more strength then the towne, & they are to command the towne: a 2. english miles from the towne standeth a ruinated towne in an Island, & by this riuer whose situation is such, as for strength it might be made a braue place, for arc & otherwise, this towne is called Roma's ward, against the which standeth a strong sconce, and so along the riuer to the towne standeth diuerse the like, like, to command the riur and passage to the towne: the castle before named, that his Excellency went to view at his arriuall at this towne, is also such as no reasonable force can win, alwayes once a yeare victualled and manned afresh, this castle regardeth not the canon shot, it is so rampred. The 1. of July, his Excellency passed from Berganaplonie to Suricksea, a towne in Zeland, and in an Island so called. In this Island also is another towne called Biewers hauen, a very strong towne, this Island is most fertile. The 2. of July his Excellency passed to Doxt. And the same day passed from Berganaplonie 3000. men that were there newly arrived, to Stenberge, a towne greatly noyous to the garrison of Berganaplonie, for when they passed into Brabant upon any exploit, they were letted by the soldiers of this towne: this iourney was so closely kept, that our men shot at the walls of Stenbergen ere any of that towne knew for what cause so great a number of men were gathered.

Stenbergen.

The 2. of July, there entred into Flaunders, the Graue Maurice, the prince of Oranges sonne, and sir Philip Sidney, lord gouernour of Flushing, with other, to the number of foure thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen. The fourth of July, Graue Maurice tooke on him to cut the bankes of the sea, to drowne the land of Masse, hauing with him two thousand men, the rest of the army passed with sir Philip Sidney into Flaunders, and surprised the towne of Arell, there were slaine of souldiers of that towne three hundred, besides the Bourgers that made resistance, which were likewise slaine. This done, they came to Drope, or Drope, a towne of great importance, this they entred and tooke in it five hundred boozes, which were kept to do seruice, and to be ransomed. Graue Maurice with his two thousand men so pleted the bankes, that in short time he had made it sufficient for the water, not onely to enter, but to drowne all the country, but the wind stood so contrary, that no water to the purpose entred at that time, onely the bankes lay open. In the meane time our men tooke five sconces, and put all to the sword that they found in them, and this was their entrance into Flaunders. The towne of Arell is not farre from Antwerpe, and about the same distance from Gaunt, and not five english miles from either, the land of Masse wherein this towne standeth, is the onely paradise of those lands, and most fertile place of all other. The eight of July, Graue Maurice returned to Middleborough, leauing all occasions to sir Philip Sidney gouernour of Flushing. The tenth of July, coronell Yorke brought to his Excellency to Dunhage, five ensignes of the enemies, all which were taken from the enemy in the towne of Arell, and the sconces.

Sir Philip Sidney entred Flaunders. Arell surprised by the English.

Five sconces taken by the English.

In this meane time, to wit, on the ninth of July was Paulus Buce a great state and a polirike man taken at Utrike and put in prison, and very shortly after was taken another named Peter Fullistine, and likewise committed to prison. The 14. of July, his Excellency commanded the gates of Utrike to be enclosed, and all the bridges to be drowne, all the men both English and Dutch souldiers to be in armes, and further proclaimed that all men that loued the queene of England, should presently be armed to the uttermost, which being done, the English souldiers were placed on the walls, with commandement, that no Burger whatsoever should come thereon, but presently they should take from them their upper gar.

garments, which if they refused, they should be straight slain. Also a straight search was made in the Towne for suspicious persons, and there were taken three which were committed to prison. The cause of this stir was this, it was reported, that there were come into the towne 500. of the enemies, in boozes apparell to betray the towne, but it was not so.

About this time, sir Philip Sidneys comet at Housdon, and certaine Dutch cornets, to the number of a hundred horse or more, with a two companies of footemen, entred into Brabant, taking booties, and spoyling the country, which being knowne to the enemies, they sought to intrap our men, and with a three hundred horse, and certaine companies of footemen, they set upon our horse, put them to retreat, and pursued them far: but our men, by swimming and goodnesse of their horses, escaped for the most part, onely a cornet of Dutch & one other officer of them were slain, our footemen brought their bootie into such streights and fens, that the enemies could not indomage them, so that they brought their booties safe to Housdon.

The 15. of July, sir Philip Sidney, Lord gouernor of Flushing, the Lord Willoughby, with those powers they had receiued from the garrison of Arel, considering the coming in of the water into the land of Masse, which might sufficiently defend that countrie, remooued the campe. The lord Willoughby to Bergenapsume, where he was gouernor, sir Philip Sidney passed the sea with a three thousand men: whose enterprise shall be shewed hereafter. This sir Philip Sidney, at or before the taking of Arel, within an English mile of the Towne, called so many of his souldiers together as could heare him, and there made a long Oration, wherein he declared what cause they had in hand, as Gods cause, vnder, and for whom they fought, for her Maiestie; whom they knew so well to be so good vnto them, that he needed not to shew, against whom they fought, men of false religion, enemies to God and his Church: against Antichrist, and against a people whose unkindnesse both in nature and in life did so excell, that God would not leaue them unpunished: further, he perswaded them that they were Englishmen, whose valour the world feared and commended, and that now they should not, either feare death or perill whatsoever, both for that their seruice, they ought to their Prince, and further, for the honor of their Countrey, and credit to themselves. Again, the people whom they fought for were their neighbors, alwaies friends, and well-willers to Englishmen. And further, that no man should do any seruice worth the noting, but he himselfe would speake to the vttermost to prefer him to his wished purpose. Which oration of his did so liuke the minds of the people, that they desired rather to dye in that seruice, then to liue in the contrary.

The 14. of July, sir William Pellam, lord marshall of the field, came to Dunhage. The 16. of July, his Excellency remooued from Dunhage to Brill, in which passage he tooke to crosse the water at the dooye of Sluce so called, being passed the water, he entred the land betwene two sconces, a quarter of a mile or more from the towne, where he was entertained with all the sconces shot both of great ordinance and smaller shot, passing by land he came to the towne, where the gouernour sir Thomas Cidell entertained him both with chere and otherwise, most honorably.

Sir Philip Sidney his oration.

honorably. This towne is on the mouth of Haze, where the water is in breadth foure miles English. The Island of Brill is great, more than twentie miles ouer, in it are Dorps not so well built as rich. On the 19. his Excellencie returned from the Brill to Dunhage.

In this meane space, to wit, on the 16. of July, the enemy entered Peuce, after a long assault, in which assault, he lost thre thousand men. This Towne of Peuce was forthwith burned downe to the ground by the lackies and boyes belonging to our soldiers, there remained whole but eight houses.

Nuce burned by the English boyes.

The 21. of July, his Excellency made a banquet to diuers great personages of those Countreies, as the lady Bredo, lady of Tiana, the Paligranes wife, the county Egmonets daughters, the prince of Oranges daughter, with a number more. In which banquet wanted not what might be had to augment their cheere, either in musicke, dauncing, fire works or otherwise.

The 22. of July, the garrison of Sutfin issued out, to the number of neare two hundred, and came to Arnem, tooke some cattell and other things, and returned, wherupon master Anthony Sherley came to captain Willson gouernor of Arnem, and required that he and his company might issue out and reuenge this iniurie, which at length was granted: then master Sherley chose out to the number of fourescore footemen, and 20. horsemen and sent them out, which the enemy seeing, to incite our men forward, set the booty not far from Sutfin, on a hill, and laide a fourescore of their men in an ambush betwene Arnem and the booty, the twenty horsemen came to them, which they let passe in a streight, but no sooner past but they discharged on them and seeing no more thought to slay or take them all, but no sooner had they charged the horse, but master Sherley charging them behinde, the horsemen returned, and so what on the one side, and on the other, they slue of them the number of 80. & tooke 12. prisoners, which with the booty, they brought againe to Arnem hauing lost but one man, and two men hurt.

Of Sutfin.

About this time, master Butlers cornet, lying at Deuentrie, issued out and tooke from Sutfield or Sutfin, of cattell to the number of foure hundred Cowes, and sixtene Hares of great price, in this maner. Those of Sutfield had by the riuer side a great marish, all so ditched in, that no horse could passe ouer by any possible meanes: but they of Deuentrie and Campyn consulting together, did one night at a lowe water passe into the marish ouer by the side of the Towne, and brought without losse of any man of our part, foure hundred and odde Beastes, and sixtene Hares, most of them sold for fine pound a Hare, amongst the souldiers. This exploit with others did greatly pinch those of Sutfield, for that the milke of those beastes were to them a great reliefe.

The 26. of July, maister Robert Sidneis cornet, lying at Sertrienberge passed with some of county Hollocks horse, to the number of an hundred, and passed on purpose onely towards Breda, but being within sight thereof, they espied a number of cattell issuing forth of the Towne (for feare of our garrisons in those parts) vp towards high Brabant, hauing to conuey them some 300. shot, and a 100. or 12. lances, our men seeing so fit a booty vnlooked of their part, charged and put to flight the shot and horse, cut betwene the Towne and the cattell,

Robert Sidneis took a booty.

and

and tooke from them six hundred oxen, seauen hundred sheepe, & threescore mares, and some boares, all which they caried to Certenberge, to the great reliefe of the souldiers there.

Mountford. The second of August his Excellencie passed from the Hage to Utrike, he dined at Tergowme, from thence he came by Oden water, & from thence to Mountford, a strong towne, at night he came to Utrike, where by the Lord North he was received with great shoy of shot.

Mewes yeelded to the enemy. In this meane time, to wit, on the 29 of July, the enemy lying part before Berke, the residue came before Mewes, which towne was no sooner summoned, then it yeilded to the ennemie, and on the next day they tooke a little Towne called Alpyen, both these townes belonged to the Graue Maurice.

Berke. The second of August, the enemy hauing passed by Berke as before, diuers of his company were cut off as straglers, and further a great sort of horse, the men that were taken were hanged: amongst whom a yong lad which was taken, confessed to Skinke that as the prince passed by Berke, on a hill made this speech, My souldiers (quoth he) you may see here this Towne, neither great nor strong, but so manned, that assure your selues you shall receiue blowes inough, and no wealth, wherefore we may now passe with no dishonor, but if we stay here long, it will be dishonor to passe away, therefore say what you minde to do, and presently they were all contented to depart, and so they passed from the Towne. The third of August, the prince seeing he could not passe any thing by water, but Berke letted it, besides he had a conuoy of venison, wine, &c. which was by them of Berke taken away with fiftie men that had the conducting thereof, the prince noting that the principall men that annoyed him, were there where the prince saw the Towne wreake, he returned to it againe: for Skinke had no sooner taken the fiftie men, and others, but asking them whose men they were, and they answering the princes, they were straightwaies hanged, which doings of Skinke caused the prince to returne his army to Berke, on the said third of August, on which day he passed with three cornets of horse from Alpyen where his munition lay, to Orlon, a Towne of the Duke of Cleues, a small league from Berke, and came with certaine to viewe the Towne of Berke, which Skinke perceiuing, straight issued out of the Towne with certaine horse and foote, and charged the prince which had three cornets of horse, and five hundred footemen, yet Skinke put him to the retrace to Alpine to his quarter there.

The fourth day he came with his maine battell and passed on the south side of the Towne, though often times he were charged, and lost many of his men, yet he abode there.

The Lord Marshall and other entred Brabant, Irish kernes. On the third of August, the Lord Marshall, the Generall of the Horse, &c. with some thousand horse and footemen passed in the night farre into Brabant, and came early in the morning to the great Dorpe Oell Stiluoysbenke, set it on fire, and burned it to the ground: There was with the Lord Marshall two hundred Kernes, who showed their courages, for none were so ready to burne, nor so ready to kill all that came in their danger, so that fewe escaped them. Comming further they came to a Dorpe more like a good Towne, nor not farre from Sattinghambulle, wherein is a castle, and a strong sconce, but the wild Irish kernes, neither fearing shot nor threat, ranne by the sides of the sconce, tooke it presently, and put to the sword all in it, and tooke the provision to themselves. Those of the towne had crossed the way with trees in such sort, as the horsemen could not passe to the towne but with great labour, but the Irish entered the towne onely, and burned it to the ground, saving none that came to their hands, so our men returned to Gertenberge, not loosing foure of their Irish men.

The sixt of August, his Excellency passed from Ulrike to Tergowe, where Tergowe. he stayed till the seventh, being honorably entertained: this towne is very strong, situate so, that all the countrey round about may speedily be drowned. About this towne is the greatest nurseries of fruite that men there present had ever scene, and by them thought sufficient to serve many countries, with trees of all sorts, but peares especially. The ground about Tergowe of a 14. score broad, is nought else but the most brave trees that can be scene. This towne hath the most faire market place that hath bene scene of many, in the midst whereof standeth a faire State house, in the which his Excellency did eate and was lodged. The 7. of August, his Excellency passed from Tergowe to Ulrike, by the which he must passe through Odonwaters, by the Burgers of which towne, he was honorably received all the towne throughout over head was hanged with garlands of flowers for his welcome. The 19. he passed from Ulrike to Keyne, and there stayed all night. The next day he passed to Arnarn. About this time a ship was sent from the bishop of Cullen to the prince, laden with canon shot, and powder, the maister of which ship, either mistaking the bishop, the prince, or their religion, so soone as he came where he might well recouer Bercke, where Skinke and his force lay, he by one meanes or other, so opened the ship that the water entered, so that he and the rest were forced by that means to retire to Bercke. In this ship was a commodary of good account with the Prince, whom the maister of this ship did convey to Skinke, who was no sooner come, but Skinke entered iudgement with him, and he desiring to be used like a gentleman, Skinke answered he should be hanged with his face toward the enemies campe, for, sayth he, I know you desire to see your friends, and so it was done. This losse of provision made the prince want of his will, for battery of the towne, onely planting five canons in two places. Further, at the same time, there came news to his Excellency, that the horse and footmen of Elder had often put the enemy to losse, and had taken 150. horses from them, besides a number of them slaine.

The 17. of August, Sir John Norris passed over Isell by Arnarn sconce (a bridge of boats being there made) with some 3000. english footmen, and 6. or 7. hundred horse. And about the same time, the prince remooved some part from Bercke to Alpyne, a dutch mile from Bercke. The 21. of August, the lord Marshall passed over the riuer by Arnarn sconce, with 3000. footmen, and 600. horse toward the legar. The 23. of August, his Excellency passed over the water by Arnarn sconce with 2000. or more footmen, and 100. or more lances. The Irish Irish kernes, kernes were no sooner come to the campe, but that they passed neare the enemy, and

and brought from thence a 100. cowes. The 24. of August, the leiger rose, and passed to Eltham: there is neither Eltham, and upper Eltham, both haue bene houses of religious women, most sumptuously built: the rather standeth neare the Keyne: the upper standeth an english mile from the Keyne vpon an high hill, and in such a place, as few the like for prospect: where a man standing may behold 100. parish churches. This cloister was of such credit and estimation, that none came there by the order of the place, but she was a barons daughter at the least. The lady Anne of Cleue was brought by in this cloister. The 27. of August, his Excellency passed from Arnaim to the campe at Eltham. The 28. he caused all the English to be marshalled into squares, and two preachers made to them 2. sermons in the field by the hill side of Eltham cloister. The 30. of August his Excellency passed from Eltham to Dowlborough with all his army, except only those that the night before were sent to lye about the towne. On the north side was an Island, to the which was sent the Scots regiment, which by night with their pioneers did intrench within 80. yards of the north part: On the west side came the regiment of sir T. Sherley. On the east side was the regiment of sir William Stanley & sir L. marshall: on the southeast side was his Excellency with the regiment of the L. Audley. All the residue, as sir Iohn Norris, Sir Digby, and diuers other regiments as well English as Dutch, were placed betwene these quarters, euery one in part induoying is intrench neare the ports, so that the same night, though with some alarmis from the towne, were the whole ports of the towne intrenched, so that none could issue without danger. The same night also that his Excellency came before Dowlborough, himselfe in person with the lord marshall in the night, with their gards, went from their tents to view by fourth trench, being neare the towne, there was a bafe shot at them, which though all were together, yet rebounding amongst them all, hit by lord marshall on the belly, pierced his busse ierkin, his dublet, and hurt him somewhat: this shot missing his Excellency, made the returne. The last of August, there was nothing but intrenching, and some volleys of each side, for that the ordinance was not come. The first of September came our ordinance, which being landed, & drawn neare the places of battery, some of the demy canons discharged, to displace the ordinance of the towne, which was in part done, but againe in other places mounted. This day his Excellency remooued from the east or southeast side to the west side into an Island, the riuer Iffall running by it. The 2. of September halfe an houre before sun-rising, began the battery of Dowlborough, & was so thoroughly plied, by with 9. battering perces a maruellous breach was made. In time of which battery captaine Williams was shot through the arme, yet in this siege not 20. men lost, and a 20. hurt. About one of the clocke they agreed to parley, all our battels being ranged in squares before the towne to assault. The souldiers had made by breach more strong then before with feather-beds, dung, timber, &c. & made in by inside a great fight, but fearing an assault, which they knew wold be furious, they (as was said) agreed to parley: the conditions were, that the souldiers should passe away with their liues onely, the Burgers should haue all they had at his Excellencies mercy: these things being agreed, about foure or five of the clocke in the after noons, all the souldiers with their wiues passed ouer the breach away. The women that passed with the souldiers, it was a grie-uous thing to see how they were ransacked, till the earle of Essex and diuers other gentlemen came downe the breach, & by smiting & beating the soldiers, made them leaue off rising them: his Excellencies expresse commandement was, that none should take ought from the towne, but that was not obserued, for much of the goods was spoiled. Captaine Borowes was appointed to keepe the towne, whose ensignes with captaine Prices colors was set in the breach. The captaines & soldiers that were sent to saue the towne from spoile, did to the contrarie, for they made harocke and most horrible spoile, wherewith his Excellencie was greatly displeased. The fift of September his Excellencie went into the towne, and there dined, and after viewed the towne. The same day maister Anthony Sherley and other captaines came to the campe, and declared that the ennemie came to Well, and with a peece of ordinance beate backe our ships wherein our men were, and killed some of them, & further beate them downe the riuer. The towne of Dowlborough standeth by the riuer Well, an arme or issuing of the Reine by Arman sconce, & runneth along through the countrey of Quar Well, it runneth also by Suthfield, and is in the prouince of Suthfield and sixe English miles from Suthfield, and sixe miles or more from Arman. It standeth in a most fertile soile, pleasant & fruitful ground. It is of reasonable strength, having high wals, not rampired but in certaine places, having a water running round about it, it is about the bignesse of Arman, nigh an English mile & a halfe compasse. The order of the assault of this towne as it was determined, sir Iohn Norris had the honoz giuen him to enter the great breach, sir William Stanley with his regiment had the seconding of sir Iohn Norris, county Hollocke had giuen him the small breach with his regiment. These ranged themselves in the most brauest manner, but his Excellencie offered parly as ye haue heard. The 9. of September word came, that sir Martine Skinke was gotten fed out of Berke, & the 11. the same Skinke, captaine Thomas with some other braue souldiers lances came to the camp before Dowlborough. The 12. of September his Excellencie with all his forces came from Dowlborough, & that same night incamped himselfe before Suthfield, but he feared want of a bridge could not go ouer the water, this night he intrenched himselfe very neare in diuers places, and on the morrow he made a bridge, which passed ouer to the other side. The 15. of September his Excellencie leauing sir Martine Skinke in his absence passed to Deuentry, but shortly returned, for that he was informed that the prince with his whole force was marching towards Suthfield. This towne of Suthfield is very strong, being in diuers places parted, in all which places is such strength, as all must be woon ere the towne be woon. It standeth a good distance from the riuer Well, but hath a sconce on Well of incredible strength, for Hollocke with all his force, and our English men a two yeres since lay at it three quarters of a yere, but could not win it: but now his Excellencie began to bessege it, and for that his forces were not sufficient to incampe it round about, he framed himselfe to do his best to win the sconce, for by that meanes he might the more easly win the towne. The first night our men intrenched at a Church beside the Towne, but for that they thought after it was not so commodious, they passed not for it, and therefore went on the other side of the water to insonce the sconce, for that out of it there there issued both horse and footemen, which did greatly annoy our camp, for none could passe or repasse from Devenrie, or otherwise stir from the strength of the camp, but they were taken or in danger, if not rescued. The 18. of September, Skinke tooke on him to make a sconce neare the enemies sconce, which the same night he began, though the towne shot soe at him, & also the sconce, yet he followed his worke, & so fortified it, that it was sufficient for greatnesse to hold men to keepe it, and sufficient for strength to hold out what the enemies shot could do against it, & this sconce Skinke kept on y<sup>e</sup> side the water, that passage could not so well come to the sconce, but he did sinke their boats. His Excellencie the next night caused another sconce to be made iust by the enemies sconce, so that y<sup>e</sup> ennemie was by these two sconces so kept in, that they were kept from issuing out for their pleasure. The 20. of September, the ennemie lying not far off at Langanham a towne of ours, distant from Suthfield an 8. or 9. miles English, sent in the night into Suthfield certaine cornets of horse, which were suffered to enter by our men, and further to passe away againe to the enemies campe, they brought nothing into the towne to relieue it: moreover, all the whole English camp lay on the other side of the towne ouer the water, so that readily a sufficient power could not be made.

A fight before Suthfield.

Sir William Stanley and sir Iohn Norris became friends that before were enemies.

The 22. of September, was the most braue fight performed of our side that could be. The ennemie this night put into Suthfield some hundred wagons with victuals, which being perceived, streight waies sir William Stanley went with his owne company, which were some 200. to stand as a buscado, sir Iohn Norris ouertooke him, being sent to the seruice, & said to sir W. Stanley: There hath bene (said he) some words of displeasure betwene you and me, but let all passe, for this day we both are employed to serue her Maiestie, let vs be friends, and let vs die together in her Maiesties cause. Quoth sir William Stanley, if you see me not this day by Gods grace serue my prince with a valiant and faithfull courage, account me for euer a coward, and if neede be I will die by you in friendship. Thus the long quarrell begun in Ireland was here ended, with such friendship as made all men reioyce: both of them serued so forwarde this day, that the one could not tell how much to commend the other, onely the one serued with footemen, the other with horse: sir W. Stanley marched with his footemen, but the enemy was come to the Church where our men had at the first placed themselves, there was of the enemies 2200. muskets, and 800. pikes, which were now to gard the place of their refuge, (to wit, the intrenched Church.) The Lord Audley with some hundred and fiftie men, by great suite made to his Excellencie, attained at length to go, who made so great haste, that he ouertooke sir William Stanley ere the skirmish began, which was hot, but the Lord Audley and sir William Stanley not liking the hot volleys of musket shot, pressed neare the enemy, and themselves at the push of the pike with their men, put the whole company of the enemy to retreat to the holde, which done, they retyped a little backe out of the musket shot, and there made a stand: the Earle of Essex Lord generall of the horse, the lord Willoughby, sir William Russell, and sir Iohn Norris with their cornets came to charge the enemy. There were of the enemy fiftene cornets, of which sixe or seue were Albanys, the rest were Spaniards or Italians. The Albanys issued, which our men charged so furiously, that

It was thought at the first shocke there were a thirtie or fortye of the enemies overthrowne, then our men went to the curtellar, which they so furiously plyed, that the enemye after some thre quarters of an houre retreated to their pikes, losing of foote and horsemen, as the prisoners since taken confesse, besides hurt, an hundred men of their bruest, amongst which was the countie Ancoball, also capitaine George the commaunder of all the Albanoyles was taken prisoner, besides neare twenty commaunders, some capitaines, some ensigne bearers, lieutenants and other officers: but to sir Iohn Noris he gaue the first charge, who with his pistoll in his hand offered to discharge it on a braue man, but his pistoll would not go off, which he seeing, stroke it on the head of his enemye and overthrow him. The lord Willoughby with his launce in his rest met capitaine George and unhorsed him, so that he fell into a ditch, and cryed to the L. Willoughby, I yeeld your prisoner, for that you be a seemely knight, (this he spake in French: ) the lord Willoughby came not to take prisoners, but passed on with his curtellar in his hand, & his whole cornet after so furiously, that it was wonder to see, y<sup>e</sup> lord Willoughby was so forward, that oftentimes. but twise especially he was like to be taken prisoner, his haubers were pulled off from him, but rescued by our side. When y<sup>e</sup> skirmish was done & all retreated, capitaine George being in his Excellencies tent, would not graunt to be prisoner to any but to him who unhorsed him, whome he knew if he saw him in his armor, the L. Willoughby came in armed, this is the knight that I am prisoner to, & I yeeld to him, said he, to the L. Willoughby had y<sup>e</sup> prisoner ad- iudged to be his. The 3. the earle of Essex charged with his cornet, who so encouraged his men, for the honor of England said he, my fellowes follow me, & with that he threw his launce in his rest, and overthrow the first man, & with his curtellar so behaued himselfe that it was wonder. Sir William Russell with his cornet charged so terribly, that after he had broke his launce, he with his curtellar so played his part, that the enemye reported him to be a diuell & not a man, for where he saw sixe or seuen of the enemies together, thither would he, and so behaue himselfe with his curtellar, that he would separate their friendship. Among the rest sir Philip Sidney so behaued himselfe, that it was wonder to see, for he charged the enemye thysie in one skirmish, and in the last charge he was wounded with a musket shot through the thigh, to the great griefe of his Excellencie and of the whole campe, who being brought to my lord lieutenant, his Excellencie said: O Philip, I am sorie for thy hurt, and sir Philip answered: O my lord, this haue I done to do your honor and her Maiesties seruice. Sir William Russell conning to him, kissed his hand, and said with teares: O noble sir Philip, there was neuer man attained hurt more honorably then ye haue done, nor any serued like vnto you. He was conueyed to Arnam, where he continued till his end in such kind of godly behauiour, that both the preacher did wonder at it, and the chirurgions admire, the one seeing his wise godlinesse, the other his valiaunt courage with patience to abide all kind of paines. The cornet of sir Philip Sidney was at this time at Deuontrie, vpon this occasion, his Excellencie feared Deuontrie, for that it had often bene in question of reuolting, but the prince of Parma hauing occasion to be employed other waies, could not come that way: now (as is aforesaid) his Excellencie fearing that while he were winning one towne he might lose another, the prince being so neere, sent sir Philip Sidneyes cornet, his owne cornet, and maister Robert Sidneyes cornet all into Deuentrye, and of foote folke captaine Flud with his souldiers, and captaine Ward with his: this was the cause sir Philip Sidney was alone without his cornet at this seruice. Sir Thomas Parrat also was at this seruice, and serued most brauely. All the time this skirmish was with these cornets, so our footmen were in fight with the enemye, and by fine force made them once againe retire to their safetrie. The enemye being retired to his strength, al our horse made a stand by the musket shot, which played on them sore, and braued the enemye, bidding him come forth if he durst, but he would not: which sir Io. Norris seeing, rode to his Excellencie, and bad him be merry, for said he, you haue had this day the honorablist day that euer you had, for a handfull of your men haue driuen the enemye three times to retrain this one day. Further he willed his Excellencie either to send for more strength, or else to sound the retrain, which last request he graunted, for that his strengths were otherwise employed, and so the retrain being sounded both by drum and trumpet, our captaines came backe in good order, eury man to his quarter with great praise and honour. The lost men of account at this fight, captaine Martine, and captaine Thomas Welch is thought to be dead, he came with Skinke from Berke in hope now to be in more safetic: the lost of foote and horse, dead, about forty.

The 25. of September our men seeing y great advantage that a certaine ylland lying in the riuer betwene the sconce and the towne, would do them, and further that there was therein some souldiers of the enemye, which greatly annoyed them in shooting as they passed any way, our men therefore set vpon it, skirmished with the souldiers, and put them to flight, many of them leaping into the riuer were drowned, some were killed, but in fine our men insconced there, and the towne shot at them, but did them little hurt.

The 28. of September, his Excellencie with a great part of his campe removed to the other side of the towne, and there began to intrench: leaning the sconces well manned, it was thought the towne was neuer so well victualled, for by his Excellencie the prouant was cut off, and eury soldier had halfe a crowne a weeke, which greatly contented them, and this was paid to them truly, so that a souldier might by this meanes be able to pay the victualler, & that made many resort to the campe. Further, Deuentrye was so neare, that by that meanes victuals were brought the more fully to the campe, for at Deuentrye is great plentie of victuals. The horsemen had foure shillings the weeke loane, to find them and their horse, which was better then the prouant: his Excellencie knighted maister William Hatton and maister Henry Vmpton, who were then sent for to returne into England to their friends.

The 29. of September, our men set vpon the lope sconce of the enemye, which with some difficultie they obtained, but after thinking to win another sconce, there were many of them slaine, as well as on the other side was the like of woyle: there were of our men slaine and hurt aboue an hundred. In this lope sconce as was reported, there were five fights, which were woon that night, and certaine trenches of the enemye, and further intrenched almost round about the great sconce, so as they of y lane could now hardly issue out, or any come in to th.

The second of October, in the night there passed into Zutphen five thousand of the princes folke, a foure thousand footmen and a thousand horsemen, these passed into the towne all in order without trouble of our campe: these companies brought no carriages into the towne, but all the wagoners were to come after. The victuals which the princes power had gotten in Drent and Twent was conveyed into Zutphen permitted by his excellencie, for that his men were otherwise employed, those of Longham did cut off some stragglers of the princes power as they passed by them. The fourth of October, they of the sconce at Zutphen called for a parley, which was graunted, and countie Hollocke for that he spake Dutch slept out of our sconce, and parlied with them, and after long talke, one of the souldiers shot a musket, which as countie Hollocke was speaking, shot into his mouth, and out by his eare, so that it smote away theirowell hanging at his eare. The fifth of October came to Deuentrie many of our horses, and about midnight, taking all the garrison of horses in the towne, passed from thence to Langham, where they also tooke the horses of the garrison, and went about an exploit, which was, they hearing of a conuoy of victuals conuoying to Suthfield, they determined to haue cut it off, but they could not meete with it. There was of our men at this exploit pretended a five or sixe hundred horse, the leader whereof was sir William Russell. The same fifth of October, early in the morning our canons being placed against the lesser sconce, they playd at it till three or foure of the clocke, at which time maister Edward Stanley leader of sir William Stanleyes companie came to assault the breach, but before he came to the breach, the enemy had a fight or trench full of souldiers placed there for to offend vs, and defend the sconce, which souldiers all at once discharged their muskets, killing onely one man. Edward Stanley entred the trench with all his men, killing some of the enemies, and the rest fled. In this trench he stayed till our canons had made the breach cleare, then maister Edward Stanley before his men, clamoured by the breach, but a braue man of great stature captaine of the sconce stood alone in the breach with a pike, and thrust at him, which pike with the one hand he defended, and with the other caught hold to get vp, till at the last he was throwne downe by a bullet throwne out of the sconce: the second time he assaulted the breach, but this captaine so defended it, and kept him downe as was wonderfull: and although our men with the canon did play on the breach, yet he still fought, and did not stirre till at the last a canon out of the Island strooke the ground from vnder him, so that he fell out of the breach into the sconce: but in fine this braue leader of our men led them by the breach, and first entred the same, then was the fight in the sconce, where at the first our men killed foure or five, at the second the like, at the length, they hauing made a traine, three or foure of our men were bent, but the souldiers of the sconce fled out at a little wicket, which our souldiers chanced to light on, and killed to the number of thirtie, so our men possessed the lesser sconce, with the losse of three or foure of our men, and sixe or seuen hurt. This seruice being done, his Excellencie seeing the valour of maister Edward Stanley, gaue him thanks, and calling captaine Reade knighted them both. This taking of the lesser sconce greatly terrified them of the greater sconce. The next night the countie Williams men lying neare them, they with a foze boilie of shot did discharge at them, and bad them haunce by. for said they, you will play but as countie Hollocke did, spend powder and shot, and lose your men, and haunce by when you haue done. This sudden bolty of shot put Graue Williams men in doubt that they would issue, wherefore they had thought to haue giuen alarm, but finding them so quiet after, they stayed their enterpryse, and listened what would follow, and hearing no noise of shew of souldiers, they passed neare the sconce to see the cueit, at length they might see a fire in the sconce which made them to preece neerer, and at length entered the sconce, where they found a ten or twelue men, which fled (as was thought) into the water and were drowned. Thus had the cowardly pratlers made a fire, and ranne away by the light thereof. Thus was the great sconce which was so well manned, so well provided of powder and shot, that they wanted none, yet without assault or charge, breach of any thing to dismay them, they ran away to their better infamy and reproch.

They of the

The seventh of October his Excellencie passed to Arnam, thre to visite sir Philip Sidney lying of his hurt receiued as is afoze shewd, before whose going he made knights these capitaines and gentlemen following: sir Henry Goodyere capitaine of the guard, sir Henry Norris, sir John Borowes, sir John Winkfield, sir Roger Williams, sir Robert Sidney, sir Philip Butler. Those were knighted, sir Henry North, sir Thomas Dennis, sir William Knowles, sir George Farmer, sir George Digby, sir Steward, sir Bewford: besides these, were made knights banarets these following: the earle of Essex, the lord Willoughby, the lord Audley, the lord North.

A souldier

from an high tower into the riuer of Reine.

There was (saith my cousin Henry Archar) a strange thing happened at Beris in the tyme of Skinkes government there, which I thought good to impart. As the souldiers were repairing and working to make the towne strong, a souldier coming by said, you worke and worke, but the enemy will haue the towne within this weeke: which words being both noted and taken grieuously that he should so discourage the souldiers, he was taken and carried to Skinke, who without any circumstances condemned him to be throwne off the great staple of the towne into the Reine, which was accomplished. But he falling off from a monstrous height, light in the water, and rising againe, as the nature of the water is, to raise one vp frome of thise, he had both life and memoire, such as he offered to swim, and crawling got out of the water: but Skinke had taken such an hatred against him, that he caused him to be bound hand and foote, to haue bene cast againe into the riuer of Reine, sauing that coronell Morgan being there, so perswaded him, that the poore mans life was saued.

The ninth of October countie Hollockes cornet of horses lying at Langham, tooke a firtie wagons, which had carried the conuoy before spoken of, into Suthfield, and a fiftene of them being laden with hurt men that were wounded in the sconce, he put them all to the sword, and tooke the wagons into Langham.

The 15. of October, his Excellencie passed from Deuenterie to Arnam to sir Philip

Philip

Philip Sidney there lying sick, as is afore shewed.

On the 17 of October, the said sir Philip Sidney, knight, a most valiant and towardly gentleman, sonne and heire to sir Henry Sidney (late afore deceased) of his hurt receiued at Zutphen in Gelderland deceased, vpon whose departure he so bled his mind and tooing, that the preacher that came to instruct him in his extremitie, might rather learne of him than teach him his assurance in the promises of Christ. From thence he was brought by water to Flushing, where he was kept eight daies, on the first of Nouember he was brought to the sea side by the English garrison, which were twelue hundred, marching three and three, shot, halberds, pikes, & ensignes all trailing, the burgers of the towne following: his body being imbarked, the small shot gaue him a triple bolly, then the great ordinance, &c. On the first of Nouember he was landed at the Tower towarke, and conueyed to the Minories without Ald-gate, on the east side of the citie of London, from whence on the thirteenth of February next following, he was conueyed to Saint Pauls Church in London, in order marshalled by Ro. Cooke alias Clarenceaux king at armes. Inprimis, poore men in blacke gownes 32. for he was so many yeares old, sergeants of the band, fife and drum, ensigne trailed, lieutenant of footemen, the corporals, trumpets, Bidon trailed, lieutenant of his horse, conductors to his seruants, the standard borne by a gentleman, his gentlemen and yeoman seruants 60. physicians and chirurgion, steward of house, esquiers of his kindred and friends 60. knights of his kindred and friends 12. the preacher & chaplaines, the penone of his armes borne, the horse for y<sup>e</sup> field led by a footeman, a page riding with a broken lance, the barbed horse led by a footeman, a page riding carrying a battle-axe the head downward, yeomen officers to the heraults, the great banner borne by a gentleman, Portcose bare the gilt spurs, Blew mantell the gauntlets, Rouge Dragon bare the helme and crest, Richmond the shield of armes, Somerset the coate of armes. Clarenceaux king at armes, gentleman officer to the corps, two bannerols, the corps couered with a pall beluet, carried by 14. yeomen, 2. bannerols following. sir Robert Sidney chiefe mourner, mourners assistant, 4. knights, two gentlemen officers to the noblemen, y<sup>e</sup> carles of Huntingdon, Leicester, Pembroke, and Essex, barons, Willoughby and North, States of Holland leuen, all these in blacke, the sword bearer of London riding on horsebacke, the lord Mayor and aldermen on horsebacke in murrey: the company of the Grocers of London in their liuerie 120. Citizens of London practised in armes 300. marched three and three in the foreward, the captaine, lieutenant, and three targets, muskettiers foure ranks, drums and fife, small shot 20. pikes 20. ranks, halberds foure ranks, chiefe officers of the field, drums, fife, and ensigne. In y<sup>e</sup> reeward, halberds three ranks, pikes fiftene ranks, drums and fife, small shot 15. ranks, muskettiers three ranks, &c. And when his corps was thus conueyed into Pauls church, where he was honourably enterred, they honoured him with a double bolly of shot and so departed.

The 18. of October, his Excellencie passed with great sorrow, for the losse of his nephew sir Philip Sidney to Ulrike: and on the same 18. and 19. dayes of October, sir William Standley gaue in charge to his officers, chieftaines & commanders, as also to his souldiers, that they should go into Deuentry by 15. by tenne, by fire and by thee, which commandement they did fulfill, so that for the most part they got them into the towne, being nothing mistrusted of the Burgers, they got into harbours and close places, that they were not espied. Also other capitaines sayd to their souldiers, if you will go five or six, or somewhat more to Deuentry to recreate your selues, take with you store of powder and shot, for feare of the enemy, which liberty they were ready to take, and performed accordingly, so that there was by this meanes gotten into the towne well knowne 1200. english souldiers: on the 12. day in the morning came sir William Stanley with some troupe of his men, and in the afternoone sir Wm Pelham lord marshall, likewise with his troupe. The counsell of States, with maister Killegrey, maister Kirly, and other were debating of matters all this day with the Burgomasters, nothing mentioning of the garrison that there should be placed: further those of Southfield in disdaine, did tel those that passed by their towne to Deuentry, that they should hve them, or the gates would be shut. The lord marshall being come to his lodging, sent for all the Burgomasters, which were in the counsell as before, who being come, he told them, that his Excellencie, both for their owne safety, and suppression of the enemy, was fully determined to put in a garrison of men there, and for that before time he had found them strange in granting, he had sent him thither, for that the campe was now ready to breake up, to know in short their determination, whether they would receiue a garrison or not, and for that his haste required no long stay, they to give him answer on the next morning by 8. of the clocke, that he might send word to Utrike to his Excellency, which the Burgomasters promised to answer according to his request: now all this night did sir William Stanley and others, with the lord marshall take counsell what were best to do, which was agreed that all the souldiers secretly should on the morrow at 7. of the clocke, be in the market place with their furniture: this order being taken, all with quiet rest, but the Burgers which made that night a double watch, and chained all the streetes, made fast all passages, and further did make and man all the ports most strong.

In the morning early, by 6. of the clocke, all the Burgomasters were assembled in the state house, to agree of this purpose. About 7. of the clocke the Lord Marshall came to the state house, with diuers gentlemen, and others, who knocked and were let in, straight sir W. Stanley also entred with his traine al appointed for the purpose, by this time were all our Englishmen assembled in the market place, which the townes men seeing were in pitious feare, the women crying out for feare to be spoiled. The lord Marshall asked them a direct answer, whether they would haue a garrison or not: give me quoth he, a direct answer, for I must so haue it. One of the principal Burgomasters rose softly, & stole away, which being told the lord Marshall, he said: fetch me presently him that is gone, or before the living God, before whom I stand, you shall all die for it, and delay not sayd he but do it, & straight was he fetched againe. Then demanded he for what cause, that this night ouer all other, they had made so strong a watch, wherefore they had chained their streetes, &c. but they answered not: well sayd he, euerie one of you let his hand to this bill, and deliuer ouer your authority, to thole whom his Excellencie hath set downe, or before God you shall all die, you haue not to deale with a nation simple, or foolish, or such as will be led in this or the like sort, coming hither to spend their goods, toile their bodies, and venture their liues, and not to be accounted such as your subtilty should ouerreach. They forthwith at his command (being sore afraid) set their hands to the bill, and gaue their authority ouer to others, all protestants appointed by his Excellency: well said he, send one of you straight to all those Burgers that are on the wals and rampiers, and command them to passe to their dwellings, and to let them forthwith be vnarmed, which was presently done. Then he commanded the, to bring to him the keyes of all the ports, or gates, vpon the like paine before spoken of, which was also done, with storing both the old and new officers to the queene of England. This being done, all that before were suspected to be enemies to the Englishmen, were turned out of their places of authority. There was a 4000. souldiers, all Burgers in this towne, which for the most part watched and warded, besides a number others, as too rich for such paines, boozs, which are all counted to be a 1200. fighting men, wherfore it requireth great care and wisdom to deale in this sort. The campe at this time brake for the most part vp, to the garrisons, and all those companies that were appointed to the sence went from Utrike on the 22. of October.

The 23. of October the States of those parts came from Deuentry to Utrike, where with his Excellency they sate in counsell, of determining all the 24. day from morning till night. The 28. early in the morning, his Excellency passed from Utrike, and came that night late to Rotherdame: On the 29. his Excellency passed from thence to the Hauge, where he staid some small time. The 8. of November he went to Delph, where he was banqueted, & went that night to Dun- hage. On the 16. he passed from Hauge to Rotherdame: and on the 17. to Dort. On the 18. he tooke shipping to passe from Dort to Flushing, and being passed a seuen English miles from Dort, the yce was so great, and so oppressed his ships that it indamaged the most strong ship in the flecte, so that perforce his Excellency was forced to land at Dope, a pooze village, and in a wagon to passe by land to Rotherdame, and there prepared ships, and when the wind serued he passed towards Flushing, but calmnesse of the wind caused his stay against the Isles of Alcoro whererein Flushing standeth, but in the morning he landed at Cam- phere, and thence in a wagon he passed to Middleborough, and from thence to Flushing, where he tooke shipping towards England.

The 22. of November, the honorable lord Robert earle of Leicester, lieutenant generall of all her maiesties forces in the vniited prouinces of the Low countries, returning from thence, arrived at London, & went late that night to the Court at Richmond, where he was not so suddenly come, as forwardly welcome of her maiesty, and the rest: and thus leauing the seruire done in those vniited prouinces, the Low countries or Netherlands (whercof thus far I had receiued aduertisements from my good friend, and neare kinsman Henry Archer, one of his Excellencies gard) I returne to matters at home.

The 8. of October last before passed, I. Low, I. Adams, and Richard Dildale, being before condemned for treason, in being made priests by authority of the bishop of Rome, were dyawne to Tyborne, and there hanged, bowelled, and quartered.

The earle of Leicester returneth from the Low countries, and arrived in England.

One of the west gates of the city of London, commonly called Ludgate, was this yeare new builded, at the charges of the citizens of the same city, amounting to fiftie hundred pound or moze.

The 29. of October, the archbishop of Caunterbury, the lord treasurer, and the earle of Darby, representing the queenes maiesties person, began the high court of parliament by prore, which session of parliament was at this time assembled, for triall of matters concerning Mary the queene of Scots, &c.

The 2. of December, the session of parliament brake up, and was proroged untill the 15. of February, the substance of matter handled in the same session concerning the queene of Scots, is set downe at large in a letter learnedly penned, and published in print, directed to the honorable the earle of Leicester, and as I haue set downe in my continuation of M. Reigne Woolfe and Holinsheds Chronicle.

The 5. of December, the lord maior of London, assisted with diuers earles, barons, the aldermen of London in their scarlet, the principall officers of the city, the greatest number of the gentlemen of the best account in and about the city, with the number of 80. of the most grauest and worshipfullest citizens in coates of beluct, and chaines of gold, all on horsebacke, in most solenne and stately manner, by sound of foure trumpets, about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, made open and publike proclamation, and declaration of the sentence lately giuen by the nobility against the queene of Scots, vnder the great seale of England, bearing date at Richmond the fourth of December, being openly read by maister W. Sebright, Towne clerke of London, and with loud voyce solemnely proclaimed by the sergent at armes of the sayd city, in foure severall places, to wit, at the crosse in Cheape, at the end of Chancery lane in Fleet-Street ouer against the Temple, at Leaden-hall corner, and at S. Magnus corner neare London bridge, during which time, like solenne proclamations were made with great solemnity in the county of Middlesex, namely in the palace at Westminster, without Temple bar, and in Holborne, by the sherifes of London and Middlesex, assisted with sundry noblemen and gentlemen of good account, and the Iustices of peace of the sayd county, to the great and wonderfull reioycing of the people of all sorts, as manifestly appeared by ringing of bells, making of bonfires, and singing of Psalmes in euery of the streetes and lanes of the city.

The queenes maiesty granted to the towne of Douer toward the repairing of their haven, the free transportation of 30000. quarters of wheate, 10000. quarters of barley and malt, 4000. tun of beare, without paying custome or impost, this licence or pattent was sold to a couple of marchants of London, named Iohn Bird, and Thomas Wats, after the rate of three shillings and foure pence the quarter of wheate, and 2. s. 8. d. for euery quarter of barley or malt. And the licence for beare being sold to diuers, amounted to 4000. markes at the least: moze there was granted by parliament. Anno. 23. Elizabeth, that for euery vessell or trayer whereof her subiects were owners or partners, being of burden twenty tuns or bpward, loading or discharging within this realme, or passing too or fro any forrein countrey during the space of 7. yeares then next ensuing, there should be payd for euery such voyage by the maister or owner of all such vessels, &c. three pence for euery tun of the burthen of such ship, which grew to 1000. pounds yearly at the least.

The

The queenes maiesty foreseeing the generall dearth of graine, and other victu- als, growne partly through the unreasonable of y<sup>e</sup> yeares past, partly through the uncharitable greedynesse of such as be great coyne maisters, but especially through the unlawfull and ouermuch transporting of graine into foraine coun- tries, vnder colour of licence granted, by the aduise of her honorable counsell, pub- lished a proclamation and booke of orders to be taken by her iustices for reliefe of the poore, notwithstanding all which, the excessive prices of graine still increased, so that wheate was sold at London for 8. s. the bushell, and in some other parts of the realme, for 10. s. 12. s. 13. s. &c.

The 8. of February, being wednesday (according to sentence lately giuen by y<sup>e</sup> nobility) Mary Steward queene of Scots, about ten of the clocke before noone, was executed, and suffered death, by beheading vpon a scafold set vp for that pur- pose in the great hall of the castle of Fotheringhay, in presence of George Tabor earle of Shrewsbury, Henry Grey earle of Kent, principall commissioners, and o- thers the gentlemen of the countrey neare adioyning, to the number of about 300. He was as appertained to a queene) royally buried at Peterborough on the first of August next following.

The 15. of February, the parliament began at Westminster, where in was gran- ted to her maiesty towards her charges for the defence of this realme, a subsidy by the cleargy of 6. s. the p. and of the temporality 2. s. 8. d. goods, & 4. s. lands, with 2. fifteenes, &c. The 20. of February, a strange thing happened, a man hanged for felonie at S. Thomas Waterings, being begged by the Chirurgions of London, to haue made of him an Anatomy, after he was dead to all mens thinking, cut downe, stripped of his apparell, layd naked in a chest, throwne into a carre, and so brought from the place of execution through the Borough of Southwarke ouer the bridge, & through the city of London to the Chirurgions hall neare vnto Cr- plegate: the chest being there opened, and the weather extream cold, he was found to be alive, and liued till the 23. of February, and then died.

oath, before whom went about the number of forty his gentlemen in one lincie blew, and chaines of gold, diuers Pensioners, and other gentlemen of the court, vpon foote-clothes, the officers and clarks of the Chancerie, and then the Lord Chancellor, hauing on his right hand the Lord Treasurer and on the left hand the Earle of Leicester, after whom rode certaine of the Nobilitie, the Iudges of the realme, many knights, and lastly a great troupe of their retinue.

In this meane time, the most fortunate service for England, performed by Sir Francis Drake in Cales the 19. of Aprill with his latell exploits in Cape S. Vincent, and Cape-laker, done the 21. of May, written by a gentleman of his companie, was such as follooweth.

He hauing discovered (by aduise of 2. ships of Middleborough that came from Cales, with whom he met in 40. degrees the 16. of Aprill) and by them vnderstanding that there was great prouision in Cales, and therabout, appointed to come for Lissboyne, he with all speed possible did bend his force thither, to cut off their power and prouision: so as the 19. of Aprill, an houre before sun setting, he entered the harbour of Cales, & his fleet: there checked with him at the entering thwart the towne, 6. gallies: but they in short time retired vnder their fortresses. There fled some 20. french ships to port Royall, & some Spaniards, which could not be hindered of the sight, by reason of the shields. There were sunke by Sir Francis, at his coming in with shot, one argosie of 1000. tun, furnished with 30. peeces of brasse, & richly laden. There were to the number of 38. ships undertaken before night, & bissons of the Rode: 30. hulks Hollanders confiscated to the king, and their goods sold to the kings vse, 24. of them were fired, the other 6. were at port Royall laden with wines & bread, & to be presently full laden for Lissboyne. One carrike of 1400. tuns appertaining to the Marques of S. Cruse, fired. Five great Biskies fired, 4. of them labing and taking in of victuall for the kings prouision for Lissboyne, the first a ship of a 1000. tun, bound for Lissboyne, hauing in hir great store of pipes, much yron, nalles, spikes, yron hoopcs, and such like, fired. One Shatterey laden with wines, of 250. tuns, for the kings prouision, which the English brought to sea, and discharged part of her wines for prouision of the fleet, and then fired her. Three flee boates of about 400. tuns laden with biscit, whereof they fired one, & kept the other two. Ten barkes more laden with wines, raisins, figges, oyle, wheate & such like: they fired, by supposition 38. ships & barks fired, sunke & brought away, amounting in iudgement to 13000. tun of shipping, &c. this was for the first exploit. The second was as follooweth, about the 21. of May, they assaulted the castle of Cape-laker, and three other strong holds, all which they tooke, some by force and some by submission. They took at severall times of shipping, barks, & caruels about 100. laden with hoopcs, gally oares, pipe stauces, timber, and other prouisions of the king of Spaines, for the furnishing of his forces intended against England, which they burned, and consumed all the fischer boats, and nets therabouts, to their great hinderance. Thence they came before the haven of Lissboyne, anchoring neare vnto call Cales, where the Marquesse of S. Cruse was with his gallies, and seeing them chase his ships a store, to take and carry away his barks and caruels, was content to suffer them there quietly to tarrie, and likewise to depart, and neuer charged them with Cannon shot.

The 18. of June Robert earle of Leicester, was made V. steward of household, & R. Deuereux earle of Essex, was made H. of her maiesties horse. The 25. of June, Robert earle of Leicester tooke shipping at Margate in Kent towards the Low countries, wher he remained not long, but returned. This yeare was a late spring and a cold summer so that at midsummer pealen in the coods at London (where they be most forward) were sold for 8. v. the pecke, yet afterward great plenty, & sold for 8. d. the bushell, or better cheape, no cherries ripe till S. James tide, or Lammass, & then such plenty, that they were sold for a peny the p. and not above. The moneth of September vehement cold, white frosts, winds boysterous in þ north, sometime haile, snow and flete, and yet a reasonable good haruell for corne praised be God.

The 7. of September. Sir Thomas Hineage was made hitechamberlaine. The queenes maiesty hauing diuers waies vnderstood the great and diligent preparation of the king of Spaine, in diuers parts both by land and sea, nor onely of the strongest ships in all places within his dominions, but also of all sorts of prouision and munition necessarie for a mighty flete, which was to come from Spaine and Portingale, for the furnishing & better direction wherof he had drauone together into the places aforesaid, the most principall and ancient captaines and souldiers, aswell of the kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie, as of Lombardy and other parts of Italy, and the more remote parts of India, as by euery one was long before very euidently perceiued, by reason that the preparation of these things together with the ships, mariners, and souldiers, the diuers sorts and quantitics of victuall, the great number and diuers kinds of artillery, with the summe of euery seuerall kind, were sufficiently specified vnto all countries by certaine pamphlets, laying forth at large the whole intent, the which pamphlets were printed and published in Spaine and Portingale, and other prouinces of Chyristendome, with this title: The most puissant and most happie flete of the King of Spaine, against the Realme of England: her Maiesty, I say, hauing in this manner receiued so open and manifest information hereof, as also certaine intelligence of horsemen, and footemen, sent in so great number, that they were sufficient for the furnishing of diuers campees in the Low countries, vnder the gouernement of the duke of Parma his lieutenant generall for those prouinces, and withall knowing the multitude of the ships of war, and the possibility that the sayd king had, to transport his souldiers out of Flanders, & land them in England, not sparing to giue out thereupon open and free report, that all that prouision was for the inuasion & conquest of England: her maiesty therfore furnished her selfe by sea with a mighty flete, & by land with no lesse diligence to resist such great forces as by all nations were reported to come against her: for it was neuer knowne in the memory of man, that so great preparation was euer heretofore at one time made out, either by King Philip himselfe, or yet by the Emperour Charles the fift his father, although his power were much more, and his occasions of warre farre greater. The diligence therfore of the Englishmen, answerable vnto the care of the Prince, was such, and so great, that her Maiesty was prouided of a mighty flete to defend her by sea from the enemy betwene the first of Nouember in this yeare 1587. and the 20. of December next ensuing, a time very short for such a prouision, most excellently furnished of all things necessary for such a purpose. charge of which nauie was commended vnto the right honorable Charles Lord Howard, baron of Effingham, lord high Admirall of England, who for his place and office, noble courage, experience in martiall affaires, and nobilitie of blood and descent, was thought most fit to be employed in that seruice: he had in his company a sufficient number of honorable, worshipfull, and valiant personages, desirous to serue their prince and countrey in such a cause as this: likewise of seafaring men and private souldiers, so competent a number, as might be answerable vnto the power of so great a prince in so weightie a cause. The lord high admirall therefore with those forces keeping for a season the narrow seas, & channell between England and Flaunders, sir Francis Drake knight, was by the aduise of the lords of the counsell, & his honor so commanding it, sent towards the west parts with certaine of the Queenes ships and others, from certaine ports of England thereabout, being in all about the number of fiftie saile of all sorts, there to attend the lord high admirall his coming with greater forces, if occasion should require. In the meane season the lord admirall, with his viceadmirall the lord Henry Seymer, kept the narrow seas, accompanied with 20. ships more, very well furnished at the charges of the citizens of London, besides many other from diuers parts on that side the realme, that lieth from the towne of Douer by to the north-ward, which met altogether in good order, and well appointed for the wars.

Now to speake somewhat more particularly of this preparation, made as well by land, as by sea, to withstand the inuasion intended, (& after attempted) by the Spanish Armado against this realme. The generall forces of the realme were appointed to be mustered, trained, & put in a readines in the severall shires, for the defence of the land: there was also a leuite made of 2. seuerall armies, the one to make the body of a camp to reside at Tilbury in Essex, to encounter with the enemy if he should attempt to land in any place in that countrey, wherof the right honorable lord Robert earle of Leicester, V. steward of her Maiesties household, was appointed lieutenant generall, as also of all the armies leuied against foraine inuasion: the other to be employed for the gard of her Highnes person, vnder the charge and gouernment of the right honorable the V. The Lords and other of her Maiesties privy counsell, and sundry others of the nobilitie of the realme, being appointed to repaire unto the court, to attend upon her maiesties person, of their free and voluntary disposition, furnished, arrayed, and put in very comely order their troupes both of horsemen and footemen, and presented the same unto her maiesties view at her manor of Saint James.

The navy set forth and armed to the seas (as ye have heard) consisted partly of other maiesties ships, partly of the ships of her subiects, which were furnished out of the port townes, wherunto they belonged. Of this navy the chiefest and greatest part was under the charge of the lord Charles Howard lord Admirall, the rest of the ships in great number were assigned unto the lord Henry Seimier, ammirall of that fleet, to gard the narrow seas, and to impeach the issuing forth of the ships and vessels prepared for the duke of Parma at Dunkirke, &c. to ioyne in the enterprise of the Spanish Armado.

The lord high Admirall with his forces keeping for a season the narrow seas & channell betwene England and Flanders, sir Fran. Drake knight, mentioned here also in honor of his desert, was by the aduise of the lords of the counsell, & his honor so commanding it, sent towards the west parts, with certaine of the M. Ships, and others fro the ports of England (as is aforesaid) being about 54. or 56. saile of all sorts, there to attend the L. high Admirall his comming with greater forces, if occasion should so require. In the meane season the L. Admirall with his vice-admirall the Lord Henry Seimor kept the narrow seas, accompanied with twentie ships more, very well furnished, at the charges of the citizens of London, besides many other from diuers parts on that side of the realme, that lieth from the towne of Douer vp to the northward, which met altogether in good order, and well appointed for the warres.

*The Lord
Admirall kept the narrow seas.*

And here the L. high Admirall vnderstanding for a certaintie, that the fleet of the enemy was already lanchd & at the sea, he weyed anchor, and leauing the lord Seimor with sufficient forces of the Queenes Ships, & other vessels to watch what the Duke of Parma would do, or was able to undertake by sea, and parting from thence the 21. of May to the westward with her maiesties navy, and 20. ships of London, with some others, he arriued at Plimouth the three and twentieth of the same month, where sir Francis Drake with more than fifty saile which he had vnder his charge, met with the Lord Admirall in very good order. And then the two nauiies being ioyned together into one, the Lord Admirall made sir ſir Francis Drake his viceadmirall : he that had ſcene theſe together, would haue commended it to haue bene a moſt royall ſteele, about two hundred ſaile, adding nine voluntaries, or aduenturers, furniſhed by the gentlemen of Deuonſhire and ſiſterne victuallers from London, the leaſt being of one hundred and twentie tun, all very well furniſhed for the fight, and a number of goodly men that were faine to returne home for lacke of entertainment, for there was choiſe both of mariners and ſouldiers.

Arriuing at Plimmouth (as is ſaid) his lordſhip preſently gaue order for pro- uiſion of victuall for the whole navy, that it might want nothing that ſhould tend to the neceſſary ſervice enſuing.

This prouiſion being complete, he reſolued with himſelfe to put ſooth to the ſea againe about the 30. of May aforeſaid, but the winde not ſeruing his turne, he kept himſelfe abroad, ſailing by and downe within the ſteeue betwene Uſſant and Silly, attending ſome ſight or report of the enemies ſteele : where hauing waited a certaine time, ſomewhiles drawing neare to the coaſt of France, and ſometimes to the coaſt of England, he returned, being thereto enforced by a great tempeſt with his whole navy into the port of Plimmouth about the ſixt of June, to reſreſh his company there.

In the meane ſeaſon there were diſcovered betwene Uſſant and Silly cer- taine ſhips of the Spaniſh ſteele, not about the number of fourtene, which were knowne to be ſeuered from the whole ſteele by violence of the aforeſaid tempeſt : but beſore they could be encountred withall by any of y<sup>e</sup> Engliſh nauie, the wind came about, whereby they had oportunitie to returne backe againe, ſauing them- ſelues from all perils in their haven called the Groine, into the which alſo the reſt of the Spaniſh ſteele was put prouide themſelues a new of other things which they wanted, and ſpecially of freſh water. Of this thing the Lord Ad- mirall had intelligence and aduertisement from ſundry parts, as alſo that the Spaniſh ſteele was by great fortune diſperſed and ſeuered into diuerſe places, through penury of many and thoſe neceſſarie things, through diſeaſes and mor- talitie of men, although the report hercof could not afterwards be veriſied, where- of the certaine truth was, that being troubled with tempeſt, they were comman- ded to come a ſhore at the Groine.

The lord Admirall therefore ſeeing the coaſt of England and France cleare and free from all danger, as by diligent ſearch it was vnderſtood, reſolued by the aduice and opinion of his counſell, to take the aduantage of the next winde that ſhould blow from the North, that paſſing to the coaſt of Spaine he might find the enemies ſteele ſo diſperſed in the Groine, and in other parts of Calitia where they had driven by the ſtorme.

This was put in execution betwene the 8. and 10. of the moneth of July, the winde being then at the North, which within a while changing vnto the South, after that he was come within 40. leagues or thereabout, of the coaſt of Spaine, made him to caſt a doubt of that which afterwards happened indeed. For laying this beſore him as his principall care, according to the charge laid vpon him by her maiestie, to be diligent and carefull for the defence of the coaſt of England, and conſidering considering that with the wind which was now changed & very good to make for England, the enemy might set out & passe for England without discovery of his fleet, he returned backe with the whole naue, & the 12. of the same month he arrived at Plimmouth, there accordingly to provide himselfe of all that was necessarie.

The 19. of July, his honor had intelligence by a barke or pinnace, whose captain was Thomas Fleming, amongst other behind in the fleet for discovery, that the Spanish fleet in number by estimation 138. sailes, was discovered neare unto y<sup>e</sup> Lizard, the wind being then south & by west. And therefore albeit that by reason of the great number of English ships which were in Plimmouth it was with that wind very hard to bring them forth from thence: (as the military art of the sea, and the condition of their affaires required) yet was there such diligence bled by the L. admirall and the rest by his example, as they inducured therein with such aduise and earnestnesse, that many of the ships at the length warped out of y<sup>e</sup> haven, as if the wind had bene wholly favourable unto them: which thing could not haue fallen out, but through the long and certaine skill which y<sup>e</sup> English maisters generally haue in marine discipline. To the which reason this may be added, that they were all of one nation, of one tounge, and touched with a grieuous and equall hatred toward their enemies, being mightily perswaded of their forces. Wherupon we may in such cases assure our selues of what importance it is in sea-faring matters, for a fleet of any prince whatsoeuer, inuading any foraine state or kingdome, to incounter with a fleet ready for defence in such manner as y<sup>e</sup> English nauy was, for so much as the fleet inuading being provided diuersly of maisters and officers, differing one from another in custome, language & conceit, cannot in any measure giue any assured hope of certaine victorie how honorable soeuer y<sup>e</sup> commander be: many of the ships therefore came forth, by reason that the men were moued in the foresaid respects to labor diligently, & so much the rather, by how much the captains & chiefe officers both by counsell and hand, shewed themselves more diligent & industrious. By this means y<sup>e</sup> 30. day of July y<sup>e</sup> L. admirall accompanied with 54. ships, came forth with the same wind y<sup>e</sup> the enemy had from the south-west, which thing certainly was not esteemed a small thing to be done, in regard as well of the wind as of y<sup>e</sup> narrownesse of y<sup>e</sup> place it selfe. The Spanish fleet being manifestly discovered about 140. miles from Edsson, & clearly seene of every one toward the west, & so far off from Foy as the English fleet was, that is, 25. English miles. The next morning being y<sup>e</sup> 21. of July, all y<sup>e</sup> ships which were now come out of y<sup>e</sup> haven, had got the wind of the Spaniards, & approaching somewhat nearer, found y<sup>e</sup> their nauy was placed in battell ray, after the manner of a moone crescent, being ready with her hoznes & her inward circumference to receiue either all, or so many of the English nauy as should giue her the assault, her hozns being extended in widenesse about the distance of 8. miles, as was informed. The reason of their arranging in this order, arose vpon the foresight of the D. of Medina Sidonia generall of the Spanish fleet, who approaching the coast sent out a small ship to spy somewhat concerning y<sup>e</sup> English fleet, & hearing by certaine fishermen taken prisoners, y<sup>e</sup> our fleet was in Plimmouth, he prepared himselfe as aforesaid, for the auoyding of all such chances as might after befall: wherupon about 9. of y<sup>e</sup> clock before noone, the L. Admirall commanded his pinnace called the Disbaine,

The Spanish
fleet discouered.

to giue the defiance vnto the duke of Medina: after which he himselfe in the Ship called the Arce went forwost, as was conuenient, & began hotly to fight with a great ship which was admirall of the Spanish fleet, in which ship he thought by reason of certaine likely coniectures, the duke of Medina to be, considering also the ship was so well accompanied by others. The fight with her continued so long and so hot, that diuerse other ships, yea the most part of the Spanish fleet came to her succour.

In the meane season the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake, with maister John Hawkens, & maister Martin Frobisher, fought with a galeon of Portugal, to wherein they thought Don Martin de Ricaldes the vice-admirall to be. This fight was so well maintained for the time it continued, that the enemy was enforced to leaue his place, and to giue way gathering toward the east. In the which point of remoouing, a great galeon wherein Don Pedro de Valdes went for captaine, falling foule with another ship of their fleet, was depriued of her fore-mast, so that she could not follow the body of the fleet that forsooke her, to the great maruell of the Englishmen themselves, whereby Don Pedro became prisoner, as after shall be declared. Furthermoze also there was at this time a great ship of Biscay about 800. tons in burthen, fore battered in fight, by casualtie of their owne powder, was set on fire, part therof blowne up and their people slaine, and so left to aduerture with the people that remained, so that being utterly unable at y<sup>e</sup> night to helpe her selfe, she was succoured by y<sup>e</sup> galliasses, & for y<sup>e</sup> time laued in y<sup>e</sup> body of the fleet.

But to returne to our purpose: This first skirmish continued not about two houres, because the lord Admirall considering that he wanted as yet fortie ships, which could not so readily come forth of the haven, thought he should do better seruiue if he stayed their continuing before he proceeded any further, beating behind vpon the enemy, lest he should bring the rest too much in hazard, and therefore he thought it not profitable too much to embolden and pricke those forward that he had with him, in a matter that was not greatly conuenient, either for the honour of the realme, or his owne person, neither did the militarie discipline of the English nation purchased by long experience at the sea, giue him leaue to do it. And therefore he put forth his flag to call the other captaines to counsell, who agreeing vnto his determination, receiued instructions concerning the order that they were to keepe in following the Spanish fleet. Then hauing giuen libertie to every man to returne to their charge, he gaue order likewise to his vice-admirall sir Francis Drake to appoint the watch for that night, and to beare out the light.

The same night the Spanish fleet lay about 14. miles off from the fleet.

The next day following early in the morning it was vnder the wind not so farre off as Berie.

In the meane time the English fleet wanting light, because the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake leauing his place to followe nine hulkes, which were discovered in the evening very late, it came to passe that all the other ships stayed behind, not knowing that they were to followe, or whither to direct themselves: so that there mought haue followed some great inconuenience, had they had to do with an enemy more practised in our seas: but as it seemed by report, y<sup>e</sup> said vice-admirall was mooued to do this by meanes of a certaine curious diligence, and a militant:

militarie suspicion, growing in his mind vpon certaine and very probable coniectures, grounded on circumstances of matter considered in his mind: and therefore he gaue them the chase, thinking that they had bene enemies. But being overtaken and their officers examined, and being knowne to be friends, or at the leastwise not enemies, he permitted the to go their way, returning himselfe vnto the fleet the day following.

The lord Admirall notwithstanding accompanied with the Beare, and the Marie Rose comming a little behind his sterne, by reason of the cleareness of the aire, followed the enemy all þ night within a Culuerin shot. By occasion whereof the rest of the fleet was cast so farre behind, that the morning after the nearest part thereof could hardly descrie the tops of the other ships, and many of the were cleane out of sight, so that with all the force of their saile they could hardly come al together the whole day following untill the evening.

The next day the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake being in the Queenes shippe called the Revenge, having also the Roe-bucke, and a pinnace or two in his company, tooke Don Pedro de Valdes, who, as was said before, had lost the fore-mast of his ship: and having receiued the said Valdes as his prisoner, and certaine other gentlemen of most account that were therein, he sent the ship together with þ prisoners vnto Dartmouth, vnder the conduct of the Roe-bucke, & he himselfe made toward the lord Admirall, vnder whose lee he came that night. This ship or galeon of 1150. tuns, in which Don Pedro de Valdes Generall of the ships of the army of Andalusia was, had in it three hundred and foure souldiers, one hundred and eightene mariners, brasse ordnance fire and fortie peeces, shot and bullet 2. thousand and three hundred, powder one hundred and fourtene quintals, lead for the muskets two and twenty quintals, match nineteene quintals, and so euery ship in the fleet according to his burthen had the like prouision, as is set downe in a booke extant in the Spanish tongue (which booke I haue seene at the hands of the worshipfull maister Anthony Radcliffe alderman of London.)

A great galeon with Don Pedro taken.

The same day being the 22. of July, a little before the vice-admirall sir Francis Drake was returned vnto the fleet, the Spaniards forsooke the ship which the day before was spoiled by fire: to the which ship the lord Admirall sent the L. Thomas Howard, and with him maister Iohn Hawkens, who being in the cock-boat of the Wiffogie, went aboord her, and there found a lamentable sight, for all the vppermost decks of her being torne and spoiled by the fire, there were in her fifty men miserably burnt with the powder. The stinke in her was so great, and the ship it selfe so filthy, that the lord Howard departed presently from her: and returning with maister Iohn Hawkens to the lord Admirall, they informed him of that they found and saw there: for which cause there was presently commaundement giuen, that the little pinnace of captain Fleming should conduct her vnto some port of England, where they might most commodiously helpe themselves: whereupon it was carried to Weymouth the next day following. For all the mishap that befell this ship, they vnderstood that the Spaniards had taken out of her all the best things that they could, casting off the bulke of her, together with certaine grosse stuffe therein, as for that time altogether vnprofitable.

A carack taken and sent to Weymouth.

The night last before mentioned there befell a great calme and thereupon foure

Spanish gallies secured themselves from y<sup>e</sup> rest of their fleet. This thing made the Englishmen to doubt, that that night they had resolved to give the onset upon some of their lesser ships, imagining that they might annoy them the rather, for that they were the reerward of the fleet, but afterwards the gallies (whatsoever the occasion was) interrupted nothing, either for that they saw they could not safely do it, or else because their minds were not thoroughly settled upon that which before they thought to do.

The morning following being the 22. of July, the wind was at northeast, whereupon the Spaniards came backe upon the Englishmen with the advantage of the wind, directing their course toward the land: the which course was not profitable for the Englishmen. Therefore to take the advantage of the enemy, they cast about towards the west with a reasonable compass, their ships being very good both of saile and storage, that they might bring about their purpose. Now y<sup>e</sup> Spaniards to hinder their intent after they perceived it, offered to come neere a-boord to fight with them, trusting in the huge gratiell and height of their ships: the which offer of theirs the Englishmen refused not, but began presently to bring themselves in battell array, which the enemy perceiving, he also did the like. In this case the Arke, the Lion, the Beare, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Whitore, and certaine other ships were content to follow the ship called the Donpariglia.

In the meane season the Triumph with other five ships of London, namely, the Merchant Royall, the Centurion, the Margerie Joan, the Mary Rose, and the golden Lion were so far to the reerward, and so far severed from the rest of the fleet, that the gallies undertooke to give them an hard assault: but they were well entertained by the ships for the space of an houre and a halfe, untill at the length some of the Queenes ships comming to succour the Triumph and the Londoners, dealt so well in the matter, that the gallies were driven to retire. The wind came about at this present to the southeast, and afterwards to the south-west and by south, at which time a certaine number of Squadron of the Queenes, together with other Merchants ships gave assault unto the Spanish fleet, and that so furiously to the westward of them, that the Spaniards were all enforced to give them way: for which cause the lord admirall considering both the discommoditie and daunger wherinto the Triumph and the other 5. ships were come, he called other of the Queenes ships that were not far off, and gave them strait commandement to follow him, and to charge the enemies which were to the westward with all their force, giving further order to them all, not to discharge any one peece of ordinance before they should come within a musket shot of the enemy, in as much as that was the onely way to succour the ships of their friends with the great damage of the enemy. This was well performed by the Arke, the Elizabeth Jonas, the Galeon Leicester, the golden Lion, the Whitore, the Mary Rose, the Dread nought, and the Swallow: which thing the duke of Medina perceiving, he also came forth with sixtene of his best galleons, to hinder and impeach the Englishmen in the defence of the Triumph, seeming in this case to pretend that the reason of y<sup>e</sup> fight did so require, whereas the regard of his honor did no lesse enforce him unto it, because it seemed inconvenient y<sup>e</sup> he should in every thing be inferior to y<sup>e</sup> Englishmen, & therefore he made large promises unto those by whose means y<sup>e</sup>

victorie could be gotten: howbeit the Spaniards in the end were enforced to giue place and to retire vnto their array of battell. In this conflict one William Cox capitaine of a litle pinnace called the Chiolet, belonging to sir William Winter, behaved himselfe very valiantly against the enemies in the greatest brate of this encounter: but within a litle while after he lost his delight, wherewith he was not very well acquainted, and his life, by a great peece of ordinance.

Toward the evening foure or five Spanish ships came out from the rest of the fleet from the southward, against whom certaine of the English ships came, and namely the May-flower of London, which discharged certaine peeces vpon the enemy with a very honorable declaration of the marine discipline, & being accompanied by other ships that were there found, they all behaved themselves no lesse diligently (which thing was not at first hoped for, shewing their desire tempered with a wish) of other company. The conflict continued from the morning vnto the evening, the V. Admirall being at all times ready and vigilant in all adventures that might fall out: and thereupon he was sometimes more, and sometimes lesse egre in the conflict, as necessitie required, giuing thereby euident example how others should behave themselves. It might well be said, that for the time, it was not possible to see before this battell, in this sea, so hard a conflict, nor so terrible a spoile of ships, by reason of the pellets that flew so thicke euery way: to conclude, there was neuer scene so vehement a fight, either side endeuoring thorough an head-strong and deadly hatred the others spoile and destruction. For albeit the musquetiers and harquebuziers were in either fleet many in number, yet could they not be discerned or heard, by reason of the more violent and roaring shot of the greater ordinance, that followed so thicke one vpon another, & played so well that day on either side, that they were thought to be equall in number to common harquebuziers in an hot skirmish. The battell was not onely long, but also neare at hand, within halfe a musket shot, and that to the great advantage of the English men, who with their ships, being excellent of saile and stirrage, yet lesse a great deale than the Spanish ships, and therefore more light and nimble, fought not at all, (according vnto their manner otherwise) to board them, but keeping themselves aloofe at a reasonable distance, continually beate vpon the hull and tacklings of their enemies ships, which being a great deale higher, could not so conueniently beate the English shippes with their ordinance.

This long conflict being finished, and euery one retiring vnto his part, the next day following, which was the 24. of July, was passed without any thing done, because, by reason of the fight the day before, there was spent a great quantitie of powder and shot: wherupon the lord Admirall sent diuerse barkes and pinnaces to the shore for a new supplie of such munition. For her Maestie prudently foreseeing each thing necessarie for her men, ordained that there should be sufficient provision made, according as should be needfull, as well of victuals as of munition. It seemed moreover that day, that the Spanish fleet was nothing grieued with that dayes respite, but were all of them indifferently glad of that breathing, in as much as thereby they had good opportunity to looke to their leaks, whercof, no doubt, they had a great number, for they had caried away

many shewd stripes from their enemies, their hurts being of great likelihood so much the more, in that the Spaniards were pent up in a narrow roome.

This day the lord Admirall for certaine convenient reasons deuided the whole body of the fleet into four squadrons, by meanes of which diuision the enemy might be greatly, and more continually troubled. The first squadron he kept for himselfe: the second he assigned vnto sir Francis Drake his viceadmirall: the third to maister Iohn Hawkins: the fourth to maister Martin Frobisher, and after noone he gaue order, that in the night six of the marchants ships in each squadron should charge the Spanish fleet, in as many parts at one & the same time, & at midnight the enemy might be kept occupied. This order taken 'as it was very likely' might haue had as good effect as it was wisely giuen: but by reason of a great calme which fell out, no part of this aduilement could be accomplished, fortune interrupting good counsell.

The next day being the five and twentieth day of July, or Saint Iames day, there was a great Spanish galcon left behind her company to the south-ward neare to the squadron of maister Iohn Hawkins, so that the barkes belonging vnto the great ships, were within musket shot of her: by reason hereof three of the gallies and another ship that was in manner of a galcon, and well appointed, came from the Spanish fleet to succour this galcon. Against whom went out the lord Admirall in the Arke, and the lord Thomas Howard in the golden Lion, and drew so neare being towed by their boates, that they did them much harme, where-by one of them requiring the helpe of the rest, being succoured by them, returned vnto the fleet. And from another, by meanes of a shot comming from the Arke, there was taken away her light and throwne into the sea: the third lost her becke, where-by these two ships, the Arke, and the golden Lion declared this day to each fleet, that they had most diligent and faithfull gunners, desirous as well of the common good, as of the private honour of their leaders the lord Admirall, and the lord Thomas Howard which went in them: which commendation might rightly be imparted with them concerning this happy euent, because the calme was so great, that albeit the two fleets were well able to behold the fortune of each of their friends, yet notwithstanding they could not helpe them at all: at the length the wind beginning somewhat to rise, the Spaniards tooke the oportunitie thereof, and put themselves forward to helpe those of their side, and succoured them honorably. After this time the gallies, in whose puillance the greatest hope of the Spanish fleet was founded, were neuer scene to fight any more, such was their entertainment that day.

The two fleets notwithstanding approaching nigh one vnto another began a conflict, but they continued it but a while, except one ship called the Pon-pariglia, and another called the Mary Rose, which hauing taken in their topsailes laied themselves there, to make as it were a certaine experience of their manhood vpon the Spanish fleet, behauing themselves honorably for a season. In which time the triumph being to the northward of the Spanish fleet, was so farre off, that doubting that certaine of the Spanish ships would assault her to the wind ward, they succoured her with diuers boates that got the wind easily: for the Beate and y Elizabeth Jonas, euen at one instant hauing knowledge of the danger wherein the other were dyeto neare vnto them, desiring both in regard of the honoz of their common wealth, and also for the preservation of their friends and countymen, to be partakers of the like danger and difficulty.

Wherupon each ship doing her duty, they ioyntly saued the Triumph from all harme, and recovered the wind. And thus this dayes worke ended: whereof I may say that the conflict was no whit shorter then the day it selfe.

At this present the Englishmen considering the great waste of powder and shot that had heretofore bene made, the lord Admirall determined not to assault the enemy any more, untill he were come nigh vnto Douer, in which place he should find the fleet under the charge of the L. Seimor, & sir Willia Winter, who were ready to ioyne with him, that thereby he might both fortifie himselfe with a great number of ships, and in this manner provide themselves of munition from that part of the realme. Upon friday therefore being the 26. of the month of July, ceasing from fighting, the lord Admirall (as well for their good deserts and honorable seruice, as also to incourage others to like valor) was desirous to aduance certaine personages to the degree of knighthood, for that behauing themselves manfully, as well with their ships as their good aduise, they were worthy that degree of honour: and so much the more worthy, in that being farre separated from all courtly fauour, which many times imparteth the chiefest honours vnto the least deseruing men, they declared their valour in the eyes of either fleet.

Therefore the two lords, viz. the lord Howard, and the lord Sheffield, Roger Townesend, John Hawkins, and Martin Frobisher, were called forth, and the order of knighthood giuen them by the lord Admirall, as their generall.

Knightes made for seruice.

This day there came to the seruice of her maiesty in her fleet diuers gentlemen, honourable both by bloud and place, but much more in respect of their courage and vertue, for that in these publike affaires, and so necessary seruice of the warres, they willingly offered their seruice in the defence of their country, and honour of her Maiesty.

This day also, and the next, being the seuen and twentieth, the Spaniards followed their course quietly before the English fleet. In which time the earle of Sussex, the lord Buckhurst, sir George Carie knight, & the captaines of the forts and castles thereabout, sent their men with powder, shot, and victuals, to the lord Admirall to assist and helpe the army. The same 27. day towards the euening, the Spaniards dyeto nigh to Calcis under the coast of Picardy, and there suddenly cast anker, almost right against the left hand of the haven to the west-ward, a little less then five miles from Calcis Clenes: the English fleet also cast anker with- in a culuerin shot of the enemy to the westward.

The Spanish
fleet flyeth, and is chased by the English.

In the meane season the lord Seimor, and sir William Winter ioynd with the L. Admirall, whereby the English fleet increased to the number of 140. ships of all sorts: but the Spaniards with all speede sent tidings vnto the duke of Parma of their arrivall, who at this present was at Bruges, who hauing retained with him all his leasaking in many dayes before to this purpose, yet proceeded no further in the matter for that time, although for such time as the king had limited him, he for his part tooke as much care as might be looked for at his hands: for hauing already imbarcked a certaine number of souldiers, he was carefull in like manner to dispatch the rest as soone as they should be ready, that they might take opportunity to come forth, furnishing them abundantly with victuall and munition. But in the meane time such a chance fell out as made frustrate, not only his, but the conceipt also of the duke of Medina, and wholly ouerthrew their enterprise, for the lord Admirall hauing by certaine notice vnderstood, that the duke of Parma had prepared a great number of runs of water, and 10000. chosen footemen to be imbarcked for the ioyning with the fleet, which could not be auoided, if the duke of Medina were not compelled to auoide that place, knowing also the euident perill that was to be feared, if the Spanish fleet should be sufferd to refresh it selfe, and to be furnished with so many souldiers, he applied his wits so in the deliberation of these matters of waight and importance, hauing the consent of others more practised, that no time might be lost for the furtherance of this seruice, and forsomuch as the forces of the enemy were not yet united and ioyned together, therefore the 28. of this moneth at midnight, he provided 8. small ships-dressed with artificall fire, to the intent to deuiue the same vpon the Spanish fleet. This thing was diligently & effectually brought to passe vnder the charge of capitaine Yong & capitaine Prowle, two valiant and couragious men: by reason hereof the enemy was not only inforced to brake his sleep, but the fire coming so suddenly vpon him, to cut his cables, to let slip his ankers, and to hope by salles as the only way to saue his fleet from so imminent and unexpected a mischance. Furthermore, by meanes of this tumult & confusion, the chiefe galiassell fell forole with another ship, vpon the cable of whose anker her sterne was set so fast, that they could not loose her all the night long, so that the next day following she was inforced with her oares to make toward the land, & to draw nigh to the hauens mouth of Calcis, to saue her selfe in that place: but not knowing that water, and hauing no profitable and conuenient counsell for the time, she fell vpon a shelfe. This thing being in good time espied by the L. Admirall, he sent thither his greatest boate vnder the charge of Amiens Preston his lieutenant, and together with him Thomas Gerard, sonne and heire to sir Gilbert Gerard maister of the Rowles, & maister Haruy two of her maiesties gentlemen & seruants, and others of the court and of his owne seruants, who fought with her, but vncqually, for that the ship being grauelled could with her force preuaile but little. In this conflict it chanced y<sup>e</sup> a musket shot stroke Hugo de Moncada chiefe captaine of y<sup>e</sup> galiassell a noble & valiant man, in the head: the which mishap ioyned with the difficulty of stirring themselves in their defence, bred such a despaire in euery man, that the greater sort leapt into y<sup>e</sup> water to saue themselves by swimming into the haueu, although many of the perished in the water. By this disorder of the enemy, the Englishmen being more secure, tooke her, and sacked her to their great commodity, about 100. men being entred into her, and their company increasing more and more. Whereupon monsieur Gordon gouernor of Calcis, a man of good estimation in respect of his prerogative in that place, sent his nephew to giue the Englishmen to vnderstand, that they should content themselves with the ordinarie spoile, & that they should leaue behind them the great ordinance, as a thing belonging vnto him by vertue of his office: the which message being sent the second time vnto men more intentiue vnto their pray, then other mens reason, made the gentle-gentleman to be euilly entertained by our men, in such sort, that they would haue forcibly taken from him some things about him, thinking him to be a Spaniard : whereat M. Gordon being offended, caused certaine peeces of ordnance to be discharged from the towne, and then the Englishmen departed, leauing the galliasse at his pleasure, after the losse of some souldiers, hauing notwithstanding sacked 21000. duckets of gold, appertaining vnto the king, and 14. coffers of mouables of the duke of Medina, with some other, both mony and mouables of other particular men, and some prisoners, among whom was Don Roderigo of Mendoza, and Don Iohn Gonzales de Solirauo binder-captaine of the galliasse.

During the time of surprisling of which galliasse, sir Francis Drake vice-admirall being in the ship called the Reuenge, accompanied with Thomas Fennar captaine of the Ponpariglia, with the rest of that Squadron, set vpon the Spanish fleet, giuing them an hote charge. Within a while after, sir Iohn Hawkins in the Uicoy, accompanied with Edward Fenton captaine of the Mary Rose, with George Beelton captaine of the Dread nought, and Richard Hawkins in the Swallow, with the rest of that Squadron, put themselves forward and brake through the middest of the Spanish fleet, where there began a vehement conflict continuing all the morning, wherein euery captaine did very honorable seruice : among the rest captaine Beelton deserued speciall praise. Vnto this fight came the lord Admirall, accompanied with the earle of Cumberland, the lord Thomas Howard, the lord Sheffield, and in that place where the fight was made, and the victory was gotten, they were publickly commended. Not farre from this place there was a great Spanish golcon scene, which was set vpon on the one side by the earle of Cumberland, and George Riman in the Bonaenture, and on the other side by the lord Seimor, in the ship called the Rainbow, and sir William Winter in the Wantgard, yet she saued her selfe valiantly, gathering into the body of the fleet, although with ill successe, for she was so beaten and so terribly rent and tozned with our great ordnance, y the night following, in y sight of her owne fleet she sunke, her men (as it was thought) being saued. After this, captaine Fenton in the Mary Rose, and a Spanish galcon met together, being east and west one of another yet no nigher then that their shot might play safely, and sic betweene them without any great hurt. Captaine Fenton notwithstanding, and those that were with him, were worthily commended for their seruice begun and accomplished, with such prosperous boldnesse. The same day the deeds of sir Robert Southwell were scene and worthily commended. Also was praised Robert Crosse captaine, who in the ship called the Hope, gaue a signe of valour to be in him.

It fell out also the same day, that the L. Henry Seimor, & sir William Winter did so thoroughly beate two Spanish galcons although they were of the chiefest of them, and y best provided, that they were enforced to withdraw themselves to the coast of Flanders, where, soasmuch as they were in a very euill taking, as well in respect of the murther of their men, as the manifold leakes of their ships, they were surpris'd, and without fight rised by the Zelanders, and with all the men in them caried as prisoners vnto Flushing. Among these the chiefest was Don Diego Pimentello, a man very famous among this countrey people. It seemeth hereby, that in these conflicts many of the Spanish ships perished. After this battell which was made the 29. of the moneth of July, the Lord Admirall the 30. day ordained, that the lord Seimor and sir William Winter should returne with their fleet vnto their appointed office in the chanell, which was to keepe the coast from the danger that the Duke of Parma seemed to threaten. The which Duke had already lost the oportunitie of being able to do any thing for the accomplishing of the common intention of the Spaniards: because the sodaine and vnlooked for departure of the Duke of Medina with the whole fleet from the coast of Calceis, caused the whole care of the aforesaid Duke that he tooke vpon the maine land, to become void, so that he did not imbarke the rest of his men to ioine with the Duke of Medina.

The Lord Admirall therefore determined to followe the Spanish fleet onely, so long, vntill they might be shot vp to the northward, whither the Spanish fleet directed her course, but to what end, it was not knowne. And that he with the same winde might come to the Frith, which is vpon the coast of Scotland, if so he be saw the enemie passe those parts. Vtherupon he thought moreover, that it was good to stay his fleet from attempting ought vpon the Spaniards, vntill he should haue good intelligence of their purpose, thereby to worke a meane vtterly to disperse and ouerthrow them. But the Spaniards kept their course about the Islands of Orkeney, declaring thereby, that they minded to returne that way into Spaine along by the north coast of Scotland, which as skillfull men coniectured would be to their euident danger, as it fell out afterward: perceiuing therefore the purpose of the enemie when he was shot by 55. degrees & 13. minutes to the north ward, and 30. leagues off from Newcastle, the L. Admirall resolued with himselfe to let the Spanish fleet keepe on her way. The Spanish fleet therefore as for her owne welfare it was requisite, hauing gone on so far before, the lord Admirall resolued to put into the Frith in Scotland, aswell to refresh himselfe with new victuals, as also to dispatch certaine other matters which he thought necessary. But the wind being much westward & against him, the day following he changed his course, and turned into England with the whole fleet the 7. of August, although by reason of a tempest part of the ships put into Douer, part to Harwich, the rest into Parmouth. And thus much of the seruice by sea, wherein God hath giuen to the English a wonderfull victorie.

The Spanish fleet passing (as aforesaid) into those seas which for y<sup>e</sup> most part are quiet & calme enough, whether it were giuen to and fro in them with contrary winds, or by some other fatall accident that fell out, it continued therein tolled by and downe vntill the end of September, with fearefull successe & deadly shipwracke along the whole coast of Ireland: so that the Duke of Medina Sidonia was inforced to leaue there behind him about the nuber of 17. good ships, besides those 15. that were thought to be lost in the moneths of July and August, & so to returne into Spaine. The persons lost in Ireland were esteemed to be about 5500. so that all being accounted together, it is certainly aouched that all the ships that were lost amount to the number of 32. & the men accounted one with an other, arise to the number of 13500. or more. The prisoners also of all sorts in England, Ireland, and the low Countries, arise to the number of 2000. and more. As for the losse of the ordinance, & the commo<sup>r</sup> or priuate treasure, or whether the Duke after he was preserved from the former fearefull & mortall dangers, lost any more ships, or no, or last of all, how many he brought home with him againe into Spaine, I know not, and therefore leaue any further to write of that matter.

Now (as you haue heard before) the campe in the meane time, being kept at Tilbury in Essex, under the charge of the earle of Leicester L. Steward, &c. the 9. of August, her maiestie repaired thither, where all the whole campe being set in order of battell, both horse and footmen, she passed through euery ranke of them, to their great comfort and reioycing, and was lodged that night and the night next following, in the house of maister Edward Rich, a Justice of that shire in the parish of Hoynedon. On the next morrow being the tenth of August, her maiestie returning to the campe, beheld the same, they being all trained in the best order that might be, and on the eleventh of August returned to Saint James, and shortly after the campe was dissolved.

Her maiestie went to the camp at Tilbury in Essex.

The 26. of August, at the sessions hal without Newgate of London, were condemned sixe persons, for being made priests beyond the seas, and remaining in this realme contrary to a statute thereof made: foure temporall men for being reconciled to the Romane church: and foure other for receiuing and abetting the others. And on the 28. W. Deane and H. Webley were hanged at the Shiles ende, W. Gunter at the Theater, R. Moorton and Hugh Moore at Lincolns Inne fields, T. Acton at Clarkenwell, T. Felton and James Clarkson betwene Brainford & Hounslow. And on the 30. of August, R. Flower, Ed. Shelley, R. Leigh, R. Martine, I. Roch and Margaret Warde gentlewoman (which Margaret had conuicted a robd to a priest in Bideowell, whereby he let himselfe downe and escaped) were hanged at Tiborne.

6. Seminars and 8. other executed.

The 4. of September, deceased Robert Dudley earle of Leicester, lord steward of her Maiesties household, lieutenant generall and marshall of all England, at Coenebury in Oxford shire, from whence he was conuicted to his castell of Kenelworth, & from thence to Warwike, where he was honorably interred. In which towne of Warwike, he had in his life time, of an olde guild (giuen him by the townes men for that purpose) founded an hospitall for 12. poore men, indowing the same with lands to the yearely value of 200. P. and better, and 52. loades of wood ready cut and made out of Kenelworth wood, &c.

Robert earle of Leicester deceased.

The eight of September, the preacher at Paules crosse moued the people to giue God thanks for the overthrow of our enemies the Spaniards, and there were shewed eleuen ensignes or banners taken in the Spanishe ships by our men, these ensignes were set vpon the lower battlements of Paules Church, before the preacher and the audience, (which was great) all sauing one streamer, wherein was an image of our Lady, with her sonne in her armes, &c. and this was held in a mans hand ouer the pulpit. And the same banners were on the next morrow hanged on London bridge towards Southwarke, where

The 18. of Aprill, sir Iohn Norris and sir Francis Drake Generals, with five Voies for of her Maiesties ships 20. ships of war, and 140, fit for burden having in them a Portingale, choise

choise companie of knights, captaines, gentlemen and soldiers, departed from Plimmouth, and on the 23. of the same moneth arrived at the Goyne. The 26. they tooke the lower towne by assault, together with great store of ordnance兵具, vituals, cables, ropes, and other furniture for shipping.

About the first of May, they fought with the Spaniards at Puente de Burgos Bridge, where the enemy fled with losse of 700. men.

The seventh of May, the lower towne of Goyne was burned, and on the ninth our fleet set sail, the 13. the earle of Essex, with maister Walter Deuereux his brother, sir Philip Butler, sir Roger Williams, and sir Edward Wingfield met with our fleet. The 16. the whole namie arrived at Penicha in Portingale, where in despite of the enemies, our people were set aland, and the same day won both the towne and castill of Penicha. After this they divided the armie, whereof part marched with sir Iohn Norris by land to Lisbon, the rest with sir Francis Drake passed by sea to Castales. The 24. our men entered the suburbs of Lisbon, where they obtained rich spoiles, and plenty of every good thing. The 27. the armie being victored, was found to be weake, and of small force to sustaine so great a siege as that was like to be, besides the want of powder, and some other necessaries: for which causes, after counsell taken, they left Lisbon, and came to Castales, without any great fight or skirmish, where they tooke the castill, and thence returned for England. There followed them nine galleies, who fighting with two English merchants ships, by cunning of the Queenes ships, discharging but one peece at them, they retired, & so our ships came safely to Uligo, where landing our men the towne was taken, & the country wasted, &c. More at large this matter is published in print both in Latine and in English.

The 21. of June, sir Francis Drake arrived at Plimmouth, and on the third of July, sir Iohn Norris with the rest of the fleet arrived there also.

Great lightning and thunder.

The first of August at night, was the greatest lightning and thunder that had at any time bene seene and heard about London, in the memorie of any man living, and yet thanks be giuen to God little hurt heard of.

Disordered soldiers executed.

Sir Iohn Norris & sir Francis Drake being returned, as ye have heard, many of their sailers and soldiers, shortly after their landing, fell sicke, and died of a stanchie bred amongst them on ship-board, other some of the so rudely behaved themselves about the country, about the court, & elsewhere, that many men misliked of their doings, and diuers of them being apprehended, on the 27. of August one was hanged on the end of a signe at an Inne doore in the towne of Kingstone upon Thames, for a terror to the rest. The 29. of August, two more were hanged in Smithfield, two at the Tower hill, two besides Westminster, & one at Tiborne.

Men furnished into France.

About the 21. of September, the citizens of London furnished a thousand men to be sent over into France, to the aiding of Henry late king of Navar, then challenging the crowne of France, as rightfull inheritor by lawfull succession. Also diuers shires in England sent into France to the same aide, some shire a thousand, as Kent and other shires, and some shires lesse, &c. All which companies were sent over into France, under the conductin of Peregrine Barrie lord Willoughby and Crisby.

The first of November, Ledowike Griuell of Wilcote in the county of Warwike

Marlowe esquire, was brought from the Tower of London to Westminster, and there at the kings bench bar, being accessory to murder, where with hee was charged, was arraigned and found guiltie: but standing mute, hadoe iudgement to be pressed to death, and was accordingly executed in the gaole of the kings bench in Southwarke on the 14. of Nouember, on the which day for committing the murther, as principall, his man was hanged in the Palace court at Westminster.

Robowike Griuell pressed to death.

In this moneth of Nouember, the Citizens of London were sundry times frighted by casualtie of fire about New Fishstrate, three times in one weeke, the Citizens raised, lightes hanged out at euery doore, and euery man labouring for his owne safety, as more at large appereth in my Summarie of the Chronicles.

An. reg. 32. Citizens of London fited by fires.

The 5. of Ianuary, about nine of the clock in the euening, before the Twelfth day, began a great and terrible tempest of wind in the south west, which continued with great vehemencie till about 11. of the clocke of the same night, this in the citie of London blew the tiles off mens houses, ouerthrew many chimneies, and caused manie men feare the ouerthrowe of their houses: one of the three west gates of Saint Pauls Church, to wit, that next to the Byshoppes palace was broken, with the bolts, bars, and lockes of the same gate, so that it was blowne ouer. In the countreie, houses and barns were bozne ouer, and some of them blowne far from the places wherein they stode, besides trees in great numbers blowne by by the rotes. On the Seas, no man can tell what harmes were done, by ships and barks cast away. About Southampton the ships and barks riding at anchoz, were driuen a land and sunke, the like was neuer sene thereabouts.

Tempest of wind great and violent.

Southwest gate of Pauls blown open.

In this moneth of Iannarie, Nicols one of her maiesties purueors was hanged, for that hee conuerted to his owne vse certaine prouision taken of her subiects for her maiesties vse.

Purueor hanged.

The 21. of february, Ambrose Dudley earle of Marlowe deceased at his house in Strande strate nere unto Que byschope, towarde Westminster, and was honozably buried at Marlowe.

Ambassadors to the princes of Germany;

The vicount of Tureine, nowe Duke of Bullion by the late marriage of his wife, was sent in ambassage from Henry the 4. now King of France, vnto her maiestie, to intreate her to interpose her credite with the princes Protestants of Germanie, for the raising and sending of an Arme of Masters, or horsemen vnto the aide of the saide French King his Maister, against those of his owne Subiectes, &c. that doe oppose themselves against him, vnder the name of the Holie League: whereupon her Maestie addrested Sir Horatio Palauicino Knight, with commission to come with the saide Princes touching those preparations. In the performance of which Ambassage was spent all the Winter season with such good successe, that thereupon this army of the maine horsemen was lent and sent into France about the ende of the summer following,

In the moneth of Aprill, three thousand footemen were sent from hence into Britaine in France, vnder the condaction of sir John Norris knight, to come with the prince Dombes, sonne of the Duke Montpensier, and generall of the French kings forces in that prouince: which companies haue since beene from time to time supplied.

Coppinger and Arthington preached on a sabbath in Cheape

The 16. date of Iulie in the morning, Edmond Coppinger and Henry Arthington gentlemen, repaired to one Walkers house nere vnto Broken wharf of London, where conferring with one of their sear, named William Hacker of Dwindale in the County of Northampton yroman, they offered to annoint him king, but Hacker taking Coppinger by the hand, said: You shall not neede to annoint mee, for I haue bene already annointed in Heauen by the Holie ghost himselfe. Then Coppinger asked him what his pleasure was to be done. Go your way both (said he) and tell them in the city, that Christ Iesus is come with his fan in his hand to iudge the earth. And if any man aske you where he is, tel them he lies at Walkers house by Broken wharfe; and if they will not beleue it, let them come and kill me if they can: for as truly as Christ Iesus is in heauen, so truly is hee come to iudge the worlde. Then Coppinger saide it shoulde be done forthwith: and thereupon went forward, and Arthington followed, but ere hee coulde get downe the staires, Coppinger had begun below in the house, to proclaime newes from Heauen of exceeding great merue: that Christ Iesus was come, &c. with whome Arthington also cried the same words aloud, following him along the streets from thence by Watling streete, and Oldchange toward Cheape, they both adding beyond their commission these words: Repent England, repent. After they had both thus come (with a mightie concurse of the common multitude) with an vniforme cry into Cheape nere vnto the crosse, and there finding the throng and preale of people to encrease about them, in such sort as that they coulde not well passe further, nor be conuenientlie hearde of them all as they desired: therefore they gotte them vnto an emptie cart which stood there, wherein they stood not onelie vpon the wordes of their former cry, but they reading something out of a paper, went moze particularlie ouer the office and calling of Hacker,

Hacker, how he represented Christ, by partaking a part of his glorified body, by his principal spirit, and by the office of securing the god from the bad with his fan in his hand, and of establishing the Gospel in Europe, &c. telling also the people, where they saw him, where he laie and remained: that they were two Prophets, the one of Mercie, the other of Iudgement, sent, and controuersed called by God to assist him in this great worke, and were witnesses of these things, &c. And thereupon the one of them pronounced Mercie, great comfort, and unspeakable loves to all that should repent presently, bee obedient, and embrace this acceptable message, and oportunitie offered: And the other denounced terrible Iudgement if they repented not, which should even presently (also) fall vpon them, and especially vpon the City of London: affirming, that all that beleueed them not, were condemned bodie and soule: with other matter against her Maestie, and some of her honorable Primate Counsaile, which I ouerpasse. And whereas they had purposed to haue gone with the like Crie and Proclamation, through other the chiefe partes of the Citie, the pzease was so great, as that they were forced to go into a Tauerne in Cheape, at the Signe of the Permayde, the rather because a Gentleman, beeing of his acquaintance, plucked at Coppinger, whiles hee was in the Carte, and blamed him for his demeanour and speeches. From whence they went by back lanes, but yet crying (as afore) Repent England, repent, &c. to VValkers house at Broken Wharfe. This strange accident being quicklie blowne through the citie, all was in a buzze, and a kind of astonishment, what to thinke of the matter: and being speedilie brought to hir maiesties eares, two of hir honorable counsaile were presently dispatched vnto London, to take further notice of the whole matter: so that about one of the clocke in the afternoone, Coppinger was sent for, whiles Hacker and Arthington were brought before those honorable counsellors and others at the Lords Palours to bee examined; whose examinations I ouerpasse: but in the ende it was thought good, that Hacker should come to triall; so that on the twentieth fire of Iulie, hee was brought from Bidelwell to the Sessions House, nere to Newgate, before the Lord Palour and other Iustices, where being arraigned, hee was by two seuerall inditements founde guiltie; as to haue bitered and spoken dyuers most false and traiterous words against her maestie, to haue razed and defaced her Maesties Armes; as also a certaine Picture of the Queenes Maestie, and did maliciouslie, and traiterouslie thrust an yron Instrument into that part of the sayde picture that did represent the Breast and heart of the Queenes Maestie, &c. He had Iudgement, and on the 28. of Iulie, he was brought from Newgate towards the place of execution after ten of the clocke in the morning, albeit by reason of the incredible multitude then in the streets, but especially in Cheape. All the waie that hee was dragged vpon the hurdle, hee continued his counterfeite baine; one while crying out, Ichouah, Messias; Ichouah, Messias: another while crying out thus, loke, loke, howe the heauens open wide, and the sonne of God cometh downe to deliuer me; when hee came vnder the gibbet (which reared hard by the Crosse in Cheape) hee was exhorted to aske God and the Queene forgiveness, and to fall to his prayers: but he in stead thereof, set to railing, and cursing of the Q. maiesty, most villanously, and then began a most blasphemous and execrable prayer, against the diuine maiesty God. They had much adoe to get him by the ladder, where he was hanged and after bowelled and quartered.

Coppinger dis-
ed in Wyndwell.

On the next day, being the nine and twentieth of Iulie, Edmond Coppinger, hauing wilfullie abstained from meate ( as was sayde ) dyed in Wyndwell. And Arthington longe after in the Counter in Woodstrete, was reserued in hope of perfecte repentaunce. More of this pee male read in a Booke extaunte, intituled, Conspiracie of pretended Reformation, &c.

Earle of Essex sent into France.

In the moneth of Iulie, Robert Earle of Essex, Vassier of her maiesties horse, a yong nobleman of great valour and exptation, was by her highnesse appointed to haue the charge & conduction, as her maiesties lieutenant general, of 4000. footemen, and some number of horsemen, and pioners, sent into France, for the assistance of the French king, against the confederates of the league. In which expedition his Lordship was also honorably accompanied, with sundrie Gentlemen and soldiers that voluntarie followed him in this service. During the time that the Earle intended these French Warres, Walter Deuereux a yong gentleman, and forward in partiall actions; and brother to the earle, was slaine with a small shot before Roane in Normandie.

Proclamation against Iesuites and Seminaries.

In the moneth of October, a proclamation was published, containing a declaration of the manifest troubles pretended against the crown and estate, by Seminaries and Iesuites, soborned by the pope and king of Spaine, to infect his maiesties subiects with the poison of their seditious religion, and vnder colour thereof, to traine them vnto their pretended treasons, for the betraying of this estate vnto the Spanishe tyranny and inuasion. For the better preventing of which imminent dangers, a speciall charge was thereby giuen vnto all her Maiesties officers and ministers, vigilantlie to looke vnto their seuerall charges of the forces appointed to be in a readines, for the necessary defence of the realme. And for the better repressing of the fraudulent attempts of those Iesuits, the very seducers of all treasons and rebellions, disguising themselves in their habit and apparell, sometimes like gentlemen, and sometimes like serving men, and so insinuating themselves into the families and seruices of noblemen, ladies, and gentlemen, to couer themselves from suspition and apprehension: It was by the saide proclamation prouided, that speciall commissioners shoulde bee appointed in all Shires, Cities, and portre Townes of this Realme, to inquire out this viperous broode, and such as male bee reconciled by their enchantmentes, thereby farther charging all manner of persons of whatsoeuer degree or condition, to retaine none into their houses, without due examination of their conditions, maner of life, & conformitie in the religion, and to keepe thereof a Register, to be shewed vnto the saide Commissioners, if they shall demaunde the same, vpon suspicion of the disloyaltie of any such persons.

Not long after the publishing of this proclamation, her maiesty addrested commissions

commissions vnder the great seale of England, generally into al parts and diuisions of the Realme, for the purposes aforesaide: The faithfull execution whereof, according to the orders prescribed, will in time discour and bnumaske these Iesuiticall hypocrites, and diminish the ouer great swarmes of them, spreading their secret poison into the hart and bowels of this politicall bodie, in dangering the sense, feeling, and life thereof.

In the moneth of October, to wit, on the 28. day, Bren O Royrke, a great man of Ireland, was arraigned at Westminster, where he was found guiltie of high treason, and after for the same executed at Tyborne on the 3. of November, as hereafter more at large insueth.

The articles contained in the inditement against Bren O Royrke, Lorde of a great territorie and countrey in Ireland, named Breny I Royrke, who accompted himselfe to haue descended of one of the Monarches that were in Ireland heretofore: at his arraignment at Westminster on S. Simon and Iudes day, Maister John Ly of Rathbide a gentleman out of Ireland, being assigned by the lordes of the councell and commissioners to enterpret betwixt the Judges, and the saide O Royrke, who did expounde and declare in Irishe the Articles ensuing, and also all speeches uttered by the Judges, and the saide O Royrke, to the good liking of all the saide Judges and others that were present.

That the saide Bren O Royrke sought the depriuation of his maiesty from her regal seat, the destruction of his person, and the overthrow of his realme of Ireland, at Downaher and other places in Ireland, the 2. of July, in the 28. yere of his maiesties reigne.

That the saide O Royrke stirred by and procured Alexander Mac Coonel, and Denell, Mac Coonel being enemies to her Maiestie and her saide Realme of Irelande: to raise forces against her Maiestie in Irelande, and after that rebelled and succoured them the second of August, the twentie eight of her Maiesties reigne.

That the saide O Royrke at Downaher aforesayde, caused the picture of a woman to bee made, setting to her Maiesties name, and caused it to bee tied to an horse tayle, and to bee drawne through the mire in derision of his maiestie. And after caused his Galliglasses to helpe the same in pecces with their eyes, uttering diuers traitorous and rebellious words against her maiestie.

That the saide O Royrke, when Sixtus the fift of that name was Pope, and Philip the Spanishe King had bent their forces against Englande, and after dispersed by her Maiesties fleet, till they came about Scotland, and so to Irelande, and arriuing there, the sayde O Royrke did entertaine, releue, and succour, at Downaher aforesaide, and other places, diuers of the saide Spaniards, which were employed to this intended inuasion. And after proclamation being giuen by the lord Deputy vpon paine of death, that no man should keepe anie of the saide Spaniards, but they to bee sent to his Lordeshippe, by a date limited: yet the sayde O Royrke kept the sayde Spaniards till the sayde Lorde Deputy went with her Maiesties Forces to the North, at Commissions for inquisition to be made of suspected persons.

Bren O Royrke of Ireland arraigned.

which time, the saide O Royrke conueied them through the North with a Spanishe Frier, and an Irish Frier in their companie, and so to Spaine, without making the saide Lorde Deputie of Irelande acquainted therewith: and after receiued letters by the Frier from the saide King of Spaine, gratulatory for the entertainment he gaue to the saide Spaniards anno 30. of her maiesties raigne.

That the saide O Royrke procured and caused one Thady O Harte and his sect, with diuers others to enter into actuall rebellon against hir maiestie, so that the said Thady and others did burne Ballymote and other places, and after that done, the saide O Royrke did relieue and succor the saide traitors, that were entered into the said rebellon.

That the said O Royrke did enter and burne Ballingasse with diuers other villages in the county of Roscoman, and murdred O Kena at Copleier, Christopher Caddell, and diuers others of hir highnes loiall subiectes, and spoiled and carried away the praies of the said towne.

That the saide O Royrke did violentlie enter into the Towne of Knocke, Mullen, and diuers other villages in her maiesties realme of Irelande, in the barony of Tyrrell in the county of Sligo, and burned the saide Towne, and murdred one Chenem Wood a gentleman, with diuers others of her maiesties loiall subiectes within the said Barony of Tyrrell, and so continued his outrages, untill he was constrained by her Maiesties forces to fly into Scotland.

That the said O Royrke being fled into Scotland, did stirre by certaine Scots there to insurrection, and to ioinie with himselte their forces against hir maiestie in the Realme of Irelande. And also offered at Glasco unto the King of Scots, if he would maintaine him and suffer his subiects to go and ioinie with him, that he would bring the realme of Irelande to his subiection: contrarie to his duty, and in contempt of hir maiesties lawes, the 9. of March, anno 33. of hir maiesties raigne.

Also it did appere by the saide Bren O Royrke his speeches made in the towne, where he said, that if the Spaniards had first come into Irelande, as they did into Englande, that Irelande had bene their owne, and that hee woulde do them a peece of seruice: which speeches were sufficient proofe of his traitorous mind towards hir graces maiestie.

To conclude, the said O Royrke, after manie speeches by the Judge and him uttered, beeing at the barre, saide, that hee woulde not consent that anie inquest or Iurie shoulde passe vpon him, vnlesse hee might haue a weekes respite to be giuen him, and all those writings sent by William Fitz Williams, Ryfien, Bingham, and others in Irelande to be deliuered him, and a good man of lawe to be assigned vnto him, and the same man of lawe to be sworne to deale as truelie for him, as hee woulde do for the Queenes heire apparaunt, if hee were in his place. And besides this, that hee woulde haue the Queenes maiestie to bee one of the Iurie to passe on him. This his refusal to bee tryed was entered, at the request of her Maiesties learned Councell. And after entrie so made: the saide John Ly, beeing interpreter, was willed by the lord chiefe chiese Justice to tell him that the law was, if hee woulde refuse to bee tried by twelve men, then iudgement must bee giuen according to the quality of those Articles of treason wherewith hee was charged, and being obstinate therein, was guiltie of his owne death, yet that notwithstanding, hee refused tryall. Then the saide Iohn Ly expounded vnto him his iudgement, which was as ensueth.

That the saide Bren O Royrke shoulde bee taken from thence to the place from whence hee came, there to be laide vpon an Hurdle, so to bee drawne to the place of execution, there to bee hanged vntill hee were halfe dead, then to bee let downe, and his members and bowels to bee taken out and bent in the fire, his heade to bee stricken off, his bodie to bee quartered, and his head and bodie to bee disposed at her Maiesties direction. This being expounded to him by the said Ly, he answered nothing, but said, if that were their will, let it be so.

Vpon Wednesdaye the 3. of November, Bren O Royrke was drawne to Tyborne, and there hanged, his members and bowelles burned in the fire, his heart taken out, and holden vp by the hangman, naming it to be the archtraytors heart, and then did he cast the same into the fire, then was his heade stricken off, and his bodie quartered. But before this was done: the said O Royrke yet standing vpon the cart, Master Iohn Ly aforesaid, willed him in Gods behalfe to remember the filthy and odious treasons that hee committed against her maiestie, with many other good exhortations, to draw him to repentance, and to aske her maiestie and all the world forgiveness; and he to forgive all the world: yet he obstinately answered that he would not, but said, that if the Q. would haue granted him space, and all such writings, as the officers in Irelande, viz William Fitz Williams, and Dicke Bingham sent against him, to be giuen him to make answer to them, and also to giue him his life, that then he woulde aske her forgiveness, and from henceforth serue her truclie. And further saide, that hee did thinke little that the King of Scottes woulde haue sent him to the queene without safety and god assurance of his life, and remittall of his offences.

The said Iohn Ly did further bze and entreat the said O Royrke to repent, and to aske forgiveness (as afoze) and likewise to forgive, and that, that was the onely way for him to come to the heavenly kingdome; and also told him that all the standers by, requested and praised him so to do: he answered and willed them to make meanes for themselves to come to God, and that hee woulde make meanes for himselfe, but no more coulde bee had of him, but fell to his prayers. The said Ly told him againe, y he could not lawfully pray being so obstinate, hard hearted, and to die without repentance, but it would not be, and so the carte went from him. Also Meylerns the Lord archbishop of Cashell in Irelande being present, was willed by the standers by, to counsaile the said O Royrke, and the saide Archbshoppe requestling him to call to God, with other good exhortations: The sayde O Royrke turned vpon him and sayde, hee had moze neede to looke to himselfe, and that hee was neither here nor there.

Bren O Royrke executed at Ty-borne.

Diction of her maiesty to the parliament
men.

Oye Lordes, and you my commons of the lower house, were it not that I know no speeches presented by any other, nor wordes deliuered by any substitute, can be so deeply impzinted into your mindes, as spoken by her selfe, whose order and direction was but foliowed and deliuered by the lord Keeper,
I could be content to spare speech, whom silence better pleaseth then to speake:
And because much hath been spoken, much lesse shall I nowe neede to speake of mine owne indisposition of nature, and small desire in private respect to be enriched by you present, which wordes shall not witnesse, but deeds by your former experience, hauing expended what I haue receiued, to the preseruation and defence of your selues. And thus much I dare assure you, that the care which you haue taken for my selfe, your selues, and the common weale, that you do it for a Prince, that neither careth for any particular, no, nor for life, but so to liue, that you may flourish. For before God and in my conscieence, I protest, whereunto many that know me can witnesse, that the great expeience of my time, the labour of my studies, and the traueil of my thoughts, chiefely tendeth to Gods seruice, and the government of you to liue in a flourishing and happy estate, God forbid you should knowe anie change thereof.
Many worse princes than my selfe you haue had, but one only excepted (whom

In the duty of a childe I must regard, and to whom I must acknowledge my selfe farre shallow) I may truly say, none whose loue and care can be greater, or whose desire can be more to fathome deeper for pzeuation of danger to come, or resisting of dangers, if attempted towarde you, shall euer bee found to errede my selfe: In loue I say towarde you, and care ouer you. You haue heard in the beginning of this parliament, some doubt of danger, more then I would haue you to feare: Doubt only should be, if not pzeuented; and feare, if not pzeuided for. For mine owne part, I protest I neuer feared, and what feare was, my heart neuer knew. For I knew that my cause was euer iust, and it stode vpon a sure foundation, that I should not faile God assisting the quarrell of the rightwise, and such as are but to defende. Glad mought that king my greatest enemy be, to haue the like advantage against me, if in truth for his owne actions, he might truly so say. For in ambition of glorie I haue neuer sought to enlarge the territories of my land; nor thereby to aduance you. If I haue vled my forces to keepe the enemy farre from you, I haue thereby thought your safetie the greater, and your danger the lesse. If you suppose I haue done it in feare of the enemy, or in doubt of his renenge, I know his power is not to pzeuaile, nor his force to feare me, hauing so mighty a protector on my side. I would not haue you returning into the countrey to strike a feare into the mindes of any of my people, as some vpon the arrivall of the late nauie, dwelling in a Paritane shire fled for feare farther into the middle of the land, but if I had bene by him, surely I would haue taught him to haue shewed so base and cowardly a conrage, for euen our enemies holde our nature resolute and valiant, which though they will not outwardly shew, they inwardly knowe. And whensoever the malice of our enemies shall cause them to make any attempt against vs, I doubt not but we shall haue the greater glorie, God fighting for those which truly serue him, with the iustnesse of their quarrell. Only let them know to be wary, and not to be found sleeping, so shall they shew their owne valour, and frustrate the hopes of the enemies. And thus farre let me charge you that be lieutenants, and you that in shires haue the leading of the most choise and seruicable men vnder your bands that you see them sufficiently exercised and traped, so oft as neede shall require, that the wantes of any of them be supplied by others to be placed in their rowmes, and that all decaies of armour be presently repaired and made sufficient. The enemy finding your care such, and so great to pzeuide for him, will with the lesse courage thinke of your disturbance. To conclude, that I may shewe my thankefull minde, in my confidence neuer hauing ben willing to draw from you, but what you should contentedly giue, and that for your selues, and hauing my head by peres, and experience better staied, whatsoeuer any shall suppose to the contrarie, therin that you maie easily beleue that I will enter into any idle expences. Now must I giue you all as great thanks, as euer priuce gaue to louing subiects, assuring you that my care for you, hath, and shall errede all my other cares of worldly causes, what soeuer.

Oration of her

men.

My Lordes, and you my commons of the lower house, were it not that I know no speeches presented by any other, nor wordes deliuered by any substitute, can be so deeply imprinted into your mindes, as spoken by her selfe, whose order and direction was but foliowed and deliuered by the lord keeper,
I could be content to spare speech, whom silence better pleaseth then to speake:
And because much hath been spoken, much lesse shall I nowe neede to speake of mine owne disposition of nature, and small desire in priuate respect to be enriched by you present, which wordes shall not witness, but deeds by your former experience, hauing expended what I haue receiued, to the preseruation and defence of your selues. And thus much I dare assure you, that the care which you haue taken for my selfe, your selues, and the common weale, that you do it for a Prince, that neither careth for any particular, no, nor for life, but so to liue, that you may flourish. For before God and in my conscieence, I profess, whereunto many that know me can witnesse, that the great experience of my time, the labour of my studies, and the trauell of my thoughts, chiefely tendeth to Gods seruice, and the gouernment of you to liue in a flourishing and happy estate, God forbid you should knowe any change thereof.
Many wiser princes than my selfe you haue had, but one only excepted (whom

Glad mought that king my greatest enemy be, to haue the like aduantage against me, if in truth for his owne actions, he might truly so say. For in ambition of glorie I haue neuer sought to enlarge the territories of my land; nor thereby to aduance you. If I haue vsed my forces to keepe the enemy farre from you, I haue thereby thought your safetie the greater, and your danger the lesse. Court of assise kept in Saint Georges field for feare of the plague.

The 19. of July, the court of assise for Surrey was holden and kept in S. Georges field, a tent being set vp for that purpose, many prisoners were there arraigned, condemned and had iudgement, nineteene were byent in the hand, but none executed. This assise was ended the same day, which was thought would haue bene thre daies worke, for the Iustices (all duties being paide) made haste alwaie for feare of being infected with the pestilence by repaire of people thither.

No Bartholmew faire at London.

This yere also, no Bartholmew faire was kept at London, for the auoyding of concourse of people, whereby the infection of the rest, or plague might haue increased, which was then verie hot in that citie, so that on the thre and twentieth of October, deceased sir William Roe then lord maior: The first of Nouember, William Elken alderman: The fift of December, sir Rowland Howard alderman, and the ninth of January, sir Wolstone Dixie alderman. The whole number deceased this yere in the citie, liberties, and suburbs absoyning, as well of the plague as of other diseases, from the nine and twentieth of December in the yere 1592. untill the twentieth of December 1593. was as followeth: within the wals of all diseases 8598. where of the plague was 5390. without the walles, and in the liberties 9295. of the plague 5385. so that within the Citie and liberties of all diseases died 17893. where of the plague was 10675.

A seminary executed.

The 18. of February, one named Harington a seminary priest, was by awn from Pelwgate to Tyborne, and there hanged, cut downe aline, strugled with the hangman, but was bowelled and quartered.

The last of February, Rodericke Lopez a Portingale (as it was saide) professing physicke, was arraigned in the Guild hall of London, found guilty, and had iudgement as of high treason, for conspiring her maiesties destruction by poison.

An Irish man executed.

The first of March an Irish man was arraigned at Westminster, and on the next morning earlie hanged and quartered at Tyborne.

Great windes ouerturned trees.

In this moneth of March was many great stormes of winde, which ouerturned trees, steeple, barns, houses, &c. namely in Worcester shire, in Beaulley forrest many Oakes were ouerturned. In Hoxton wood of the said shire, more then 1500. Oakes were ouerthrowen in one day, namely on the thurs day next before Palmesunday. In Stafford shire the steeple in Stafford towne was rent in pieces along through the midst, and throwen vppon the church, where with the said rose is broken, 1000 l. will not make it good. Houses and barnes were ouerthrowen in most places of those shires. In Canke wood more then 3000. trees were ouerthrowen, many steeple more or lesse about 50. in Stafford shire were perished, or blowne downe.

The 16. of Aprill, Ferdinando Earle of Darby deceased at Latham, whose Ferdinando earle of Darby deceased.
strange sickness and death, gathered by those who were present with him at the time thereof, was such as followeth: his diseases apparant, were vomiting of sower or rustie matter with bloud, the yealow faundes: melting of his fat, swelling and hardnesse of his spleene, a vehement hichcocke, and sower daies before he died, stopping of his water.

The causes of all his diseases were thought by the physicians, to be partly a surfet, and partly a most violent dissempering himselfe with vehement exercise, taken foure daies together in the Easter weeke.

The 5. of Aprill about fixe of the clocke at night he fell sicke at Louthly;
where he vomited thrice.

The 6. he returned to Latham, and feeling his health to sinke more & more, sent to Chester for a doctor of physicke.

The 7. before the coming of the doctor, he had cast 7. times, the colour of his vomits was like to fontie or rustie yron; the substance verie grosse and fattie: the quantitie about seven pintes, the smell not without offence, his waters were in colour, smell, and substance not unlike his vomites. The same night he took a glister to draine the course of the humors downeward, which wrought five times and gave some ease.

The 8. he took a gentle infusion of Rubarb and Spanna in a draught of chicken broth, which wrought very well nine times.

The 9. because of his continuall bleeding by mouth with his vomits, he was instantly intreated to be let bloud, to direct and stay the course thereof, but by no meanes he could be perswaded thereunto, wherefore that daie onely so-mentations, oyles and plaisters were outwardly applyed, to stay and comfort his stomacke.

The 10. he took one other glister, which wrought well five times.

The 11. he took one other purge which wrought with great ease 9. times upon the humors. The same night he took a little diascordium with the syrope of limons and scabions water, which somewhat staied his stomacke and gave him some rest.

The 12. because his vomiting continued still, hee was moued to take a vomit; that thereby the bottome of his stomacke might be scoured and cleansed from so vile and lothsome matter therewith he was troubled: but by no perswasion he would yelde thereunto; notwithstanding the same daie hee took a medicine to procure sweat, but preuayled not, the very same night his water staide upon a sodaine, to the astonishment of all.

The thirtieth, all meanes were offered to prouoke water as glister drinckes, fomentations, oyles, pultises, plaisters and stirrings, but nothing happelle succeded.

The

The 14. and 15. was vsed an instrument called a Casteter, which being conuected into his bladder, was strongly sucked by the Chirargion but no water followed.

The 16. day about five of the clocke at night, he most deuoutly yielded his soule to God.

In all the time of his sickness, he often toke Bezars Stone, and Unico:nes hozne, his pulse was euer good, his strength indifferent, the number of his vomites were 52. and of his stools 29. his phyfitions were doctor Canon, doctor Ioynar, doctor Bate, doctor Cale.

A true report of such reasons and coniectures, as caused many learned men to suppose him to be bewitched.

The first of Aprill being the mondate before his hono<sup>r</sup> fell sicke, a woman offered vnto him a supplication, or petition, wherein her request was, that it would please him to giue, or assigne her a dwelling place nere vnto himselfe, that she might from time to time reueale vnto him such thinges with speede, which God reuealed vnto her for his god. This petition was thought vaine and therefore refused.

On the fourth of Aprill, he dreamed that his ladie was most dangerously sicke to death, and in his sleepe being sore troubled therewith, he wept, sodainly cried out, started from his bedde, called for helpe, sought about the chamber, betwixt sleeping and waking, but being fullie awaked was comforted, because he found her well: here we omit strange dreames, or distainctions of diuers graue men, which happened before or about the time of his sickness.

On the sixt of Aprill, in his chamber at Ironsley about five of the clocke at night, there appeared sodainly a tall man, with a gasly and threathing countenance, who twise or thise seemed to crosse him, as he was passing through the chamber, and when he came vnto the same part of the chamber where this shadow appeared, he presently fell sicke, and there vomited thise. After Go:borne one of his secretaries attending then vpon him sawe nothing, which more amazed him. The same night he dreamed that he was in fighting, and twise or thise stabbed to the heart, and also wounded in manie other places of his bodie.

The 10. of Aprill about midnight, was founde in his bed chamber by one master Halsall, an Image of ware with haire, like vnto the haire of his hono<sup>r</sup>s head, twisted through the belly thereof, from the nauell to the secrets: This Image was spotted, as the same master Halsall reported vnto master Smith, one of his secretaries, a daie before anie paine grew, and spots appeared vpon his sides and bellie. This Image was hastily cast into the fire by master Halsall, before it was viewed, because he thought by burning thereof, as he said, he should relieue his lord from witchcraft, and burne the witch who so much tormented his lord, but it fell out contrary to his loue and affection, for after the melting thereof, he more and more declined.

The 12. of Aprill, one Iane a witch demanded of master Goberne, whether his hono<sup>r</sup> felt no paine in the lower parts, and whether he made water as yet or

or no: and at that verie time notwithstanding all helpes, his water bitterlie stopped, and so remained till he died.

Sir Edward Filton, who with other Iustices examined certaine witches, reporteth, that one of them being bidden to saie the lords prayer, said it well, but being coniured, in the name of Iesus, that if she had bewitched his honor, she should not be able to saie the same, she could neuer repeate that petition, For-giue vs our trespasses, no not although it was repeated vnto her.

A homely woman, about the age of fiftie yeres, was found mumbling in a corner of his honors chamber, but what God knoweth. This wise woman (as they termed her) seemed often to ease his honor both of his vomiting and hickocke, but so it fell out, which was strange, that when so long as hee was eased, the woman her selfe was troubled most vehemently in the same manner, the matter which she vomited, being like also vnto that which passed from him. But at the last, when this woman was espied by one of the doctors tempering and blessing (after her manner) the iuice of certaine herbes, her pot where into she streined the iuice, was tumbled downe by the said doctor, and she rated out of the chamber, notwithstanding she did still saie that she would not cease to ease him, although she could not perfectly helpe him, because hee was so strongly bewitched. All physicke wrought verie well, yet had he none or little ease thereby, his diseases were many and his vomits, with stopping his water grievous, yet euer his pulse remained as good and perfect as euer it did in time of his best health, till one quarter of an houre before he died. He himselfe in all the time of his sicknesse cried out that the doctors laboured in vaine, because he was certainly bewitched. He fell twice into a traunce, not able to moue, hand, head, or foote, when he would haue taken physicke to doe him good. In the ende, he cried out often against all witches and witchcraft, reposing his onely hope of saluation vpon the merites of Christ Iesus his Saviour.

One excellent speech, can not be omitted amongst many in the time of his sicknesse, especially the day before he departed, at which time he desired one of his doctors, whom he especially loued, to perswade him no longer to liue, because (saith he) although out of thy loue, thou wouldest stirre vp hope of life, and doest imploie all thy wit, arte, and trauaile to that ende, yet knowing for a certaintie that I must now die, I pray thee cease, for I am resolved presentlie to die, and to take awaie with me onely one part of my armes, I meane the Eagles winges, so will I die swiftly into the bosome of Christ my onely sauour. And with that he sent for his Ladie, and gaue her his last Vale or farewell, desiring her to take away and loue his doctor, and also to giue him some ieuell, with his armes and name, that hee might be remembered: the which thing, immediatly after his death was most honorably performed. His spirituall physicians, were the bishop of Chester, and master Lee his chaplatine.

Then was it by the court declared vnto them, how they had bene charged with high treason against her maiestie, had bene tried, found guilty and had receiued iudgement; therefore it was demanded of them, what they could say for themselves, and should not suffer death accordingly: whereunto one of the Portingales began in his language to tell a long tale, but was willed to be short, which he answered could not be done without circumstance, &c. whereupon he was willed to holde his peace. The second answered by writing in his language, which being read by an interpreter, the Quenes attourney had faile, for it was not true. Rodericke Lopez in English made his submission, and affirmed hee neuer thought harme to her maiestie, &c. Then was called the marshall of the kings bench, and appearing, hee was charged with the prisoners, to conuaine them to the prison of the kings bench, and there to deliuer them to the Sheriffes of London, with a writte to see them executed: so were they conuained by water from Westminster to the bishoppe of Winchesteres staires in Southwarke, from thence to the kings bench, there laide on hurdles, and conuained by the Sheriffes of London ouer the brydge, by to Leaden hall, and so to Tyborne, and there hanged, cutte downe aliue, holden downe by strength of men, dismembred, bowelled, headed and quartered, their quarters set on the gates of the citie.

Great raines.

This yere in the month of May, fell many great howyes of raine, but in the moneths of June and July, much more: for it commonly rained euery day, or night, till S. James day, and two daies after together most extreamly, all which, notwithstanding in the moneth of August there followed a faire harvest, but in the moneth of September fell great raines, which raised high waters, such as flated the carriages, and bare downe brydges, at Cambridge,

Also the price of graine grew to be such, as a strike or bushell of Rie was sold for five shillings, a bushell of wheat for five, seven, or eight shillings, &c. for still it rose in price, which dearth happened (after the common opinion) more by means of our much transporting, by our owne merchants for their private gaine, than through the unseasonableness of the weather passed.

apprehended.

The 29. of June, being Sunday in the afternoone, a number of unruly youths on the tower hill, being blamed by the warders of Tower street ward, threw at them stones, and drove them backe into Tower streete, being harned the reunto by sounding of a trumpet, but the trumpeter hauing been a soldier, and many other of that companie were taken by the Sherifs of London and sent to prison. About 7. of the clocke the same night, Sir John Spencer lord maior rode to the tower hill, attended by his officers and others, to see the hill cleared of all tumultuous persons, where, about the middle of the hill, some warders of the tower, and lieutenants men being there, tolde the maior, that the sword ought not in that place to be borne vp, and therefore two of the them catching hold of the sworde, some bickering there was, and the sworde bearer with other hurt and wounded: but the lord maior, by his wise and discrete pacification, as also by proclamation in her maiesties name, in short time, cleared the hill of all trouble, and rode backe, the sworde bearer bearing vp the sword before him.

The Quenes maiestie being informed of the se, and sundry other disorders committed in & about her city of London, by unlawfull assemblies: And some attempting to rescue out of the hands of publike officers such as had bin lawfully arrested, whereby the peace had bin violated and broken: Her maiestie, for reformation the reof, by proclamation dated the 4. of July, straightly charged all her officers, both in the city, and places nere adioining in the countie of Middlesex, Kent, Surrey and Essex, that had authority to preserve the peace, and to punish offenders, more diligently, to the best of their powers, see to the suppression of all offenders against the peace, vpon paine to be not only remoued from their offices, but to be also punished as persons maintaining or comforting such offenders. And because the late unlawfull assemblies & routs were compounded of sundry sorts of base people, some prentises, and some others wandring, idle persons of condition Rogues & vagabonds, and some colouring their wandring by the name of souldiers, her maiesty, for better direction to her officers of Justice, and inquisition to be made, notified her pleasure to her counsell, to prescribe orders to be published, and straightly obserued, and for that purpose a Prouost marshall with sufficient authority to apprehend all such as should not be readily reformed and corrected by the ordinarie officers of Justice, and that without delay to execute vpon the gallowes by order of martiall law. The orders prescribed, were the same day also by proclamation published. Sir Th. Willford knight, was appointed prouost marshal for the time, he rode about, and through the City of London daily, with a number of men on horsebacke, armed, with their cases of pistols, &c. This marshal apprehended many vagrant and idle people, brought them before the iustices, who committed them to diuers prisons. On the 22. of July were arraigned in the Guild hall of London 5. of those unruly youths that were apprehended on the Tower hill, they were condemned of high treason, had iudgement to be e-

Fletcher bishop of London preached there in praise of the queene, and praier for her maiestie, before the lord maior, Aldermen, and citizens in their best luxuries. Which sermon being ended, vpon the church leades the trumpets sounded, the cornets winded, and the quistrillers sung an antheme. On the steeple many lightes were burned: The tower shot off her ordinance, the belles were ringing, bonefiers made, &c.

This yere a certaine Pinnace was made by an house Carpenter, in the great green yard of the Leaden hal in London, it was of burthen about some
5. tun: this was made to be taken a sunder, & set together with vices: the same was finished, and launched out of the Leaden hall on the 12. of March in the night, being drowne by strength of men, and of horses on a sled, with wheles made for that purpose, towards Aldgate, where against the parish church of S.
Katherine Christs church, the wheles taking fier on the axletrees, were broken about one of the clocke in the morning, where it staid till the next night, and then was drowne to the Tower hill, where the same was calked and pitched.
And on the 20. of March drowne and launched into the riuer of Thames at the

The 9. of Aprill being good friday, in the afternone, the lord maior and aldermen of London being in Bowles church yard, hearing the sermon at Pauls crosse, were sodainlie called from thence, and forthwith by a precept from her maiestie and counsell, pressed 1000. men, which was done by 8. of the clocke the same night, and before the next morning they were purued of all maner of furniture for the wars, readie to haue gone towarde Douer, and so to the aide of the French in Calais against the Spaniards, but in the afternone of the same Saturday they were all discharged: notwithstanding on the 11. of Aprill being Easter day, about tenne of the clocke before none, came a newe be souldiers, that by twelue of the clocke, they had in the whole Cittle 1000. men, and those, forthwith furnished of armour, weapons and all thinges necessarie, were for the most part that night, and the rest on the next morning sent awaie towarde Douer, as the like out of other partes of the Realme: but about a weeke after they returned backe againe, for the French had lost Caleis.

The last of Aprill at night, deceased Sir Iohn Puckering Lord Keeper of the great Seale, he died of a dead palsey, wherewith hee had bene taken on the five and twentieth of Aprill at night, and was buried at Westminster.

About this time was published a booke intituled, A declaration of the causes mouing the Quenes maiestie of England, to prepare and sende a Nauie to the seas, for the defence of her Realmes against the King of Spaines forces, to be published by the Generals of the saide Nauie, to the intent that it shall appeare to the world, that her maiestie armieth her Nauie onely to defende her selfe, and to offende her enemies, and not to offend ante other, that shall forbear to strengthen her enemy, but to vse them with all lawfull fauours.

To all Chyistian people, to whom this declaration shall come to be read, or heard gréeting. We Robert Earle of Essex, and Cwe, vicount Hereford, lord Ferrers of Chartley, Bourgcher and Louane, &c. and Charles lord Howard, baron of Effingham, lord high Admirall of England, &c. hauing the charge of a Royall nauie of ships, prepared and sent to the seas, by the most excellent Princeesse, the ladie Elizabeth, Queene of England, France and Ireland, &c. doe giue all men knowledge that the saide nauie vnder our charge is by her maiestie prepared and sent to serue on the seas, for defence of her maiesties realmes, dominions, and subiects, against such mightie forces, as we are aduertised from all partes of Chyistendome, to bee already prepared by the king of Spaine, and by further prouisions of men and ships daily sent for, are to be mightily increased, to invade her maiesties Realmes: as heretofore in the péere of our Lord 1588. was attempted (euen then there was a Treatie continued by both their Commissioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then euer before in his time was set to the seas: though by Gods godnes, and the valour and wisdome of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the same was notably made frustrate. And because her Maiestie hath godd intelligence of perfite amitie with all Kings and Princes of Chyistendome, sauing with the King of Spaine, who hath this manie yeres most vniustly professed openly great enimitie by diuers actions, both against her Royall person, and her people, and Countries, without anye iust cause first giuen on her Maiesties part. Therefore we saide the Earle, and Lord Admirall, doe ascertaine all persons, that were are most straightly commanded by her excellent Maiestie to forbear from offending in this our Voyage of anye maner of persons of what Nation soeuer, except the saide Kings naturall Subiects, or such others borne Strangers, as shall giue to the saide King manifest ayde, with Men, Shippes, Artillerie, Munitiall, and other Warlike prouisions for inua-tion of her Maestie. Which her Maesties commandement we meane dutifullie to obserue: and doe the refone giue weight charge to all persons that shall serue in this Spanie vnderneath vs. vpon paine of extreme punishment to obserue the same, &c.

at Sea.

Anno Domini 1596. her Maestie sent a great flete to the seas consisting of 17. or 18. of her Royall shippes, and thre of the L. Admirals, and of Merchants shippes and men of warre, and victualers about 100. and to these the States added foure and twenty: so that the whole flete being assembled at Plimmoth, was about 150. saile.

An Abstract of the exp. dition to Cadiz 1596.
Drawne out of Commentaries written at large thereof, by a Gentleman who was in the voyage.

This Royall flete was commanded by the most noble and fortunate in all his aduentures, the L. C. Howard (now Earle of Nottingham, high admirall of England in the Arke Royall, wherein, by Gods fauor & her maiesties auspices) he defeated the great Spanishe flet in the yere 1588. And by the right honorable and renowned lord, Robert D'Eureux earle of Essex and Cw, and master of her maiesties horse and ordnance: both jointly her maiesties Lieutenants generall for this expedition by sea and land; their authoritie and power being equall, sating that the one had the precedence at sea, the other at land: the Earle was shipped in a newe built and very warlike shippe called the Du repulse. The Vice admirall of the whole flete was the L. Thomas Howard second sonne to the duke of Suffolke in the Piranore. The Rere admirall was sir Walter Rawleigh Captaine of her maiesties garde and lieutenant of Cornwall in the Masspate, both new ships. The Admirall of the flet of the States was Ion van Duvenoord lord of Warmonot, in the Neptuneus a ship of 400. tonnes.

This whole flet was diuided by the L. L. Generals into fure squadrons, euerie one of these Chiefs aforesaid had their particular squadron, and Vice admirall. The first squadron was lead (as it was his right) by the lord high admirall of England: the second by the earle of Essex: the third by the lord Thomas Howard: the fourth by sir W. Rawleigh; the fift by Mounfier Du venoord: And strait commandement was giuen throughout all the flete that euerie shippe should waite vpon the Admirall of his squadron. The Vice admirals of these squadrons were, sir Robert Southwel (son in law to the lordes admirall of England) in the Lyon, to the lord Admirall: sir Francis Vere lord marshall in the Rainbow, to the earle of Essex: sir Robert Dudley son to the earle of Leicester in the Ponpareille, to the L. Th. Howard: Captaine Robert Crosbie in the Swiftsure, to sir Walter Rawleigh: and Ion Gerbranson in the B. of Holland, vice admirall of the Hollanders.

mirals and vice

The lords Generals while they lay at Plimmouth (to arme or furnish them- selues with euerie thing necessarie for so great an army) gouerned their charge with verie good iustice and martiall discipline: and for instance hereof briefly this I obserued: Two souldiers were hanged vpon the wo with pa- pers vpon them shewing their offences: vpon the one paper was written: For drawing his sword, and raising mutinie against his Commander. Vpon the other, For running away from his Colours.

His name was Hammon.

There was also a lieutenant that had taken firtie pounds to discharge men that were pressed in Wales, he was disarmed by proclamation, and ad- iudged to repay the money and banished the army.

A souldier also in a dutch regiment that had killed one of his companions, was by order of martiall law tied to the partle murdered, and so throwen both into the sea: And in fero afterward an English souldier was shotte to death by other souldiers, for killing a dutch sea Captaine. The lords Gene- rals at Plimmouth also published a declaration of his iust causes which moued her maiestie to set forth this flecte against the king of Spaine: admonishing also the subiects of all other princes and states, of their danger if they ayded the said king with shippes, victuals or munition, which was translated into Italian, French, Dutch and Spanish, and dispersed.

The souldiers were mustred at Plimmouth and trained every day by their Captaines, Colonels and Commanders. The chiefe Commanders and offi- cers of the army by land (besides the earle of Essex, and the lord admirall ioint Generals as aforesaid) were, sir Francis Vere lord marshall, sir John Wink- field Campmaster generall, sir Coniers Clifford sergeant maior, sir George Carew master of the ordinance, master Astley secretarie, captaine John Buck prouost marshall, captaine Oliuer Lambert quarter master. The Colonels of the regiments of the army were, the earle of Sussex, sir Christopher Blunt, sir Thomas Gerrat, sir Richard Winkfield, and sir Edward Winkfield of the vo- luntaries: besides the regiments of both the generals, whose lieutenants co- lonels were, sir Mathew Morgan, and sir Vill. Woodhouse, of equall ranke with colonels: and besides the regiments of the lord Marshall, of the Camp- master, of the Sergeant maior, and of the Dutch, commanded or to haue bene commanded by the Count Lodowicke, and all these regiments contai- ned not aboue 10000. men.

Th: Queenes
Prayer.

And in this meane time of all these businesse at Plimmouth, the Queenes Maiestie (well considering that the lord of hostes blesteth the hostes and for- ces of godly Princes, and giveth victorie to the faithfull armies) made a ve- rie deuout prayer to Almighty God for the god successe of the flecte, and sent it by Captaine Ed. Conway to the Generals, commanding that it should be daily saide throughout all the flecte. And here also they receiued instructions for appointing their priuate counsell for this expedition, viz. the lord Thomas Howard, sir W. Rawleigh, sir Francis Vere, sir George Carew, and sir Coniers Clifford: and here they ordered that there should be two flags vsed to be hanged in the shrowdes of the lord Admirals shippe about counsell causes, the one a flagge of the armes of England with a warning piece to call the select coun- sell, sell, and the other the flagge of S. George hanged in the same place to call the common counsell of all sea captaines and masters of ships, and besides that euerie shippe in the flæte should hang vpon their mizen parce a white pendant foure elles long,

And they sent to euerie shippe certaine instructions sealed vp, with strait commandement to the Captaine the reof not to open them untill such time as they were come to the South cape, vntlesse they hapned in the meane time to bee seuered from the flæte by storme, or other misfortune: and if they hapned to be taken by the enemy, then to hurle them so sealed ouer bord. But for bzenitie sake I passe ouer thus these and other like preparatiues to this journey: and come to the matter.

By these instructions the Bay of Cadiz was appointed their Rendezuous.

The first daie of June all the souldiers and mariners being embarked, and the winde comming to the North-west and by north, the lord Admirall of England being aboard the Arke, commanded his master gunner to shote off a peece to giue warning to all the flæte to weigh anchors and set sailes: which they did incontinent, and thus being vnder sayle (the lord Admirall leading) they sayled the same daie and night as farre as a plementoric in Cornewall called Dodmans point: but the winde scanting they were faine to retorne againe, the greater ships into the sound of Plimmouth, and the lesser ships into Causton bay by spectall cation of the lords Generals, least anie mariners should retorne againe to Plimmouth: which they also prevented by sending commandement to the maior & gouernor of Plimmouth that they should suffer no boates from the flæte to come ashore.

The next daie following being the 3. of June we set saile againe, and in a good houre, for from that time till wee came to Cadiz, we had faire weather and the winde prosperous: but we neuer came within sight of Spaine till we came to the cape of S. Vincent, and thereabout vpon the 18. daie of the same moneth the L. Admirall toke an Irish Barke that came but a daie or two before from Cadiz, of this Irish man the lord admirall enquired what forces were in Cadiz, what shipping in the Bay, what newes of the English flæte: to whom the Irish man answered, that in the towne were no forces more then ordinarie, but in the Bay there were 20. gallies and about 50. saile of ships, whereof foure or fve were of those Gallions of the kings which are called the twelue Apostles, & two great Gallies, three Fregates, three Renantillas or Argosies, two great Biskaines, the rest were merchants ships rich, and most of great burden, and the lading of these ships was munition, coine, wine, oyle, silkes, cloth of gold, gold lace, quicke silver and about 1500. quintals of ware, and diuers other rich merchandise: and some were bounde for the Indies, some for Britaine, some for Lisbonne, and some for other places: and that there was no speech (that he heard) of the comming of any English flæte thither. By this time the Earle of Essex was come aboard the Arke, and there was a flagge of the armes of Englnd hanged in the shroldres, and after consultation, and euery man returned to his owne shippe, the lords Generals hastened their course to Cadiz, and vpon the 20. day of this moneth being sundae early in the morning we came all to anchor within halfe a league of S. Sebastian a frerie at the west end of Cadiz.

The Generals attempted presently to land nere to this Frerie at a descent called the Colietta, they filled many boates and barges with souldiers, and leaders, but the weather was verie fowle, and the water went so high that two boates with some 80. souldiers armed sanke, whereof some were drowned, the others by helpe of other boates were saued, and set aboord their owne ships againe. This mischance did not happen as anie token that God was displeased with our enterpryse (as the sequell shewed) but that we mischose the daie attempting so great a worke vpon his daie of rest. And it was also a mercie of Almightie God: for we could not haue landed there without great difficulty and much losse, for besides that the place was strong of it selfe, the Spaniards had brought all the strength that they could to it.

The next daie being munday early in the morning, the Spanish flée which rode at our coming before the towne vnder the fortres and bulwarks thereof (by the aduise of Diego Soto master of the S. Phillip the Admirall ship) shot with the tide within the point of the maine land, and Castle of Puntall in the straites of the Bay: immediately after the English flée weighed, and came to ancho: nere the same place where the Spanish flée rode before, and there the fort S. Phillip and the rest plaide vpon our ships with their great ordinance, and the Gallies were very busie: but by the Generals commandement sir John Winkfield in the Vanguard hauing some other lesser shippes joined to him, took them to taske, and so laured them that they were glad to seeke to saue themselves; they crept by the shore, first to the Puntall, and from thence into the Bay, and so to the Bridge called Puente de Suaco, where striking their masses and by helpe of certaine engines vpon the Bridge (contrarie to the expectation of the Generals) they went rounde about the Ile of Leon, and came to Rota. But the eie and care of the lords generals was chiefly fixed vpon the Gallions and other great ships before mentioned: whereupon they resolved to send that most noble Gentleman and great sea Captaine the lord Thomas Howard to encounter with them in the Ponpareille, adioyning to him some selue ships of the Queenes (for the place was so narrow that hardly ten ships could come to fight:) The other that were employed in this enterpryse with the lord Thomas, were sir Walter Rawleigh, sir Robert Southwell, sir Francis Vere, captaine Robert Crosse (aboord whome the Earle of Sussex was) sir George Carew in the Mary rose, and Captaine Alexander Clifford in the Dreadnought and the Alcedo of London. And although it were agreed in counsell that the lords Generals should not hazard their shippes of greatest burthen and of most charge in those straites and shoales; yet the earle of Essex could not endure to be onely a looker on in so honorable an action, but he put in amongst the thickest of them, and fought very gallantly: which the lord Admirall seeing (and being not able to bring in his owne shippe) took his long boat and went presently aboord the Spanishe, & went into the fight also, taking with him his noble young sonne now the lord William Howard of Effingham, being at those young peres very desirous to seeke and share honor with the oldest captaines at all hazards.

The Battaille
at sea.

The

This fight lasted till past none, and then the Gallions being cruelly rent and tozned, and so much slaughter in them, that the bloud gushed out at the scowp holes, some resolved to flie to Porto Real, some to burne their ships, some ran their ships aground: diuers Spaniards lepte into the water, whereof some swamme ahoze, some were drowned, some taken, some slaine. The L. Admirall beholding this miserable spectacle of a conquered fortune in these distressed Spaniards swimming about their ships and craving mercie, had compassion of them, and toke his boate and rewe by and downe amongst them forbidding these cruelties, & preventing the firing of the Spanish ships so much as was possible, which the Spaniards remaining aboard in this desperate beaten estate chiefe intended, and first they fired the S. Philip a ship of 1500. tunnes, by whose side a pinnace of Sir Robert Southwells was burned, but the men were saved. They fired also the S. Thomas, and the S. Juan (as Signior Fantonio affirmed to me in his house in Cadiz) but the other two Apostles S. Spatheu, and S. Andra ships of 1200. tunnes apiece were preserved from fire, and flats, and brought safe into England.

The battaille by sea being thus happily fought and victory obtained, the lords Generals (not willing to lose any opportunity) presently set in hand the landing of the souldiers, and in a verie little space there was such diligence vled, that the earle of Essex was aland nere the Puntall about a league from Cadiz, with 8000. foot and pikes: he was accompanied with the earle of Sussex, the earle Lodowike of Bassaw, the lord Harbert sonne and heyre to the earle of Worcester, the lord Bourke of Ireland, Sir Edw. Winkfield, Sir Robert Druery, Sir Thomas German, Sir Anthony Standen, master S. Laurence, master Alexander and master Will. Ratcliffes brothers, and diuers other gallant gentlemen aduenturers.

As soone as this lord Generall was landed he dispatched presently three colonels with their regiments to the Puente de Suazo, the Sergeant maior, and Sir Christopher Blunt, and Sir Thomas Gerard, with charge so to empelch the passage of that bridge that there might be no meanes left for any succours to come into the Isle of Leon to helpe the Spaniards, and to breake downe that engine, by helpe whereof the Gallies might passe, and also to surpris 02 force the Castle at the bridge fote called by the dutch Herods house: they did somewhat ruinate the bridge, and returned to Cadiz that same night. But the dutch (which presently after the Earles landing toke the fort at Puntall) toke also after ward that Castle of Leon at the bridge fote (as E. Meternus writeth) but I neuer heard so much before. The Earle of Essex hauing for his guide Captaine W. Morgan, marched apace with his army toward the towne, although in no hope to lodge within it that night: vpon the way he was encountered with 400. or 500. canalleroes or horsemen of Xeres, and 600. or 700. footmen, but they were without any great difficultie beaten backe, and ran into the towne, offering to shut the gates; but the Earle made such haste as he entered with his troups pell mell with them: and some made such shift to get into the towne that they climbed over the wals, shewing our men by that means another way to enter the towne if they could not haue got in at the gates, which they soon learned and put in practise: and by this the L. Admirall was landed with his battaile of some 12. or 15. hundred, and followed the earle with a very round march: hee was accompanied with all the chiefe commanders by sea, and capitaines of ships and their retinue, as the lord Thomas Howard, and sir Walter Rawleigh, who was not able to march so fast as the rest, by reason that he was hurt in one of his legs with a splinter in the fight with the Gallions. There were also in this march the young lord William Howard, sir Robert Southwell, sir Edward Hoby who bare the lord Admirals ensigne, master W. Paget, sir R. Leuson, master Philip Woodous, master John Townesend, master R. Weston, master Mathew Browne, capitaine Robert Mansell, master Miles Corbet, master George Bucke, master John Morgan, master Th. Woodous, and diuers other gentlemen aduenturers, and men of qualitie, whose names I doe not now remember.

When the lord Admirall came into the towne, he found the Earle of Essex skirmishing and fighting with the Spaniards, who fought and fled still before him, others threw downe stones from the battlements of their houses, which annoyed much our souldiers, and some were hurt thereby. But after that the forces of both the Generals were ioyned together, the fight and resistance of the Spaniards continued not long, but they fled into the Castle and into the Ciuada or towne house in the market place adioyning to the Castle, and into other their strong places. And here sir John Winkfield riding vpon a nagge vnarmed, hauing bene hurt before in the thigh was shot in the head from a lope in the Castle, whereof hee instantly died: yet before night the Ciuada was taken, and therein the Generals lodged that night, and they were masters of the whole towne (the castle and the fort S. Philip excepted) both which also in the morning were rendred the one to the earle of Essex, and the other to the lord Admirall, and their red ensignes displayed vpon the tops and wals of them. And the next night the earle lodged in the frierie of S. Francis: and the lord admirall in the house of Don N. Ruygoes whose sonne was capitaine of S. Philips fort, where he had 12. or four hundred pikes and shot, and eight faire brasse pieces of Ordnance, & wine and bread good plentie, as I my selfe sawe being at the taking in of this fort by the commandement of the Lord Admirall.

The conditions whereupon the Corregidor and the rest of the chiefe of the towne yielded were these: they should haue their liues saued, and onely their wearing clothes permitted them: all the rest of their goods and wealth should be spoyle and pillage to the souldiers, and should pay besides to the Generals for their ransom five score thousand ducates: and for the payment hereof, the Generals tooke forty of the chiefeest Regidores, Caualleroes, Cleargie men and merchants for Rehenes or Pledges, and brought them into England, and here kept them till the money was payde. And now proclamation was made that no English man should offer violence to any religious person, to any woman, or childe, or any other of the Spanish nation in Cadiz: and the Generals sent away boates, barges, and pinnaces, first with the Ladies and the religious, and then the men & all other of the inhabitants of Cadiz to Porto Santa Maria, excepting the Rehenes, and the prisoners of some English Captaines. The women were suffered by the Generals to weare so much apparell as they were able to beare upon them, and all their iewels: and because none of them should be spoiled by our ruder soldiers and mariners, the lord Generals themselves stood at the water gates and saw their safe imbarcking. The lord Admirall also let go the rich Bishop of Cusco, who was his prisoner without any rancome, onely he promised to send him a horse which he hath not yet performed. In this interim also the L. admirall appointed the rereadmirall to take some of the lesser of the Quéenes ships and merchants ships (that drew but little water for their more safetie) to go after the Spanish shippes which were fled to Porto Reale, and there either to take them, or to sinke or to fice them, if they would not yield. But while this was determined, offer was made of two millions to the earle of Essex for the saving & ransoming of those ships and their lading. The L. admirall would by no meanes agree that the ships should bee left to the Spaniards, nor ransomed: but onely the merchandice. But the Duke of Medina Sidonia Admirall of Spaine decided this controuersie: for he being then at Porto Santa Maria, and alwaies ill affected to them of Cadiz, gaue order that the next morning before daie the whole flete at Porto Reale should be fiered, which was put in execution: yet neuer the lesse our men made such haste thither that they recovered much merchandise and bluer's pieces of ordinance & other things, but none of the ships could be saued.

Thus this whole flete which was valued by some of the best of the Spaniards at tenne or twelue millions of ducates, was all either taken, sunke, or burned in a short space. In the towne of Cadiz were 1500. pipes of wine, 2000. chests of sugar, great store of rice, much coine and plate and rich furniture in their houses: The L. had also much rich merchandice in his Duainas or Warehouses, and a great deale of treasure in the castle, all which shoulde haue bene preserved (and all that soeuer else was the kings peculiar goods) for her maiesty by her right, if some had, or could haue performed the trust committed to them. But the losses which pinched the king most (his ships excepted) were the 1200. pieces of ordinance which were taken or sunke in his ships and his fortres, and armoz in his armorie to arme five or six thousand men. All which riches, treasure, munition, merchandice, viaduall, &c. of the kings and of his subjects there aboard the ships and in the towne, I heard valued by Pedro de Castilla the kings Indge of the contratation, and Don Juan de Soto a principall sea man, and Signior Fantonio the rich Florentine, three graue and well experienced men) to bee worth twenty millions of ducates at the least.

These things being thus happily atchieued, and sir John Winkfield vertehonorably buried in Santa Cruz the chiefe church of Cadiz, with all the funeral solemnities of warre, the drums and trumpets sounding dolefully, the shot bearing the noses of their pieces downward, the pikes traped, his body was borne by sir knights, the Generals threw their hand kerchiefs wet from their eyes into the graue, and at the instant the most part of all the shot great and small aboard and ashore were discharged.

The 27. day of June being Sunday, the LL. Generals with all the Chiefe and gentlemen of the army heard a sermon at S. Francisco; where after dinner they made a great many knights, even all almost that did deserue it, or affect it, or not neglect and refuse it (as some did;) this great Indulgence of fortune, and exceeding accesse of honoz to them in this atchieuement, made them not onely bountifull, but prodigall of honoz. But two berie woozthe Capitaines (which were hurt in the fights at the entring into the towne) were knighted before the towne was all won: Sir Samuel Bagnol, and Sir Arthur Savage. There was great dispute about the keeping of Cadix, and the opinions of all the able soldiers and seamen asked: but because it appeared not better it might certainly at all needes be relieved with men, munition, and victuals, and for other causes best knownen to the Generals, it toke no effect.

The next day being munday, the L. Admirall went aboard, to set things in order in the flæte, and to make readie for a new enterprise: and by his example also to drawe the sea men and mariners to their shippes that were loth to come out of the towne.

About this time the L. Admirall receued (from his olde acquaintance, since 1588.) the duke of Medina Sidonia Admirall of Spaine, two very honorable answeres to two letters which hee had before writtten to him about the exchange of prisoners, Spanish for English in the Gallies: the Dukes answer was that he liked well of the motion, and would do in it so much as lay in him. But (he saide) that that charge was more particularly in the Adelantado of the Gallies, to whom he would write, which he performed so effectually, that within a day or two the Adelantado sent a principall Captaine to the L. Admirall, and he made a full agreement for the exchange of English prisoners in the Gallies for Spanish prisoners in our Hopes: and upon the fift of July following, about 40. of our English prisoners were deliuered aboard the Arke by the Gally called La fama, and promise for the rest which was afterward duly accomplished. This gally La fama wherof Don Iulian Hurtado was Captaine, came from Rota to the English flæte with a white flagge of safe conduct, according to the order of warre, but an ignorant sea Captaine made a shot at her as she passed by him, and hurt and killed thre men in her, whereat the lord admirall was much grieved, and greatly offended with the Captaine, and threatened to haue hanged him: but the Captaine of the Gally and Don Payo Patin one of the Rebenes, made earnest suite to the L. Admirall for his pardon, which they obtained.

The Duke of Medina Sidonia's letters to the L. Admirall.

The Earle of Essex staide all this while in the towne with the rest of the commanders & captaines and companies of the army by land, which he suffered not to be idle. Upon the 28. day the ordinance was taken from the walls, Castles and fortes. Upon the 30. day of June in the night hee made a rode into the Ile, and burned and rased and spoyled, all that mought serue the enemy to any strength or reliefe. The next day he set pioneers a worke to rase and besage the forts and castle in the towne. The first of July, the Calver of the Cusabua was battered downe. And lastly, upon the fourth of July set the whole towne on fire (the Churches excepted) and saw all his men embarked, & came aboard last. And the next day the whole flæte set saile, & steered their course to the westward: and in the mean time besides the negotiation (which I speake of before with the gallies) the 6. of July the Generals sent a Pinnace into Barbary with 40. slaves which had escaped out of the gallies & came to them for succour. And about this time sir Anthony Ashley was sent into Englands to make report to her maiestie what had passed hitherto, and for other secret affaires of the lords Generals.

From this time till we came to Faro, there was nothing done, but often meetings for consultation about their next enterprise, & how to get viuals & fresh water: saying that the Gallies in a calme caught by a flieboat of ours bound for Engl. In this course we passed first by Rota, and by the point of Chiptona

Chylona néere unto which lie the Rocks called the Salmedinas, and by the Duke of Medinas Tower, or Almadana for Tunny fishing: and by Arenas Cordas in the mouth of the Bay of S. Lucar, and by Aymont in Portugall, and then we doubled the cape S. Mary, and so came before Faro a principal towne of Algarua, where they resolved to land.

But first the Generals sent both their Lieutenants of their ships, sir Amias Preston, and sir Will. Mounson, and Captaine William Morgan, to discover the passage to the towne by the channel in their Pinnaces in the evening, and to view the place, to espie the forces, and to learne what flagge that was, which they saw at their comming before the towne, and to seeke for fresh water and victuals, and such like instructions. They brought answer the next morning, that the people were fled and had carried away their goods, and that they could not as yet finde any fresh water nor victuals: but yet for all this in the afternone the lords Generals landed with all their forces: but the L. Admirall being not well, and having little hope of any reliefe there for their wants, returned aboard his shippe taking sir Edward Winkfield with him, who was lame of a hurt which he had receiued at Cadiz in one of his legges, and indeede it was the earle of Essex his earnest desire that the L. admirall (seeing him so ill) should returne to his ship and take that valiant knight with him.

The Obedience
of the Gallies.

Whilest the lord Admirall lay here at anchor, the flate of the Gallies came, and anchored close by the English flate: but the L. admirall sent a ship presently to them to command them in his name to depart from thence and goe further off: which commandement they obeyed as readily, as if the Admirall of Spaine had sent it, and I rather note this because I thinke it was the first commandement that they euer obeyed, being giuen them by an enemy upon their owne coasts.

The earle of Essex being landed (as I said before) and being desirous to doe some exploit vpon the Terra Firma of Spaine, being also prouoked hereunto the rather by the enemy (who made braue shewes of horse and foote vpon the coast all alongst as we sayled by) he marched with his army that night to Faro (being about some two leagues from the place where we landed) hee took the towne with ease, for the inhabitants had abandoned it and carried away most of their goods (as he was enformed before) there was in the Munnerie some stiffe left, and in the Bishops palace, and a Library of booke valued at 1000. markes: there was also in the towne some fruites, and wines, and a few hennes: and in the fort there was some pieces of great Ordnance, whereof one was the fairest and longest Culuerin which the king of Spaine had, as it was esteemed. And here the earle appointed Captaine Brea a valiant gentleman, and of very able body, to march into the Countrey with 800. souldiers of the strongest, chosen out of diuers bands: he marched some two or thre leagues and found a towne called Lothera which he took and bent, without any resistance, but he saw a farre off troupses of horse and foote, (but none) approached him: but if any of his souldiers stragled, or were left sick vpon the way (as many were) hee found them at his returne pittifully mangled, some with their hands chopt off, some had their nostrils slit, and others killed.

In this Iourney he got aboue a hundred Colwes and Dren, and some Swine, for victuall, and was brought by an old Portugall to a well of good fresh water, but small store: and so returned to Faro to the lord Generall, who after he had sacked and fiered the towne, the third day returned to the fleet.

And now being all aboord againe, the Generals with their counsell helde a new consultation what was else to be done, and how victuals and fresh water might be supplied: some had great desire to go for Lagos: but ere any thing was resolved, the fleet was past the cape S. Vincent where a strong Northerly winde took vs and forced vs to hale off into the sea some 80. leagues from the Cape, and towards the Isles of Azores: and here they called a counsell againe, and resolved to go for those Islands, there assuring themselves to haue plenty of fresh water and victuals, and there to lie for the Caraks and West Indian fleet, and to encounter with the 25. Spaniards men of warre, which lay at the Isles (as the Generals were aduertised.) But neither did this purpose hold, for the windes coming contrarie, they held a new consultation, and that was to beare in with the coast of Spaine and Portugal, and to search what shipping was in the harbours thereof as they passed. And this course was thought the best, and kept for the most part untill we came before the Groyne & Ferola. From thence master George Buck was dispatched by the lords Generals to her maiesty, to make relation of that which had passed in the army since the fleets departure from the Bay of Cadiz: and other particular busines of their Lordships for her maiesties seruice.

The LL. Generals thus being come before the Groyne the first of August, and finding no shipping there nor in Ferola, now lastly resolved to come for England, and the rather by reason of the generall wants of victuals and fresh water, and for that there were many sick men in the Masspite and in diuers other ships of the fleet, and for a great leake that was sprung in the Mount-guard, and for that (which moued their Lordships most of all) her maiesties commandement that they should stay forth but five months in this voyage. All which reasons duly considered, the lords generals now shaped their course directly for England, and vpon the 7. and 8. daies of August they arrived with their whole fleet in Plimouth safely thanks be giuen to Almighty God, who hath so blessed her maiesty and her ministers in all her designs and enterprises, with so much honor and good successe, as he hath made her the mirror of all princely felicitie in this world. Thus far of the expedition to Cadiz.

Duke of Boloine came into England.

The twentie nine of August, the Duke of Boloine being arrived in England, came to the Court then at Greenwich, and there by her Maiesties othe confirmed the league of amity and peace betwixt the two Realmes of England and France: and shortly after soldiers were sent ouer to aide the French, in their wars against the Spaniards.

The Earle of Shrewsburies ambassage into France.

Presently vpon the departure of the Duke of Bullion, the right honorable Gilbert Earle of Shrewsbury was sent into France to take the oth of Henry the fourth French king, for the confirmation of the saide League, as also to inuest the said king with the order of the Cartar: the manner whereof being carefullie obserued by M. William Segar then Somerset Herald, I haue set downe according vnto his owne description as followeth.

He departed from Douer on Thursday the 16. day of September 1596. and arrived at Dêpe in France the Thursday seauen night following, where both the Ambassadors, the right Honorable the Earle of Shrewsbury, and sir Anthony Myldmay Knight, were very nobly entertained, and feasted, the first night by the Commander of Dêpe, Mounſieur de Chaste, who was inuested the next day to dinner and requested by the Earle, and so during the vnhipping of their horse, and other their prouisions, their Lordships passed the time in hunting for two or three daies.

Monday the 27. following, the Earle set forward to Roane, the capitall Towne of Normandie, and was mette on the way by Mounſieur Feruagues, and his traine, who conducted his L. that night to the Castle of Clere, where he lodged.

Tuesday his L. proceeding on was encountered within two miles of the Citie of Roane, by the Duke Mountpencier, the kings Lieutenant thereof, and about 200. horse, of nobles and gentlemen his attendants, who bringing his Lordshippe to his lodging, after some ceremonies of honorable entertainment, toke his leaue: his Lordships lodging was in the market place, called Le March Veux, in a very faire house, furnished with rich hangings and tapits, three clothes of estate, and two standing beds.

The Wednesday seuenight following, being the fift of October, the king made his rottall entrie into Roane, in which entring sundrie messages passed betwene the King and the Ambassadors, praying them not to thinke the time long of his comming, for that he was to attende a preparation which the townes men had purposed for his welcome, having neuer bin in the citie before: the maner whereof, for it was verie princelie, and full of rare deuises, I haue thought good to insert.

In the suburbs of the towne on the farther side of the river, was newlie erected for the king a most statelie roome, made of plaister of Paris, where his highnes stode with his Nobilitie to beholde the companies, and severall Classes both of horse and foote, and to receiue the townes mens submissions as they passed, which was most humbly perfoymed by fire of everie company,

and

and of his Maiestie most grationlie accepted.

First the Order of the Friers Capuchins followed their Crosse, being of wood, vpon which a Crowne of Thornes and three great nayles were fixed, their habit was Russet, all bepatched, girt with hempen cordes, shirted with haire-cloth, and bare footed, wearing sandals onely. This order may haue but one habit for a man during his life, they seede standing, and sleepe sitting, they liue by almes, and are much esteemed of the people.

Secondly, the Gray Friers being Cordelers followed their Crosse of silver. This order haue a Librarie in their house, containing fire and fiftie paces in length, with three rowes of desks all along, replenished with manie excellent booke both of Philosophie, and the Fathers, the most parte Manuscript.

Large Librarie of booke in Roane.

Thirdly followed the Carmelites, and Celestins. Fourthly, the Jacobins. Fifthly, the Augustins. Then proceeded the Priests, and Chantries of the towne in their Surplices, singing, bearing 42. Crosses of silver, which was the last number of the parishes, and chappels in the towne, and euery crosse had a great banner of a Saint, richly painted thereon, besides two tapers of white ware in aulter candlesticks, borne by youths, and euery taper armed with an Escutcheon of the kings armes.

Then followed the Spint-masters of Poimandie, the merchants of the Viscounty of the Riuer, Receiueurs, Customers, Treasurers, Advocates, Procurators, and other officers of the palace.

Then came Batchelers, and Passers of Arte, Doctors of Physicke, Ciuill lawes, and Diuinitie. All these degrees were clothed in very faire and reuerent garments, of damaske, satten, and blacke beluet, long and large, and for the most part riding vpon mules, distinguished by virgers that made way before them.

Then followed in Gownes of purple cloth, and hoods of the same, with square cappes on their heads, the Officers and Councillers of the Chamber of Poimandie, in which is kept their high court of Chancerie, and Parliament.

Then came riding on mules to the number of forty in Scarlet, called De la robe rouge, being Judges, and Officers of estate, belonging to the saide Chamber.

After them toke place, the foure Presidents of Poimandie in Robes of scarlet, furred with Calaber, wearing on their heads great caps of maintenance of blacke beluet.

Then proceeded the fenerall bandes of the Towne, containing foure regiments of foote, and three coronets of horse, suted in greene, russet, and carnation satten, and beluet, garnished with silver lace, their hats, plumes, scarfes, and shoes white: the furniture of their muskets, fether stauces, and partisans, suitable to their colours, their ensignes, cornets, and standards all white, embelasoned with the kings armes, and enriched with his deuisse, which was a Roman H Crowned, betwene two branches (as I take it) the one an Olive, the other a Laurell, his motto, or word, Hic dedit, Hic dabit vltra.

After

After vpon great Confers rode for tie enfant d' Honeur oꝝ Henchmen, the properest and choicest young men of the towne, sued in greene Weluet horsemens coates, richlie laced with Siluer, their Caparisons and trappings answerable, their plumes, scarfs, and bootes white.

Then came all the Gallantes and young Gentlemen of the French court (coquetting and fetching vp their great horse) accompanied with diuers of the Nobilitie, as Barons, Vicountes, and Earles, the Knightes of the Saint Esprite were knowne by their blew Ribandes, and white Crosses hanging thereat.

The Chauncelloꝝ Mounseieur Cheuernay rode alone after his mace.

The Archbishop of Rheims, did ride betwene the Bishops of Anisw and Curenay.

Then marched the Kinges thre guardes after their Drummes and Fifes. The Swislers with shotte and pikes, the Scots and French with Halberds, the Kings Trumpets in horsemens coates of greene Weluet, and verie well mounted, then tooke they place, and sounded oftentimes, as they passed. Mounseieur Suraine P. of the ceremonies, and one of the Captaines of the garde rode together, after whome followed thre Heraultes, Anisw, Picardie, and Byptaine, inuessed in rich coates of Purple Weluet, embroidered with the Armes of France, each bearing his name in capitall letters of gold vpon the left manch.

Then followed two Sergeants of Armes, carrying maces before the person of the King, who that daie was mounted on a white Courser, his owne apparell plumes, and horses furniture white, wearing the order of the Saint Esprite at a boade blew Ribande about his necke. About his person were his Garde of Scottes, and certaine footemen in white. And after him followed the Duke de Neuers, Duke de Namours, Duke Joyeuse, and others.

Leaue wee the King going to the Citty, and let vs by the waie of preparation know how the same was ordered for his entertainment.

Some five oꝝ six daies before the King made his entrie, the Bailiffes of Roane commanded by sounde of Trumpet that all the streets through which his maiestie shoulde passe, shoulde be clenfed, sanded, and their signes taken downe, hanging forth their fairest coveringes, and Tapits at their Windows, and to crie Viue le Roy as hee passed. All which beeing in a readines, the Windows full of people of all degrees, the streets garded with certaine ensignes of muskets, and infinite numbers of common people in euer y quarter.

His Maiestie by this time was come to an bitter gate betweene the bridge and the Suburbs, which in the late warre had bene more than halfe ruind. This gate in two oꝝ thre daies with plaister of Paris they had halfe repaired, and the other halfe remained in ruin for explication of a deuise, which was thus. On the toppe of the Gate were certaine personages made of Plaister, some carrying of stones, some mortar, some heauing, some leveling, and al so liuelie, that they seemed to want nothing, but verie motion. Vpon the arche of the the part repaired safe Apollo, with his lyze, vnder whome in goulden letters, was wrytten this prophesie.

Henrico totum reparabitur aspiciere regnum.

And ouer the Portall,

Gallicarum urbium restitutorem,

The king being past this gate, hee came to the first Gate of the Bridge, which was made of twelue columns about foureteene foote of height, the base bodie, Capitall, fræze, and Cornish, after the order Ionica. Ouer the Arche thereof in a table of embossed work safe a personage representing Porman-die, resting her backe against two Leopardes (the Armes of the Dutchie) in her left hande, she helde a Hart, her right hande she put forth to a figure, resembling the king, who seemed to raise her vp, vnder her was wrytten, Da miseræ dextram, and ouer her certaine drops distilling from the Heauens.
Then in golden letters vnder the kings armes (which was embased with lola palmes) were these verses in French thus englished.

O doubled branches, for Conquerors ordaind,
If Henries name, for Crownes hath you not gaind,
Bowing downe your toppes, for to be wretched
You cannot giue him your honors triumphant,
No more then this streame, can yeeld water currant,
Vnlesse from higher spring it be receiued.

The king hauing viewed the deuice, and read the verses, passing further vnder the rose or bault of the gate, ouer his head certaine cloudes opened, and there descended vpon him the similitude of the holie ghost, and an angell presented vnto him a sword, called the sword of peace, before the opening of which cloud, a voice was heard, as from God saying:

Heauenly mouing spirits, stable intelligences,
Cleauue through, make way for this sprites descent,
Presenting from one heauen, of thousand influences
To one speciall monarke, one speciall present.

Henries mine annointed, he feares me, I him loue, Yeeld him due honor, the honor shall be mine:
All kings are Gods, and as my selfe aboue,
Dispose both good and bad, on earthly line.

The Angell descending saith:

Stay mighty monarke stay, the heauenly monarke sends
To thee this sword of peace, with good and happy day:
Take it, but in thy blisse, a modest heart intends,
Himselfe who raiseth, fals; and Gods loue loseth aye.

He hath giuen thee the sword in fields victorious,
And that which to no other could be giuen so:
One more of peace did rest for thy hand glorious,
Receiue it from aboue, for to command below.

Threefold great by these, thou maist thrice happy make,
 France vnder thee to yeeld, thy scepter greatnes brings;
 Pursue this good (therefore) the price for gracious take,
 The which about thy browes, makes thousand laurels spring.

The Angell ascending saith:

Reioice yee heauens, since peace which yor hath lesie
 Returned is on earth, to dwell with Henry,
 Who for his neighbours good, of ioy berefte
 Merits for his, that men one day be sory.

Earth do as much, tapet thy selfe with flowres
 And sundry fruites, that henceforth may encrease,
 All things without mans Art, or handy laboures:
 For golden age is where there raigneth peace.

Then liue thrice happy, and content this prince,
 Who chiefe of world, and peace, is made this day,
 Of all the world heele make but one prouince,
 If there be kings, these kings shall him obey.

After these wordes deliuered by the angell, the king proceeded ouer the bzidge of Roane, which was garded by sixe or sixe hundred swissers, al in bright armour, and Spanissh pikes, untill hee came to the other gate of the bzidge, which entered into the towne, the building of which gate was after the order rustique, rising thre degrees, hauing vpon the one corner of the first degree, a bound with a Cupid riding on his backe, vnder which was written, Dux A- mor est fidei. And on the other corner, an Ore, with another Cupid, subseri-bed, Vires franantur Amore. Vpon the corners of the second degree, stood foure Tritons, or mare men with trydents in their hands, and aboue them vpon the third degree, was erected a personage representing Roane, with a lambe standing, and laying one foote vpon the knee of the figure, ouer which was written, Nowe, it is to be vnderstood, the lambe is the armes of the Citie, which in an Epigram made vnto the king was thus described.

O King your lambe before our wretched broile,
 Was wont to beare vpon her humble backe
 The golden fleece, like that of Colchos Ile,
 But certaine newcome Argonauts (alacke)
 Haue her oft times so barely cut and shorne,
 That on her body poore, and all forlorne,
 You scarce with paine, can find at all to pull
 One simple fleece, or litle locke of wooll.

The King passing through this gate, the towne had prepared for him a Ca-napie of purple beluet, richly embrodered with his armes, and device, and flower delices strewed all ouer, which canapie was carried ouer him by fire benchemen

henchemen apparelled in one sute. From thence he went by the stræte called La Rue du Pont, where was set vp a verie stately Pyramid, about 100. fote of height, on which was set forth in painting of Copper colours the labours of Hercules, on the toppe thereof was a great Sunne of golde, bearing the King crowned H vpon the pointes of his brames: the Spire of this Pyramid was carried from the Base, or Pedestall by foure Sphinxes gullt, and on the one side of the said Base, was wrytten Hercules Gallicus, and on the other side in letters of golde vpon sable, french verses thus Englished.

Hercules, and Henry, are semblable
In vertues, wordes, and Actes,
But that Hercules is in the fable,
And Henry in the Factes.

Here the King turned downe the stræte called Ozou, where were set vpp two statues of plaister, vpon Antique Bases, both vndernamed in Graeke characters. The first called stable viatoie, helde in her one hand a Palme, and in the other an imperiall Crowne, and Scepter, treading vpon armour, and other martiall engines. The other figure was quicke sighted Iustice, holding a sword and ballance, and treading vnder her fete a number of visors, or maskes, signifying falsehoods, betwene them both was wrytten in golden letters vpon Azur, certaine french verses to this effect.

Kings which for honour, beare name of August (Or happy Cæsars) preferred by History, Acknowledge Henry more valiant and iust,
Would beare no other but the name of Henry.

So the Kings Maestie riding through the stræte named Le Rue de la Viscount, at the stræts end opposite his coming forth into the high stræte, there was raised a doctike pillar about 20 fote of height, on the toppe whereof stood Fame, treading downe death, holding a crowned H in one hand, and a trumpet with a banneroll of France in the other, which when the kings trumpets in passing by sounded, Fame raised her trumpet to her mouth, and seemed to sound also, turning her selfe rounde about, which motion was most cunningly wrought by an engine belowe within the Base. And vpon the out side of the Base, leaning against the pedestall, sate Pallas, and Peace; treading vpon Enuie, who was set forth like a fute, with haire of Snakes, and a murdering knife in her hand:ouer these figures sate Historie wryting, and looking vp to Fame, vnder whom were wrytten the se Latin verses.

*Delicium historia, & fama sed vera canentis,
Henricum reges exemplar habete futuri;
Ut fuisse populos, & bello, & pace regatis.*

Of future kings example take by Henry,
Histories delight, and Fames most true report,

That you may rule, and gouerne prosperously,
Your people both in warre and peacefull sort.

Under these verses was painted a Lyon breathing forth Bees, but without either motto, or allusion.

The King passing on through the Diall gate, there was an Arboꝝ resembling Apollos temple curiously wrought of herbage, and fashioned like wreathed pillars; adioyning to which was a little wood, where on a wall was painted in prospect diuers Metamorphoses, as Daphne pursued by Apollo and turned to a Laurell: Pan embracing Siringa, as she became Pipes: Europa & Iupiter, & such like. In which Arboꝝ was excellent musique heard, both for voice, and instruments. All which being a while listened vnto by his maiestie, he proceeded to the strates end, turning to our Ladie church (called Possardame) where was erected a most magnificent Arch triumphall of plaister, after the order Corinthique, on the toppe whereof vpon a great Globe of the worlde, stood the figure of the King in his Royall Robes, supported by two personages, the one Prudentia who crowned him with a crowne of Starres, the other Fortitude, who offered him a scepter wreathed about with Laurell: before him sat Occasion, behinde him Clemencie; and round about him late armours, ensignes, drummes, trumpets, and other martiall instruments; at either corner sat a huge Lyon of golde supporting the armes of France and Nauarre, and on the one side of the gate stood Enuie, bound in chaines feeding of her own hart, and on the other side a man of armes sitting a sleape on a drummes head, by whom was written Securitie.ouer the Portall gate, under the Globe were written Latin verses thus translated.

To some for feare, to some for Clemencie,
Are prizes giuen; but fourth King Henrie
Excelling other kings in both, and both conioynde
In him by wisdome, hath also adioynde,
Vnto these three, a fourth (occasion)
Which if it stand, with lawes probation,
Hath sworne her selfe to be companion,
Yoking worldes to France by king Borbonion.

Opposite to this Arch triumphall, vpon two Rustique pillars (distinguished about 20. fote asunder) stood two figures of plaister, the one of Saint Lewis in his kinglie Robes, holding a Scepter in one hand, and a verge in another; on the top whereof was a hand pointing to the king which stood on the Globe, with this verse underwritten. Macte tua uirtute mea maxima sumps. The personage on the other pillar, was Sambetha, one of the Sibils, who likewise pointed to the kings proposition, and presented to the beholders a table with this prophecie in Latin, Englished thus.

Sambetha I of Sibils chiefe, an Hebrew by ofspring, Glad Oracles bring to the French, and vnto thee O King,

The earth did neuer boast her selfe of any childe so much,
As France (O Henry) shall reioice that thou their king art such.
Peace being to the people brought a thousand armies strong,
Dreadlesse shall march and follow farre thy battailes all along,
Where Tagus, and Durias swell, with goodly golden sand,
And where Idume for thy selfe holdes woorthy palmes in hand.
Thou being Captaine, souldiers shall returne with laden spoiles
Of Easterne and the Westerne wealths, and shall bring to their foiles, Triumphant signes, and trophies backe; O King their countrey wone, Fame shall eternall crownes thee giue, for that which thou hast done.
Live thou therefore now all our yeeres, and Nestors longest date,
Worlds loue, to people giuing lawes, made quiet by thy state.

The king going through this Arch Triumphall, he presently entred the cathedral church of Postredame, with all the ecclesiasticall pompe that might be, from whence, after certaine ceremonies which entertained him for a time, he returned more privately in his coach to his Court, being some times a Cardinals house, adioyning to Saint Owins Church, and thus the kings entrie ended with the day, being performed with great honoz, charge, and applaudments of all sorts of people.

Thursday the 7. of October, the right honorable LL. Embassadors had audience of the king, who most princely received, embraced, and welcommed them both, as also all other the Lordes, knightes, and Gentlemen their attendants.

Satterday the 9. of October the fidelitie or othe of confederation betwene the king and the Quenes maiestie of England was verie solemnly taken in the church of S. Owen, in the presence of the French nobility, lords spirituall, and temporall, who that day toke the right hand of the quire.

Act of fidelitie taken by the French king.

Sunday being the morrowe after, the order of the Garter was most royally performed in the saide Church, where both the Princes had their estates, and armes created. The Quenes Maiestie being Soueraigne of the order had that day the right hand of the quire, and so had the right honorable Earle, her maiesties Embassador his armes, style, and stall accordingly. Before her maiesties estate sate Master William Dethicke, Garter principall king of armes in his Robe of the Order. Before the Earle stood William Segar Somerset Berault. Next unto the Earle sate the lord Embassador Lieger. Then the lord Cromwell, the lord Rich, and all other knightes, and gentlemen, according to their qualitie. On the left hand sate the king, betwene the two Bishops of Antioiw, and Cureur. Before the kings estate sate his Chancelor Mounfier Cheuerny alone. And before him stood Anioiw, Picardy, and Britaine, heraulds of armes. In the stals sate the knightes of the Saint Esprit, who (as farre as I doe remembre) were these, Duke Montpensire, Duke de Neuers, Duke de Namours, the Prince de Vandemont, Duke Montmerancie Constable, and his brother the Admirall, Duke Loyeuse, Duke de Bullion, the Marshall de Rotz, and the Marshall Maignon.

The French
king inured:
with the order of the Garter.

All things being accomplished with much honor, the kings maiestie trusted and sworn, the vespers ended, and the benediction given by a bishop in his Pontificalibus, the king taking the Earle by the hand, returned as they came, attended upon by the nobility, who two, and two proceeded before the m. That night the king and the Earle supped together under one estate in the house of Duke Monpenier; there also was a generall feast for all the English.

Thursday being the 14. of October the king took the Earle into his coach, and went to the bridge of Roan, to see a sea fight upon the River, which was performed by two French shippes, against two supposed Spanish, and one Basiliian (large boates armed and prepared for that purpose, with muskets, pikes and Hargubuse a Crocke) where after one houres fight, the Basiliian was sunke, and the Spaniards forced to flee, by the French. This pastime was done by the townesmen, for the kings more delight.

On Fridaie the right honorable Earle with his attendants took leaue of the kings maiestie, and kissing his hand departed with great loue, honor, and reputation.

Saterday the sixteenth of October his lordshippe set forth of Roan, and came that night to Dépe, being accompanied with the commander thereof, Monsieur de Chaste, where he remained for conuenient passage, tenne daies after.

The 26. of October, the Quenes maiesties Shippes being come, his lordship embarked himselfe in the Admirall, and arrived at the Downes nere Dover the day next following.

This yere, like as in the moneth of August, so in September, October,
and

and Nouember, fell great raines, whereupon high waters ouerflowing the low grounds; wheate and other graines grew to great price, so that wheate meale was solde at London for ten shillings the bushell, Rie at five shillings, Ote meale at eight shillings the bushell, &c.

Great land waters.

The 17. of Nouember, a day of great triumph for the long, prosperous, and triumphant raigne of her Maiesie, at the Court, the Earle of Cumberland Champion for the Quene, the Earles of Essex, Bedford, South-hampton, and Sussex, with other, ran at the tilt most brauely.

Tempest in the City of Willes

Sunday the fift of December, great numbers of people being assembled in the Cathedrall church of Wells, in Somersetshire, in the sermon time before none, a sodaine darknesse fell among them, a storme and tempest following, with lightning and thunder, such as ouerthrew to the ground them that were in the body of the church, all which church seemed to be on a light fire, a lothsome stench following, some stones were stricken out of the bell tower, the wheels and pions of the horologe were molten, and no timber bent; which tempest being ceased, and the people come to themselves, some of them were found to be marked with sundry figures in their bodies, and their garments not perished.

The moneths of December, January and Februarie continued colde and moiste, also March colde, but drie with extreme frosts, Aprill colde showres, Maie colde and drie, &c. by meane of which weathering, and provision for the ships at sea, all kinde of victuals kept at an high price, as well fish as flesh, white meate, and what soeuer.

In the moneth of May, souldiers were pressed in the citie of London, to the number of 550. with all their furniture and charges of the Cittizens: these were for a long time daily trayned in the fields, out of which were picked 400. and the rest dismissed: These, and other the like picked men out of diuers shires, about the number of five thousand, most brauely furnished of all things necessary, (and some superfluitie, for no cost was spared of the voluntaries) were sent to Seas, and set from the west coastes of England, about the tenth of Iuly.

Souldiers trained.

This sommer arriued here an Orator from the King of Polonia, and had audience at the court then at Greenewich on the 25. of Iuly, whose Oration in Latin, beginning, Serenissima princeps, domina Clementissima, &c. was presently, most learnedly and eloquently answered by her maiesie, also in Latin; the effect whereof in English folloiweth.

Answer of her Maiesie to the Orator of the King of Poland.

Oh, how was I deceiued: I looked for an embassage, but thou hast brought a complaint vnto me. I vnderstood by thy letters, that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee a Herault, neuer in my life heard I such an Oration. I marvell truly, I marvell at so great, and such vnaccustomed boldnes in a publike assembly. Neither do I thinke, if the king were present, that he would say so much, but if peraduenture hee hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I much doubt) this is the cause: That where the King is young, and not by blood, but by election, and newly elected, both not so perfectly vnderstand the cause of handling these businesses with other Princes, which either his auncestors haue obserued with vs, or perhaps others will obserue, that afterward shall succede in his place. For thy part: Thou seemest to me, to haue read many booke, but not to haue come vnto the booke of Princes, but altogether to be ignorant what is conuenient amongst kings. For thou that makest often mention of the lawe of nature, and nations, know that this is the lawe of nature and nations, that when warre doth happen amongst princes, it is lawfull for the one of them to intercept the warlike helpes of the others, brought from any place, and to be ware lest they fall to the losse. This I say is the lawe of nature and nations. Whereas thou doest rehearse a newe affinitie with the house of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, forget not that there haue bene of the same house, that would haue bereft the kingdome of Polonia from thy king. But for the rest, which be not to be spoken of at this place, and time, because they are many, and to bee considered of, one after an other: Thou shalt expect that, which thou shalt vnderstand of some of my Councell, to whom I will assigne this matter. In the meane time farewell and be quiet.

In this moneth of August, the price of wheate in the markets at London, fell from thirteene shillings the bushell to ten shillings, & six pence, & from nine shillings to six shillings, and so to three shillings two pence, but then arose againe, to the late olde, and greatest price.

Embassado:
from Den-
marke.

This yeere also, Arnald Whitfield Chancelor of the Resolue in Denmarke Embassadour, and Christian Barnice his assistant, from the king of Denmarke, arrived here, and were lodged in Fenchurch streete: these had audience at the court then at Tibals in Essex, on the seventh of September, they made certain requests, which her Maiestie presently answered without pause, to every point of their embassage.

Embassado:

The first, he required that where as there had remained a long league of amitie betwene the two Crownes of England, and Denmarke, both in the life of the late deceased king and his predecessors, that it might please her maiestie to confirme and continue the same to the king his master, now newly adopted and crowned.

Her Maiestie.

Her Maiestie granted thereunto, on condition the king his master would proue no worse then his progenitors had done, and in all Christian loue accepted thereof.

Embassado:

His request was, that whereas there was great and continuall warres betwene her maiestie, and the king of Spaine, whereby much christian blood was shed, to the king his master, and all other christian kings great griefe, and to the great damage, and danger of Christendome, that it would please her maiestie, if in her wisdom she did see it conuenient to giue her consent, that the king his master might make a motion of peace, and if he found both parties thereto addicted, to procede further for the effecting thereof.

Her Maiestie.

Her Maiestie replying, said, she thought the king his master was too young to knowe the cause of the breach of the league betwene her maiestie and Spaine, and as it was not broken by her Royall consent, nor by anie of hers, so it should not bee sued, nor sought for by her maiestie, nor anie in her behalfe, behalfe, for said she: Know now, and be it knowne to the king your master, and all princes christened, or heathen, that the Quene of England hath no make to craue peace, for I assure you (saide she) that I neuer endured one houre of feare, since my first comming to my kingdome, and subiects.

He was to desire, if it might stand to her maiesties god liking, open traf. Embassadoy.
like with Spaine, and that the gods might not be staide on the narrow seas, as it hath heretofore bene.

Her Maiestie saide, if any his masters, or subiects gods so staied, it was her Maiestie. to her unknowne, but if he had any such just complaint, he should, the matter being made to her counsell knowne, haue such redresse, as should well content his master, and subiects.

He was to returne the Carter that her maiestie had bestowed vpon the Embassadoy.
king lately deceased, as the manner of all foraine Princes is to doe.

Her Maiestie accepted thereof, but tolde him she was sozie to receiue it of her Maiestie him, for thereby she was put in minde of the losse of a most honorable brother and louing friend, and so that she were assured of his kings lone and friend. This in the like sort, she would hereafter to the king his master do the like fauour.

The Embassadour hauing his Audience the daie that her maiestie was Embassadoy.
borne, toke thereby occasion to saie, that sithen it had pleased God, on that daie (which hee was informed was her maiesties birth daie) to glorifie the world with so gracions a creature, who had brought so great happinesse to the Realme, and the neighbour kingdomes, hee doubted not but that the king his master should in that happie daie, haue an happie answer of his request, &c.

I blame you not to expect a reasonable answer, and a sufficient, but you Her Maiestie.
may thinke it a great miracle, that a childe borne at foure of the clocke this morning, should be able to answer so learned and wise a man as you are, sent from so great a Prince as you be, about so great & waighty affaires you speake of, and in an unknowne tong, by this of the clocke in the afternone.

And with him more prudent and gracions wordes she ended, and gaue him leaue to depart.

The 23. of October, the right honorable lord Charles Howard, lord high Carle of Nottingham created.
Admirall of England, was created Carle of Nottingham at Westminster.

The 24. of October began the Parliament at Westminster: on the which Parliament at Westminster.
daie diuers people were smothered, and crushed to death, passing betwixt White hall, and the Colledge church, to haue seene her maiestie, and nobilitie riding to the said parliament, sir Thomas Gerrard knight marshall, and his men, making way before them.

The 27. of October, her maiestie went by water to the parliament house and proroged the said parliament, till saturday the first of Nouember.

This yere against Christmasse, pepper was solde at London for eight shillings the pound, Reysons for six pence the pound, Gascoine wine, white and claret for two shillings eight pence the gallon. Ann. reg. 40. Pepper eight shillings the pound.

The 20. of December, being S. Thomas the parliament was put off till the 11. of January, on the which day they sate againe.

A great frost.

A great frost the ten first daies of January, so that the river of Thamis was at London very nere clozen and frozen ouer, but then it thawed.

Ambassadors into France.

Sir Robert Cecil principall secretary, M. Harbert master of the requests, sir George Carew lieutenant of the ordinance, & others prepared for their embassage into France, and set saile from Douer about the 19. of February.

Angare hanged for murdering of his father.

The 25. of January one named Ainger was hanged at Tyborne, for wilfully and secretly murdering of his owne father, a gentleman and counsellor of the law at Grales Inne, in his chamber there.

Parliament dissolved.

The ninth of February, the parliament hauing granted for defence of the realme three subsidies of 4. s. the pound lands, and 2. s. 8. d. the pound goods, and fire sixtienes; was dissolved and brake vp.

A cold spring after a cold winter.

In the month of March, the beginning thereof, three or foure daies together were hot, more then ordinary for that time of the yeare, but the residue of that month, and the next following very bitter cold, with great windes still west, with haile, snow, &c.

1598

Lightning and thunder
Twisford towne burned.

The 26. of March in the afternone great lightning, thunder and haile, and the weather still cold.

On the thirde of Aprill, the faire and rich towne of Twisford towne in Deuonshire was bzent by casualltie of fire, beginning in a poore cottage, a woman there frying pancakes with strawe (for lacke of other felwell) the same fired the house, and so the towne, about one of the clocke in the afternone: the rage of which fire, lasting one houre and a halfe, consumed 409. houses, burned downe: one hundred and fifty thousand pound consumed in money, plate, merchandise, household stoffe, and houses, fifty persons, men, women, and children consumed: an almes house preserued with poore men therein, in the midst of the flames: 2000. pound weekly was bestowed there in the market on mundaies, in Deuonshire houses: 9000. people maintained by the cloathing of that towne, in Denon, Cornwall, and Somerset shires. It was the Earle of Deuonshires chiefe seate, where yet standeth his Castle, or court place, (has much of this towne, was certified to her maiestie, and was thought of many to be a iust punishment of God vpon that towne for the vniuersallnes of the rich, and small regard of the poore, which were daily seene to perish in the streets of that towne, for lacke of reliefe.

Our ambassadors returned out of France.

The first of May, sir Robert Cecil secretary, M. Harbert squire master of Requests, sir George Carew lieutenant of the ordinance, and other the ambassadors, returned out of France, and came to the Court.

Caleis returned to the French.

About the latter end of May, or beginning of June, Caleis & other towne in France, lately holden by the Spanish nation, were vpon compositions of peace, rendred to the French king.

A challenger of all men at defence was hanged.

The 10. of Iuly, 19. for felonie were hanged at Tyborne, and one pressed to death at Newgate. Also Iohn Barrese a Burgonian, and Spencer, that had lately come ouer, and chalenged all professors of that arte, was hanged with-out Newgate, for killing an officer of the Citie that had arrested him for debt,

ted.

The 14. of Nouember, the queenes maiesty came to Westminster, and was there most royally receiued by the maior of London, aldermen and sheriffs in scarlet, and a great number of the wealthy Citizens in velvet coates, and chaines of gold, all on horsebacke, in the euening by torchlight.

In the moneth of December great frosts, the Thamis nigh ouer frozen at London brdge, but thawed about one weeke before Christmas, & began again to freeze on S. Iohns day the 27. and a great snow on the 28. so that the Tha- mis was againe nigh frozen as before, but on Pelopores day it thawed.

Ann. reg. 41.
Great frosts.

In the beginning of the moneth of January, souldiers in Essex and di- uers other shires, as also in the City of London, were pressed, and furnished of al things necessary for the wars, were sent into the low Countries, there to remaine in seruice, and place of olde souldiers, from thence to be transported and sent into Ireland. All subsidy men in the city, were sessed at eight pence the pound goods or lands towards this charge.

Souldiers into the low countries.

Also in this moneth great loanes of money were demanded, and granted by the citizens of London, besides all other charges, at that time.

In the month of Feb. about the 28. day, a fifteenth was granted and paid by the citizens of London, for the setting forth of more souldiers into Ireland.

Souldiers sent into Ireland.

The 1599

Earle of Essex
lieutenant generall, rode through the Ci-tie of London towards Ireland.

The 27. of March, about two of the clocke in the afternone, the right honorable Robert earle of Essex, lieutenant generall, lord high marshall, &c. departed from Seding laue, through Fenchurch street, Grace street, Cornhill, Cheape, &c. towards Fildon, Highgate, and rode that night to S. Albons, towards Ireland, he had a great traine of Noble men, and gentlemen, on horse backe before him, to accompany him on his iourney, his coaches followed him. He had also (by the pleasure of God) a great shoyre, or twaine, of raine, and haile, with some claps of thunder as he rode through the citie.

The months of March, Aprill, and May, cold & drie, but on Whit Sunday great raie, and high waters, the like of long time had not beene seene: the months of June, and July, hot and drie for the most part, thus much for weathering.

Ships prepared to the seas, and men trained for the warre, by the Londoners.

This yere in the moneth of August, the beginning thereof, politically preuenting danger that might be feared to happen, by occasion of some preparation of shipping reported to haue bene made in Spaine, and to be intended to the annoyance of this estate: The Citizens of London were charged, with the furnishing and setting forth to the sea, of twelue ships, since encreased to fifteene. Also with 6000. men, and furniture for the warres, which men, with all speede, and as it were on a sodaine were made in a readinesse. Three thousand of them were daily trained in the field vnder Captaines, Citizens of the same city, from the first of August, &c. The other three thousand appointed to attend vpon her maiesties Royall person, were also likewise trained vnder Captaines, in braue furniture, for they were householders, of accompt, all which their charges, was partly borne by themselves, the residue perforce by subsidies, leuied of the citizens.

In this meane time, to witte on the first of August at night by commandement from her maiestie, the chaines were drawne oorthwart the strates and lanes of the City, and lanthorns with lights, of candles (eight in the pound) hanged out at euery mans doore, there to burne all the night, and so from night to night, vpon paine of death, and great watches kept in the strates, which hanging out of lights so continued, some foureteene nights or longer.

Horsemen and foote men trained in the shires and mustered at London.

In this meane space, many thousands of horsemen and foote men, chosen persons, well appointed for the warres, trained vpper in armour with braue liueries, vnder valsaunt Captaines, in diuers shires, were brought vpper to London, where they were lodged in the suburbs, townes, and villages nere adioyning, from the eight of August, till the twentieth, or thre and twentieth: in which time the horsemen were shewed in Saint James fielde, the footemen trained in other grounds about the Citie, and then all discharged homewards, with charge to be alwaies readie at one houres warning. And so it followed that on the five and twentieth of August, being saturday at night, postes were sent after them, to recall the horsemen, presently to returne to London, with all speede possible: which charge they prepared to performe. But on monday following the saide postes, were likewise sent to staie them at home, or to returne them backe, whose forwarding in seruice of her maiestie was such, as the like hath not bene seene, or heard of, towards any prince of this realme, or other, to the great happinesse, and comfort of her Maiestie, whom whom God (amongst many other blessings) hath blessed with so dutifull, loving, and obedient subiects.

The 26. of August being Sunday, before sixe of the clocke in the morning, by commandement from her maiestie, the 3000. souldiers, trained by by the citizens, were all in armour in the streets, attending on their Captaines till past 7. of the clocke, at which time, being thoroughly wet by a great shewre of raine, were sent home againe for that day.

On the next morrow being the 27. the other 3000. citizens, householders, and subsidie men, shewed on the piles ende, where they trained all that daie, and other daies following vnder their Captaines, also citizens, untill the 4. of September, and so ceased their training for that time, and what soeuer had bene feared, a good peace within this realme hath since followed, which God long time continue and increase amongst vs.

On Michaellmas eue, the right honorable Robert Earle of Essex, lieutenant generall, lord high marshall, &c. being returned out of Ireland, came to the Court at Ponsich, and spake with her maiestie.

The 13. of Nouember, the maiors, aldermen, and sheriffes of London, in scarlet, and the commons a great number of them in velvet coates, & chaines of golde, all on horsebacke, receiued the Quenes maiestie at Westminster by torch light.

After the 17. of Nouember was Iustings diuers daies at Westminster, with other triumphes. An. reg. 42.

Sunday the 23. of December, winde west and by south, boysterous and great, wherethrough the toppes of many chimneies were ouerthrowne, lead blowne off churches, trees, and barnes blowne downe, with also a tiltboate from London towardees Chawesend, lost against Woolwich, with 30. persons, men and women, whereof eleuen were saued. Winde boisterous: Tiltboate and people drowned

The 11. of January, Henry Adlington, a fencer was hanged without the barres of Alogate, for killing of a man there, and after hanged in chaines on the piles ende.

The 20. of January began a frost, that within one seuen night after the river of Thamis was nigh ouer frozen at London bridge. Great frost.

The 7. of February, the honorable Charles Blunt lord Mountjoy, hauing taken his leaue at the Court, departed through Holborne towardees Ireland, as lieutenant there, souldiers out of diuers shires were sent before him, and also after him in this moneth of February, namely the Citizens of London at their owne charges furnished and sent three hundred at that time into Ireland. Charles Blunt L. Mountjoy departed towardees Ireland lieutenant there.

The 23. of March being Easter day it snowed and was extream cold, and so continued till the last of March. 1600

It snowed on the 30. of March, and on the 4. of Aprill, which whole moneth following, with also the moneth of May was cold and drie, with frosts enerie morning, except some three daies little raine, which coldnes of the spring, and drynesse of the ground, made men doubtfull of any good haruest to succede, whereupon, and by meanes of some late transporting over the seas, procured by

by the Justices of the shires, but more by unconscionable farmers hoarding up their coine, badgers, and other coine-mongers, keeping the same from the markets, or extorting that price they listed, even upon a sodaine, namely, wheate was raised from three shillings to five, seven and eight shillings the bushell, still increasing their price. Untill the Quænes most excellent Maie<sup>tie</sup>, perceiving how bitter a thing the scarcitie of victuals is to the poorer sort of her people, published by proclamation that her Maie<sup>ties</sup> had, not onely recommended precisely to her counsell and other principall ministers, that all manner of graine might bee kept within the Realme, but likewise directed them to punish such ingrocers, and foreshallers of coine as by greedinesse laboured to racke things up to vnrasonable prices, &c. since the which time the price of graine, hath highly fallen, as bring in hurters hands.

Souldiers sent to Ireland.

In the moneth of July, two fiftiēnes were granted, and collected by the Citizens of London, toward the furniture, and setting out of 300. souldiers into Ireland. Also out of diuers shires souldiers were likewise furnished, and sent.

This yere in the moneth of Aprill, Richard lord bishop of London, with two other Commissioners, to witte, doctor Parkins, and doctor Swale, were sent in Embassage to Emden, there to treat with the Commissioners from the king of Denmarke. Those returned into England the eight of July next following. In which service the said Reverend father so wisely, bountifullie, and honorably carried himselfe, that her Maie<sup>ties</sup>, verie gratioudly accepted his proceedings.

Conspiracy against the king of Scots.

Tuesday the fift of August, Charles James king of Scots in Scotland escaped a strange and strong conspiracie, practised by the Earle Gowry and his brother, as at large appeared in a booke thereof extant, first published and printed in Scotland, and since in England.

Meanes for an intreaty of peace to be had.

A Peace beeing concluded at Aersin in France, in the yere 1598. betwæne Henry the fourth king of France and Navarre, and Philip the second king of Spaine: the Quænes Maie<sup>ties</sup> of England was likewise invited by the French king, her Confederate and Allie, to dispose her selfe vnto a like treaty of Amittie with Spaine. To the effecting whereof, he had procured the consent of the king of Spaine then living. After whose decease, Philip the 3. succeeding his father in the Crowne, the same was againe renewed and solicited by Andreas of Austria the Gouvernour of the low Countreies, and the Bishop of Constance, both for the house of Burgundy and kingdome of Spaine, afterwards ratified by the Archduke Albert returned out of Spaine with the Infanta his wife. Upon which former promise made vnto her maie<sup>ties</sup>, there was at length induced, to condescend vnto a treatie of peace at Bologne in France, a place chosen by mutuall agrément on either side, with the assent and good liking of the French king: whither both Princes sent their embassadours, furnished with ample power and authoritie in that behalfe, where the English Embassadours arrived the sixteenth day of May, in this present yere of our Lord God 1600. being the date prestred for this assembly, and the Spanishe the twentieth of the same moneth. The Commissioners on the

the English side were these: sir Henry Neuill knight, her Maiesties ordinary Embassadoꝝ resident with the French king, John Harbert esquire, her maiesties second secretarie of Estate, Robert Beale esquire, her maiesties secretarie in the North parte, and Thomas Edmonds esquire, her maiesties secretarie for the French tong. The Commissioners for Spaine were Baltazar de Caniga & Fonseca, Embassadoꝝ resident for the king of Spaine, with the Archduke of Austria in the lowe Countries, and Ferdinando Carrillo Doctor of the Ciuill lawe: vnto whom were adioyned on the Archdukes part John Richardoꝝ president of the Councell of the saide Archduke, and Lewis Verreyken the saide Archdukes Audencer. The Commissioners on both sides being viewed and considered of, some question for the precedence and superiority of place fell into disputation and debate, her maiestie chalenging the same as due vnto her before the time of the Emperoz Charles (as appeareth by Volateran) in the time of king Henrie the seventh her Highnesse grandfather, when this selfesame difference betwene both these crownes comming into question, the Pope preferred England, and adiudged vnto this crowne the most honorable place. But for as much as the same was contradicted by the Spanish Commissioners, who not onely refused to yald preescancie vnto her maiestie, but also to admit of an equalitie, or of anie other indifferent and middle course, whereby the honor of her maiestie might be preferred: the present treatie (which hitherto was performed only by some private visitations and conferences of some one or two of the Commissioners on either side, without comming to anie generall meeting or colloquie) was on the second day of August in the yere aforesaid for this time belaid, and by mutual assent of the Commissioners on both sides, according to their seuerall authorities respectiuelly granted vnto them in this behalfe, suspended, vntill the ende of fiftie daies following, in which meane while it might be vnderstande what should be the determination of both Princes for a further proceeding in the saide Colloquie of peace, at some other time, and place: wherein as yet no certaine resolution hath bene hitherto taken.

Commissioners sent out to treat of a peace to be concluded.

Our commissioners for peace returned out of France.

Embassadoꝝ from Morocco and Barbary.

About the 8. of August, arrived at Dover, certaine Embassadoꝝ and assistants, firste in number, sent from the king of Marocco, in Barbary; these were by certaine English Gentlemen conducted to Grauesend, and from thence, by sir Thomas Gerard knight marshall, and other gentlemen, with the Barbarie merchants towards London, where they were landed at the Tower wharffe on the 15. of August, from whence they were conveyed in foure Coaches to the Royall Exchange, and there lodged in the house of Anthonie Radcliffe esquire, of London merchant tayloꝝ.

The 20. of August they rode in Coaches through Cheape, to Westminster, from thence by water ouer to Lambhith, and thence again in Coaches to the Court at Honesuch, where they were honorably entertained, and returned the same night to their lodging at London.

The 10. of September, the saide Embassadoꝝ of Barbary were againe continued to the Court then at Watlands, there to take their leaue of her maiestie, but were required to staie to see the Iusting and other triumphes at Westminster.

Westminster on the seventeenth of November.

Souldiers sent
to Ireland.

In the moneth of September souldiers press, in, and about the Citie of London, to the number of three hundred and fiftie masterlesse men, vagrant persons: and such like out of other partes of this realme to be sent into Ireland: Divers of them running from their Captaines and Colours, being afterward taken, were hanged for example to other.

Ambassadors
from Rowia and Muscouia.

The 18. of September, certaine Ambassadors from Muscouie, or Rowia, landing at the Tower wharffe, were there receiued by the Aldermen of London in scarlet, the Muscouie merchants, and a number about two hundred) of the principall companies, in velvet coates, and chaines of golde, all well mounted on horsebacke, conueied them riding in eight Coaches, from the Tower vp to Aldgate, from thence to the Leaden hall, downe Grace Stréte, by Frenchurch Stréte, and then downe Rode lane towards Welings gate, and there lodged in the house sometime pertaining to Sir Cuthbert Bucklegham.

The 14. of October the said Ambassadors from Rowia and Muscouia, rode to the Court and had audience before hir maiestie.

Trinitie hospitall in Croydon
founded.

This yere the most reuerende father Iohn Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, did finish that notable & memorable monument of our time, to wit, his hospitall of the holy Trinitie in Croydon, in the County of Surrey, by him there founded and builded of stone and bricke, for reliefe and sustentation of certaine poore people. As also a faire scholl house for the encrease of literature, together with a large dwelling house for the scholl master his vse, and these premises he hath through Gods favorable assistance in his own life time performed and persited, for that (as my selfe haue heard him say) he woulde not be to his executors, a cause of their damnation, remembreing the good advice that an ancient father hath left written to all posteritie: Tutor via est, ut bonum quod quisquis post mortem sperat agi per alios, agat dum vivit ipse, per se: It is a way farre more safe for a man to doe good and charitable deedes by himselfe whilest he liueth: then to hope that others will doe the same for him after his death.

Gregorie.

On Thursdaie the thirteenth of November, her Maiestie being most honourable attended on, by the most honourable Prelates, and Nobles, and Judges of the Realme, was receiued nere vnto Chelsep, by the Lord Mayor of London, with his brethren the Aldermen all in scarlet, besides to the number of five hundred Citizens, in Coates of velvet, and chaines of gold, on horsebacke, euerie of them hauing two staffe to ches to attende on them: And they all waited on her, to her royall Pallace at Westminster.

An. reg. 43.

The 17. of November, and the 43. yere of hir maiesties raigne, there were most princely Iusts performed at White hal in honoz of the quéens holyday, by three earles, foure lords, seven knights, and nine gentlemen, hir maiesties pensioners. At these iusts was so great an assembly of people, as the like hath not bin seen in that place before: There were also present sundry ambassadors, as namely from the French king, the king of Barbary and Fez, & the emperor of Russia. There was no great harme that hapned (thanked be God) considering the multitude; but that one arme or branch of a great Elm broke, which stood

stood in the parke, by being ouer laden with people; and from whence there fell thre men, that were soze bzused and dangerously hurt.

Thus good Reader, I haue brought these my Annales of England (nowe latelie enlarged with notes of antiquitie, not before published in our Vulgare) from the first comming of Bruce into this Island (of whome it is saide it tooke the name of Britaine) vntill this present yeere of Christ 1600. and the 43. of the most happie raigne of our soueraigne Ladie Elizabeth, whose Partitie, I praye God long and manie yeeres to prosper, and ratigne ouer vs, to his glorie.

¶ Of the Vniuersities in England, and Colledges

in the same, with the founders, and principall benefactors.

I haue before time reioiced (saith Erasmus Roterdam) that Englande was so well furnished with so manie men of excellent learning, but now I begin to enuie her felicitie, for that shee so flourisheth with all kinde of literature, that by taking the commendation thereof from other Regions, she doth as it were markehouliie obscure them. And yet this commendation is not as now first due to England, in the which (it is well knowne) haue bene of long time, men of great learning. The Vniuersities prooue this to be true. which haue for their antiquities and worthines, contended with the most auncient, and moost vniuersities in the world.

Colledges.

Colledges and Hals in the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, to the number of 21. indowed with lands and possessions for maintenance of Students in all manner of Sciences, first he accounted according to the time of their beginnings, although at this day by the altering of foundations they are but 16. left.

The common Schooles.

The common Schooles of the Vniuersitie haue bene of such auncient continuance, as there is no certaine mention how or when they began. But the faire new building which now standeth foure square, like vnto the fashion of a Colledge, was made by successe of times vpon the costs of the Vniuersitie, and diuers benefactors in order as hereafter followeth.

First, the Philosophie Schoole aboue and beneath, sometime called the Schoole of Canon lawe (that is to saie, the West side of the same quadrant) was builded at the charges of the Vniuersitie, and other good benefactors, since the yere of our Lord God, 1136. The Schoole of Diuinitie, and ouer that the newe Chappell (that is to say, the North side) was begun by the Vniuersitie vpon contributions and collections of sundrie persons. But the same was finished in the yere of Christ, 1400. by the erectours of Sir William Thorpe Knight, sometime chiefe Justice of Englande. The Schoole of Art, and ouer that the olde Librarie (that is to saie, the South side) was made by the Vniuersitie of the ruines of the olde Schooles. The gate of the same Schooles, with the walkes on each side thereof, and the newe Librarie (that is to saie, all the East side) was builded at the costs of Thomas Rotherham Archbyschop of Yorke, with some contribution of the Vniuersitie in the yere of Christ, 1470. And in the yere, 1476. was perfected, as now it standeth.

Peter colledge. Saint Peters Colledge, commonly called Peter House, was founded in the time of King Henry the third, by Hugh Balsham prior of Ely, in the yere of Christ 1256. This was after enlarged in the time of King Edward the second, by master Robert Lyrling, who gaue a house with the appurtenances, wherein sometime dwelled the religious men called Frates de sacco or de penitencia Iesu Christi. Likewise another house was giuen by Ryherus de Aylesham and Iohn of Felmingham. But the indowment was giuen by the saide Hugh Balsham, who was after the 15. bishop of Ely, and finished the Colledge in Anno 1284.

Michael house. The Colledge or house of Saint Michael, was founded by Herueus or Herueus de Stanton, sometime Chancellor of the Erchequer, and a canon of Yorke and Wells, who obtained licence of King Edward the seconds in the seuententh yere of his raigne, to erect the same Colledge for a certaine number of Schollers and Chaplaines, to be governed by a master according to his owne ordinaunces and rules: granting farther by the same licence to the saide Herueus, power to vnite vnto his Colledge the aduowson of Saint Michaels church in Cambridge, which was after moze largely indowed with lands and rents, rents, as well by him as by diuers other good benefactors of latter time. At this day it is taken into Trinitie Colledge founded by King H. the eight.

The Uniuersitie Hall or Colledge was founded by the Chancelor and masters of the Uniuersitie of Cambridge, in the yere 1326. And the 19. yere of King Edward the second (master Richard Badew being then Chancelor) by on a ground, whereupon stood two houses belonging of old time to the saide Chancelor and Uniuersitie in Milnestrate. King Edward the third in the 20. yere of his raigne, gaue licence of Mortmaine to the master and schollers of the saide new erected Colledge, to take lands and tenements to the yereley value of forty pounds for ever, for their maintenance in study, at the request of the Chancelor and masters of the said Uniuersitie. Since that it was much increased by master Walker Thacksted master of the same Colledge. But now it is united into the foundation of the lady Elizabeth de Burgo countesse of Clare.

Uniwersity
Hall.

The Kings Hall or Colledge had his first originall of King Edward the second, who of his owne deuotion maintained there for a time 32. schollers, in studie of learning and knowledge, who for certaine yeres after were payde their salaries or stipends, sometime by the sheriffe of Cambridge, sometime by the prior and couent of Saint Neotes or Needes, and sometime out of the Erchequer. But King Edward the third by his charter dated the seueneth daie of October, in the 11. yere of his raigne, erected there a Colledge in the honor of God and his blessed mother S. Mary the virgin, and all holy Saints, for a master and 32. schollers, calling it by the name of the Kings Hall. The ground whereof he purchased of master Robert Croiland, and after indowed it with lands and possessions, which so continued a Colledge till the time of King H. the 8. who united the same to his new foundation of Trinitie colledge.

Kings Hall.

Clare Hall was founded by the lady Elizabeth de Burgo widow, sometime the wife of John de Burgo Earle of Ulster in Ireland, daughter of sir Gilbert of Clare Earle of Gloucester, and one of the heires of sir Gilbert of Clare her brother the last Earle of Gloucester, she was first married to John Burgh earle of Ulster in Ireland, after to Theobald of Clerdon, and thirdly to sir Roger Damary, and had issue by them all, she taking into her foundation the forenamed Uniuersitie Hall by the resignation of master Walter Thacksted master of the saide house, and the consent of master Richard Badew the first founder, called it all vnder the name of Clare Hall: and became the only founder thereof in the time of King Edward the third, about the yere of our Lord 1347.

Clare Hall.

Pembroke Hall was founded by the lady Mary of Valentia Countesse of Pembroke, wife of Audomare de Valentia earle of Pembroke, and daughter of Guido Earle of Saint Paule in France, she obtained licence of King Edward the third (whose cosen she was) to founde this Colledge of a master and thirtie schollers or moe, at her pleasure: And to assigne them for their habitation a place in Cambridge of her owne inheritance, with thre other messuages which she purchased, and 100. l. of yeerlie rent in aduowsons of churches for ever, and called it Aula de Valence Maria, Anno 1347.

Pembroke Hall

Corpus Christi
Colledge.

The Colledge of Corpus Christi & our blessed lady, commonly called Bennet Colledge, was founded by the alderman and brethren of Corpus Christi guild, and the brethren of our Lady guild in Cambridge, at the instance of the first Henry Duke of Lancaster, who in the 26. yeere of king Edward the third, obtained a licence of Portmain for the said alderman and brethren, that upon a messuage to them belonging in Cambridge, they might erect this colledge for schollers, chaplaines, and others, to be gouerned by a master, according to their rules and ordinances. By the same licence was also appropriated into the colledge for euer the aduowson of S. Bennets church standing before their gate. This duke of Lancaster in the 28. yeere of the said king Edward the third, was elected alderman of the same guildes, who recognised the statutes of the colledge not by the dukes seale, but by the seale of the alderman of those guildes.

Trinity Hall.

Trinity Hall was of olde time an hostell or house of studie. And in the time of king Edward the thirde, John Cranden prior of Ely and his count procured the same hostell for their monks to studie in. To this house were added three other dwelling houses by master Richard Ling Chancelor of the Uniuerstie, and Archibald of Norwich, master Walter Elueden, and master Simon Rekinghale parson of Kollesby, either of them one house. And in the 28. yeeres of the reigne of king Edward the thirde, master Robert Stratton, John Trunch, Walter Bakton, Walter de Aldeby, and Peter de Bitterings, gaue toward the enlargement thereof one messuage and seuen pieces of void ground. And likewise the said Walter Bakton, and Peter Bitterings, and Thomas Walsingham, gaue one other messuage called Draxes entrie. All which being thus laid together, were after purchased by master William Bateman bishop of Norwich, who by the kings licence builded thereon the Colledge, as now for the most part it standeth, in the worship of the holy Trinity, and indowd it with lands and possessions, and became founder thereof, though since it hath bene increased by diuers good benefactors: hee deceased at Autun in France (where he was sent on the kings message) the first day of Januarie, in the 11. yeere of his consecration, and of our Lord God 1354.

Gonville Hall.

Gonville Hall was founded by Edmond Gonville parson of Terlington in Norfolk, in the two and twentieth yeere of king Edward the third, who for that purpose obtained a licence at the suite of sir Gualter de Manney, to erect a colledge for a master and twentie schollers, to be students in the art of Logicke and other sciences, upon a ground where sometimes stode three houses and a garden in Lutbotow lane, which he purchased for his money. And in the 26. yeere of the same king, the rowne of that colledge was enlarged by the gift of two other houses, the one by the Chancelor and masters of the Uniuerstie, and the other by the master and brethren of Saint Johns hospitall in Cambridge. This Edmond Gonville at his decease having a good summe of money, commended the further finishing of the same colledge to master William Bateman bishop of Norwich, which he performed both in the buildings and indowment with lands, and caused it to be named Gonville Hall. At this day it is vnitied into the colledge of doctor Caius, and called by the name of Gonville and Caius colledge.

The

The Colledge of Gods-house was first founded by master William Bingham parson of Saint Iohn Zacharie in London, vpon a tenement and thre garden plats in Milnestrate, which he bought for his money, and procured licence of king Henry the first, in the twentieth yere of his raigne, to erect the re- on his said colledge for 25. persons and a prouost, to be geuernd by such rules and statutes, as should be assigned vnto them by the said William Bingham, and by William Wimbell, William Millington, and William Gull doctors of diuinitie, and Iohn Tilney doctor of Law, and the longest liuer of thent. This colledge was chiefly erected for such as should professe the study of Grammar, whereof (as it seemeth) there was great want in those daies, not only in both the vniuersities, but also throughout the realme. In few yeres after k. Henry being determined to found his great Colledge of our Lady and S. Nicholas, obtained of the saide William Bingham a resignation of that house and ground for his said new colledge, and in stee thereof gaue vnto him two other places in the Preachers strete, belonging sometime the one of them to the abbot of Miltie, and the other to the priorelle of Deny, therewith he also granted a licence of Portmaine for one hundred pound by yere towards their maintenance for ever. But shortly after the said William Bingham in the yere 1447. resigned vnto the said king Henry the foresaid colledge, to the intent that hee should be accounted the onely founder thereof as he was indebe. But now it is annexed to Christs colledge founded by the lady Margaret countesse of Richmond and Darby.

The Kings Colledge of our blessed ladie and Saint Nicholas was first founded by king Henry the first, vnder the name of a Rector and schollers, in the nineteenth yere of his raigne. And after in the one and twentieth yere of his raigne, he translated the forme of that foundation into the name of prouost and schollers. Edward the fourth in displeasure withowen from this Colledge so much land as the founder had giuen them, and after restored them to the yeerly valew of five hundred markes. After that king Henry the seventh finished the same worke of that notable chappell begun by king Henry the first, and king Henry the eight finished the glasing, stalles, and pavement of fine Marble. This colledge was ment by king Henry the first, to haue bene one of the beautifullst houses in this land, the plat whereof is more particularly set out in this my Annales.

The Colledge of Saint Margaret and Saint Bernard, commonlie called Queenes Colledge, was first begun by Quene Margaret wife to king Henry the first, and daughter of Reyner king of Sicillie and Jerusalem, who procured Portmaine for the same of 100. pound by yere, in anno 1441. at the intercession of master Andrew Duckett, parson of Saint Buttolphes in Cambidge, sometime principall of Bernard Hostel, which Hostel he purchased and gaue to the said colledge. And by his owne money and helpe of others, purchased certaine other tenements and builded the colledge, being the first president of the same: and gaue as well in his life time, as by his testament, diuers summes of money and parcels of land: procuring likewise certaine giftes of George Duke of Clarence, of Cicely Dutches of Poike, of Richard duke of Glocester, and Anne dutchesse of the same, of Edward earle of Salisburie, of Maude countesse of Arford, and Marmaduke Lomelie bishop of Lincoln, sometime Chancelor of the Vniuersitie. But the creation of this foundation goeth now in the name of king Henry the first, as appeareth by his charter dated the third day of December in the 25. yere of his raigne, who made the same vpon his owne ground, where now it standeth in Milne streete, for one president and foure fellowes or mo, as their liuelode should extend, according to such rules and statutes as should be deuised by Ma<sup>r</sup>. Iohn Somerset, chancelor of the Erchequer, Iohn Langton chancelor of the Vniuersitie, Richard Cawdreie, Peter Hirford, Gilbert Northington, and Thomas Bolyn, and by the longest liuers of them. After all which, queene Elizabeth the wife of king E. the 4. made perfect the defectes of that Colledge, in the yere 1465. King Richard the 3. endowd this colledge, with 500. markes the yere lands.

Katherine Hal.

Katherine Hall was founded by Ma<sup>r</sup>. Robert Woodlarke docto<sup>r</sup> of Divinity, chancelor of the Vniuersitie, and prouost of the kings Colledge, to the honor of our blessed Ladie and S. Katherine, the virgin and marty<sup>r</sup>, in the time of E. Edward the 4. about the yere of Christ, 1475. for the number of one Ma<sup>s</sup>ter and three fellowes or mo, vpon a certaine messuage in Milne streete, by him purchased, wherewith he also obtained of the said king a licence of mortmaine for 40. markes of yereley rent towards their maintenance for euer. Since it is enlarged by other good benefactors.

Jesus colledge.

Jesus Colledge was of old time a Monasterie of religious women of S. Kadegund, which monasterie being destitute of government, the edifices fallen in decaye, the gods and ornaments of the church wasted, the lands diminished, and in conclusion a small number of nunnes left, being but two, whereof the one ready to depart, and the other an infant, were brought into such povertrie, that they were not able to relieue themselves, and therefore forced to depart and leaue the house desolate: whereupon Iohn Alcocke bishop of Elye, obtained licence of king Henry the 7. in the yere 1497. to found in place thereof a Colledge to the honor of the holy Trinitie, and our blessed Ladie, and S. Iohn the Euangelist, and S. Kadegund the virgin, for the number of one maister, sixe fellowes, and a certaine number of schollers, to be gouerned by such rules and statutes as he should appoint vnto them.

This Iohn Alcocke was bozne at Beuerley in Yorkshire, and builded a free schole at Rinkstone vpon Hull, and a chappell on the southside of the parish church wherein his parents were buried: He builded likewise a most beautifull monument in the great church of Elye, where himselfe lieth buried, and did in his time so many and so good actes, as would require a long treatise to set them forth. The rents of this Colledge, and the number of fellowes and schollers haue been moze amplified at seuerall times by sir Robert Reade knight, chiefe Justice of the common Pleas, docto<sup>r</sup> Eleston, docto<sup>r</sup> Royson, and docto<sup>r</sup> Fuller.

Christs Colledge.

Christs Colledge was first begun by King Henry the first, and after his decease by the ladie Margaret Countesse of Richmond and Derby, daughter and heire of Iohn Duke of Somerset, and mother of king Henry the seventh, in the place where sometime the Colledge of Gods-house stode in the Wyre, chers street, which colledge was first founded by William Bingham parson of Saint John Sabary in London and other, but because it came neuer to perfection, she obtained of the said King her sonne his charter dated the first day of Maye in the 20. yere of his raigne, and the yere of our Lord God 1505. to increase the number of students there, translating it according to her disposition, so that from thenceforth it should be called Christs Colledge, where in she allowed by her Will to the number of 60. persons, with servants to them convenient and necessary. The Abbey of Creeke being dissolved the lands were given to that colledge.

A master, six schollers, twelve
and 47.
schollers dis-
pens.

Saint Johns Colledge was of ancient time an Hospitall of regular chanoons, founded by Nigellus the second bishop of Ely, and treasurer to King Henry the first, in the yere of Christ 1134. After him many yeres Hugh Balsham, alias Norwold bishop of Ely, obtained licence of King Edward the first in the yere 1280. to translate the order of that house, and placed therein a certain number of schollers, to cohabite among the religious persons, assigning to each part their portions by their owne consents, aswell of the landes as the goods: so that alwaies y<sup>e</sup> more people of ancient time there relieved, should not be defrauded of their accustomed charitie.

Saint Johns
Colledge.

The noble ladie Margaret countesse of Richmond and Derby, being informed, that the number of religious brethren was greatly diminished, and now brought but to two, the house decayed, and the lands and goods wasted, procured licence of her nephew King Henry the 8. to erect in the same place a Colledge in the worship of S. John the Euangelist, but she being prevented by death, left the execution thereof to her executors, Richard Foxe Bishop of Winchester, John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, Charles Somerset lord Herbert, afterward created Earle of Worcester, Sir Thomas Louell, Sir Henry Marney, and Sir John S. John Knights, Henry Horneby, and Hugh Ashton clerkes, who with her goods finished the buildinges, and with the remaine of the lands that was in the house before, amplified with her owne landes, founded the said Colledge for a master and fifty schollers, in the yere 1509.

Magdalen Colledge was first an Hostell or Hall, inhabited by diuers monks of sundry monasteries (and therefore of old called Ponks Colledge) being sent from their abbeies to the Vniuersity for to study.

Magdalen
Colledge.

Edward Duke of Buckingham had an intention to bestowe great cost in the building thereof, who builded by the hall in the yere of Christ 1519. whereupon it was for a time called Buckingham Colledge.

But these buildinges being left by the duke vnperfect, were after brought to some better passe by the prior of Ely, and the abbots of Ramsey, and Walden, and so continued a place of study for the monks till the generall suppression of monasteries made by King Henry the 8.

At length the Lord Thomas Audeley Baron of Walden, and Chancelloz of England, founded there a colledge vnder the name of S. Mary Magdalen, and indowd it with possessions, in the yere of our Lorde 1542. But being prevented by death, so that what he had begun, he left vnfinished, Sir Christophor Wray Lord chief Justice of England repaired and beautified it.

In the Vniuersities of England (saith Erasmus Roterodame) there be certayne colledges, in the which there is so much Religion, so streight discipline, in such integritie of life, that if you did see it, you woulde negle in comparison of them, all monkish rules and orders.

All the cities in England, manie Market Townes, and villages, haue free Grammar Schooles erected in them for the further increase of learning and vertue. Vertuous men haue to the perpetuall registering of their good names done these good dedes, learned men haue not bene all the doers. Some therefore for the supplie in other, of that which wanted in themselves, haue done wisely, all to this purpose: that vertue and learning vntied and knitte together, might in this our age make a learned vertuous worlde, haue done goodlie. It were much (they are so manie) in a small rounne to comprehend them, but the chiefe and worthy patrones of the rest are,
